Bush Administration Seeks To Maintain Aid To Colombia. The AP (10/24, Goodman) reports the Bush administration "will ask Congress to maintain current aid levels to Colombia - running at more $600 million yearly - to support the Latin American nation's fight against terrorism and drug trafficking." Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns "said the mostly military aid would remain unchanged through at least 2008. … The call for continued funding is a major boost to President Alvaro Uribe, Washington's staunchest ally in Latin America, and comes despite the failure of efforts to reduce the country's cocaine trade."

In Bogota, the Miami Herald (10/25) reports Plan Colombia formally "ended in late 2005 with outlays topping $4 billion. The U.S. Congress extended the aid this year as the two countries negotiate a longer-term arrangement. The U.S. money has improved the security situation here, but its impact on the cocaine and heroin industries remains unclear."

Also in Bogota, Prensa Latina (10/24) reports Uribe and Burns "are analyzing Tuesday results of the Colombia Plan, which many consider has failed in wiping out the drug trade in this nation. Until Thursday, Burns will be in Colombia on an official visit accompanied by top functionaries of the departments of State, Defense and Justice, of the Agency for International Development and the Office of National Drug Control Policy. Several analysts and politicians from both countries think the Colombia Plan has also been insufficient in reducing illegal drug crops and eliminating guerrillas in the Andean state."

Two Congressmen Urge Rumsfeld To Step Up Afghanistan Anti-Drug Efforts. The AP (10/25) reports two GOP congressmen "have told Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld that more needs to be done about Afghanistan's opium crisis because of increased violence and terrorism against coalition forces. The opium and illicit drug trafficking has greatly increased in recent months and threatens to 'totally corrupt all of the new Afghan democratic institutions we support,' Illinois Reps. Henry Hyde and Mark Kirk said in an Oct. 12 letter." The congressmen "suggested that the Drug Enforcement Administration combat the problem by focusing on drug kingpins in Afghanistan, heroin processing labs and drug convoys. Hyde and Kirk said the convoys that carry the drugs out of the country bring back land mines and modern weapons bought with drug money from the Taliban and other anti-coalition forces." More than 30 newspapers used the AP story, including the Washington Post, Wall Street Journal, San Francisco Chronicle, Houston Chronicle, Los Angeles Times, and Newsday.

DOJ_NMG_0086324

UPI (10/24) cites the USA Today story included in yesterday's briefing and writes, "Others officials, including Rumsfeld, voiced similar concerns that drug money is fueling a resurgence of Taliban and al-Qaida forces in Afghanistan. Rumsfeld has not responded to Hyde's letter, but a Defense Department spokeswoman said the department is treating the matter seriously."

IMMIGRATION:

Role Of DNA Testing In Immigration Examined. The Washington Post (10/25, A1, Aizenman, 748K) reports in a front page article that while the use of DNA testing to prove family relationship in immigration cases has "been invaluable" for those lacking sufficient documentation, "some immigration lawyers worry that US authorities are increasingly requiring DNA tests even when the paperwork is in order -- adding substantial costs and delays to an arduous process." Though State and Homeland Security department officials "said they do not track the number of DNA tests submitted by people seeking to sponsor a relative for a visa," the Post notes that Fairfax Identity Laboratories, one of two DNA laboratories in the Washington region accredited to handle immigration cases, said "the number of requests for tests has increased about 20 percent, to about 2,000, in the past year."

TAX:

Thomas Questions Tax-Exempt Status Of NCAA Athletics. In his column for the Washington Post (10/25, A17) George Will writes that earlier this month, Rep. Bill Thomas, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, wrote "an eight-page letter to the president of the National Collegiate Athletic Association, asking awkward questions. Thomas wonders how, or whether, big-time college sports programs, which generate billions of tax-exempt dollars -- CBS pays the NCAA an annual average of $545 million, mainly for the rights to televise the March Madness basketball tournament -- further the purposes for which educational institutions are granted tax-exempt status. … In recent decades the NCAA has increased the number of games that football and men's basketball teams are allowed to play. Thomas wonders how these changes help athletes improve their academic performances. Perhaps these changes have pecuniary purposes?"

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Education Department Eases Restrictions On Single-Sex Classes. The AP (10/25, Feller) reports that the Education Department yesterday "announced rules that will make it easier to create single-sex classes or schools, a plan that's been expected for almost three years." Education Secretary Margaret Spellings "said more parents deserve to have the option. … 'Research shows that some students may learn better in single-sex education environments,' Spellings said, careful not to offer an outright endorsement. 'The Department of Education is committed to giving communities more choices in how they go about offering varied learning environments,' she said." The AP adds, "To be published Wednesday and take effect Nov. 24, the rules update the enforcement of Title IX, the landmark anti-discrimination law. The current language has stood since 1975."

The New York Times (10/25, Schemo, 1.21M) reports that the new rules "will allow districts to create single-sex schools and classes as long as enrollment is voluntary. School districts that go that route must also make coeducational schools and classes of 'substantially equal' quality available for members of the excluded sex." The Times adds, "The federal action is likely to accelerate efforts by public school systems to experiment with single-sex education, particularly among charter schools."

The Washington Post (10/25, A4, Strauss, 748K) reports that the Education Department "made the change even though it reported a year ago that there was not enough evidence to say whether single-sex education is beneficial or harmful to students."

USA Today (10/25, Toppo, 2.27M) reports, "The shift is the biggest in 31 years and for the first time allows schools to separate students by gender if they believe it helps -- a standard that is under debate in the existing research." USA adds, "Spellings said research shows that 'some students may learn better' in single-sex environments, but other administration officials Tuesday admitted that the best research offers only tepid support."

The Washington Times (10/25, Price, 88K) reports, "The guidelines have been studied for four years. Education officials began examining policy changes after research indicated that some students learn and behave better in boys-only or girls-only environments. … Education Department officials in a teleconference yesterday made it clear that the evidence is mixed. 'The research suggests single-sex education can provide benefits to some students under certain circumstances,' said Stephanie Monroe, the department's assistant secretary for civil rights. 'We're not imposing this as a one-size-fits-all mandate. This is an option that can be helpful to some students, and that's what the literature says. Local schools and parents will make the decision on what is appropriate for their students,' she said."

DOJ_NMG_0086325

NBC Nightly News (10/24, story 7, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Some women's advocacy groups fear the new rules will end up short-changing girls."

Embattled Schools Try Marketing Themselves To Parents. The Washington Post (10/25, B1, De Vise, 748K) reports that embattled schools, that are falling behind the No Child Left Behind Act's requirements and risk losing students to the transfers allowed by the Act "are trying a new tack: fighting back by marketing themselves to parents. They promote the extra resources afforded to schools after their test scores repeatedly fail to meet standards, the easy proximity of a neighborhood school, the familiarity of friends and even their so-called inadequate results. … Principals point out that the standard for 'adequate yearly progress,' the measure of success under the 2002 federal law, is a bit higher each year. And a school can be labeled a failure if any one of several statistical subgroups misses the mark. For example, the test scores of special education students or those with limited English skills can open an entire school to transfers."

Federal Auditors Probe Costs Of Transporting Medicaid Patients. The Washington Times (10/25, McElhatton, 88K) reports, "Federal auditors are examining the skyrocketing costs of providing transportation to Medicaid patients across the country, a problem that DC officials are struggling to control. The Office of Inspector General for the US Department of Health and Human Services said it 'will determine whether state Medicaid agencies make erroneous payments for transportation services,' according to its recently released 2007 work plan. Medicaid transportation costs across the nation rose by 48 percent from 1999 to 2003, reaching $1.5 billion, according to the work plan."

Senate Finance Committee Produces List Of Possible "Tax Gap" Fixes. The Wall Street Journal (10/25, D2, Wells, 2.03M) reports, "Congress, in a perpetual hunt to raise revenue without appearing to raise taxes, has a new list of ways to fatten the federal Treasury. One proposal would force brokers to track historical price-basis information on stock sales, which could mean a stiffer capital-gains hit for investors who, intentionally or not, misstate the original purchase price. Another proposal would tighten the interest deduction for some mortgage refinancings. Still another would remove a key tax advantage for many family-owned businesses. The proposals, released to little fanfare last week by Congress's Joint Committee on Taxation, are viable options for lawmakers looking to offset the cost of future tax cuts, tax experts say. … This list of revenue-boosting options was produced at the request of Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley and Sen. Max Baucus, who asked the joint committee to pinpoint ways to close the estimated $290 billion tax gap, a measure of uncollected taxes."

Reid's "Ethical Transgressions" Seen As Evidence Of Congress' "Entitlement" Mind Set. In her Washington Post column (10/25, A17), Ruth Marcus says, "As recent ethical transgressions go," Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid's "actions aren't the biggest deal around. Election rules bar candidates from using campaign funds for personal expenses, but Reid contends that the tips were to thank the staff for the hassle of dealing with a resident dignitary. That's arguable, and after the Associated Press reported on Reid's donor-funded generosity, he repaid the three years of campaign-funded tips, $3,300." Reid's actions are "more important, though, as an illustration of the entrenched, bipartisan congressional mind-set of entitlement. Republicans and Democrats may not agree on much, but their joint operating ethos too often boils down to an attitude of: 'It's my due. Why shouldn't I?'" What's "striking about Congress (aside from flagrantly corrupt members such as former representative Randy 'Duke' Cunningham) is the nickel-and-dime nature of the benefits they feel entitled to take, from Reid's acceptance of free boxing tickets from the Nevada Athletic Commission to California Republican Rep. John Doolittle's use of campaign funds to pay the babysitter."

Perino Featured In Esquire's "Women We're Ashamed To Love" Special. Al Kamen, in his Washington Post "In the Loop" column (10/25) writes that his month's Esquire magazine features a "photo display of 'The Women We Love' from various fields. … The section includes 'Women We're Ashamed to Love,' topped by White House deputy press secretary Dana Perino. 'Hotter than Tony Snow and Scott McClellan combined,' Esquire says of Perino. 'Plus, the executive branch seems so much more capable in her dulcet voice. Lie to us, Dana. Lie to us.'"

White House Chief Usher Retiring. The Washington Post (10/25, A6, Romano, 748K) reports, "Gary Walters, the longtime chief usher at the White House who has kept the secrets of seven first families, will retire at the end of the year after nearly four decades of service." Walters "said last night that he told first lady Laura Bush and the president last week of his decision. … In a statement,

DOJ_NMG_0086326

President Bush and the first lady praised Walters, who also worked for the first Bush White House, and said that they were 'grateful for making our family feel at home.'"

Patent And Trademark Office Institutes Telecommuting Pilot Project. The Washington Post's "Federal Diary" column (10/25, D4, Barr) reports on "a telecommuting pilot project developed by the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office…and one of its unions. Under the pilot, 10 experienced trademark lawyers with good job-performance ratings will be permitted to move anywhere in the continental United States and work from home. … There is a catch. The lawyers must show up once a week at the Alexandria headquarters, at their own expense. That requirement will allow the PTO to keep the employees on the roster at agency headquarters and avoid triggering a law that mandates reimbursement for employee travel and per diems."

Government Urged To Provide Face Protection In Event Of Flu Outbreak. In a New York Times op-ed (10/25), Lawrence Wein of Stanford's graduate school of business says, "Despite all the attention given to anthrax and smallpox and potential weapons of mass destruction, pandemic influenza is probably the world's most serious near-term public health threat." It is "highly likely that an effective vaccine will not be available during the pandemic's first wave, that we won't have enough antiviral drugs for large-scale prophylactic use, and that hospitals will be too overwhelmed to treat most cases." To prevent the virus' spread, the government "must draw up a plan for educating the public about effective nonpharmaceutical interventions like hand washing and face protection like masks." While the government "says that it might be beneficial, it doesn't make respirators or masks available. Yet face protection would guard against aerosol and droplet transmission, and even reduce contact transmission by making it difficult to place fingers into one's mouth or nose."

OTHER NEWS:

Dow Hits New High As Investors Await Federal Reserve Meeting. The Financial Times (10/25, Mackenzie) reports US stocks "were caught in narrow ranges on Tuesday, as earnings continued flowing while unsettled investors were distracted by the two-day policy meeting of the Federal Reserve." The S&P500 "was up 0.36 points, or 0.03 per cent, at 1,377.38 while the Nasdaq Composite was 10.72 points, or 0.5 per cent, lower at 2,344.84. The Dow Jones Industrial Average settled up 10.97 points at 12,127.88, marking its fourth record close in five days." But "some observers warn that the surge in equities since markets bottomed in July might not be sustainable."

NBC Nightly News (10/24, story 5, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Now the Wall Street Now. The Dow was up almost 11points to another record close [to close at 12,127.88]. NASDAQ was down just under 11 points [to close at 2,344.84]."

The Wall Street Journal (10/25, C1, McKay, 2.03M) reports, "Investors shied from making big bets ahead of the Federal Reserve's latest interest-rate decision, due out this afternoon." On a day "when major stock indicators ended mixed, the Dow Jones Industrial Average did close at another record, its 11th in the past 16 sessions." Fed officials are "expected to leave their interest-rate target unchanged at 5.25%, although their written statement, expected at 2:15 p.m. EDT, may offer surprises for Wall Street." Even "without the central bankers' thoughts in hand, investors' hopes for a rate cut by the end of the year have been fading in recent days, amid a generally strong batch of strong third-quarter corporate earnings reports."

Federal Reserve Debating Public Inflation Target. The Washington Post (10/25, D1, Henderson, 748K) reports "a fervent debate is underway this week" at the Federal Reserve: "Should the Fed explicitly tell the public what level of inflation it wants to achieve? And if so, should that goal be in the 1 to 2 percent range, or 'comfort zone,' expressed by many central bankers in recent years, or should the upper limit be raised to as high as 3 percent?" How much "people's paychecks will buy in the future, how far their retirement money will go, how many people might need to be thrown out of work to achieve a stated inflation goal -- all these outcomes could be influenced by a debate among the nation's central bankers at their meetings yesterday and today, to which the public has no access." One option, "long-advocated by Chairman Ben S. Bernanke, is for the Fed to adopt a formal, numerical inflation goal, a practice called inflation targeting and used by central banks in 25 countries. The Bank of England, for example, is one of several central banks that seeks to keep inflation at or near 2 percent." The policymaking Federal Open Market Committee "includes supporters and skeptics, making a quick decision unlikely. If committee members ultimately decide to adopt a target in principle, the next challenge would be setting the number."

Some Heating Bills To Rise Despite Drop In Natural Gas Prices. The Wall Street Journal (10/25, A13, Smith, 2.03M) reports, "A substantial drop in natural-gas prices won't help some U.S. consumers with their heating bills this winter." The Journal says, "Some utilities that raised rates significantly last year, in the aftermath of gas-production disruptions along the Gulf Coast, will offer substantial reductions this year because of the fall in gas prices. Others will have modest increases or decreases depending on whether they locked in gas supplies when prices were high or rolled the dice on the spot market."

DOJ_NMG_0086327

Judge Rules Nine-Year-Old Cannot Be Forced To Undergo Circumcision. The Chicago Tribune (10/25, Peres) reports, "In a case that has been closely watched by anti-circumcision groups nationwide, a Cook County judge ruled Tuesday that the medical benefits of the procedure are not clear enough to compel a 9-year-old Northbrook boy to be circumcised against his will. The boy's mother and her new husband had claimed the operation was necessary to prevent recurrent episodes of redness and discomfort. The boy's father sought a court order barring the circumcision, which he called an 'unnecessary amputation.' The mother has sole custody, but their 2003 parenting agreement gave her ex-husband a say in non-emergency medical decisions."

Former Editor Wins Lawsuit Against Music Magazine's Founders. The Washington Post (10/25, C1, Carlson) reports, "After a tumultuous two-week trial, Kimberly Osorio, a former editor in chief of the Source magazine, won a workplace lawsuit against the popular hip-hop monthly, and a Manhattan jury awarded her $15.5 million. … Osorio, who was fired by the Source last year, sued the magazine and its founders, David Mays and Raymond Scott, alleging sexual harassment, gender discrimination, defamation, retaliatory discharge and maintaining a hostile work environment."

Bush Says Tax Bills Would Increase Under Democrats. The AP (10/25, Loven) reports, "Look around the dinner table and add $500 to your tax bill for each child, President Bush said Tuesday as he sought to convince voters that Democrats would destroy the economy and the family budget if they took over Congress." During a "fundraising swing through Florida aimed at adding nearly $1.4 million to GOP coffers," Bush said, "When you go to the voting booth in two weeks, the lever you pull will determine the taxes you pay for years to come. You will feel the results every April 15." The AP adds that "each one of the president's recent political speeches has offered new zingers aimed at making more ominous the specter of Democrats in charge of the House or Senate, either on the subject of tax cuts or fighting terrorism. On Tuesday, Bush singled out for special emphasis the gradual doubling of the child tax credit from $500 to $1,000, one of several cuts passed during his administration with expiration dates." But "Bush skimmed past the fact that the child tax credit is not yet $1,000 and doesn't reach that level until 2010," and he "also ignored that many Democrats now say they want to retain that tax cut." The AP adds Bush "made his cash-raising visit for GOP congressional candidate Vern Buchanan cheaper for the Republican businessman's campaign by stopping briefly at Gyrocam Camera Systems."

ABC World News (10/24, story 4, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M), the only network to report on Bush's trip, said the President "hit the campaign trail visiting Sarasota, Florida, to stump for the Republican for the seat being vacated by Katherine Harris. This is one of the seats around the country that the GOP had considered safe, but are now in play. The President's visit underscores just how concerned his party has become about its prospects this fall."

The Sarasota Herald Tribune (10/25, Wallace) reports Bush "exhorted Republicans to show up on election day, saying that a strong GOP turnout is critical to preserving his tax cut package and winning the War in Iraq." Bush said, "We're going to do everything we can to protect you before the enemy attacks." The Herald Tribune adds, "Appearing at a $20 a person fundraiser for Republican congressional candidate Vern Buchanan, the president spent a good portion of his speech warning the audience that Democrats, if they gain control of Congress, will discontinue tax cuts and disrupt U.S. efforts in Iraq." After his speech, Bush's "motorcade made a stop at Gyrocam Camera Systems, a local company with a $51 million contract to provide the Armed Forces with explosive-detecting cameras that can be mounted on personnel carriers and other military vehicles." Meanwhile, Republican Sen. Mel Martinez "has been hitting the campaign trail for Buchanan pretty hard. This is his third visit to Sarasota in the last 60 days. Prior to that, it had been almost two years since his last public visit."

The Miami Herald (10/25, Piedra, Clark, 310K) reports the Sarasota House seat "should have been a cakewalk." But polls "suggest Democrats are poised to seize control of the House -- in part by possibly picking up this seat and two others in South Florida." Strategists "suggest Democratic prospects have been aided by bleak reports out of Iraq, mixed with distaste for corruption scandals -- topped by U.S. Rep. Mark Foley's resignation last month after graphic Internet exchanges with former House pages were made public." Buchanan has "had trouble gaining traction since he limped out of a bitter primary with 32 percent of the vote amid attacks on his business practices. The millionaire auto dealer and major GOP donor has pumped nearly $4.5 million of his own cash into the campaign, making it one of the nation's costliest." Internal polls "are said to show him trailing Democrat Christine Jennings."

The Washington Post (10/25, A7, Abramowitz, 748K) reports President Bush "accused Democrats on Tuesday of being 'genetically disposed' to raise taxes, as he sharpened his rhetoric on the economy in an effort to rally Republicans to the polls next month." Bush "mocked Democrats for what he described as their misplaced pessimism that tax cuts would not stimulate the economy. He said it was only one of many poor predictions by the Democrats and suggested they are making another mistake in their growing confidence that they might take the House next month."

DOJ_NMG_0086328

The Los Angeles Times (10/25, Gerstenzang, 918K) reports Bush used "mocking language to belittle Democrats" as he "launched a new, muscular political attack today in his campaign to preserve Republican majorities in the House and Senate, challenging the Democrats' economic record and their commitment to fighting terrorism and succeeding in Iraq." Bush "brought up, as he has done before, a statement by Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), the likely House speaker if Democrats win a majority, expressing Democrats' 'love' of tax cuts." But citing Democratic "opposition to tax cuts he had proposed, the president said sarcastically: 'Time and time again, she had an opportunity to show her love for taxes. If this is the Democrats' idea of love, I wouldn't want to see what hate looks like.'"

The Palm Beach Post (10/25, Bennett, Laforgia) reports President Bush "raised more than $1 million for the Republican National Committee during a brief stop here as the costly battle over which party controls Congress entered its final two weeks." After campaigning in Sarasota, Bush "attended a late-afternoon fund-raiser at the home of advertising executive Jordan Zimmerman in The Sanctuary neighborhood between Federal Highway and the Intracoastal Waterway." The "$25,000-a-head event raised more than $1 million for the party, a GOP spokeswoman said. Gov. Jeb Bush and U.S. Sen. Mel Martinez also attended."

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (10/25, Blum, 265K) reports President Bush "passed through Fort Lauderdale on Tuesday to raise last-minute cash in Boca Raton for Republican candidates fighting to hold onto the party's majority in Congress." Supporters who "gathered at Fort Lauderdale-Hollywood International Airport to see Air Force One touch down received just a quick glimpse of the president before his motorcade sped off to a Boca Raton fundraiser. The private event held at the mansion of advertising executive Jordan Zimmerman raised $1 million for the Republican National Committee." On Friday, First Lady Laura Bush is "expected to attend a Palm Beach fundraiser for U.S. Rep. Clay Shaw, who is in a tight race against Democratic state senator Ron Klein for Florida's 22nd Congressional District."

Democrats Seize On Bush Social Security Comments. The Washington Post (10/25, A7, Montgomery, 748K) reports, "More than a year after Social Security reform faded from the political radar screen, the debate erupted anew yesterday, as Democrats seized on news that President Bush hopes to revive an unpopular proposal to make changes in the national retirement program." Bush has recently "said Social Security remains one of the 'big items' he wants to tackle next year and he continues to 'believe that a worker, at his or her option, ought to be allowed to put some of their own money...in a private savings account, an account that they call their own.'" With just "two weeks to go until the Nov. 7 congressional elections, Democrats highlighted Bush's comments, seeing an opportunity to remind voters about a Republican proposal that polls have shown is highly unpopular with many voters." Democratic strategists "were gleeful about the chance to draw a sharp distinction between the parties on Social Security, an explosive issue among elderly voters." Some Republicans "were equally perplexed by Bush's timing." Rep. Thomas Davis III said, "I guess you could argue if it gets Iraq off the front page, it was probably a good thing at this point."

Bush Gets Limited Campaign Exposure In Final Weeks. The New York Times (10/25, Stolberg, 1.21M) reports President Bush's visit to Sarasota, Florida for Republican Vern Buchanan "offers a hint of how White House strategists will use Mr. Bush in the final two weeks of the midterm campaign." A Republican strategist "close to the White House" said "some Republicans — among them Senate candidates in tight races in Missouri, Montana, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Tennessee — simply do not want their final campaign images to include Mr. Bush, and have spurned White House offers for help." Instead, White House strategists "are sending Mr. Bush to Republican-leaning districts like Sarasota, where he can help energize the base and increase voter turnout. The president will also appear in swing districts where the Republican candidate has calculated that the last-minute infusion of cash he can bring in is worth more than any bad publicity surrounding the visit." GOP strategist Charlie Black said, "You probably won't see him too much in the Northeast or the areas where he has less popularity. But we do have a number of races that are very close, where the president, as champion fund-raiser, can still get some extra money in there and allow us to outspend the opponent."

The Washington Times (10/25, Curl, 88K) reports Bush "has become the Stealth Campaigner. Candidates across the country, especially those in tight races where the president's power to draw cash is most valuable, want him to drop by for a fundraiser. They just don't want their picture taken with the head of the party -- mainly because they know it will end up in their opponents' television commercials." So far this year, Bush has "done 10 times as many closed-press fundraising events compared to 2002. He has also not appeared at a single major Republican rally, unlike four years ago, when he did 32."

Bush Advised To Seek Credit On North Korea. In their column in The Hill (10/25), Dick Morris and Eileen McGann say President George Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "have succeeded beyond expectations in lining up China as a strong ally in forcing North Korea to abandon its nuclear ambitions. The New York Times reports that the Chinese are even threatening to ratchet back on their oil shipments to North Korea, which is totally dependent on Beijing for fuel." But Bush "is getting no credit for it and neither are the Republicans. All of the focus has been on the role that Rice and UN Ambassador John Bolton are playing in forcing North Korea back from membership of the nuclear club. President Bush needs to do much more to rivet popular attention on Korea, as opposed to Iraq." To "guard against" a possible strong Democratic close, Bush "needs to distract the country from Iraq, and North Korea offers the best way to do so."

DOJ_NMG_0086329

Huffington Expects Bush To Make Political Hay Over North Korea. In a CBS Evening News (10/24, story 8, 2:05, Couric, 7.66M) commentary segment, liberal commentator Arianna Huffington said, "Don't get me wrong, North Korea testing a nuke is real bad news. Yet, I couldn't help but wonder what political use Karl Rove and the President would put this real bad news to. After all, banging the fear gong and trying to scare the hell out of us has worked like a charm for the President and the GOP."

White House Uses "Radio Day" To Spread Optimistic Message. The AP (10/25, Riechmann) reports, "President Bush's political top gun Karl Rove gushes with optimism about Election Day," while National security adviser Stephen Hadley "says the Iraqis need to do more to secure their nation — and do it faster. Presidential confidant Dan Bartlett takes a few verbal punches at Democrats." It "was 'Radio Day' at the White House where more than 30 talk show hosts were invited to set up shop in a heated white tent on the North Lawn to quiz senior administration officials. Beginning at 5:30 a.m., the broadcasters chatted live about everything from Iraq to homeland security to the Nov. 7 elections." In an interview with Fox News Radio, Rove "predicted the Republicans would retain control of Congress, discounting polls that show the Democrats threatening to take over." In an interview with Charlie Sykes of WTMJ in Milwaukee, Wis., Bartlett "also predicted a Republican victory." The AP adds, "Talk about Iraq was buzzing in the tent." Other officials who stopped by the tent or were interviewed at other spots at the White House included Vice President Dick Cheney, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt, Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and White House press secretary Tony Snow."

The Washington Post (10/25, A7, Kurtz, 748K) reports that for "15 years, the conservatives who dominate talk radio have served as shock troops for the GOP, bashing Democrats, hitting the hot buttons and rallying their listeners. Since the Republicans won back Congress in 1994, a feat in which Rush Limbaugh played a catalyzing role, through the disputed election of 2000 and President Bush's first term, the radio talkers have wielded a powerful megaphone for their ideological side." But "as Bartlett, Karl Rove, Tony Snow, Michael Chertoff and other top administration officials worked the tent during yesterday's day-long event, it became apparent that there are serious cracks in this once-solid wall of support." Jan Mickelson, "a fixture in Des Moines radio," said, "The corps of Bush supporters are just seething, angry and disappointed." Mickelson said Iraq "has become 'ungovernable,' voters are upset about 'perceived corruption in the Republican Party,' and 'social conservatives feel like they've been used again.' But in a point echoed by several of the hosts, Mickelson said that 'immigration is the number one issue' fostering disgruntlement with the Republicans, because his listeners are 'seeing the effects of lack of border control every single day.'" The "biggest star on the right yesterday was Sean Hannity, who is heard on 515 stations. He was granted interviews with Vice President Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, whom Hannity hailed as 'a great American.'"

USA Today (10/25, Jackson, 2.27M) reports the hosts, "both national and local, hailed from cities from New York to San Diego. They included a smattering of liberals." Bush spokesman Tony Snow, "himself a former radio talk show host, sat for at least 34 radio interviews in the big white tent. His list included national hosts Glenn Beck and Neal Boortz, as well as Inga Barks of Bakersfield, Calif., and Dave Jaconette of Kalamazoo, Mich."

White House Reaching Out To Disaffected Conservatives. The Washington Post (10/25, A1, Baker, 748K) reports in a front page story, "Beset by discouraging polls and division within ideological ranks, the White House is accelerating efforts to woo back disaffected conservatives and energize the Republican base in a reprise of a strategy that succeeded in the last two campaign cycles." President Bush and Vice President Cheney "have given multiple interviews to conservative journalists, senior adviser Karl Rove has telephoned religious and social activists, and the White House has staged signing ceremonies for legislation cracking down on terrorism and illegal immigration. Two weeks before Election Day, Bush aides invited dozens of radio talk show hosts for a marathon broadcast from the White House yesterday to reach conservative listeners." The "message that Bush and others are sending to alienated supporters is that, no matter how upset they have been about various policies or political missteps over the past couple of years, life would be far worse under the Democrats." But "some conservatives said it is too late." GOP pollster Frank Luntz said, "I've given up on 2006. They've already made so many mistakes, there's no way they can fix it in two weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0086330

But I'm worried now they're going to lose all the marbles." The Post adds the White House "courtship of the right paid enormous dividends in the past, but this year it is complicated by a far more skeptical audience than in 2002 and 2004."

Republicans Could See Defections Among Religious Voters. The Christian Science Monitor (10/25, Lampman, 58K) reports, "Recent surveys show signs of a shift among religious voters that could give Democrats a boost." An October Gallup poll "found white religious voters 'equally as likely to say they will vote Democratic as Republican.' And a Pew Research poll last week found just 57 percent of white Evangelicals planning to vote Republican, a drop from 68 percent in 2002 and 74 percent in 2004. Among white Catholics, the decline was even greater." Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life fellow John Green said, "The GOP's problems with white Evangelicals are important, but they have even bigger problems with white Catholics." The Monitor adds, "The shift reflects plummeting support for the Republican administration and Congress over the war in Iraq and multiplying political scandals. But it appears that Democratic candidates' efforts to articulate their faith and values - and tie them to a broader range of issues - are also resonating with voters."

Kuo Book Gets Muted Reaction Among Christian Conservatives. In the Wall Street Journal's "Campaign Journal" column (10/25), Jackie Calms reports a book "that perhaps should be required reading for evangelical conservatives" is "Tempting Faith." Author David Kuo "worked in the White House office for the faith-based social initiatives that were a foundation block of Mr. Bush's 2000 platform. The book recounts his disillusionment with officials, up to the president. On his promotional tour, Mr. Kuo is calling for Christians to 'fast' from politics for two years." The book recounts how White House aides cynically treated Christian Conservative leaders and the faith based initiative. Perhaps "understandably, Mr. Kuo's book hasn't gotten the attention of another, best-selling author Bob Woodward's 'State of Denial' on the administration's mal-administration of the Iraq-Afghanistan war -- the biggest issue on Americans' minds generally these days. Yet even among Christian conservatives, the reaction to the Kuo book -- where there is any -- is a shoot-the-messenger dismissal."

Rove Remains Optimistic About GOP Retaining House Majority. The Hill (10/25, Kaplan) reports Karl Rove "told Republican supporters last Friday that the media was misreading the political environment — that the combination of money and mobilization of religious conservatives could keep the House in Republican hands after November." Speaking at a fundraiser "for Ohio GOP congressional candidate Joy Padgett at the Old Ebbitt Grill, Rove said polls showed that evangelical Protestant voters were still enthusiastic and suggested that Republicans started with a two- to three-point advantage because of their successful voter turnout operations in 2002 and 2004." The Hill adds, "Despite evidence that voters could direct a barrage of negative public opinion against Republican officeholders on Election Day, Rove and President Bush have been upbeat, making some Democrats nervous about current predictions and worrying some Republicans."

Snow Predicts Republicans Will Maintain Control Of House. White House spokesman Tony Snow was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (10/24) if Republicans will retain control of the House after this election. Snow said, "Yes, they are." Asked about polls that do not look good for Republicans right now, Snow said, "You know the difference between a generic poll and an individual poll. There are 435 House races. I think you're going to see a couple of things. I think, for instance, the fact that for a long time when it comes to Iraq, people have been focusing like another network did on a sniper taking down an American, rather than the achievements of the Americans. People are going to start thinking what's actually going on there? They are also going to ask about the economy. Who is going to be better off? The president cut taxes. We have been through an amazing run of difficulty in the American economy."

Democrats Leery Of Overconfidence. The Washington Times (10/25, Fagan, Hallow, 88K) reports Democrats, "stung by unexpected defeats in the past two national elections, are trying to fend off poll-generated overconfidence by staying on the offensive and focusing on get-out-the-vote efforts." Simon Rosenberg, president of the New Democrat Network, said, "We've learned our lessons. The last two elections we thought we'd do better. Nobody's taking their foot off the gas." The Times adds Danny Briscoe, "a campaign media consultant and former Kentucky state Democratic Party chairman, says from party leaders and pundits to grass-roots Democrats, feelings swing between disbelief and superconfidence -- at least when it comes to House control." Fighting those "feelings of disbelief, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi has emphasized that a Democratic takeover of the House isn't definite and that there's still work to be done."

Pelosi Sees Economy As Number One Election Issue. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi was asked on CNBC's Kudlow and Company (10/24) what the number on issue in this election is. Pelosi said, "Number one issue -- where the economy isn't. The economy is tremendous issue for middle income families caught in the middle income squeeze. Poorer families in the crunch. We have to have a fair economy where we raise the minimum wage. We give access to higher education. Make it more affordable. Access to quality healthcare. Dignified retirement. Where there is certainty in people's lives so they can be entrepreneurial.

DOJ_NMG_0086331

They can take economic risks. They can help grow the economy."

Cheney Says Pelosi Is "Not In Sync" With Most Americans. Vice President Dick Cheney was asked on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (10/24) for his thoughts on House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi and her claims that Republicans are immoral and corrupt, and that she "wants to restore civility in Washington." Cheney said, "It would seem to be a little inconsistent to use that kind of language on her adversaries and then talk about trying to restore civility. Nancy Pelosi is -- she's the Democratic leader in the House. She earned that post, ran for it, had to compete for it. I think, frankly, she helps our cause with that kind of talk, but also because of what she believes. I think Nancy is not in sync with the vast majority of the American people."

Pearlstein Says Democrats Seemed Poised To Repeat GOP Mistakes. Steven Pearlstein writes in the Washington Post (10/25, D1, 748K), "There are lots of reasons why businesses run into trouble, but a few pop up with remarkable regularity. … It should be no surprise that these business missteps are also common in politics. They are the key mistakes that led Republicans to overplay their hand and perhaps throw away the chance to renew their political lease on Congress and the White House. Though the election is still two weeks away, there are signs the Democrats, if they win, are determined to make the same mistakes." The Democrats' "six-point program is more a compendium of political slogans and ideological hot buttons than a serious policy agenda -- again, the very thing the customers say they don't want. … In politics as in business, the way to create enduring advantage is not by beating the competition at its game but changing the nature of the game. Up to this point, all Democrats have been doing is beating the Republicans at their game."

Thomma Says Waxman Could Cause Trouble For Bush Administration. In his column for McClatchy (10/24), Steven Thomma wrote that "if you want to watch a Democrat who could give the Bush White House hell for the next two years, keep an eye on Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif." Waxman "would become chairman of the House Government Reform Committee if the Democrats take over the House. He's one of the shrewdest, most effective inside players in Congress. And armed with the committee's subpoena power, he'd force the Bush administration to spend much of its last two years in office answering questions about its first six." Thomma adds, "Giving Waxman the gavel would be a dramatic shift for the House, which all but dropped congressional oversight of the executive branch when a Republican administration was sworn in on Jan. 20, 2001. It would also be a shift for Waxman, who spent the 1990s largely defending the Clinton administration and accusing the Republican House of overreaching in its investigations."

Lack Of Economic Confidence Could Boost Anti-Business Agenda. In his Wall Street Journal column (10/25, A2), Alan Murray says, "There's something unnerving about watching an anti-incumbent tidal wave roll in at a time when the economy, by most macro measures, is cruising. Unemployment is at a historic low -- 4.6% -- and inflation remains under 3%. The big economic bugaboos of earlier this year -- rising interest rates and soaring oil prices -- have both eased off." But a "majority of voters who responded to last week's Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll say they disapprove of President Bush's handling of the economy." The "economic backdrop for election 2006 should raise a warning flag about the future. Large numbers of Americans seem to have lost their belief in John F. Kennedy's famous aphorism that a rising tide lifts all boats." Political analyst Charles Cook said, "They know the economy is white hot, but they also know they aren't in it....There's a feeling that some people are getting theirs, but we aren't getting ours." The "danger for business is that the broad social support for pro-business and pro-market policies that has characterized American politics for a quarter century or more could be breaking down." A Democratic "wise man told me recently that if he were asked what economic platform would offer a Democratic presidential contender the best chances of success in 2008, he would have to say it's an antitrade, antiglobalization, anti-immigration platform."

NRCC Focusing On 33 Key House Races. GOP strategists are urging donors to contribute to 33 key House races in which members and candidates are in need of support. The Hill (10/25, Cusack) reports, "The National Republican Congressional Committee's (NRCC) 'Final Push List' consists of 29 Republican seats and only four Democratic seats, indicating that the GOP is playing defense. The list, obtained by The Hill, provides a rare glimpse of the races that congressional strategists are concentrating on close to Election Day. NRCC focuses on most but not all toss-up House races in its Final Push roster, dated Oct. 19." The Hill adds, "Republican incumbents who did not make the Final Push cut include Reps. Chris Chocola (Ind.), Michael Fitzpatrick (Pa.), John Hostettler (Ind.), Nancy Johnson (Conn.), Jon Porter (Nev.), Clay Shaw (Fla.), Christopher Shays (Conn.), and Charles Taylor (N.C.). These Republicans are in highly competitive races, but several have major fundraising advantages over their opponents and are not in dire need of NRCC assistance."

Drug Industry's Contributions To GOP Candidates Prove Controversial. The Wall Street Journal (10/25, A1, McKinnon, 2.03M) reports in a front page story, "Assailed by Democrats, drug companies are pouring millions of dollars into close races, giving some Republicans a financial edge. In the process, the industry is becoming not just a campaign backer, but also a campaign issue." Pennsylvania Republican Sen. Rick Santorum "is a big beneficiary of the industry's push. He was a leading proponent of the 2003 law that gave seniors Medicare coverage for prescription drugs, and helped shape the law in ways that benefited the industry." Santorum's campaign has "received almost $500,000 from pharmaceutical interests and their employees, according to the Center for Responsive Politics." Democrat Bob Casey Jr. "regularly attacks the Medicare program as 'a giveaway to Big Pharma,' in part because it bars the government from negotiating prices. He and many fellow Democrats say they will overhaul the benefit if they win control of Congress on Nov. 7. Not surprisingly, Mr. Casey counts just $11,850 in contributions from pharmaceutical interests." The Journal adds, "Companies and business groups have long thrown money at candidates to further their interests. But with a Democratic victory increasingly likely, few recent elections have been so critical, particularly for the drug industry."

DOJ_NMG_0086332

Democrats Hope To Create "Blue Belt" Across Three Florida Districts. The Hill (10/25, Blake) reports that the two districts that have been battlegrounds in Florida this election season, Rep. Vern Buchanan's 13th and Rep. Clay Shaw's 22nd, "both border former Rep. Mark Foley's (R) south Florida district." According to Buchanan, "the month-old scandal surrounding Foley's communications with House pages has thrown a wrench in the final month of the campaign, Buchanan said. Foley's 16th District, now a tight battle between Democrat Tim Mahoney and Republican Joe Negron, lies in south Florida between the Sarasota-based 13th on the west coast and the Fort Lauderdale-based 22nd on the east coast. The Democrats hope to turn the three of them into a blue belt across the peninsula, chipping away at the Republicans' 18-7 House advantage in this very purple battleground state. The three would go a long way toward a possible Democratic majority in Congress, and Florida could rival states like Indiana and Ohio, which have long been considered prime pickup territory for the Democrats, as an impact state in 2006."

Veteran Republicans Running Like Underdogs. The Hill (10/25, O'Connor) reports that many veteran Republican lawmakers are running like underdogs this election year. The "expanding field of veteran Republicans in serious danger this October is further evidence of a national wave that appears to be cresting this fall, imperiling the GOP's majorities in both chambers. In some cases, this eroding political landscape has made seniority a millstone rather than an advantage."

In AZ5, Hayworth, Mitchell Display Differences In Personality. The Hill (10/25, Hearn) reports on the race in AZ5, which pits incumbent Rep. J.D. Hayworth, "a tough, boisterous Republican from upscale Scottsdale" against Harry Mitchell, "an easygoing Democratic native son from a university town." According to The Hill, "In television ads and on the stump, the pair carve out stark differences in personality." Mitchell "portrays himself as friendly and accessible in campaign ads, appearing with children and senior citizens amid soft lighting and cheerful hues, a deliberate strategy, said one Democratic aide." Hayworth "welcomes the tough-guy image, arguing that he delivers for his constituents. He is a vigorous campaigner with an uncanny memory for names and personal details that is rare even among seasoned politicians. His ads focus on cracking down on illegal immigration, showing him at a cattle ranch talking with worried residents."

Despite Bribery Probe, Tight Reelection Bid, Jefferson Projects Confidence. The New York Times (10/25, Nossiter, 1.21M) reports that Rep. William Jefferson is unbowed by the pending federal bribery investigation against him and his tight reelection bid. Indeed, Jefferson "still maneuvers with relative ease in the world of New Orleans politics, which he has partly owned since his opponents in the Nov. 7 primary election were barely in high school." Jefferson "is outwardly projecting confidence in the biggest challenge of a career that stretches over nearly 30 years." The Times adds, "Over the congressman's protests, the state Democratic Party endorsed his leading challenger, Karen R. Carter, a state representative with a reputation for seriousness. Experts reckon that he and Ms. Carter are the likeliest in the field to wind up in a runoff in December, to be held if no candidate receives more than 50 percent of the vote, under the state's idiosyncratic election rules."

NYTimes Endorses Shays' Opponent In CT4. In an editorial, the New York Times (10/25, 1.21M) endorses Democrat Diane Farrell in her bid against Republican Rep. Chris Shays in CT4. The Times argues that Farrell "is an excellent candidate," and adds that Shays "may be a beacon of integrity, but if he is re-elected, he will vote to continue House control by a party that has repeatedly sold out the country to special-interest lobbyists. … With due respect for Mr. Shays's service, we strongly endorse Diane Farrell for Congress."

Documents Cast Doubt On Taylor Land Ownership Claims. The Hill (10/25, Schor) reports, "Public land records in Haywood County, N.C., show that a company registered to Rep. Charles Taylor (R-N.C.) owns 17 plots of land in the mountain community of Maggie Valley, an interest that tax records indicate is worth more than $500,000." The records "raise questions about an assertion Taylor made in an Oct. 12 statement, part of a strong public defense mounted by the House Appropriations 'cardinal' after a Wall Street Journal report alleged this month that Taylor steered federal funds to projects that would benefit businesses in which he has an interest." Taylor's "strongly worded defense comes in the thick of a hard-fought race between the wealthy lawmaker, whose estimated personal assets topped $50 million last year, and" Democrat Heath Shuler.

DOJ_NMG_0086333

Commentator Criticizes Treatment Of Ney. In an op-ed in The Hill (10/25), Ellen Ratner, Washington bureau chief for the Talk Radio News Service and a commentator on the Fox News Channel, says, "I happen to be a proud liberal, one who gets to spout off on 300 radio stations every day." Yet "even in the rancid atmosphere that passes for political interaction in Washington these days, one can occasionally reach across the partisan and ideological divide to form genuine friendships with those on the other side. Thankfully, that's what happened with me and my friend, Rep. Bob Ney of Ohio." As Republicans "distance themselves from him and Democrats use him as a campaign tactic, let me say that I'm heartbroken over what's happened to him." Ney "was a guy who really did remember where he came from. He knew that the kids he'd grown up with couldn't afford to raise their children in quality housing, and he went to Washington determined to do something about it." Ratner adds, "I only wish he'd had a chance to tell his side in a court of law — and, take it from me, there is another side to this. Today's Justice Department, however, tries its evidence in the public press, not a courtroom, so it can't be challenged or cross-examined."

Senate Polls Show Three GOP States May Deny Democrats Senate Majority. The Los Angeles Times (10/25, Brownstein, 918K) reports Democrats are "within range of capturing a Senate majority, but face potentially decisive resistance from rural voters in three critical Republican-leaning states, a series of Times/Bloomberg polls have found." If Democrats "can't break through to win the Senate races in at least two of those three states — Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia — they are unlikely to control the chamber." The surveys "show Democrats leading in bids to claim hotly contested Republican-held seats in Ohio and Virginia. Republicans lead in Missouri and Tennessee, both also held by the GOP." But the Democrats "maintain a slim advantage in New Jersey, where Republicans are pressing their strongest bid in this year's campaign to gain a Democratic seat." Polls in "the other key Senate races show Democratic challengers holding consistent — though in some cases narrow — leads against GOP incumbents in Pennsylvania, Rhode Island and Montana. If Democrats captured those three seats, won Ohio and held New Jersey, Senate control would hinge on the outcomes in Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia." The Times/Bloomberg polls "found that among likely voters:"

- In Ohio, Democrat Sherrod Brown leads Republican Sen. Mike DeWine 47%-39%.
- In New Jersey, Democratic Sen. Bob Menendez leads Republican Tom Kean Jr. 45% to 41%.
- In Virginia, Democrat James Webb leads Republican Sen. George Allen, 47% to 44%.
- In Missouri, Republican Sen. James Talent leads Democrat Claire McCaskill, 48% to 45%.
- In Tennessee, Republican Bob Corker leads Democratic Rep. Harold Ford Jr., 49% to 44%.

GOP Increases Funding For Missouri, Virginia Senate Races. The AP (10/25, Kuhnhenn) reports Republicans "pumped money into Missouri and Virginia Senate races this week, part of a GOP strategy to cling to their Senate majority by fending off strong Democratic challenges in Republican-leaning states." The National Republican Senatorial Committee "purchased $1.4 million of television time to air an ad that portrays Democratic candidate Jim Webb as insensitive to women. The ad is the first investment by the Republican Party in the state, reflecting concern among Republican officials that incumbent Sen. George Allen is in a closer contest than they expected." In Missouri, the Republican National Committee "spent $1.78 million on Monday on ads opposing Missouri Democratic Senate candidate Claire McCaskill, who is running against Republican Sen. James Talent. Missouri has been a target for both parties. Democrats have poured $6.37 million into the Senate race and Republicans have spent $5.39 million."

Democratic Gains Could Result In Evenly Divided Senate. The AP (10/25, Abrams) reports, "Expected Democratic gains in the election raise the possibility that the Senate, for the second time in six years, will end up in a 50-50 tie." In that event, Democrats "would like to revive a power-sharing deal that was struck in 2001. But partisan passions on Capitol Hill are stronger now." Republicans would "officially still be the majority party in an evenly divided Senate because Vice President Dick Cheney, in his role as president of the Senate, would give the GOP a tie-breaking vote. But Democrats would surely demand a greater role in determining how the Senate treated Bush's legislative agenda in his final two years in the White House."

Impact Of Racial Issues On Tennessee Senate Race Considered. The Christian Science Monitor (10/25, Feldmann, 58K) reports that if Rep. Harold Ford Jr. wins the Tennessee Senate race, he "would be the first African-American from the South to take a Senate seat since Reconstruction - a victory that could nudge another ambitious black politician, Sen. Barack Obama (D) of Illinois, toward running for president by showing him how to win in the South." On the other hand, after "falling behind in the polls and replacing his campaign manager late in September," Republican Bob Corker "has now settled on his final argument to the people of Tennessee: Vote for me because of my experience and my maturity and because I'm the 'real Tennessean.'" Corker, "his campaign, and national Republicans have also worked hard to drive up Ford's negatives, highlighting some of his relatives' legal troubles, a life spent mostly away from Tennessee, a career in politics, and his bachelor, designer-suit lifestyle." The "racial dimension of the Ford-Corker contest looms large. Pollsters speak of a race effect on surveys- that is, shave off a few percentage points from the black candidate's total, since some white voters tell pollsters what they think they want to hear, that they're willing to vote for a black candidate when in reality they're not." But one Tennessee Republican activist "says he believes the racial aspect will be a wash in this race: Some whites won't vote for a black man, but turnout in the black community, 16 percent of the electorate, will be higher than usual."

DOJ_NMG_0086334

The Washington Post (10/25, A1, Murray, 748K) reports in a front page story that Ford "announced his Senate campaign 18 months ago with three strikes against him: He was a Democrat, he was black, and he carried family baggage. The five-term congressman was wildly popular in his Memphis House district and was viewed as a rising star in the Democratic Party. But statewide office seemed beyond reach in Tennessee, a state with a history of racially divided voting where Republicans had won recent Senate races." Corker and Ford "tangle over all the usual issues, including the war in Iraq, education and energy independence, with both candidates holding mainstream views on most topics. Yet every speech, slogan and campaign ad seems to echo with double meaning." Corker "often appears to be tiptoeing through a rhetorical minefield, eager to discredit his Democratic opponent with the sharpest weapons he can find but wary about accusations of playing racial politics." The state Democratic Party "is working particularly hard to rally black voters. State party officials believe African Americans could push Ford over the top if they turn out in large numbers."

GOP Ad Said To Play To Racial Biases. NBC Nightly News (10/24, story 4, 2:55, Mitchell, 9.87M) reported, "Ford could become the first African American elected to the Senate from the South since Reconstruction. But crossing that color barrier might not be easy. Watch this Republican ad for his components." GOP ad, Unidentified female: "I met Harold at the playboy party." Unidentified male: "I'd love to pay higher taxes." Unidentified male: "Canada can take care of North Korea, they're not busy." Unidentified male: "So he took money from porn movie producers. I mean, who hasn't?" Unidentified female voice: "The Republican National Committee is responsible for the content of this advertising." Unidentified male: "Harold, call me." Mitchell: "The NAACP says the ad 'plays to pre-existing prejudices about African American men and white women.' On MSNBC today the party chairman defended it." Ken Mehlman, National Republican Committee Chair: "African American folks, Hispanic folks and myself, we all looked at it, all of us are sensitive to that and we did not have that same reaction to it. So I just think there's disagreement about it." Mitchell: "Advertising experts, like Republican Jerry Della Femina, say it is a blatant racial appeal." Jerry Della Femina, advertising executive: "This is clearly an attempt to attack Harold Ford in a racist way. A blond, a Playboy bunny. It's just wrong."

Ford Says Republicans Are Desperate. Rep. Ford said on MSNBC's Hardball (10/24) that Republicans "are a little desperate and they are doing things you do when you get desperate in a campaign. We've stayed focused on Iraq and North Korea. We've tried to lay out how we can make college more affordable for these kids here, not only at UT, but at University of Tennessee at Chattanooga, the University of Memphis. Kids all across the state deserve a better chance and a more affordable option. And again, we're just working hard and pushing and pounding away. The numbers say good things. But more than that, everybody here is excited about this race for one reason. They know we can be better as a country than what we are right now."

Talent Says He Supports Bush On Some Issues, Disagrees With Him On Others. Sen. Jim Talent was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (10/24) if President Bush helps or hurts his campaign. Talent said, "It depends on what issues that you're talking about. I mean, you talk about economic growth, for example. I mean, look what the economy is doing. He's a strong supporter of renewables. There are other areas where, you know, I disagree with him and I think Missouri does. I think a classic example of that is immigration. I mean, I'm not in favor of an amnesty. I support a border fence, and he's on the other side of those issues. But, sure, there is a whole lot of issues where Missouri is strongly in support of the president."

Limbaugh Accuses Michael J. Fox Of Exaggerating His Illness In Ad. The Washington Post (10/25, C1, Montgomery, 748K) reports that radio host Rush Limbaugh yesterday accused actor Michael J. Fox of exaggerating the effects of his Parkinson's disease in a series of political ads he has done in support of candidates who favor stem cell research. Limbaugh "was reacting to Fox's appearance in another one of the spots, for Missouri Democrat Claire McCaskill, running against Republican Sen. James M. Talent." Limbaugh said, "He is exaggerating the effects of the disease," adding, "He's moving all around and shaking and it's purely an act. ... This is really shameless of Michael J. Fox. Either he didn't take his medication or he's acting." The Post adds, "Later Monday, still on the air, Limbaugh would apologize, but reaction to his statements from Parkinson's experts and Fox's supporters was swift and angry."

DOJ_NMG_0086335

USA Today (10/25, Stone, 2.27M) reports that Limbaugh "told listeners Monday that Fox's lurching, palsied movements in a TV ad for Missouri Senate challenger Claire McCaskill were 'an act.' Limbaugh said that Fox, a longtime advocate for research on embryonic stem cells, has said he sometimes does not take his medication in order to illustrate Parkinson's severe physical effects. Uncontrolled shaking and stiffness are among the symptoms of the nerve disease."

The New York Times (10/25, Stanley, 1.21M) reports, "Mr. Limbaugh later apologized for accusing Mr. Fox of exaggerating his symptoms, but said that 'Michael J. Fox is allowing his illness to be exploited and in the process is shilling for a Democrat politician.'" The Times adds, "If Mr. Fox did forgo medication for the advertisement as Mr. Limbaugh suggested, it could hardly be considered fraudulent: if anything, masking the extent of the disease's ravages is the deception, not revealing them. (A spokesman for Mr. Fox said his tremors were caused by his medication.) It was certainly the most dramatic way Mr. Fox has to personalize the issue; he used his infirmity much the way the late Christopher Reeve did when he lobbied for stem cell research to seek a cure for spinal injuries."

Talent Camp Says Fox Ad Is False. ABC World News (10/24, story 5, 2:30, Tapper, 8.78M) reported, "Michael J. Fox has been an impassioned advocate for years. Lobbying for embryonic stem cell research, which he argues can help people who suffer as he does from Parkinson's disease. But Fox has never injected himself so directly and so emotionally on the campaign trail and on TV until now." Michael J. Fox: "In Missouri, unfortunately Senator Jim Talent opposes expanding stem cell research. Senator Talent even wanted to criminalize the science that gives us a chance of hope." Tapper: "That's one of three TV ads so far Fox has recorded for candidates this season. This one goes after Republican Senator Jim talent of Missouri, where embryonic stem cell research is also on the ballot as a referendum. Today, the Talent campaign called the Fox ad, false. Since Senator Talent supports stem cell research that doesn't involve destroying a human embryo."

Virginia Candidates, Parties Begin Multi-Million Dollar Ad Blitz. The Washington Post (10/25, B5, Shear, Craig, 748K) reports Virginia's Senate candidates "and their national party backers will begin a final, multimillion-dollar advertising blitz Wednesday, flooding the state's airwaves with campaign commercials during the two weeks before Election Day." During the next week, "television watchers in Northern Virginia will see an average of five Virginia Senate ads a day. Together, the campaigns and the Senate party committees in Washington are spending $3.45 million over the next week in Northern Virginia." Political analyst Stuart Rothenberg said, "Voters are going to see so much stuff. If they are not numb already, they ought to shoot their brains full of Novocain." The Post adds voters "in other parts of the state will also be deluged with the commercials about" Republican Sen. George Allen and Democrat Jim Webb. But "most of the money will be flowing to Northern Virginia and its expensive media market, where a week's worth of ads for one candidate costs about $1 million. By contrast, running the same number of ads in the Roanoke media market costs about $89,000." The Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee's first ad "attacks Webb for his reaction to the Navy's Tailhook Association scandal, in which women were assaulted at a Las Vegas convention in 1991."

Clinton Jokes About Webb's Past Criticism Of Him. Al Kamen, in his Washington Post "In the Loop" column (10/25) writes former president Bill Clinton, "talking to Democratic contributors here last week, recounted how he had earlier chatted with Jim Webb, a Virginia former Republican who is running for the Senate as a Democrat. 'He said: "I can't believe you're going to campaign for me after all the terrible things I said about you,"' Clinton said. Clinton said he told Webb that 'if that was my test, I'd have no one to campaign for.'"

Kennedy States Support For Iraq War In New Ad. The AP (10/24, Condon) reported that in his new TV ad, Minnesota Senate candidate Mark Kennedy "squarely states his support" for the Iraq war, "'even though I know it may not be what you want to hear,' he tells voters." The 30-second ad "is the latest attempt by the Republican to catch Democratic frontrunner Amy Klobuchar, and may be the only ad of its kind in the country. Staring into the camera, Kennedy acknowledges that 'we've made some mistakes in Iraq' but says that 'leaving Iraq now will create a breeding ground for new attacks on America.'" The AP added, "Political observers said Tuesday they've not seen an ad like it anywhere this election cycle, with the Bush administration and Republicans on the defensive over Iraq. Just a day earlier, the White House acknowledged President Bush had dropped his familiar "stay the course" phrase in talking about the war."

Cardin Says Faith And Family Sustain Him. The Washington Post (10/25, Shaver, 748K) reports, "During 40 years in public office -- 20 in the General Assembly followed by two decades in Congress – [Maryland Democratic Senate candidate Benjamin] Cardin has woven his political life into the faith and family that he says sustain him." Cardin's faith "informs his actions in the House of Representatives, particularly a six-year membership on the ethics committee, he said." Cardin "said he remains grounded in what his father told him after his election to the General Assembly at 23. 'He said I had something people worked a lifetime for,' Cardin said, 'that I had the opportunity to make a difference and that I should think about that. ... I think about that frequently, and it affects everything I do in life.'"

DOJ_NMG_0086336

WTimes Endorses Steele. In an editorial, the Washington Times (10/25, 88K) endorses Republican Michael Steele in the Maryland US Senate race, noting that he is "anything but a conventional politician." Steele's "openness to new ideas offers a refreshing contrast from the sort of orthodox liberalism represented by Mr. Cardin. And Mr. Steele, the first black candidate elected statewide in Maryland in modern times, offers a compelling personal success story that is in many ways the embodiment of the American Dream." The Times adds that Steele "is a nontraditional candidate who has brought a different style of campaigning to an old-school blue state, and there are no gray areas when he stands on issues. The Washington Times is pleased to endorse Michael Steele for the US Senate."

Report Warns Of Potential Voting Problems In 10 States. The Washington Post (10/25, A3, Goldstein, 748K) reports that a study released yesterday by a nonpartisan clearinghouse that tracks electoral reforms across the US warns that at least 10 states are ripe for voting problems in this year's election. The report by Electionline.org "says those states, and possibly others, could encounter trouble on Election Day because they have a combustible mix of fledgling voting-machine technology, confusion over voting procedures or recent litigation over election rules -- and close races. The report cautions that the Nov. 7 elections, which will determine which political party controls the House and Senate, promise 'to bring more of what voters have come to expect since the 2000 elections -- a divided body politic, an election system in flux and the possibility -- if not certainty -- of problems at polls nationwide.'"

GOP Lobbying Firms Not Clamoring To Hire Democrats As Election Nears. The Hill (10/25, Tiron, Young) reports that while seasoned Democrats are in high demand as lobbying shops gear up for a possible Democratic take over of Congress, "some top all-Republican firms are not clamoring to hire them. Despite a growing sense of urgency in recent months to bring well-positioned Democrats to lobby shops, company government-relations offices and trade associations, several all-GOP and GOP-leaning lobby firms said that they are doing nothing to prepare for a change of congressional power." The Hill adds that "some firms that have few or no ties to Democratic lawmakers can expect to continue to flourish, particularly if they have close relationships to Republican committee leaders, as opposed to the leaders of the chambers," a Republican lobbyist said.

WPost Endorses Ehrlich For Reelection. The Washington Post (10/25, A16, 748K) endorses Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich for reelection in an editorial this morning. The Post says Ehrlich "has grown in the role to become a generally proficient, pragmatic governor, if not always a disciplined or mature one." The Post adds, "Mr. Ehrlich, for all his faults, has shaken up the old guard in Maryland politics -- while appointing plenty of Democrats to his cabinet and judgeships. If he were wise, he would use a second term to start anew with the legislature and build on his record of achievement."

Anti-Deval Ad May Have Backfired On Healey In Massachusetts. ABC World News (10/24, story 6, 3:05, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Massachusetts will either have its first elected female governor or its first African-American governor. The race in the final days, like so many races around the country, is getting very rough." ABC (Berman) added that in the contest between Republican Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey and Democrat Deval Patrick, "his race and her gender don't seem to matter in this election." Frank Phillips, State House Bureau chief, Boston Globe: "It's not an issue in the campaign for governor here that Deval Patrick is an African-American. It's not an issue that Kerry Healy is a woman." Berman: "What are the issues? Both candidates are talking about jobs and education. But lately." Patrick: "They have thrown at us, everything but the kitchen sink. And I expect the kitchen sink any day now." Healey: "Deval Patrick says..." Berman: "Lately it seems that candidates are spending most of the time talking about each other. Patrick is tying Healey to an unpopular Republican governor. And Healey is running an ad on letters that Patrick wrote about a convicted rapist." But there "are signs it might be backfiring." A new poll "shows Patrick opening up a 27-point lead. More than double the lead he had just a few weeks ago. And the majority of the people on the poll, say they are turned off by the tone of Kerry Healey's campaign."

Survey Finds US Muslims Likely To Back Democrats. The Washington Times (10/25, Duin, 88K) reports America's Muslim voters "are a young, highly educated and prosperous voting bloc that will overwhelmingly back Democrats in November, according to a survey released yesterday by the Council on American-Islamic Relations." They are "also coming of age in terms of political representation. Next month, Democratic nominee Keith Ellison of Minneapolis is poised to become the first Muslim member of the House of Representatives. He says, if elected, he will take his oath of office with his hand on the Koran instead of the Bible." With their "large families and socially conservative leanings, Muslims mirror the GOP's demographic profile. Seventy-eight percent of those interviewed were married. Of those respondents, 83 percent had at least one child and 54 percent reported two or three children. Muslims had an average of 4.5 members per family, contrasted with a 2005 Census Bureau figure estimating the number of family members in an average American household at 3.14." But ideologically, "their differences with Republicans are vast. Sixty-six percent favor normalization of relations with Iran, 55 percent are afraid the 'war on terror' has morphed into a war on Islam, just 12 percent think the war in Iraq is worthwhile and only 10 percent support the use of the military to spread democracy."

DOJ_NMG_0086337

Cheney Says Clinton Would Be A "Formidable" Presidential Candidate. Vice President Dick Cheney said on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (10/24) that Sen. Hillary Clinton would be a "formidable" presidential candidate. Asked if she can win, Cheney said, "I think she could win. I hope she doesn't. I disagree with her on nearly all the issues, but nobody should underestimate her. She's a very serious candidate for President."

The AP (10/24) reported that Cheney "handicapped the Democratic field of potential candidates in an interview with conservative talk show host Sean Hannity." In addition to his comments on Clinton, Cheney said Sen. Barrack Obama "was an 'attractive guy. Don't know him well, met him a few times. I think at this stage, my initial take on him was he's been two years as a senator. I think people might want a little more experience than that, given the nature of the times we live in. But certainly, he's an attractive candidate." USA Today (10/25, 2.27M) carries the AP story this morning.

The Los Angeles Times (10/25, Gerstenzang, 918K) reports that Cheney said if Obama runs, "he'll be a player on the Democratic side."

Hollywood Democrats Ponder An Obama Presidential Bid. The Los Angeles Times (10/25, Daunt, 918K) reports, "Just the hint of a possible presidential run by US Sen. Barack Obama …has Hollywood Democrats talking." While Obama is "pondering his options, you can bet that some people in Hollywood are already envisioning his inaugural bash. Director Rob Reiner compared a possible run by Obama to Abraham Lincoln's victory." The Times adds, "Almost anyone who has met Obama will tell you that he's charismatic and warm, but not giddy. … But there's no denying that since he rocked the Democratic National Convention in 2004 with an impassioned speech about America, his life has changed. For one, he became an instant political star." Obama "says he appreciates the supports he's been shown by Hollywood Democrats. … 'There are some celebrities who have really done their homework and know what they are talking about and are terrific advocates for justice and peace and opportunity around the world,' he said. 'I want all citizens to get involved. Whether they are the secretary in an office building or a movie star, I think the more engaged and interested people are, the better off we all are.'"

Cheney Says He Will Not Run For President In 2008. Cheney was asked on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (10/24) if anyone has approached him about running for president in 2008. Cheney said, "I've made it very clear that I'm not a candidate, won't be a candidate." Cheney added, "I'm not coy about it. I made my decision a long time ago, and it's firm, final, fixed, irrevocable. I don't know how else I can say it. If nominated, I will not run; if elected, I will not serve."

Cook Called Most "Prominent" Political Forecaster. In the Washington Post's "Washington Sketch" column (10/25, A2), Dana Milbank says political analyst Charles Cook , "for a fee of $5,000 to $20,000, gives his audiences the (very) early returns." Last week "he spoke to pharmaceutical and insurance groups. On Monday, he flew to Las Vegas and back to talk to the American Beverage Association. Later this week it's American Express and a hedge fund in New York and the paper industry in Georgia. Yesterday found Cook at a breakfast with the DLA Piper law firm, lunch with automobile manufacturers and dinner in Boston with a corporate housing group." All are "looking for the same thing: next month's election returns. And Cook has them. 'Senators Santorum in Pennsylvania and Mike DeWine in Ohio are pretty much done,' he told the Piper audience at the Willard hotel. And the lifelines of Sens. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) and Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.) aren't looking any longer." Milbank says Cook is "not the boldest of election prognosticators (that honor goes to Stuart Rothenberg), nor the most telegenic (washingtonpost.com's Chris Cillizza gets the nod there), but he is surely the most prominent."

College Tuition Rising Faster Than Inflation. ABC World News (10/24, story 7, 0:25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that a new study from the College Board has found "tuition increases at the nation's colleges slowed this year. But still rose faster than inflation. Average tuition and fees at public colleges increased more than 6% to more than $5,800 a year. And the average cost of attending a private college rose 5.9% to more than $22,000."

The CBS Evening News (10/24, story 5, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Now, here's a warning for parents. College costs are still rising faster than the overall inflation rate, which ran about 2% in the fast year. Tuition fees at public colleges are up more 6% from last year, now averaging nearly $6,000 a year. At private four-year college tuition has increased by nearly 6% to $22,000 a year."

DOJ_NMG_0086338

The New York Times (10/25, Glater, 1.21M) reports that the report also found that "in the past five years, tuition and fees at public institutions rose more than at any other time in the past 30, increasing by 35 percent to $5,836 this academic year. Tuition and fees at private four-year colleges increased by 11 percent over the same period, though the average price of attending a private institution is $22,218." Education Secretary Margaret Spellings "said in a statement that the report 'underscores the need to make colleges and universities more accountable for results and at the same time increase need-based aid.'"

The Washington Post (10/25, A4, Matthews, 748K) notes that while costs are rising, "tuition and fees are not rising as fast as they did a few years ago. The College Board said the increase in tuition and fees at public four-year colleges, although still higher than the national inflation rate, slowed for the third year in a row. Increases at private four-year colleges have also cooled off in recent years, although the average yearly price of attending a private college is $22,218, far more than the state school average of $5,836."

The Wall Street Journal (10/25, B1, Tomsho, 2.03M) reports, "The number of students from all income levels pursuing post-secondary education continues to grow. But to stay in school, educators say, low-income students are taking loans, using high-interest credit cards to pay tuition, working more hours, and opting for two-year schools. Low-income students are choosing two-year colleges for financial reasons even though studies show more of them are academically qualified for four-year schools due to efforts by school districts to push them into tougher, college-prep courses. But only 23% of community college students earn a bachelor's degree -- a vital credential in today's workplace -- within six years, as compared with 63% of students at four-year institutions, according to the College Board."

Meanwhile, USA Today (10/25, Marklein, 2.27M) reports that "federal Pell Grant funding for low-income students declined for the first time in six years, and students borrowed more from private lenders last year than ever before." The report from the College Board "notes that financial aid averages conceal the wide range of aid awards; some students get a full ride, others pay the full amount. And federal tax benefits and a trend toward non-need-based state and institutional aid benefit middle- and upper-income students more than lower-income students, it says."

Former Morgan Stanley VP Praises Spitzer As "Good For Business." Donald Kempf Jr., retired executive vice president and chief legal officer of Morgan Stanley, writes in the Wall Street Journal (10/25, A14, 2.03M), reassuring that presumptive Gov. Eliot Spitzer will be "good for business" in the state and disagreeing with critics who say he overreached on federal securities law as attorney general. In his experience, Kempf says Spitzer came across as "smart," "self-reliant," and a "catalyst for constructive change." He "often had a better grasp of the underlying facts, legal implications and policy considerations than many from the federal regulatory agencies," Kempf says. In addition, Spitzer is different from other public servants and regulatory agencies because he "does not welsh on deals" and is "willing to engage where others at times seek to hide behind their status." Before stating that his "heroes" include Ronald Regan and George Herbert Walker Bush, Kempf lays outs Spitzer's "comprehensive strategy" for businesses in the state and is confident Spitzer will "pull much of it off" because "it spells a healthy and positive business climate."

Rice Defends "Axis Of Evil" Concept. The AP (10/25, Gearan) reports comments by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice that "recent events in Iran and North Korea support President Bush's 2002 claim that those nations were part of an 'axis of evil.'" When asked if Bush offered "a pretty good analysis" of Iran, Iraq and North Korea, Rice said, "It really was." She is further quoted saying, "The president three years ago realized that in order to manage the North Korean nuclear problem, a problem that's been going for decades, we have to have a regional coalition. This isn't something the United States was going to be able to do alone." The AP continues, "Proof of the strategy's success came when China voted this month to impose sanctions on its neighbor and ally North Korea, she said."

In related reporting, the Financial Times (10/25, Dinmore, Dombey) notes comments by UN Ambassador John Bolton that "imposing economic and political sanctions against Iran and North Korea will help democratic forces in those countries as Washington pursues its 'ultimate objective' of regime change." Those remarks "reflect the views of hardliners in the Bush administration who doubt that the threat of nuclear proliferation can be dealt with through negotiations." The Times says Bolton's "linking of sanctions with 'democratic forces' are likely to complicate delicate coalition-building efforts by" Rice.

Western Allies Move Ahead With Limited Iran Sanctions Plan. CNN's The Situation Room (10/24, Verjee) reported, "A new proposal may be in the works to sanction Iran for its disputed nuclear program. The US, Britain and France purportedly plan to urge the UN Security Council to ban the sale of missile and nuclear to Tehran. Diplomats say the draft resolution is essentially aimed at winning the backing of Russia and China. Iran has said imposing sanctions will backfire."

The AP (10/25, Jahn) reports Washington "and its allies want the [UNSC] to ban the sale of missile and atomic technology to Iran and end most U.N. help for its nuclear programs — moves diplomats said Tuesday are narrowly focused in hopes of winning Russian and Chinese backing for sanctions." AP sources "said the proposal also would commit U.N. member nations to denying entry to Iranian officials involved in developing missiles or nuclear systems," and likened some of the provisions under consideration to UNSCR 1718. "One of the diplomats described all three measures aimed at Iran as moderate in impact, saying that was an attempt to win Russian and Chinese support. Moscow and Beijing could be formally presented with the draft later this week, the diplomat said." The AP adds, "Canceling technical assistance to Iran from the [IAEA] would do little to ease [uranium enrichment] fears. But as the first such withdrawal of IAEA help, it would send a strong signal of international displeasure with Tehran."

DOJ_NMG_0086339

Beijing Says Kim Didn't Apologize, But Isn't Planning Second Nuclear Test. The Financial Times (10/25, McGregor, Fifield) reports Beijing "said on Tuesday North Korea had no immediate plans to conduct a second nuclear test, damping speculation of another blast following the imposition of [United Nations Security Council Resolution 1718] on the reclusive state. However, a Chinese foreign ministry spokesman suggested that Kim Jong-il, the North Korean leader, had warned in a meeting with a senior Chinese politician last week that Pyongyang could test another bomb if the pressure on it was not eased." Experts' "fears" last week of a second test "failed to materialise and many analysts think Pyongyang will try to drag out the crisis for as long as possible." The Times says, however, that "because the first test was considered a technical failure – the small size of the blast suggested the weapon had not fully detonated – it was likely that North Korea would want to try to iron out the problems then eventually test again, analysts said."

In lengthy reporting on the Chinese diplomatic mission to Pyongyang, the AP (10/25, Olesen) adds Beijing "gave its first full public account Tuesday of its mission to North Korea, saying it got no apology from top leader Kim Jong Il for the atomic explosion but did receive assurances there were no plans for a second nuclear test." Kim "also expressed a willingness to return to six-nation talks over its nuclear program if financial restrictions levied by the U.S. are first resolved, said Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao." Talks in Pyongyang "resulted in no breakthroughs, but China cast the discussions in a positive light."

AFP (10/25) reports remarks by Assistant Secretary of State Chris Hill that Washington and Beijing "'have never been closer' in the wake of North Korea's nuclear test earlier this month." Hill said of Secretary Rice's Asia trip, "In China we felt we were speaking with one voice on this issue. At no time have we felt closer together than we have felt in the wake of these North Korean provocations. … It always used to be that the Chinese would ask for more patience and we'd ask the Chinese for less patience but I think today we are really working better together."

Rice Backs Asian Security Organization, Will Elaborate On Plan Today. The Washington Times (10/25, Kralev, 88K) notes Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "is urging Asian nations to form a regional security organization to address common threats, suggesting that the six-nation forum dealing with North Korea -- which includes China and Russia -- could be a useful starting point." The Times says Rice believes that forum "would not come even close to NATO's integrated political and military structures, but it would assure more effective responses to crises such as Pyongyang's recent nuclear test." Rice is quoted saying earlier, "There are highly developed security arrangements all throughout Europe -- as a matter of fact, some people think too many. I don't think this region is probably going to develop an organizational structure anything like what you have in Europe." A State Department official "said the secretary will elaborate on the concept during a speech at the Heritage Foundation in Washington today." Regarding North Korea's candidacy for such a grouping, one "official familiar with interagency talks on the issue said membership could be held out as a reward to Pyongyang if it dismantles its nuclear program." The Times adds, "Analysts generally agree that a regional security organization in Asia is necessary, and point to the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation as a model." However, "several diplomats and analysts expressed doubts that China in particular would sign on to a security arrangement that institutionalizes the dominance of the United States in the Asia-Pacific region."

Japanese Anger Could Hurt North Korean Expats. The AP (10/25, Greimel) reports, "Harassment of Japan's insular North Korean community, the biggest outside the homeland or China, dates back decades. But animosity has flared to new levels since North Korea stunned the world with its nuclear test." A recent arson attempt against the headquarters of Chongryon, an organization of North Korean expatriates, "was one of several outbursts putting people on edge. … North Koreans in Japan have long been vilified as a communist fifth column, but with Tokyo leading a worldwide campaign to sanction Pyongyang for its nuclear test, they now stand in an unwanted spotlight." The AP says that every one of the 600,000 "Koreans in Japan face discrimination in Japan. All Koreans were stripped of their Japanese citizenship after World War II and those in Japan found themselves in a society that often looked down on them as former colonial subjects. Yet given the long-standing animosity between Tokyo and Pyongyang, North Koreans face especially limited economic opportunities, confined to tight-knit community-run businesses." Economic sanctions imposed by Japan on North Korea "will dig deep into North Korean businesses that rely on importing manufactured goods like cheap men's suits, marine and agriculture products, like clams and mushrooms, and raw materials such as coal."

DOJ_NMG_0086340

Joint Chiefs Chairman Says US Victory Over North Korea Would Be Costly. The AP (10/25, Burns) carries remarks by Joint Chiefs Chairman Peter Pace that the "U.S. military would prevail in a war against North Korea but at a greater cost in lives than if the United States were not already fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan." He is quoted saying, "It would not be as clean as we would like it to be, but it would certainly be sure, and the outcome would not be in doubt." Pace "told a Pentagon news conference that the U.S. military has plenty of people available to fight wars beyond Iraq and Afghanistan, but he acknowledged that U.S.-based ground combat units are not fully equipped." Pace "said U.S. intelligence can determine the size of the North Korean military but it cannot provide an equally important piece of information in assessing the threat of war: the intent of North Korea's leaders."

South Korean Public Opposes Confrontation, Rejection Of North. A 1,164-word piece in the New York Times (10/25, Fackler, 1.21M) details solidifying South Korean attitudes towards engagement with North Korea. "Once fervently anti-Communist, South Korea has slowly parted ways with the United States, its largest ally and wartime protector, on how to deal with the North. Across age groups and political persuasions, most South Koreans now appear to believe that their nation has no choice but to keep building ties with the North, despite the widespread shock and anger here over its nuclear test." The Times says that "bedrock of public sentiment" explains the differences in tone between Washington and Seoul, which "has been reluctant to tighten the economic screws on the North, hoping instead to entice it to the bargaining table with increased links with the outside world." South Korea's "softer approach is a result of a deeper evolution in public perception [there] since the end of the cold war and South Korea's subsequent emergence as an Asian economic powerhouse." Recent opinion polling suggests "that while the claimed nuclear detonation hardened attitudes toward the North, a majority of South Koreans still oppose outright confrontation." The Times adds, "Political analysts say a big factor behind the desire to maintain economic ties is a deep ambivalence in South Korean views of the North. While the two Koreas still face each other across the minefields and barbed wire of the demilitarized zone, many South Koreans have come to see the North as nothing more than a destitute, misguided relative."

Israel Ponders Preemptive Gaza Strike On Hamas Weapons Stockpiles. The Washington Times (10/25, Mitnick, 88K) reports, "Applying a lesson from the recent war against Hezbollah, Israeli leaders are increasingly talking about staging a pre-emptive military offensive in the Gaza Strip in order to avert a Hamas buildup of improved missiles." Some Israeli "politicians say a broader operation against Hamas is necessary if Israel wants to deny it the ability to stockpile weapons like the Shi'ite militia Hezbollah, which was able to build up its arsenal during six years of relative calm." While Israeli military forces "have uncovered more than a dozen smuggling tunnels used to sneak weapons, money and contraband into Gaza from Egypt," some "intelligence officials say they think that Syria and Iran are supplying Hamas with the advanced anti-tank missiles that turned armored vehicles like the Merkava tank into a sitting ducks, according to local press reports." Defense Minister Amir Peretz "has said that Israel cannot allow Gaza to become another Lebanon. At the same time Mr. Peretz, the chairman of coalition partner Labor party, said that Israel has no desire to reconquer the Gaza Strip permanently."

AP Photographer Released In Gaza. The AP (10/25, Laub) reports AP photographer Emilio Morenatti "was freed unharmed Tuesday after a harrowing day in the hands of Palestinians who abducted him at gunpoint and dressed him in women's clothes to spirit him from one secret location to another." Fatah Party officials brought him to Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas' office late yesterday. "It was not clear who kidnapped him, though officials said he was taken by criminals. The government and main Palestinian groups denounced the abduction. Morenatti, a 37-year-old Spaniard, looked fatigued after his daylong ordeal but said he was unharmed."

NYTimes Pans Olmert's Coalition Choice. In an editorial today, the New York Times (10/25, 1.21M) says Israeli Prime Minister "Ehud Olmert "has chosen to make an unwise and damaging trade-off. Bringing the pro-settler Israel Beiteinu party into his governing coalition reinforces his vulnerable parliamentary majority. But it makes it virtually impossible for Mr. Olmert to carry out the partial West Bank withdrawal program he ran on just seven months ago." The possibility of a "new momentum toward" a peace settlement "now seems less likely than ever." Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas' attempts "to bring Hamas around have not gotten as much support as they should from Israel. With Israel Beiteinu joining Mr. Olmert's coalition, they are likely to get even less." The Times concludes, "Creating new obstacles to peace with the Palestinians is the last thing Israel needs after the Lebanon fiasco."

Israeli Official Says Iran And Syria Are Rearming Hezbollah. A Washington Times (10/25, Sands, 88K) interview reports comments by Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Shaul Mofaz that "Iran and Syria are rapidly rearming Hezbollah guerrillas in southern Lebanon as an international peacekeeping force has failed to carry out a U.N. mandate to disarm the Shi'ite militia group." Mofaz "also warned that time was growing short for the international community to implement effective sanctions to halt Iran's drive for nuclear weapons." He "said Israel's 34-day war with Hezbollah fighters this summer had dealt the Shi'ite militia a major setback in its southern Lebanese base. But he expressed frustration that the Lebanese army and an enhanced U.N. peacekeeping force had not disarmed Hezbollah or sealed the border to prevent Syria and Iran from rearming their 'proxy.'" Despite Olmert's criticisms of Iran's nuclear program, Mofaz "put greater stress on multilateral efforts to pressure Iran, calling for strong sanctions against Tehran if it refuses to cooperate. .. The North Korea nuclear test earlier this month has heightened the need for a tough stand against Iran, Mr. Mofaz said." The Times adds, "The hawkish Mr. Mofaz is the transportation minister under the unity government headed by [Olmert], but he remains a major voice on defense and security issues in Israel."

DOJ_NMG_0086341

Pentagon Officials Enter Plea On Arms Deals. The AP (10/25, Apuzzo) reports that Ronald W. Wiseman, a former official the Defense Reutilization and Marketing Service, the Pentagon agency that sells excess military equipment, "was sentenced to 18 months in prison" for "selling military equipment in the Middle East and pocketing hundreds of thousands of dollars." He "and a Saudi Arabian auctioneer agreed to sell some equipment off the books and share in the profits." While "most of the equipment was unneeded and scheduled for auction," some Humvees "were still weaponized and were not supposed to have been sold." Wiseman previously pleaded guilty "and agreed to cooperate in a federal investigation. A second U.S. official, Gayden C. Woodson of North Ogden, Utah, pleaded guilty Tuesday to conspiracy to steal government property." Woodson, he joined Wiseman's conspiracy in January 2001 "and continued it after Wiseman left the Middle East the following year."

Chavez Continues Security Council Candidacy, Denies He's Backing Bolivia. The AP (10/25) reports Bolivian President Evo Morales "said Tuesday that Venezuelan leader Hugo Chavez would throw his support behind the Andean country if Venezuela is unable to win enough votes to defeat U.S.-backed Guatemala for a" rotating UNSC seat." Morales "said he had spoken by phone with Mr. Chavez on Monday, who told him that if Venezuela does not get the two-thirds majority it needs to win, he will 'propose Bolivia as a candidate.'" While Venezuelan Foreign Minister Nicolas Maduro "said [his nation] would continue its drive for" seat, "a 36th round of voting is scheduled to be held [today], and some countries in the region -- from Brazil to Guyana -- expressed hope of seeking an alternate candidate. Other possibilities mentioned by diplomats included Chile and Uruguay." The Washington Post (10/25, A18, 748K) focuses its coverage on Caracas' plan to continue its candidacy, saying Venezuelan leaders "denied Bolivian President Evo Morales's claim that Venezuela had decided to withdraw from the competition…and would instead nominate his country as a candidate."

Under the headline, "Venezuela Diatribe Backfires," the New York Times (10/25, Hoge, 1.21M) says of Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez's speech last month to the UN General Assembly, "Now it appears that [his] histrionic performance -- styled to win him support from the United States' many detractors at the United Nations — may have cost his country the seat on the Security Council that he has conducted a global campaign to win." While "developing nations make up a vast majority of the 192 countries in the General Assembly and generally warm to rants against Washington," most "also value the United Nations as a place where their voices can be heard in a dignified setting, and both supporters and detractors here say Mr. Chávez may have miscalculated in turning it into his bully pulpit." The Times says "Venezuela's candidacy is already considered finished," and those "poor results came as a surprise," with many analysts noting "Mr. Chávez's performance as the cause." Also, "the unseemly process is embarrassing to Latin diplomats who acknowledge that the 33-nation Latin American and Caribbean group at the United Nations has often shown disunity, while the 53-nation African group and the 54-country Asian group yearly produce candidates without dispute."

Korologos Expected To Resign As Ambassador To Belgium. Al Kamen, in his Washington Post "In the Loop" column (10/25) writes "famed Washington lobbyist" Tom Korologos "is said to be leaving his fine posting as ambassador to Belgium early next year. Korologos, 73, often known as the 101st senator, helped out in Iraq in 2003. Word is the White House has tapped wealthy St. Louis developer Sam Fox, 77, to replace Korologos. Fox, a major GOP fundraiser, is national chairman of the Jewish Republican Coalition."

Study Says Most Automakers Falling Short Of Europe's CO2 Emissions Targets. The Wall Street Journal (10/25, A8, Echikson, 2.03M) reports, "About three-quarters of auto makers are failing to improve fuel efficiency to meet Europe's voluntary targets to cut carbon-dioxide emissions, according to an environmental group's study." The group "produced the study to heat up a debate over whether the European Commission should impose mandatory emissions cuts for automobiles. The federation backs mandatory controls, while the commission has set only voluntary targets." The Journal adds, "Any effort to impose new rules on the auto industry is likely to meet resistance from individual governments. The European Parliament's environment committee voted last month to delay compliance with CO2 standards to 2011 from 2008, saying auto makers needed the time to develop technologies."

DOJ_NMG_0086342

Vietnamese Economy Attracts Investment. The New York Times (10/25, Bradsher, 1.21M) reports, "In the three decades since Vietnam has gone from communism to a form of capitalism, it has begun surpassing many neighbors. It has Asia's second-fastest-growing economy, with 8.4 percent growth last year, trailing only China's, and the pace of exports to the United States is rising faster than even China's." It is a "sign of Vietnam's economic vitality" that it has nearly completed the WTO accession process. "The latest Asian economic tiger, Vietnam now produces and uses more cement than France, its former colonial ruler. The main index for the Ho Chi Minh City stock market and a smaller exchange in Hanoi have nearly doubled in value this year. Vietnam has become the talk of investment bankers and investors across Asia." In "some ways, Vietnam is more pro-business than China." The Times also reports that "Republicans in Congress are divided over" permanent normal trade relations, and "corporate America is divided, too, over a Bush administration initiative to win votes for full trade status by throwing a bone late in September to Southern senators representing states where textiles are made."

Book Argues Mercenaries Could End Abuses In Darfur. In his column in the Wall Street Journal (10/25, A14, 2.03M), Max Boot says mercenary "outfits have grown in importance as the armed forces of the U.S. and other countries downsized after the end of the Cold War. Today, from Afghanistan to Iraq, much of the logistical support for American troops is provided by Halliburton subsidiary KBR." Noting that "hired hands" work in Iraq "to safeguard supply convoys, buildings and VIPs," Boot says, "Among foreign troop contingents, they are second in number – and in casualties – only to the U.S. military." Mercenaries "can actually perform valuable work that we won't send our own troops to do," including, Book suggests, defending civilian populations in Darfur. Citing cases of mercenary units creating the conditions for peace, Boot adds, "Hired guns could be equally effective in stopping the campaign of rape, murder and ethnic cleansing carried out by the Sudanese government and the janjaweed militia in Darfur." He concludes, "Sending mercenaries to Africa isn't politically correct. But it would be a lot more useful than sending more aid money that will be wasted or passing ineffectual resolutions that will be ignored."

Friedman Say Energy Struggle Reviving Cold War Tensions In Europe. In his column in the New York Times (10/25, 1.21M), Tom Friedman "posits that the price of oil and the pace of freedom operate in an inverse relationship in petrolist states — states with weak institutions and a high dependence on oil for their G.D.P. As the price of oil goes down, the pace of freedom goes up." He says "a black tide of petro-authoritarianism [is] emanating from Russia, and it is blunting the Berlin Wall tide of free markets and free people." Russia under President Vladimir Putin "has gone from the sick man of Europe to the boss man." EU and Russian "energy interests" are "in a standoff," and Friedman says "turnabout is fair play," with Russia "now using petro-power to push back." He concludes, "Centuries of uneasy relations between Europe and Russia make German officials queasy about how dependent they've grown on the Kremlin to heat their homes and offices. Queasy or not, one thing they know for sure: Russia is back. The gas man cometh."

WPost Says Europeans Not Bridging Gap With Muslim Community. Noting the one year anniversary of the suburban Paris riots, a Washington Post (10/25, A16, 748K) editorial says the "alienation" felt by Muslims "appears to have worsened, not only in France but across Western Europe. … Europeans are slowly growing more aware that a major part of the global struggle against Islamic extremism must take place in their own countries -- and not just in faraway Afghanistan or Iraq." However, European elites still appear to be a long way from coming to grips with the challenge. Rather than seeking to address the larger alienation of mainstream Muslims, European leaders often appear to do the opposite -- by challenging the culture of Muslims and defending gratuitous insults of Islam." The Post pans British Commons Leader Jack Straw's recent comments about veiled Muslim women, and says "veils -- which are also under government attack in France and Italy -- are not the cause of [self-] segregation, much less of terrorism. Attacks on Muslim custom by public officials are more likely to reinforce than to ease the community's alienation." Politicians should focus "on those who actually foment intolerance among European Muslims -- as well as those in the mainstream community who promote prejudice against Arabs and South Asians and their descendants." The Post concludes, "Politicians would do better to work on dismantling the barriers Muslims face in getting educations and jobs rather than those that distinguish Islam from the secular majority."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Democrats' Senate Hopes Lie With Rural Voters, Poll Finds."
"War On West Shifts Back To Afghanistan."
"Army Is Training Advisors For Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0086343

"Making Sabbath A Day At The Beach."
"Governor Is Blunt To Bush."

USA Today:
"By The Numbers."
"Single-Sex School Restrictions Ease."
"When A Heart Attack Goes Undiagnosed."
"No Major Troop Cut In Iraq For A Year."
"Projections."

New York Times:
"General Weighs 2nd Troop Shift To Calm Baghdad."
"Idle Contractors Add Millions To Iraq Rebuilding."
"To Lower Costs, Hospitals Try Free Basic Care For Uninsured."
"Federal Rules Back Single-Sex Public Education."
"Pieces Of Art Collection Were Someone Else's."
"Vietnam's Roaring Economy Is Set For World Stage."

Washington Post:
"More U.S. Troops May Be Iraq-Bound."
"The GOP Leans On A Proven Strategy."
"A Sense Of Service."
"A Contentious Campaign In A Battleground State."
"DNA Testing a Mixed Bag for Immigrants."
"FBI's Fairfax Agents Packing For Pr. William."
"Failing Schools Are Fighting Back."

Washington Times:
"Democrats Won't Count Votes Before They're Cast."
"Iraqi Takeover target Set."
"National Medicaid Transport Probed."
"Virginia Battle On Same-Sex 'Marriage' Down To Wire."
"Rice Proposes Asia Form Security Alliance."
"Tracking device Places Parents In Driver's Seat."

Detroit Free Press:
"Tigers Must Start Hitting-Or Else."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Potty Talk Ends Shock jock Era In Atlanta."
"Schools Move To Gender Divide."
"Titanic Relics Emerge From Secret Warehouse."
Who'll Pay For Civil Rights Museum."
"Perdue Tax Break Spotlights Legislator."

Houston Chronicle:
"State Tuition Surpasses U.S. Average."
"If These Walls Could Sing."
"Will Skilling Get Prison Of Choice."
"Us May Boost Troop Level In Baghdad."
"Worker For All Jobs And All Seasons."
"Friedman Feels Sting OF Political Attacks."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Iraq Timeline-Changing Course; Iraq War Analysis; Kidnapped Soldier-Iraq; Bush Hits Campaign Trail; Michael J. Fox AD- Anti Stem Cell Research; Massachusetts Governors Race; College Tuition Increase; Heart Attack Risk; Tropical Storm Paul; Light Hurricane Season; Stock Market.
CBS: Iraq Timeline-Changing Course; Iraq war Analysis; Iraq War Analysis; Foley Investigation; College Tuition Increase; Genetic Medicine-Medical Breakthrough; Campaign 2006-Microtargeting; Arianna Huffington Opinion-UN Sanctions; Stock Market; Dead Celebrities; Kenny Rodgers & Baseball.
NBC: : Iraq Timeline Changing Course; Iraq War Analysis; Foley Investigation; Campaign 2006; Stock Market; Flu Shots; Separate Education; Housing Market; Fashion Goes illegal.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
CBS: Casey-US Troop Levels In Iraq; Hastert-Ethics Committee Testimony; Study-Health Care Costs; Study-Effects Of Flu Shots On Children; World Series.
NPR: Casey-Us Troop Levels In Iraq; Hastert-Ethics Committee Testimony; Nm-Los Alamos Documents Found; Ethiopia-Somalia Conflict; La-Offshore Drilling; Paulson-Us Economy's Health; World Series.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Meets with President Leonel Fernandez of the Dominician Republic, Oval Office, pool at bottom.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — Addresses Cincinnati USA Regional Chamber, The Phoenix, Cincinnati.

LAURA BUSH —Delivers remarks at a Michele Bachmann for Congress and Republican Party of Minnesota breakfast, Minneapolis Marriott Southwest, 5801 Opus Parkway, Minnetonka, Minn., open press; delivers remarks at a Minnesota Victory 2006 Rally, Mayo Civic Center, Rochester, Minn., open press; delivers remarks at Indiana Victory 2006 Rally, Bartholomew County 4-H Fairgrounds, Columbus, Ind., open press.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: MILITARY COMMUNICATIONS _ Milcom 2006, the Military Communications Conference, will be held. Theme: ``Networking the Warfighter." The conference will include classified and unclassified sessions, discussion panels, and tutorials, focused on advanced technology in military communications. Highlights: 12 p.m. Lunch with Gordon England, Deputy Secretary of Defense. Location: Wardman Park Marriott, 2660 Woodley Road, NW, and Omni Shoreham Hotel, 2500 Calvert Street NW. The classified program will take place in the Ronald Reagan International Trade Center, 1300 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0086344

US-CHINA _ Five-day meeting of the US-China Economic and Security Review Commission. Location: Hall of the States, 444 N. Capitol St.

BEST COLLEGES _ 9:30 a.m. Education Sector holds discussion on American colleges and universities and whether they're really ``the best." Participants include Paul Glastris, Editor-in-Chief, The Washington Monthly; David Dunn, Chief of Staff to the U.S. Secretary of Education; Brian Kelly, Executive Editor, U.S. News & World Report; Patricia McGuire, President, Trinity University; and Kevin Carey, Education Sector. Location: Capital Hilton, 16th and K Sts. NW., Capitol Hilton, 16th and K Sts. NW.

GENETIC DATABANKS _ 9:30 a.m. The American Civil Liberties Union holds a panel discussion on the expansion of forensic DNA databases and their implications for civil liberties and criminal justice, with Barry Scheck of the Innocence Project, Helen Thompson of Genewatch UK, William Thompson of UC, Irvine, Tania Simoncelli, science adviser to the ACLU. Location: Room 2226, Rayburn.

AMTRAK _ 10 a.m. Rep. John Mica, R-Fla., joins D. Hamilton Peterson, Deputy Counsel - Director of Special Investigations, Office of Inspector General, National Railroad Passenger Corporation (Amtrak) for a press conference to release a report on an investigation of Amtrak Contracts With Private Law Offices. The Inspector General's report outlines what it says are serious problems, lack of oversight and excessive charges In awarding millions of dollars In legal contracts. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn House Office Building.

DROPOUT RATE _ 10 a.m. Pew Partnership for Civic Change holds briefing and discussion on ``Why the Dropout Rate Goes Beyond the Schools." With Alma Powell, Pew Advisory Board; and representatives from the Joint Center for Political Studies; National Governors Association; National Association of Manufacturers; others. Location: National Press Club, 14th and F Sts. NW.

GAYS-MARRIAGE AMENDMENTS _ 10 a.m. The National Press Club and the National Lesbian and Gay Journalists Association sponsors a newsmaker media briefing, ``The Gay Factor: How Marriage Amendments and the Foley Fallout will Affect the Election." Location: National Press Club.

ZOGBY POLL _ 10 a.m. Arab American Institute releases Zogby Battleground Poll of Arab-American Voters in Florida, Michigan, Ohio and Pennsylvania. Location: Capital Hilton, 16th and K Sts. NW.

IRAQ-PROTEST _ 11:30 a.m. There will be telephone news conference on Active-Duty troops launching a campaign to press Congress to end U.S. Occupation of Iraq, with 65 members -- including two who served in Iraq -- sending ``Appeals for Redress under the Military Whistle-blower Protection Act. Contacts: Trevor Fitzgibbon, 202-246-5303. Notes: To participate, call 800-362-0574; password ``Active-Duty.

TOM DAVIS-AWARD _ 11:30 a.m. Rep. Tom Davis (R-VA) receives the Gen. L.V. 'Sonny' Montgomery Award, the National Guard Bureau's highest award. Location: Room 2154 Rayburn.

FOREIGN AGRICULTURAL SERVICE _ 12 p.m. - 2 p.m. Michael Yost, administrator, Foreign Agricultural Service, U.S. Department of Agriculture, addresses a Women in International Trade Agriculture Section luncheon. Topic: ``The Restructuring of the Foreign Agricultural Service -- How Will It Be Impacted?" Location: Chinatown Garden Restaurant, 618 H St. NW.

ENERGY-BODMAN _ 12:30 p.m. Energy Secretary Bodman speaks on ``Biofuels and the Future of US Energy" at the US Chamber of Commerce. Location: 1615 H St. NW.

SENATE RACES _ 12:30 p.m. Sens. Elizabeth Dole, R-NC, chair, National Republican Senatorial Committee; and Charles Schumer, D-NY., chair, Democratic Senatorial campaign Committee, participate in a National Press Club Luncheon. Location: National Press Club.

ARLINGTON BURIAL _ 1 p.m. There will be a burial service for Army CW2 Scott Dyer, an Army Special Forces officer killed in Iraq. Location: Arlington National Cemetery.

CHRISTIAN-ZIONISTS-ELECTIONS _ 1 p.m. - 3 p.m. The Council for the National Intertest sponsors a discussion, ``The Armageddon Vote in 2006: Christian Zionists and the Midterm Elections." Speaks include Rev. Bob Edgar, General Secretary, National Council of Churches; and Rev. Robert O. Smith, co-author, ``Christians and a Land Called Holy: How Can We Foster Justice, Peace, and Hope?" Location: Room 2168, Rayburn House Office Building.

RICE SPEECH _ 1:30 p.m. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice speaks on her recent diplomatic mission to Asia, aimed at building consensus in dealing with North Koreas nuclear program. Location: 214 Massachusetts Ave. NE.

US FOREIGN POLICY _ 3 p.m. New America Foundation forum on ``The American Way of Strategy: US Foreign Policy and the American Way of Life." With Michael Lind, author, ``The American Way of Strategy," and Bruce Stokes, New America Foundation director. Location: 1630 Connecticut Ave. NW.

DEMOCRATIC ELECTIONS _ 5 p.m. National Endowment for Democracy holds panel discussion on ``Electoral Systems and Democracy: What Have We Learned?" With Donald Horowitz of Duke University; Larry Diamond, Hoover Institute; others. Location: 1025 F St. NW, Suite 800.

CHINESE TECHNOLOGY _ 5 p.m. American University Professor Douglas Fuller speaks on ``China's Emerging Technology Tracjectory." Location: American University, Butler Board Room, 4400 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0086345

COURAGE AWARDS-JILL CARROLL _ 6 p.m. International Women's Media Foundation's 2006 Courage in Journalism Awards. Winners include Jill Carroll, The Christian Science Monitor, who was held in captivity in Iraq for 82 days; May Chidiac, a journalist with the Lebanese Broadcasting Corporation, who survived a car bomb attack; and Gao Yu of China, pro-democracy reporter who was sentenced to six years in prison for ``leaking state secrets.'' Lifetime Achievement Award goes to Elena Poniatowska Amor, who's spent much of her career reporting on the lives of poor Mexicans. Location: National Geographic Society, 17th and M sts NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

From: USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent: Wednesday, October 25, 2006 11:04 AM
To: USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject: PREPARED REMARKS OF ATTORNEY GENERAL ALBERTO R. GONZALES ON THE MILITARY COMMISSIONS ACT OF 2006 AT THE GERMAN MARSHALL FUND

Department of Justice

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE — AG
WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 25, 2006 — (202) 514-2007
WWW.USDOJ.GOV — TDD (202) 514-1888

PREPARED REMARKS OF ATTORNEY GENERAL ALBERTO R. GONZALES ON THE MILITARY COMMISSIONS ACT OF 2006 AT THE GERMAN MARSHALL FUND

BERLIN, GERMANY

DOJ_NMG_0086347

Thank you. I welcome this opportunity to engage in a dialogue with you about the legal challenges that the United States, and our allies in Europe, have faced in fighting terrorism against al Qaeda and its allies.

On September 11, 2001, the world stood witness with shock and horror to images of planes turned into missiles, flying into the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, murdering thousands of innocents. Those images, as well as subsequent images from London, Madrid, Bali and elsewhere have left an indelible mark on citizens throughout the world, and they have fundamentally shaped how the United States is responding to the threat from international terrorism.

When the enemy is willing to sacrifice their own lives to attack our citizens, when their cause is nothing less than territorial domination and a return to the barbarity of the Dark Ages, and when the cost of each tactical success for the enemy is measured in the hundreds and thousands of innocent lives lost, then we face something fundamentally different from crime—we are at war. Every resource of our Nation, including law enforcement, the military, and the intelligence services, must be directed at preventing future attacks before they occur.

By its activity both before and after 9/11—and by its own statements—al Qaeda is clearly in a state of armed conflict with the United States and its allies. The action taken following 9/11 by the United States and its allies in invading Afghanistan was a clear recognition of that state of armed conflict. I recognize that many countries now believe that the conflict is concluded, but the United States does not. Rather, we believe that as al Qaeda has scattered, the battlefield has widened.

There is a fundamental disagreement between the U.S. and some of its allies as to whether we are still at war. But my main point today is that just because the U.S. still believes a state of war exists, that does not mean that the rule of law has no place. To the contrary, it means that a different set of rules is applicable. I hope to be able to explain today how we preserve the rule of law in fighting this conflict.

We believe that, as part of this war, and in order to defend the security of our citizens, as well as the lives of citizens of Europe, we must have the ability to detain and remove terrorists from the battlefields of this conflict; to collect from them the vital intelligence that enables us to capture their associates and break up future terrorist plots; and to create effective and fair procedures that will allow us to prosecute and punish captured terrorists for their war crimes.

The legal doctrines directed at achieving these ends are not the same as those we would employ during peacetime. The United States Supreme Court has recognized this in several of its decisions, including its recent Hamdan decision. The United States Congress likewise has endorsed this view, most recently in the Military Commissions Act of 2006.

Over the past five years, the United States and its allies can point to a number of successes in our fight against terrorism. Our intelligence-gathering efforts were instrumental in capturing dozens of Osama bin Laden's closest henchmen, including the mastermind of the 9/11 attacks, Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, as well as Abu Zubaydah and Ramzi bin al Shibh. And the capture of those terrorists has led to actionable intelligence that has disrupted many other terrorist plots through both law enforcement and military operations.

DOJ_NMG_0086348

We have broken up a cell of 17 Southeast Asian terrorist operatives being groomed for attacks inside the United States; uncovered key operatives in al Qaeda's biological weapons program – including a cell developing anthrax to be used in terrorist attacks. We have stopped planned strikes on U.S. Marines in Djibouti, and on the U.S. consulate in Karachi, and we have foiled a plot to hijack passenger planes and fly them into Heathrow Airport and Canary Wharf in London.

As we know, just this summer, British investigators thwarted an al Qaeda plan to blow up airplanes bound for the United States with common household liquids that could be smuggled aboard in passengers' carry-on luggage and assembled into bombs once onboard.

These successes, and the vigorous prosecution of the armed conflict with al Qaeda, have undoubtedly made us safer, but we cannot delude ourselves. We are not yet safe. Accordingly, we are continuing to work with our allies to identify new ways to contain and combat the ever-changing threat of terrorism.

Today, I would like to address one such way—the Military Commissions Act. This new American law provides for the full and fair trials of captured terrorists; reinforces and clarifies United States obligations under the Geneva Conventions; and buttresses our ability to gather vital intelligence and disrupt future terrorist attacks.

The Detention of Enemy Combatants

With respect to our international obligations, the United States provides individuals detained as enemy combatants at Guantanamo with greater legal rights than those owed to lawful prisoners of war under the Geneva Conventions. As many of you know, the Third Geneva Convention requires that, where there is any doubt regarding a belligerent's status as a prisoner of war, the detaining power must bring the individual before an "Article 5" military tribunal to determine whether the individual warrants the enhanced privileges of prisoners of war. The Geneva Conventions otherwise provide that enemy combatants may be detained for the duration of the hostilities, a fundamental precept of the law of war.

The United States goes well beyond these international obligations in the course of this present conflict. As President Bush has stated, the United States has no interest in serving as the world's jailer, and we have no interest in detaining individuals who do not threaten our citizens. Accordingly, we have released alien enemy combatants to their home countries where those nations have agreed that they will prevent such individuals from returning to combat, and where we have been assured that those nations will treat such individuals humanely. Indeed, we have repeatedly asked our European allies to join us in these efforts by agreeing to take back their citizens detained at Guantanamo or by helping persuade other countries to provide better security and human rights assurances to allow us to increase the number of transfers. But despite demands that Guantanamo be closed, the United States has received little help from our European allies regarding the fate of these detainees.

DOJ_NMG_0086349

We also put in place procedures to ensure that the individuals we detain are, in fact, enemy combatants. The United States gives Article 5-like "Combatant Status Review Tribunals" to every detainee held at Guantanamo to determine whether they should be detained as an enemy combatant at all. Based on the decisions of these tribunals and based on our parallel efforts to repatriate detainees where appropriate and consistent with our national security, we have transferred approximately 340 individuals from Guantanamo.

The legal rights afforded to detainees do not stop there. Our law provides that each and every detainee has the opportunity to appeal the determination of the Combatant Status Review Tribunal to the federal court of appeals in Washington, D.C. In other words, the United States provides every detainee at Guantanamo Bay the opportunity to challenge his detention not merely before a military tribunal, but also before a civilian court.

These points, it seems to me, are lost in the recent debate over the Act's restrictions on habeas corpus, which allows an individual in police custody to seek his release from detention before a civilian judge. Indeed, the entire debate is premised on several misconceptions. First, habeas corpus is a civilian remedy. Alien enemy combatants captured outside the United States have never had the right to file a writ of habeas corpus under the United States Constitution in prior armed conflicts. Thus, the restrictions on habeas corpus do not, and cannot, deprive enemy combatants of any constitutional right that they have ever had under United States law.

Second, as I have explained, the United States already provides enemy combatants with the opportunity to challenge the legality of their detention before a civilian court, by appealing the determinations of our Combatant Status Review Tribunals. This process—which goes well beyond what is required for lawful prisoners of war under both international and domestic law—provides the same opportunity to get into federal court that these individuals would claim through the writ of habeas corpus.

Although some critics have focused on detention, the Military Commissions Act is fundamentally about prosecution. The law permits the prosecution of suspected war criminals before military commissions, which have been used during times of war by the United States and other countries. By law, these commissions can be used to try only "unlawful enemy combatants." This definition expressly excludes lawful prisoners of war, and it is carefully defined to include only those unlawful combatants who have taken active and purposeful steps to further hostilities against the United States and its allies not those who may provide an incidental or unintended benefit to the enemy.

Some have questioned why terrorists should be tried as war criminals in the first place. Although the law of war permits us to detain dangerous enemy combatants for the duration of hostilities to keep them from attacking us, we also believe that we must have the capability to bring them to justice for their crimes. Some ask, why not then try these terrorists in civilian courts just like any other individual who commits a crime? Here again, this view reflects a fundamental denial of the existence and the practicalities of this armed conflict.

DOJ_NMG_0086350

In the War on Terror, members of al Qaeda are not merely common criminals. Al Qaeda seeks to employ weapons of mass slaughter as a means of achieving political goals against both the civilian and military capacity of the United States, Europe, and our allies throughout the world. Their members continue to fight our Armed Forces on battlefields across the world, and they will continue to do so until we stop them. Their crimes are nothing less than war crimes.

For hundreds of years, the United States and other nations have used military commissions—not civilian courts—to try enemy combatants under such circumstances. Article 84 of the Geneva Conventions provides that lawful prisoners of war must be tried by military, not civilian, courts. It is entirely fitting that we continue to do so, consistent with our obligations under both international and domestic law.

Equally as important, military commissions are necessary because in many cases, the use of civilian courts would simply be unavailable or impractical. The collection of evidence and the prosecution of terrorists pose a host of difficulties not associated with the civilian justice system. For example, our civilian courts in the United States strictly limit the introduction of hearsay statements, that is, the admission into evidence of the assertions of individuals not present in court. Yet many whose statements we will need for military commissions are likely to be foreign nationals who are not subject to the jurisdiction of a United States tribunal, or who may be unavailable because of military necessity, incarceration, injury, or death. Therefore, if we are to put terrorists on trial, military commissions must be permitted to hear a broad range of evidence, including hearsay evidence where it is reliable. International war crimes tribunals, such as the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, have similarly adopted broad rules of admissibility.

Finally, our civilian justice system provides for strict rules governing the collection and authentication of evidence. But battlefields and foreign terrorist safe houses are not like typical crime scenes, and the United States military cannot be expected to gather evidence like police officers in the course of fighting the enemy. Again, like international war crimes tribunals, military commissions will consider a broad range of evidence—all evidence that the military judge deems to be reliable and probative of the guilt or innocence of the accused.

Protections Afforded by Military Commissions

Although military commissions are both necessary and appropriate, let me emphasize that they are also venues in which the accused will receive a full and fair trial. The procedures for military commissions, like those of international war crimes tribunals, are adapted to wartime circumstances, but they contain all of the procedural protections that we in the international community regard as fundamental.

Consider the specific protections afforded by the legislation Congress enacted:

- The trial itself will be presided over by an independent military judge, drawn from among the same judges who preside over the courts-martial of U.S. troops, and whose impartiality is protected under law.

DOJ_NMG_0086351

- The accused shall be presumed innocent unless and until the prosecution proves his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt—the highest standard of proof recognized under U.S. law.

- The accused shall have the right to examine and respond to every piece of evidence—including classified evidence—that is introduced before the trier of fact.

- The world community, too, shall have the right to see the evidence and observe the proceedings, because, with a narrow exception for national security, all trial proceedings shall be open and public.

- The Act plainly and unequivocally bars all evidence collected through torture, as under domestic and international law. The United States does not engage in torture, and consistent with our law and practice, no evidence obtained by torture shall be admitted at a commission proceeding.

- For statements of the accused, the law further provides that the judge may admit such evidence only if he finds that the statements are reliable and that their admission would serve the interests of justice. This rule tracks closely Rule 95 of the International Criminal Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda, both of which require an inquiry into the reliability of the evidence and its impact on the integrity of the procedures.

    - The law does not, as some have charged, require the admission of coerced evidence. Rather, it simply provides that an impartial judge shall determine under the circumstances whether the evidence is fit to be considered by the trier of fact.

- In addition to these protections at trial, the Act grants convicted terrorists several opportunities to appeal, both to a military review court and to a civilian court of appeals. The Supreme Court also may exercise jurisdiction to review commission judgments. As in the detention context, this access to our domestic courts is another extraordinary protection in the history of armed conflict.

Implementing the Geneva Conventions

The Military Commissions Act thus establishes military commissions in compliance with the law of war, which includes the Geneva Conventions. The Act also contains critical provisions to clarify the meaning of those Conventions.

I do not believe the Geneva Conventions were drafted with the threat of al Qaeda in mind. The drafters of the Conventions understood armed conflict as a choice between two models: international conflicts between nation-states and civil wars within a single State. And last summer, our Supreme Court held that Common Article 3 applies to our conflict with al Qaeda.

DOJ_NMG_0086352

Common Article 3 has been part of the Geneva Conventions since 1949, yet some of its provisions, such as its prohibition upon "outrages upon personal dignity," are not well-defined. What constitutes an "outrage upon personal dignity" or "humiliating and degrading treatment"? International law provides relatively few precedents, and the law which did exist suggested that courts could reach widely varying conclusions. The United States takes its treaty obligations seriously, however, and indeed, we had previously made any violation of Common Article 3 a war crime. The Military Commissions Act reinforces the commitment of the United States to Geneva by providing clarity to the meaning of its terms under our domestic law.

The Act clearly defines nine "grave breaches" of Common Article 3. These include things like murder and torture—all of which were already illegal under United States law, and none of which America has ever condoned. These also include clear and undeniable outrages upon personal dignity, such as rape, sexual abuse, and the performing of human experiments.

Beyond the floor set by these provisions, the Act then provides that the President may issue regulations concerning our understanding of the Geneva Conventions for conduct that falls short of a "grave breach"—for example, conduct that constitutes an "outrage[] upon personal dignity" or "humiliating and degrading treatment." These regulations will be public, and therefore open to congressional and public scrutiny.

Conclusion

I close with a reminder that Germany and the United States are great nations, but neither will succeed in defeating terrorism without the help of the other, and the help of other friends and allies. Though there may be differences in approach, our objectives are the same. It is important that we continue to dialogue, to discuss, to educate. Our friendship is based on trust, and trust is based on understanding and understanding based on communication. Germany and other European countries have more experience dealing with terrorism. I am sure there are lessons we can learn from you. And I hope in our discussions you may learn some things as well.

Germany and the United States have taken great strides in fighting terrorism, but there is still much work left to do. For those of us who work at the United States Department of Justice, everyday is September 12, 2001. Everyday is that day after. Everyday requires renewed commitment to combating and preventing terrorism. And everyday we will look to the Government of Germany and to the German people as our partner in making the world a safer place for our children and grandchildren.

Thank you.

###

DOJ_NMG_0086353

Image not available for this document, ID: 0.7.10316.22155-000001

Image not available for this document, ID: 0.7.10316.22155-000002

From: Miller, Charles S
Sent: Wednesday, October 25, 2006 11:06 AM
To: Agarwal, Asheesh (CRT); Ames, Andrew; Battaglia, John T; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Beckner, Rick (CIV); Blomquist, Kathleen M; Branda, Joyce (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Davis, Dan (CIV); Davis, Deborah J; Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Frost, Peter (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Gunn, Currie (SMO); Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory; Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); McDonald, Esther Slater; McMahon, Linda M (CIV); Miller, Charles S; Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John (USAEO); O'Quinn, John C; Osborn, Tara (CIV); Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Senger, Jeffrey M; Shaw, Aloma A; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 10/25/06 Civil Division News

Latest Round in Web Porn Law Fight Begins

Curb sought on counsel to detainees; US asks court to restrict talks with lawyers

Top GOP Senator Joins Critics of FBI Anthrax Probe

San Francisco Court Backs Atheist Who Fought Pledge

RCMP boss wrong on Arar, says former solicitor general; Liberal cabinet minister denies he was briefed on errors by Mounties

State to get almost $900,000 from settlement

Judge freezes Guard lawsuit

The Military Commissions Act of 2006: A Short Primer

The Legal Intelligencer
10-25-2006

Latest Round in Web Porn Law Fight Begins

By Shannon P. Duffy

It's not all that often that a month-long trial begins in federal court where everyone knows from the start which side is likely to win.

But that was the situation Monday in ACLU v. Gonzales as the final round of litigation got underway in a challenge to the Child Online Protection Act (COPA), a law which threatens criminal penalties for commercial Web site operators that allow children to access material that is "harmful to minors."

Eight years after it was passed, COPA has never gone into effect because Senior U.S. District Judge Lowell A. Reed Jr. granted a preliminary injunction that, after two trips to the U.S. Supreme Court, won the approval of a 5-4 court.

Although the majority was a slim one, the high court's holding was that the ACLU and its co-plaintiffs are "likely to succeed" in proving that COPA is unconstitutional.

But "likely" doesn't mean certainly, and the Justice Department isn't giving up the fight.

In preparation for Monday's trial, Reed ordered lawyers on both sides to file their proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law.

DOJ_NMG_0086356

Ordinarily, such briefs are filed after a nonjury trial has concluded to aid the judge in his drafting of an opinion that announces his verdict.

But ACLU v. Gonzales is no ordinary case, and Reed apparently wanted the lawyers to provide a roadmap for the trial, which is expected to boil down to a battle of the experts.

One of the central disputes in the case is whether children can be protected by "filtering" software -- a program added by parents to a computer to block access to sexually explicit Web sites.

The government, in its brief, insists that "filtering software cannot completely protect minors from exposure to sexually explicit material on the World Wide Web. The status quo solution -- filtering software without any government regulation -- fails to protect children adequately."

The better solution, the government argues, is to stop pornography at its source by requiring Web site owners to demand "age verification," such as a credit card, before allowing access to sexually explicit content.

But the plaintiffs lawyers -- a team from the ACLU and Latham & Watkins -- argue that COPA is overbroad and that many legitimate Web sites fear prosecution under the law.

Age verification won't work, the ACLU argues, because Internet users are reluctant to give their identity and Web site owners cannot afford to process credit cards just to allow access to free content.

And even if a credit card system were installed, the ACLU says, it wouldn't prevent children from gaining access since many youngsters have access to their parents' credit cards or even have their own cards.

Instead, the ACLU says, Congress should go back to the drawing board and draft laws designed to enhance the effectiveness of filtering software.

"Congress could enact a statute that permits the distribution of such material [that is harmful to minors], but instead requires Web site operators to include a rating, label, or code on the Web site that makes clear that harmful to minors material is available on the Web site. Such a rating, label or code could be placed on the initial home page of the site," the ACLU argues in its brief.

"Requiring Web sites to include a harmful-to-minors rating, label or code would make filtering products even more effective and accurate at blocking harmful to minors material," the brief says.

Another way to make filters more effective, the ACLU says, would be a federal law requiring the Justice Department to compile and maintain a list of Web sites that contain material that is harmful to minors.

Such a statute "would provide filtering product companies with the ability to accurately block absolutely all speech that the government believes is harmful to minors. It would also provide parents and other entities with information about the types of material that are on the Web in order to assist parents in determining what protections, if any, are necessary for their children depending on their individual values and circumstances," the brief says.

The ACLU contends in its brief that "filtering product companies would accept a governmentally created list of inappropriate sites; in fact, many have already testified that they would almost certainly comply with any request from a governmental entity to include specific sites on their lists."

But Justice Department lawyers insisted in their brief that "voluntary measures such as a Web site rating system, filtering products, and education, will be effective only if they are used in conjunction with the requirements of COPA, because voluntary measures alone will not prevent children from accessing material harmful to minors."

A rating system simply wouldn't work, the Justice Department says, because Web site operators "would lack an incentive to label their material in a manner that makes it more likely that filters will block access."

The operators, they say, "would have to agree to a uniform system of ratings, or agree to subject themselves to an independent rating body."

And even if such a system were attempted, the Justice Department says, it would prove ineffective because "Web sites are too numerous and change too frequently for the government, or any private business, to effectively separate harmful from nonharmful material."

Instead, the government argues, "Only a solution directed at the source of the problem can provide the incentive necessary to adequately protect children."

In an opinion handed down on Oct. 10, Reed rejected a last-minute bid by the government to have the case dismissed.

In its motion, the government argued that none of the named plaintiffs has standing to challenge the law because they are not "commercial pornographers," and that their fear of being prosecuted under COPA is therefore "too speculative."

But the plaintiffs lawyers argued that plaintiffs such as Salon.com and the Philadelphia Gay News have good reason to fear that they will be targeted for prosecution because the law prohibits any commercial dissemination of material that is deemed to be "harmful to minors."

DOJ_NMG_0086357

Reed sided with the plaintiffs, finding that "there is nothing in the statute that limits COPA to commercial pornographers."

The legal test for establishing standing on the basis of a credible threat of prosecution is "quite forgiving," Reed said, and courts "will assume a credible threat of prosecution in the absence of compelling contrary evidence."

Under COPA, a commercial Web site operator faces up to six months in prison and fines of up to $50,000 if found to have allowed minors access to harmful material.

The law defines material that is "harmful to minors" as any "communication, picture, image, graphic image file, article, recording, writing or other matter of any kind that is obscene" or that, if not obscene, meets the law's three-pronged test.

Under the first prong of the test, material violates the law if "the average person, applying contemporary community standards, would find, taking the material as a whole and with respect to minors, is designed to appeal to, or is designed to pander to, the prurient interest."

The second prong calls for proof that the material "depicts, describes, or represents, in a manner patently offensive with respect to minors, an actual or simulated sexual act or sexual contact, an actual or simulated normal or perverted sexual act, or a lewd exhibition of the genitals or post-pubescent female breast."

Finally, the material must be shown to "lack serious literary, artistic, political or scientific value for minors."

With that test in mind, Reed found that the plaintiffs have standing because they "will be able to show at trial that they have a legitimate fear that they could be prosecuted under COPA because their materials could be found to be harmful to minors."

Having reviewed each of the plaintiffs' Web sites, Reed found that many of them include material that "could be found to: have been designed to appeal to the prurient interest of a minor; depict or describe a sexual act or contact or a lewd exhibition of the genitals or post-pubescent female breast in a manner patently offensive with respect to minors; and lack serious literary, artistic, political or scientific value for minors."

Some of the plaintiffs' materials "are more graphic than others," Reed noted, and "range from erotic homosexual kissing to highly eroticized descriptions or depictions of anal and vaginal sex."

In a footnote, Reed said the term "prurient interest" is most often defined as "a shameful or morbid interest in nudity, sex, or excretion over and beyond that which would be characterized as normal."

But that definition was significantly expanded by the U.S. Supreme Court, Reed noted, in a decision that said materials may appeal to the prurient interest if they are merely "in some sense erotic."

In another footnote, Reed said, "I find that it is possible that some communities would find even minor sexual contact, like kissing, to be prurient in nature and patently offensive if performed by homosexuals."

END

Boston Globe
October 25, 2006

Curb sought on counsel to detainees; US asks court to restrict talks with lawyers

By Farah Stockman, Globe Staff | October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The US government is seeking to sharply restrict communication between defense lawyers and inmates at Guantanamo Bay prison, asserting that some lawyers have given inmates "inflammatory" material such as reports of abuses at Iraq's Abu Ghraib prison and news articles about terrorist attacks.

The government is seeking judicial approval for new rules that would allow defense lawyers only four visits with their clients, rather than the unlimited number now permitted; control the topics that can be discussed in such meetings; and restrict the types of information that can be exchanged between lawyers and detainees through the mail.

The government filed the new rules in August with the federal appeals court in Washington, D.C., which is currently reviewing them in connection with the case of a Guantanamo detainee. If the court agrees to the limitations, they are expected to be applied to future cases.

Since the first detainees were brought to Guantanamo Bay after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the Bush administration has battled to keep information about them secret -- including their names -- and to prevent them from having access to defense lawyers.

But defense lawyers won the right to meet with detainees in 2004, when the Supreme Court ruled that about 450 men being held at the Cuban military base could challenge their detention in federal courts.

Last month, Congress passed a law taking away the right to challenge detention in federal court.

But under the law, detainees still have a right to appeal the US military's decision to classify them as "enemy combatants," determinations that are made by military officers at Guantanamo Bay who review the government's evidence and hear testimony from the detainees. Detainees have a right to a limited appeals process, during which they can ask a panel of federal judges in a Washington appeals court to review documents in their cases to determine whether the enemy combatant classification was a mistake.

The proposed new rules would restrict the legal representation for these challenges. It is unclear how they would affect the dozen or so detainees who are expected to be tried before military commissions.

Haji Bismullah , a former Afghan transportation official in the post-Taliban government, is among the first detainees to appeal his enemy combatant designation. Justice Department lawyers filed the proposed new rules governing access to defense attorneys in his case, and have refused to give his lawyers any information about him until they agree to the restrictions.

Justice Department attorneys argued in their filings that stricter rules are needed because some defense lawyers have abused the system by sending detainees news articles about terrorist attacks in London, Iraq, and Israel; by providing a book about abuses of detainees in Iraq's Abu Ghraib prison; and by giving a detainee a transcript of a speech given at a conference held by the human-rights group Amnesty International.

"The speech contained inflammatory information regarding current political events, as it contained information about ongoing efforts in the war on terror," Commander Patrick M. McCarthy , a top military lawyer at Guantanamo Bay, wrote in the filings. "Such information threatens the security of the camp, as it could incite violence among the detainees."

McCarthy also complained that one team of defense lawyers had asked a detainee questions about his case at the behest of the British Broadcasting Corp.

But Barbara Olshansky , a lawyer with the New-York-based Center for Constitutional Rights, a legal advocacy organization that coordinates the representation of Guantanamo Bay detainees, said none of the actions cited by the government amounts to violations of prison rules or threats to prison security.

"Leaving aside core American values like free speech, and whether reading something that is said at Amnesty [International] is going to damage national security, the accusations that they have leveled against us make me incredibly sad," she said. "People haven't been talking about classified stuff. Nothing classified has been leaked in the press. What is the basis of asking for something more onerous when the current rules are working?"

The current rules, which were the result of tough negotiations between defense lawyers and the government in 2004, require that attorneys obtain security clearance before they see classified evidence in a case. But the proposed rules state that in addition to security clearance, an attorney must "need to know" the information that is being sought, a determination that is made by the US government.

Under the current rules, the military must ask a judge for permission to make information off limits for an attorney to discuss with a client. But under the new rules, the military itself would have the power to declare information off limits, although defense lawyers could appeal that determination in court.

Under the current rules, legal mail is reviewed only to ensure that attorneys are not passing on physical contraband. Under the new rules, mail will be reviewed by a committee to screen out unnecessary information about the outside world.

Currently, there are no limits on the number of visits a lawyer can have with a detainee. But the new rules allow a lawyer appealing an enemy-combatant designation one initial visit and a maximum of three additional visits.

Justice Department attorney Robert Loeb said in legal filings that lawyers do not need many meetings to file an appeal.

The fight over limiting access to lawyers comes after President Bush transferred 14 terrorist suspects, including alleged Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, to Guantanamo Bay from secret CIA facilities. Administration officials have expressed concern that information about those detainees -- and the conditions under which they were kept in secret prisons -- might leak out through defense attorneys.

END

New York Sun

October 25, 2006

Top GOP Senator Joins Critics of FBI Anthrax Probe

BY JOSH GERSTEIN - Staff Reporter of the Sun

DOJ_NMG_0086359

A powerful Republican senator is adding his voice to a growing chorus of congressional critics who contend that the FBI may have botched its investigation of the anthrax-laden mailings that killed at least five people in 2001 and have not been solved.

Senator Grassley of Iowa wrote to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales late Monday demanding an update on the status of the probe and expressing frustration at a decision by the Justice Department and the FBI to stop briefing Congress about the investigation.

"How do they expect Congress to do our constitutional responsibility of oversight?" Mr. Grassley asked yesterday in an interview with The New York Sun. "Do they think we're not supposed to be part of the checks and balances anymore?"

Last month, the FBI refused a request from Rep. Rush Holt, a Democrat of New Jersey, for a briefing on the status of the probe. The agency said no further briefings would be offered to members of Congress because of press accounts that followed earlier briefings and cited congressional sources.

In his letter, Mr. Grassley said he was "shocked" by the explanation because leaks from FBI sources led to news reports fingering a former Army scientist, Steven Hatfill, who was never charged. "For the FBI to withhold information from Congress for fear of leaks seems a bit hypocritical, to say the least," the senator wrote.

Officials at the FBI and Justice Department said they had received the letter but had no immediate comment. Mr. Grassley said "irritation" with the FBI contributed to his decision to take the matter directly to Mr. Gonzales. "We ought to have an answer as to why this crime hasn't been solved," the senator said.

In a letter last month to Mr. Holt, the FBI disputed reports that it operated for years under the mistaken impression that the anthrax used in the mailings was of a refined type that only a few scientists could have produced.

"The FBI and its partners in this investigation have never been under any misconception about the character of the anthrax used in the attacks," an FBI official, Eleni Kalisch, wrote. She said 17 FBI agents and 10 postal inspectors still were assigned to the nearly five-year-old investigation.

Mr. Grassley said that if Mr. Gonzales does not respond, Congress could consider other approaches, such as subpoenaing the information. "I also think holding up nominations for the Justice Department is a possibility," the senator said.

Mr. Hatfill is pursuing two libel suits over reports tying him to the anthrax attacks. He is also pressing a Privacy Act case against the federal government over alleged leaks. The New York Times, which is the defendant in one of the libel cases, has acknowledged that two of its confidential sources for columns about Mr. Hatfill were FBI employees. Last week, a federal magistrate ordered the Times to identify those sources and others, but the decision is under appeal.

END

San Francisco Chronicle

Oct. 25, 2006

San Francisco Court Backs Atheist Who Fought Pledge

Bob Egelko

An atheist who challenged the phrase "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance can proceed with a libel suit against a minister who claimed he lied under oath, a state appeals court ruled Tuesday.

Michael Newdow of Sacramento sued the Rev. Austin Miles after Miles, who described himself as an interdenominational chaplain in Contra Costa County, wrote an Internet article about Newdow's case in July 2002. The article quoted Newdow as telling the court that his daughter, an elementary school student, suffered emotional damage because she was required to recite the pledge with the words "under God." That statement was a lie under oath and should be prosecuted as perjury, Miles wrote.

Newdow's lawsuit, filed in 2003, said the quote was a fabrication and had been widely circulated, damaging his reputation. When Miles failed to respond, a judge awarded Newdow $1 million in damages in 2004, but the award was thrown out last year by the appeals court, which said Miles was entitled to defend himself.

Miles then sought to dismiss the suit as an interference with his freedom of speech. But the Court of Appeal in San Francisco, upholding a judge's ruling, noted that libel is not constitutionally protected and said Miles' article was potentially libelous because it accused Newdow of a crime.

Miles wrote his article shortly after a federal appeals court ruled that mandatory recitation of "under God" was an unconstitutional endorsement of religion. The Supreme Court overturned the ruling in 2004, saying Newdow was not entitled to sue on his daughter's behalf because her mother had full custody of the child. Newdow, a lawyer and physician, has filed a new suit on behalf of other parents and children and won an initial ruling from a federal judge, which is now on appeal.

END

CanWest News Service

Oct. 25, 2006

RCMP boss wrong on Arar, says former solicitor general; Liberal cabinet minister denies he was briefed on errors by Mounties

Andrew Mayeda

OTTAWA -- The former head of the department that oversaw the RCMP has disputed testimony by RCMP Commissioner Giuliano Zaccardelli that he briefed his political masters soon after learning that the Mounties spread false information on Maher Arar.

Zaccardelli testified last month before a parliamentary committee that he first learned of the RCMP mistakes sometime after Arar was imprisoned in Syria in the fall of 2002.

He went on to say that the RCMP "had discussions with the minister to inform him of the situation."

But in testimony before the same committee yesterday, former solicitor general Wayne Easter said he was not briefed about the errors, nor about RCMP efforts to correct them.

"I was not so informed. And I will state that again. I was not so informed," said Easter, who served as solicitor general under the former Liberal government. The position was abolished last year after the Public Safety Ministry took over responsibility for the RCMP.

"There is no situation where the RCMP came to me and basically said, 'We screwed up. We provided improper information.'"

Members of the public safety committee, which has been conducting hearings into the Arar case since the release of the explosive O'Connor report last month, were troubled by the apparent discord in testimony between Easter and Zaccardelli.

"I have very, very shaky confidence in [Zaccardelli] and him continuing this role, and this just further undermines that," said Liberal MP Mark Holland. "Given the severity of what happened to Mr. Arar, given the weight of the mistakes made by the RCMP, it's just flabbergasting that they would not have at any point talked to anybody in the political sphere and let them know that they made a mistake."

Arar, an engineer with Canadian and Syrian citizenship, was detained by U.S. authorities after passing through a New York airport in September 2002 and eventually sent to Syria, where he was tortured.

END

AP

October 25, 2006

State to get almost $900,000 from settlement

CHEYENNE, Wyo._Wyoming will receive almost $900,000 as part of a multistate and federal settlement with a company accused of Medicaid billing fraud .

Wyoming Attorney General Pat Crank said Wyoming was one of 30 states, along with the federal government and the District of Columbia, to join in the settlement with Pediatrix Medical Group, Inc. Wyoming's share is almost $893,000.

The governments said Pediatrix improperly billed Medicaid and other programs for neonatal care, listing infants as being critically ill when they weren't, from 1996 through 1999.

"This settlement can serve as a reminder to health care providers in Wyoming that abuse of the system will not be tolerated," Crank said.

END

The Republican

October 25, 2006

Judge freezes Guard lawsuit

By MARLA A. GOLDBERG

SPRINGFIELD - A judge has frozen a lawsuit by Massachusetts National Guard soldiers who said they were never compensated for lodging and out-of-pocket expenses after being activated in 2001 to protect public resources from terrorism.

U.S. District Court Judge Richard G. Stearns ruled on Friday that he will give the National Guard time to finish evaluating the soldiers' claims, and hopes the process "can be satisfactorily brought to a conclusion," within 60 days as proposed by the U.S. attorney's office in Boston.

However, Stearns said that if no resolution is reached, he will rule on two opposing motions: One to dismiss the lawsuit or transfer it to the U.S. Court of Federal Claims; the other to broaden it into a class action.

Lawyer John R. Shek, who represents the four soldiers who filed suit in January, said Stearns' ruling sidestepped core issues. "Our hands are tied, while the government has ... full reins to do whatever it wants," he said.

Shek estimated that 1,200 Massachusetts National Guard soldiers are owed $73 million, based on days worked and "per diem" allowances they should have received. Using those numbers, the soldiers would be owed $60,833 each, but Shek would not confirm an average yesterday, saying terms of service varied greatly.

Motions filed by lawyers, which judges typically allow or deny, were "terminated," by Stearns, and Shek questioned the move. "We don't know what it means," he said.

However, the National Guard touted Friday's ruling as affirming that its "reimbursement workshops" are a good-faith effort to provide the soldiers with any funds they are due.

"The bottom line is that our soldiers worked hard to ensure the people of Massachusetts were safe and they are entitled to full compensation ... it has always been my intent to ensure they get it," stated Brig. Gen. Oliver J. Mason Jr., who is also the guard's adjutant general, in a press release.

Filers of the lawsuit are Sgt. Steven M. Littlefield, of Manomet; Sgt. Wayne R. Gutierrez, of New Bedford; retired Capt. Louis P. Tortorella, of Brookline, N.H.; and Spc. Joseph P. Murphy, of Derry, N.H.

The four cite violation of equal protection rights, along with breach of contract, financial duty and Army regulations. Besides reimbursement, they seek damages and lawyer's fees from the United States, the commonwealth of Massachusetts and the Massachusetts National Guard.

A status report filed by the U.S. attorney's office on Friday states that seven soldiers who attended a reimbursement workshop in September "lacked sufficient information" about their service to fill out travel vouchers. However, staff from the National Guard Joint Force Headquarters in Milton have since reviewed "all the historical files for Operation Noble Eagle," to get such data and add it to information packets for 116 soldiers, the report states.

Headquarters plans to restart the workshops as soon as possible, and is "reviewing the orders for all soldiers who served in Operation Noble Eagle ... to ensure that none are missed."

"Once a soldier is satisfied with his or her travel voucher ... the form will be processed ... for payments," stated the document signed by Assistant U.S. Attorney Mark T. Quinlivan.

Shek said the number of soldiers identified by the National Guard falls far short of those affected, and the travel voucher system isn't proper reimbursement. Instead, Shek said, "the law provides for these men and women to be paid according to per diem schedules" adopted by a military travel committee.

At an Oct. 10 hearing in Springfield, Shek said some soldiers commuted more than 100 miles a day and slept in their cars to protect resources such as the Quabbin Reservoir, because they weren't given money for hotels.

In yesterday's press release, Maj. Anthony Sciaraffa stated that eight months prior to the lawsuit, a formal audit was launched to determine who might be owed additional compensation.

The soldiers did get annual salaries, Sciaraffa said after the Oct. 10 hearing, totaling about $24,000 for a specialist or corporal. A soldier whose station is changed for at least 179 days is also entitled to an annual housing allowance.

END

FindLaw.com

October 25, 2006

The Military Commissions Act of 2006: A Short Primer

By JOANNE MARINER

In the final run-up to the midterm elections, the Republicans are looking to national security to save them from a rout. Exploiting Americans' fears of terrorism, they accuse Democratic candidates of hindering counterterrorism efforts and exposing the public to the threat of further attacks.

Under the heading "America Weakly," the website of the Republican National Committee trumpets the fact that "162 House Democrats voted against authorizing military tribunals for dangerous terrorist suspects, including alleged 9/11 mastermind Khalid Sheikh Mohammad."

The legislation at issue is the Military Commissions Act of 2006 (MCA), a law that even some Republicans have criticized as unconstitutional. Besides authorizing substandard military trials for suspected terrorists, the new law immunizes CIA personnel for past abuses, bars detainees from asserting their right to habeas corpus, and attempts to render the Geneva Conventions unenforceable in court.

In the immediate wake of September 11, when the Patriot Act passed without opposition, a traumatized American public might have been apt to mistake abusive counterterrorism policies for effective ones. But five years later, objective indicators now show that the Bush Administration's response to terrorism has been, in myriad ways, counterproductive. The recently declassified National Intelligence Estimate confirms that U.S. policies have spawned deep-seated Muslim resentment, and that terrorists are using this resentment to draw recruits.

Rather than marking a new approach, the MCA provides congressional sanction for many of the Administration's most short-sighted and dangerous counterterrorism policies. While it does not explicitly legitimate torture or arbitrary detention, it places formidable legal obstacles in the way of detainees who would challenge such abuses. Below, following on a column posted two weeks ago, I discuss some of the worst elements of the new law.

CIA Abuses

The MCA was passed in the wake of the Supreme Court's landmark decision in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, a ruling that called into question the legality of the Administration's secret CIA detention program. Hamdan made it clear that abusive interrogation techniques used by the CIA violated international law, and that CIA operatives could be held criminally liable for such abuses.

Reacting to Hamdan, the Bush Administration first pushed to redefine the scope of U.S. obligations under the Geneva Conventions, in particular Common Article 3, the provision at issue in Hamdan. After opposition from within the Republican Party to such an overt repudiation of universally-accepted international norms, the Administration took a different approach. While the MCA does not explicitly rewrite the Common Article 3, it opens the door to the provision's effective redefinition. It does so by specifying that the War Crimes Act, as amended, satisfies the U.S. obligation to criminalize grave breaches of Common Article 3, and that the president may issue authoritative interpretations of the remainder of the provision.

The law also nullifies the legal impact of the Conventions in domestic courts. Section 5 of the law provides that the Geneva Conventions and related treaties are unenforceable in court in civil cases involving the U.S. government or its agents. It states, specifically, that they may not be invoked "in any habeas corpus or any other civil action or proceeding . . . as a source of rights in any [U.S. or state] court." And another provision of the law bars persons deemed unlawful enemy combatants from invoking these treaties as a source of rights.

Column continues below ↓

Notably, the legislation narrows the scope of the War Crimes Act, decriminalizing certain past acts. Previously, the War Crimes Act criminalized all violations of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, as well as grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions. Anyone responsible for any Common Article 3 violation, including the cruel, humiliating or degrading treatment of detainees, could be prosecuted under the law.

The MCA revises this portion of the War Crimes Act, replacing the blanket criminalization of Common Article 3 violations with a list of "grave breaches" of Common Article 3, which are specified and defined in the legislation. And the law is amended retroactively to November 26, 1997, meaning that perpetrators of several categories of what were war crimes at the time they were committed, can no longer be punished under U.S. law.

DOJ_NMG_0086363

Now, under the MCA, torture and cruel and inhuman treatment qualify as "grave breaches," but degrading or humiliating treatment does not. The MCA also eliminates as a war crime the passing of sentences by a court that does not meet international fair trial standards.

A twist in the new legislation is that it includes two separate definitions of cruel and inhuman treatment, one that applies to abuses that occurred prior to the MCA's passage, and another that applies to future conduct. If committed after the passage of the MCA, cruel and inhuman treatment only requires a finding of serious and non-fleeting mental pain or suffering. But for abuses committed prior to the law's passage, the perpetrator can only be penalized if the pain or suffering is "prolonged."

This provision may immunize from prosecution CIA interrogators who have previously employed abusive interrogation techniques such as waterboarding and extended sleep deprivation -- techniques that cause time-limited but severe mental anguish.

Habeas-Stripping

The most-criticized provision of the legislation bars aliens held as enemy combatants from filing suit via the writ of habeas corpus to challenge the legality of their detention or to raise claims of torture and other mistreatment.

This provision covers all non-citizens, including longtime legal residents of the United States, and it applies even if they are held inside the United States. Moreover, the prohibition applies even after detainees have been released. As a result, detainees who have been tortured or otherwise mistreated are forever barred from going to a U.S. court to seek redress and to air what has happened to them.

The habeas-stripping provision raises a host of legal questions. The first is whether enemy combatants enjoy a constitutional right to habeas corpus (not just a statutory right to it), a question left unanswered by the Supreme Court's 2004 opinion in Rasul v. Bush. Note that the constitutional claim will probably be deemed stronger for Qatari student Ali Saleh al-Marri, held as an enemy combatant in the territorial United States, than for the Guantanamo detainees. It is likely to be deemed weakest of all for detainees held in Afghanistan and elsewhere abroad.

A second question with regard to Guantanamo detainees is whether the narrow federal court review of administrative proceeding held on Guantanamo allowed under a 2005 law should be considered an "adequate substitute" for habeas. And courts may also end up assessing whether the right to habeas can legitimately be suspended when a person has been deemed an enemy combatant.

Repeal

A post-election Congress should take a hard second look at the new law. While the courts are likely to strike down some of the MCA's worst provisions, a responsible Congress would repeal the law first. The goal of a fair, tough, and effective approach to counterterrorism requires it.

Joanne Mariner is a human rights attorney.

END

DOJ_NMG_0086364

Image not available for this document, ID: 0.7.10316.22144-000001

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Thursday, October 26, 2006 8:17 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Thursday, October 26, 2006
Attachments:	agnb061026.pdf; agnb061026.doc

This morning's Attorney General's News Briefing is attached.

Website: You can also read today's briefing, including searchable archive of past editions, at http://www.BulletinNews.com/justice.

Full-text Links: Clicking the hypertext links in our write-ups will take you to the newspapers' original full-text articles.

Interactive Table of Contents: Clicking a page number on the table of contents page will take you directly to that story.

Contractual Obligations and Copyright: This copyrighted material is for the internal use of US Department of Justice employees only and, by contract, may not be redistributed without BulletinNewsâ€™ express written consent.

Contact Information: Please contact us any time at 703-749-0040 or Justice-Editors@BulletinNews.com. Use of this email address will automatically result in your message being delivered to everyone involved with your service, including senior management. Thank you.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, OCTOBER 26, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

In Berlin, Gonzales Urges Europeans To Receive Released Detainees....3
Cheney Confirms US Has Used "Water-Boarding" To Question Al Qaeda Detainees....4
US Proposes Limits To Contacts Between Detainees And Their Lawyers....4
Binalshibh Files Legal Challenge To Detention, Seeks Lawyer....4
Teen Once Detained As Potential Terrorist Says She Faces Mutilation If Deported....4

Homeland Response:

Federal Agencies Sharpen Surveillance Methods....4
Grassley Demands FBI Brief Congress On Its Anthrax Investigation....5
DHS Pushing Mass-Evacuation Planning....5
Expert Sees Holes In Freight Rail Security....6
Little Progress Seen On TSA ID Programs....6

War News:

A "Somber" Bush Says He Is "Not Satisfied" With Iraq Situation....6
Maliki Says He Did Not Agree To US Timelines....9
US-Led Forces Raid Sadr City....10
Author Suggests Bin Laden Wants US To Pull Out Of Iraq....10
Situation In Iraq Said To Strengthen Syria Domestically, Internationally....10
NYTimes Slams "Contracting Fiascos" In Iraq Reconstruction....10
NBC's Engel Has Covered War Since It Began....10
Taliban Consolidates Control In Pakistani Region....10
Veterans Call For Mandatory Public Service Program....11
Author Calls For Expansion Of GI Bill Benefits....11
Fallen Soldiers Remembered....11

DOJ:

Acosta Sworn In As South Florida US Attorney....11

Corporate Scandals:

SEC Files Civil Charges Against Two In Fraud Scheme Targeting Korean Speakers....12
Judge Issues Secret Ruling In Nacchio Case....12
SEC Launches Probe Of Mutual-Fund Firms After Kickback Case Settlement....12
NASD Fines James River CEO For Market Timing Violations....13
US Argues Former AOL Officials Lied To Auditors....13
Austria Charges Nine In Refco Probe....13

Criminal Law:

Republicans Grumble About DOJ Pre-Election Probes....14
Gay Rights Group Fires Employee Who First Posted Foley Emails....14
Police Chiefs Discuss Rise In Crime At White House Meeting....15
FBI Investigating LANL Classified Material Found In Drug Raid....15
Gun Collector Jailed In Wales Murder Probe Seeks Venue Change....16
New Charges Filed In PRC Military Secrets Case....16
Philadelphia Mob Enforcer Arrested In Illegal Gambling Probe....16
Gotti Told Federal Investigators NYPD Detective Helped Mob Murder....16
Pellicano Says He Has Rejected Repeated Plea Bargain Offers....17
Former California Bank Manager Sentenced To Prison For Embezzlement....17
Texas Church Employee Sentenced To 12 Years For Child Porn Possession....17
Florida Executes Man For 1990 Killings Of Five Students....17
DC Police Web Site Plots Crime In Street-By-Street Detail....18

DOJ Webcast Helps Local Police Departments With Recruitment Issues 18

Civil Law:

Philip Morris Case Seen As Showing Roberts Court's Hand On Business Issues 18
Warsaw, IN, Seen As Center Of Orthopedic Device Industry.. 18

Civil Rights:

Required Voter Lists Often Contain Errors 19
Georgia Election Board Roiled By Voter ID Letter Dispute 19
Manassas, VA, May Face Second Suit Over Permit Bias 20
New Jersey Court Rules Gay Couples Have Same Rights As Heterosexual Couples 20
Civil Liberties Endangered By Expanded DNA Collection, Experts Warn 22
Close Vote Expected On South Dakota Abortion Referendum 22
New Voting Equipment Could Cause Election Day Problems 22
Target Sued By Advocacy Group For Blind Over Web Site 23
NAACP Chairman, Judge Brown To Attend White House Fellowship Program Meeting 23

Antitrust:

FCC Seen Likely To Avoid Net Neutrality Debate In AT&T-BellSouth Ruling 23
Constellation, FPL Abandon Merger Plans 24
Yankee Candle Agrees To $1.4 Billion Buyout By Equity Firm 24
Administration To Issue Position On Dot-Com IPO Class Action Case 25
Clear Channel Radio Chain Said To Be Up For Sale 25
Dewey, Orrick Close To Merger 25
Blackstone Group To Expand Private-Equity Fund 25
NYSE To Purchase Rest Of American Stock Exchange Stake 26
German Antitrust Regulators Nix Coherent's Proposed Excel Buy 26

Environment/Indian Affairs:

US Tells 9th Circuit Hawaii Stryker Unit Is Vital 26
Russia Threatens Criminal Charges Over Shell Natural Gas Project 27
NYTimes Criticizes Bush Recess Appointment For Mine Safety Agency 27
Apache Police Chief, Tribal Officer Arrested On Embezzlement Charges 27

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Maine Civil Liberties Union Releases Peace Group Emails Collected By FBI 27
FBI Arrests Chicago Police Officers In Drug Money Theft Sting 28
California Jailer Snared By FBI Bribery Sting 28
Authorities Say Colorado Ring Hid Meth Inside Elmo Doll, Other Toys 28
DEA Agent Accused Of Tipping Off Friends About Cocaine-Trafficking Investigation 29
FBI, California Police Arrest 15 In Crackdown On Violent Drug Gang 29
US Charges New York Man With "Club Drug" Smuggling 30
Owner Of New York Pharmacy Accused Of Illegally Distributing Painkiller 30
Trial Date Set In Sacramento For Accused "Drug Kingpin." .. 30
Big-City Mayors Lead Efforts To Curb Gun Violence 30
Texas Gun Dealer Pleads Guilty To Illegal Firearm Sales 31
Old West Town Still Plagued By Guns, Now Carried By Gangs 31
Fugitive Killed In Georgia While Pointing Shoe At Agents 31

Immigration:

Immigration Officials Arrest California Man Linked To Murder Of Salvadoran Priests 32
Arizona Seen As Microcosm For Nation On Immigration Debate 32

Tax:

Charitable Giving By Wealthy Said To Be Immune To Tax Changes 32
IRS Help Line May Not Be Much Help, Audit Finds 33

Congress-Administration:

Portman Says A Democratic Congress Would Boost Spending, Raise Taxes 33
OMB Set To Roll "Smart Card" IDs For Federal Employees.. 33

Other News:

Fed Leaves Interest Rates Unchanged 33
Report Faults Amtrak For Management Of Outside Counsel 34
Poll Finds Majority Believe Democrats Will Retake House Majority 35
Republicans Raise Specter Of "Speaker Pelosi" In Closing Days Of Campaign 35
Democrats Hope To Win Upstate New York House Races 36
Kentucky's 4th CD Race A Test For Democrats' Effort To Nationalize Campaign 37
GOP Faces Hostile Political Environment In Ohio 37
Trade Issues The Focus Of North Carolina 8th CD Race 38

DOJ_NMG_0086368

Herbert Says Indiana 2nd CD Voters Lack Confidence In Both Parties 38
Schumer Surprised At Extent Of Democrats' Senate Prospects 38
RNC Pulls Controversial Tennessee Senate Ad 38
Unusual Number Of Conservative Democrats Running For House 39
Controversy Over Michael J. Fox Ad Raises Stem Cell Issue Into National Debate 40
NRSC To Spend $3.5 Million On Ads In Closing Days Of New Jersey Senate Race 41
Steele, Cardin Clash In "Tempestuous" Debate 41
Allen, Webb Both Support Revisions To No Child Left Behind 42
Republicans Hope For Upset In Michigan Senate Race 43
Connecticut Senate Race Seen As Harbinger For US Involvement In Iraq 43
Sophisticated "Google Bombing" Campaign Targets 50 Republicans 44
Poll Finds Majorities Of Arab Americans Backing Democratic Candidates 44
Woman Claims Bribe Offer Made Over Allegations Of Gibbons Assault 44
Late Campaign Stress Leads Candidates To Make Ill-Advised Statements 44
Doubts About Hillary Clinton's "Authenticity" Said To Remain 44
US Said To Be Facing Growing Skills Gap 45
Brooks Says US Entering Era Of Ideological Dealignment 45
Liberal Radio Network Seen As Evading Campaign Contribution Limits 45
Bush "Assassination" Movie Faces Marketing Challenges 45
WPost Backs DC-Beijing Flights 46
WSJournal Says Decline In Oil Prices Shows Folly Of "Windfall Profits" Tax 46
US, European Allies At Odds Over Iran Resolution 46
Rice Prods South Korea On Sanctions 47
Bush, Dominican Leader Agree To Push Trade Accord 48
Putin Says He Won't Run Again, But Vows To Remain Influential 48
Contest For Latin American Security Council Seat Still Stalled 49
US Officials Concerned By Rights Abuses In Colombia 49
Nicaraguan Congress Expected To Ban All Abortions 50
Brutal War Between Drug Gangs Underway In Mexico 50
South African Political Analyst Denied Entry Into US 50
Activists Urge UN Action Against Regime In Burma 50

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 50

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 51

Online Version

Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

In Berlin, Gonzales Urges Europeans To Receive Released Detainees. The AP (10/26) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said European countries should do more to take back detainees released from the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, while defending Washington's treatment of prisoners." The AP continues, "Gonzales is touring European capitals to discuss a recently passed U.S. law covering the prosecution of terror suspects. … Speaking in Berlin at an event organized by the German Marshall Fund, he said the United States is 'not interested in serving as the world's jailer,' and urged Europeans to be more willing to repatriate released prisoners, as well as to increase pressure on third countries to do so. … 'Despite demands from others that Guantanamo be closed, the United States has received little help from our European allies regarding the fate of these detainees,' Gonzales said." The AP adds, "Gonzales also detailed the U.S. Military Commissions Act, a law that provides for trials of captured terrorists, saying it was proof that 'just because the U.S. still believes a state of war exists, that does not mean that the rule of law has no place.' … Gonzales was conciliatory toward expressions of frustration from German members of parliament who attended the discussion over what they view as insufficient respect by the United States for international law. … 'We understand the anxiety and the tension this has created,' Gonzales said. However, he urged German and other allies to be open for discussion, saying 'we need you in the long haul as partners.'"

DOJ_NMG_0086369

Cheney Confirms US Has Used "Water-Boarding" To Question Al Qaeda Detainees. McClatchy (10/26, Landay) reports, "Vice President Dick Cheney has confirmed that US interrogators subjected captured senior al-Qaida suspects to a controversial interrogation technique called 'water-boarding,' which creates a sensation of drowning." Cheney "indicated that the Bush administration doesn't regard water-boarding as torture and allows the CIA to use it. 'It's a no-brainer for me,' Cheney said at one point in an interview." Cheney's comments, "in a White House interview on Tuesday with a conservative radio talk show host, appeared to reflect the Bush administration's view that the president has the constitutional power to do whatever he deems necessary to fight terrorism."

US Proposes Limits To Contacts Between Detainees And Their Lawyers. The AP (10/26, Melia) reports, "The US government has proposed limiting contact between defense lawyers and detainees at Guantanamo Bay, according to court documents." The government "argues that it must restrict the detainees' communications, as news of world events could incite the prisoners to violence." The US "proposed the rules in a filing to a federal appeals court in Washington that was examined by The Associated Press. The case deals with an Afghani detainee but the government wants them to apply to other prisoners at Guantanamo Bay Naval Base in southeast Cuba. The prison camp holds some 430 detainees."

Binalshibh Files Legal Challenge To Detention, Seeks Lawyer. The Washington Post (10/26, A3, Leonnig, Tate, 748K) reports admitted 9/11 planner Ramzi Binalshibh "filed a legal challenge in federal court in Washington on Oct. 10, asserting his rights to contest his detention and requesting that a court-appointed lawyer represent him free of charge. In so doing, Binalshibh brought to life the two arguments at the heart of the recent, furious debate over stripping such habeas corpus rights from so-called enemy combatants: the administration's position that alleged terrorists like him do not deserve access to U.S. courts, and his opponents' assertion that the American justice system is a model for the world precisely because it accords such basic rights to all." The Post notes, "Because of Binalshibh's alleged admission that he was a key player in the Hamburg cell that carried out the attacks, his legal suit may provide the starkest test yet of America's justice system, legal experts said."

Teen Once Detained As Potential Terrorist Says She Faces Mutilation If Deported. In a story taking a sympathetic tone toward 18-year-old Manhattan resident Adama Bah, jailed for six weeks on suspicion of being a potential suicide bomber, the New York Times (10/26, Bernstein, 1.21M) reports that she is "still wearing an electronic ankle bracelet and tethered to a 10 p.m. government curfew, restrictions that were conditions of her release." Bah also faces "deportation to Guinea, where she has not lived since she was 2. Today, at a closed hearing in Manhattan's federal building, she will plead for political asylum from Guinea's entrenched practice of female genital mutilation, which has marked all the women in her extended family, including her mother. … 'I'm worried about being sent back,' Ms. Bah said on Tuesday in her first extended interview about the lasting consequences of a case that briefly became a cause célèbre in the debate over government vigilance and the protection of individual liberties."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Federal Agencies Sharpen Surveillance Methods. Government Executive (10/26, Marino) reports, "A senior Coast Guard official on Tuesday praised homeland security and intelligence agencies' efforts to develop new surveillance tools and bolster information sharing." GE continues, "Guy Thomas, the Coast Guard's science and technology adviser, said improved surveillance techniques would help provide better protection against the possibility of attacks launched from boats offshore. … A 60- to 70-foot boat loaded with ordinary explosives and a biological or chemical weapon could deliver and spread a deadly substance - five pounds of anthrax, for example - to coastal areas with thousands of people, Thomas said. 'I don't think I want to live in Los Angeles anymore,' he told guests of the Border Management Summit, which was organized by the Institute for Defense and Government Advancement." GE adds, "Protecting the coastal waters requires improved sensory techniques, an official with a company that provides security solutions said. He said his company has been working on multiple projects aimed at identifying incoming ships from farther away to detect suspicious ones. Recent advances mean that even the material from which a ship is built -- whether it is wood, plastic or metal -- can be determined from a distance, he said. … As part of more general efforts to improve surveillance, technology capable of recording biometric identifiers such as leg or facial muscle movement without alerting the subject is being refined. Gait recognition, for instance, is part of the 'long-range surveillance' that the FBI may start using to help track suspects, said Duane Blackburn, the bureau's representative to the National Science and Technology Council. It remains in the research phase, and is being tested at universities, Blackburn said. … Other techniques in development include keystroke analyses of typing rhythms, and the production of video and photographic images clear enough to display biometric patterns. … Like gait surveillance, these remain in the early research stages. 'Video is a real challenge,' said Christopher Miles, senior program manager of the Justice Department's National Institute of Justice."

DOJ_NMG_0086370

Grassley Demands FBI Brief Congress On Its Anthrax Investigation. FNC News Live PM (10/25, 2:06 p.m., Jane Skinner) reported, "Five years after those deadly anthrax attacks in this country, there is nobody in custody. The FBI does not seem to be any closer to solving the case. Those attacks killed five people, infected 17 back in 2001. Now, a top Republican is slamming the Justice Department, saying the FBI may actually have botched the investigation. … According to senior Republican, the FBI gave a briefing to Congress on the anthrax case more than two and a half years ago because there were so many leaks in the media. Now Senator Charles Grassley is joining other lawmakers to question whether the bureau has messed up the case and that's the real reason the FBI Is unwilling to talk about it. Senator Grassley has written a letter of complaint to the Attorney General."

At least two local television networks reported that Senator Charles Grassley sent a letter to attorney general Alberto Gonzales, slamming the FBI's refusal to brief Congress on its investigation into the 2001 anthrax attacks. WXIX-TV Cincinnati, (10/25, 10:28 p.m.) broadcasted, "A top ranking Republican wants answers from the FBI about the lack of results from its five-year anthrax investigation. In a letter to attorney general Alberto Gonzales, Iowa Senator Charles Grassley says numerous questions need to be answered both about the investigation itself and how the FBI has handled it. Grassley calls the FBI's refusal to brief Congress over the last several years 'outrageous.'"

KHON-TV Honolulu, (10/25, 5:32 p.m.) broadcasted, "A top ranking Republican wants answers from the FBI about the lack of results from its five- year anthrax investigation. Iowa senator Charles Grassley says numerous questions need to be answered both about the investigation itself and how the FBI has handled it. Grassley calls the FBI's refusal to brief congress over the last several years 'outrageous.'"

Judge Issues Two-Day Stay For NYTimes To Reveal Hatfill Sources. The New York Sun (10/26, Gerstein) reports, "A federal judge gave the New York Times a brief reprieve from an order forcing it to identify confidential sources for columns about the 2001 anthrax attacks, but the paper could still face the possibility of being held in contempt of court as soon as tomorrow. Judge Claude Hilton of Alexandria, Va., issued a two-day stay of a magistrate's order that would have required the Times to name the sources by yesterday" for Steven Hatfill's lawsuit claiming "he was defamed by five columns written by Nicholas Kristof." Judge Hilton said "that he was still reviewing whether the Times should be compelled to identify the sources. … But the Times suffered a setback yesterday when Judge Hilton upheld a magistrate's ruling denying its request to suspend action on the libel suit until the government completes its investigation into the anthrax mailings."

DHS Pushing Mass-Evacuation Planning. The Washington Post (10/26, A23, Hsu, 748K) reports, "Making a familiar case for more roads and using the newer argument of homeland security, a trade association for highway builders and the automotive industry recently gave most of the nation's biggest metropolitan areas failing grades for how well they would evacuate their populations in a disaster." The American Highways Users Alliance gave failed twenty of 37 urban areas, including "New York City, Los Angeles, Chicago, Philadelphia and Washington." The report cards followed a DHS study over released this summer that found mass-evacuation plans "inadequate in about 90 percent of the nation's top 75 cities and 'an area of profound concern.' Pushed by Congress, DHS will award $1.3 billion in homeland security grants next year, partly on the basis of fixing them." However, "many state and local officials warn that Washington is focusing too much on a replay of a Katrina-like disaster instead of drawing broader lessons about preparedness."

DOJ_NMG_0086371

Expert Sees Holes In Freight Rail Security. Kevin M. Lynch, a former captain of police for the Conrail Police Department and a consultant on railroad police practices, in an op-ed in the Washington Times (10/26, 88K) writes that while the US has been successful thus far in "creating a safer air traffic system" following 9/11, the nation's freight railroad infrastructure "remains vulnerable to attack and sabotage." However, "Even since September 11, the freight railroads have continued to trim their police departments." Lynch says the answer to this security issue "is to stop giving lip service to protection and prevention and to fence strategic railroad property and drastically increase the number of sworn railroad police officers across the nation."

Little Progress Seen On TSA ID Programs. In an article appearing on no fewer than 38 news websites, the AP (10/25, Miller) reported, "Two anti-terrorism ID programs have been sent back to the drawing board and a third is being farmed out to private companies after costing hundreds of millions of dollars. … So far, the Transportation Security Administration _ which has been overseeing development of the three programs_ has not gone beyond testing, has issued no IDs and has screened no passengers against terrorist lists." TSA chief Kip Hawley said this week that the Transportation Worker Identity Credential, Secure Flight and Registered Traveler programs "by their very nature use expensive and unreliable advanced technology. All three are back on track, Hawley said." However, documents obtained by The Associated Press, show that on each of the three projects, "the TSA and contractors hired by the agency have spent more than anticipated, missed deadlines and raised questions about their ability to protect the public's privacy and the private sector's commercial interests."

WAR NEWS:

A "Somber" Bush Says He Is "Not Satisfied" With Iraq Situation. The AP (10/26, Hunt) reports, "Acknowledging painful losses in Iraq, President Bush said Wednesday he is not satisfied with the progress of the long and unpopular war, but he still insisted the United States was winning and should not think about withdrawing. Thirteen days before elections in which Republicans fear Iraq could cost them control of the House or Senate, Bush expressed unwavering confidence in Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, the US generals running the war and Iraq's prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, despite new strains between Baghdad and Washington." Said Bush, "The ultimate accountability rests with me. If people are unhappy about it, look right to the president." In answer to a question, the President said, "I know many Americans are not satisfied with the situation in Iraq. … I'm not satisfied either." However, he added that "the United States was changing tactics to deal with circumstances in Iraq but shouldn't change the overall direction of the war. 'Absolutely we're winning,' the president asserted."

The President's comments received heavy coverage, leading two of the major network newscasts and receiving front page articles in major newspapers. The network news devoted just under 13 minutes to the story in aggregate. Most of the coverage continued to be negative toward the President. There were some exceptions, however, as some media reports an opinion pieces praised Bush's "candor." The CBS Evening News (10/25, lead story, 2:55, Axelrod, 7.66M), for example, said "Bush took the podium with rare candor about the mess in Iraq." However, added CBS, "as soon as the questions began, it was back to familiar territory. Resolute and defiant." And the Los Angeles Times (10/26, 918K), usually very critical of Bush's Iraq policies, editorializes this morning, "If there was good news from President Bush's news conference Wednesday, it's that the president is not adopting a bunker mentality and is addressing the deteriorating conditions in Iraq. The bad news is that the more he talks, the more apparent it becomes that there is no easy way to reverse them." That is "a painful admission for an administration two weeks before a midterm election, so any sense of despair was wrapped in more purposeful language." The Times concludes, "Here's hoping that it won't get much worse in the next two weeks, and that Bush will be more candid about his plans on Nov. 8."

Media coverage generally focuses on what is seen as a new demeanor on Bush's part – described as "somber" in several stories – and also a change in his rhetoric. NBC Nightly News (10/25, lead story, 3:25, Gregory, 9.87M) Gregory) said Bush was "somber as he acknowledged the public's anxiety and anger over Iraq. At the same time he was also insistent that US losses in Iraq are worth it." NBC Nightly News (10/25, story 3, 2:00, Russert, 9.87M) later reported, "The one thing every candidate's, Democratic or Republican polls show is pessimism about Iraq. The President knows that. He had to come forward to reassure the American people that he has a plan. That he is not being overly stubborn about Iraq, and that he is not stuck, as he would say, in the ground on Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0086372

The CBS Evening News (10/25, story 3, 1:45, Schieffer, 7.66M) said, "Most polls show the majority believe it was wrong to go there and it's making no difference to keep our troops there. That is what the President is trying to change that attitude." Couric: "While there is all very nuanced today did represent a shift in the President's stance, didn't it?" Schieffer: "I think what it represents is a change in tone." The CBS Evening News (10/25, story 4, 1:55, Couric, 7.66M) also reported, "What are voters saying about the President's latest position on Iraq? The war is a big issue all over this country. Especially in Connecticut. So today I sat down with a group of Democrats and Republicans at a diner in Norwalk to get their take." Tommy Jackson, Pastor: "I've been encouraged by the President's position to pass two to three weeks. I hope this is not an election ploy but one that is sin veer." Alex Savvidis, dinner owner, was asked, "Are you encouraged by the President's words? No?" Savvidis: "No." Couric: "Why not?" Savvidis: "Just words. I want to see it. When I see it, I'll believe it."

Bush's "tone" is being linked to the homestretch of the midterm campaigns. The New York Times (10/26, Broder, 1.21M) says that with his "shift in tone and the suggestion of flexibility on tactics in Iraq," Bush "gambled Wednesday that he could rescue Republican candidates who are having a hard time defending the war and an even harder time running away from it." Bush's "decision to address the war and its problems so prominently carries the risk that he will strengthen the Democrats' case that the midterm election is primarily a referendum on his own handling of the war."

More negative is another New York Times piece (10/26, Stanley) that couples Bush's appearance with that of Madonna on the Oprah Winfrey Show. Both, says the Times, "are famous people famously under fire for a ruckus overseas. Both are famous for never bending to public opprobrium and for pushing their agendas with single-minded assurance. The president and the pop star went on television yesterday looking more like victims of circumstances beyond their control than visionaries." Both "showed viewers an unfamiliar side of themselves. The president, whose political identity is founded on an image of unwavering cowboy resolve, looked uncertain and chastened behind the lectern, at one moment staring downward and gnawing his lip in a rare tableau of weary anxiety."

But in several reports, Bush is accused of changing his rhetoric without altering the substance of his Iraq policies. MSNBC (10/25, Shuster) reported "a sober President Bush admitted what most Americans have been saying for a year: that the Iraq war is not going well. … But the only change from President Bush today seemed to be his words, not his policy. The President did not offer a new strategy for stopping the loss of American lives or preventing an all-out Iraqi civil war. … Now just 13 days before the Congressional elections, the President is caught between his own party getting bludgeoned over the Iraq war and suggestions he is making changes only because of domestic politics."

Along similar lines, ABC World News (10/25, story 3, 2:45, Stephanopoulos, 8.78M) said the President "displayed a variety of moods. Somber," as well as "assured" and "combative." Stephanopoulos added, "The President pushed today, flexibility." Stephanopoulos added, "The only evidence in the change in tactics is the President's promise that he is working with the Iraqi government to develop benchmarks for progress on security, reconstruction and political reconciliation. But he refused to spell out any consequences if those goals are not met." The Washington Post (10/26, A17, Ricks, 748K) makes a similar point, reporting, "The text of President Bush's news conference yesterday ran to nearly 10,000 words, but what may have been more significant were the things he did not say. The president talked repeatedly about 'benchmarks' for progress in Iraq, using that word 13 times." But "he did not discuss the consequences of the Iraqi government missing those targets. Such a question, he said, was 'hypothetical.'" That response "left unclear how the benchmarks would be different from previous times when the United States has set out intentions, only to back down."

In a front page article, the New York Times (10/26, A1, Rutenberg, 1.21M) describes Bush's remarks as "the latest iteration in a recent rhetorical evolution that has seen him move from vowing to 'stay the course' in Iraq to promising flexibility." Still, "Bush indicated no major changes in his overall strategy in Iraq, saying he continued to support Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and the generals overseeing the war." He also "urged Americans to look beyond the violence…and avoid disillusionment over a war he said was being won."

Also in a front page story, the Washington Post (10/26, Baker, 748K) focuses on the President's assertion the US is winning, reporting the President was "trying to walk a careful line between optimism and pessimism" and "balance a variety of competing ideas." The Los Angeles Times (10/16, Gerstenzang, 918K) headlines its story "Bush Takes Sober Iraq Tone but Says Goals 'Unchanging,'" and describes Bush's remarks as "a strenuous attempt to shore up pre-election support for the Iraq war, acknowledged three years of setbacks Wednesday and expressed dissatisfaction over a frustrating and deadly month." The Wall Street Journal (10/26, Pulizzi, 2.03M) says "with the debate over the strategy in Iraq heating up two weeks ahead of the mid-term Congressional elections, Wednesday's press conference was billed as a chance for Mr. Bush to give the public an update on the war."

DOJ_NMG_0086373

The Financial Times (10/26, Daniel) also describes the press conference as "sombre," and says Bush "spent nearly 15 minutes in an opening statement trying to knit together often-contradictory arguments." He "moved from expressing 'serious concern' about Iraq, while emphasising progress was being made, to being resolute about the ultimate outcome in the country but flexible about military tactics to attain that end."

The Washington Times (10/26, Curl, 88K), meanwhile, says Bush was "combative and defensive at times," adding "Democrats on Capitol Hill immediately took aim at Mr. Bush. 'President Bush's Iraq policy has been a dismal failure. The president has abandoned his "stay the course" slogan; it is long past time he abandon his "stay the course," policy,' House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said." Added Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, "The Bush administration's Iraq policy, like Iraq itself, is in complete disarray. One day, the administration calls for a timetable, the next day, Iraqi Prime Minister Maliki objects to it. ... One day, it's stay the course, the next day, it's change the course."

Appearing on MSNBC's Hardball (10/25, Matthews), Democratic Sen. Richard Durbin echoed those criticism, saying, "The only change I saw is the President started to acknowledge the position that the Democrats have held for a long time, a position which suggests this would be a year of change, that we would be talking to the Iraqi government in no uncertain terms about their responsibility to defend their own country, talking about timetables. But it was a lot of brave talk two weeks before an election, but no real change in strategy, in terms of where he's going."

USA Today (10/26, 2.27M), meanwhile, says in an editorial, "There is little doubting the sincerity of…Bush's commitment to the mission in Iraq. On Wednesday, amid sinking public approval less than two weeks before congressional elections, Bush set out yet another course for a victory he optimistically predicted was achievable." The President's "conviction is obvious. But whether it's supported by facts -- and whether there's a real path to victory as he defines it -- is dubious. There continues to be a yawning gap between his rhetoric and reality."

Snow Defends US Flexibility In Iraq. Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, writes in USA Today (10/26, 2.27M), "It seems odd to be defending the commanding general and the US ambassador to Iraq from charges that they don't understand the situation in the country in which they work, especially when the complaining sages live thousands of miles from the battlefront. The business of war requires constant vigilance, enterprise and determination. Our goal and a key to our security at home: to help Iraq sustain, govern and defend itself, and emerge as a key ally in the war on terror. We have pursued that aim according to the challenges on the ground and have adjusted to shifting realities -- from the early resistance by Saddam Hussein's armies, to early battles in such places as Fallujah to today's Iraq, where 14 of 18 provinces live in relative peace. Gen. George Casey noted earlier this week that 90% of the violence in Iraq now occurs within a 30-mile radius of Baghdad. … The combined Iraqi-U.S. forces will win that fight, as they have every other engagement of the war. But peace in Iraq will require more than superiority of arms. Iraqis need some other basics for good and free lives — a political system that will guarantee rights and representation for all, and an economy that can provide jobs." Snow adds that when the enemy adjust its "tactics, we must adjust ours, taking the fight to them. That is what we have done and what we will continue to do. And we will win."

Iraq Seen As A Negative For Republican Candidates. The Washington Post (10/26, A1, Slevin, Powell, 748K) reports, "Just three months ago, Republican strategists believed that doubts about Iraq could be contained -- or even turned into an electoral advantage -- if the battle was framed as a vital front in the war against terrorism. Voters would be invited to choose: Stand firm or capitulate." But "the issue is not playing out that way. In both parties, a consensus now exists -- buttressed by polls -- that disaffection with a war grown costly and difficult to manage is the gravest threat to continued Republican rule." Iraq "is not only a potent issue in its own right, but is also a resonant metaphor for doubts about the competence and accountability of the Republican Party."

DOJ_NMG_0086374

The AP (10/25) reports Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, visiting New Hampshire, said if Republicans "want to succeed on Election Day, they should turn their focus away from the Iraq war." Frist said, "The challenge is to get Americans to focus on pocketbook issues, and not on the Iraq and terror issue."

Maliki Says He Did Not Agree To US Timelines. NBC Nightly News (10/25, story 2, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There appears to be something of a disconnect between what we heard from the White House today and what is going on the ground." NBC (Engel) added, "Certainly a disconnect. Yesterday the top US officials in Iraq announced the Iraqi government had accepted a planned time line. Today the Iraqi prime minister said not so and accused Washington of trying to bully him. Anger and defiance today on the streets of Baghdad and from the prime minister. … Maliki went on the defensive claiming he did not approve the raid. … Then Maliki went further, yesterday US officials claimed his government developed a timetable for economic and political process. Maliki today said this government represents the will of the people and no one has the right to impose a timetable on us."

ABC World News (10/25, story 4, 2:10, McCarthy, 8.78M) reported, "About-face. Only yesterday, the US Ambassador announced Prime Minister Maliki had signed off on a timetable for change. Today, Maliki said he had agreed to no such thing. … Maliki went further, saying the US timetable giving him 12 to 18 months to take over security was influenced by the upcoming US elections. Truth is, he wants to be seen as his own man. The Prime Minister demanded an explanation for a US led raid, launched this morning in Baghdad's Sadr City."

The CBS Evening News (10/25, story 2, 2:10, Loganc, 7.66M) reported, "The Prime Minister has repeatedly promised to disarm militias, a promise that so far has seen no results. Not surprising, considering every major political group in the Iraqi government has its own militia."

The AP (10/26, Bodeen) described Maliki as "angry," while the Washington Post (10/26, A15, Anderson, 748K) says he "lashed out at the United States on Wednesday, saying his popularly elected government would not bend to U.S.-imposed benchmarks and timelines." He "accused US officials of election-year grandstanding, saying that deadlines were not logical." Maliki also "distanced himself from and criticized a U.S.-Iraqi military "deadly early-morning…raid in Sadr City" intended to capture the leader of a Shiite death squad "that left at least five people dead and 20 wounded."

McClatchy (10/26, Youssef) describes US and Iraqi officials as "increasingly at odds over strategy and goals, a division that American officials in Iraq say is making it harder to pursue their objectives in Iraq." The New York Times (10/26, Tavernise, 1.21M) also says Malikis's comments "pointed to a widening schism between the Shiite-led Iraqi government and the Americans who support it." Maliki "tailored his remarks to a domestic audience, reassuring the millions of Shiites who form his power base that he would not bend to pressure by the American government," as "the very forces that elevated him to power and whose support he must retain — religious Shiite parties with their own militias — are complicit in the violence." He is "forced to navigate between the rising tide of frustration among Shiites who form his base and the American government that wields the power." Makili's stance "fits snugly inside the circle of hardening Shiite sentiment that the American military, in keeping full control of security, has not given the Iraqi government full power to intervene when Sunni militias or insurgents carry out sectarian cleansing."

The Financial Times (10/26, Negus) lead that Maliki "dismissed Washington's claim that Iraqi politicians had agreed a timetable." The "statements were a challenge to US officials" and "suggest that Mr Maliki either believes that Washington has no option but to continue backing his government, or feels that he cannot afford to alienate other members of his Shia-led coalition."

In a separate front page story focusing on the President's comments on Iraq, the Washington Post (10/26, A1, Baker, 748K) reports that Bush and Maliki's "dueling messages" have "exposed rising tensions between Washington and Baghdad as the fighting worsens." In another New York Times (10/26, Rutenberg, 1.21M) also on the President's Iraq comments, Bush "expressed general support for Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq, even as Mr. Maliki used his own news conference to distance himself from the United States." The US and Iraq's "political tumult…carries the potential to drive them further apart."

USA Today (10/26, Jackson, Jervis, 2.27M) runs a similar report under the headline "Iraqi Leader Bristles At Idea Of Timetable." The Washington Times/AP (10/26, Yacoub),among other newspapers, also runs a story on Maliki's comments.

DOJ_NMG_0086375

US-Led Forces Raid Sadr City. The Los Angeles Times (10/26, Roug, 918K) reports US-led forces battled insurgents in Baghdad's Sadr City "during a rare foray into the capital's vast Shiite Muslim slum. Troops searching for an alleged death squad leader called in airstrikes when they came under attack, killing four people, according to Iraqi authorities." While the US military said the raid "had been authorized by the Iraqi government," PM Nouri al-Maliki "quickly renounced the operation. He told reporters at a news conference that the raid was an example of the continued lack of coordination between Iraqi and American officials." Maliki said, "We are going to request some explanations from the multinational forces to prevent a similar incident and to ensure coordination with the Iraqi security forces."

Author Suggests Bin Laden Wants US To Pull Out Of Iraq. In a New York Times (10/26, 1.21M) op-ed, the New America Foundation's Peter Bergen, author of "The Osama bin Laden I Know: An Oral History of Al Qaeda's Leader," writes under the headline "What Osama Wants" that for the US to "pull entirely out" of Iraq now "would be to snatch an unqualified disaster from the jaws of an enormous blunder. … Vietnam often looms large in the debate over Iraq, but the better analogy is what happened in Afghanistan since the Soviet invasion," when the end of US aid helped lead to the "rise of the Taliban and its Qaeda allies. We can't make the same mistake again in Iraq. A total withdrawal from Iraq would play into the hands of the jihadist terrorists."

Situation In Iraq Said To Strengthen Syria Domestically, Internationally. The Washington Post (10/26, A18, Knickmeyer, 748K) reports, "Horror at the bloodshed accompanying the U.S. effort to bring democracy to Iraq has accomplished what human rights activists, analysts and others say Syrian President Bashar al-Assad had been unable to do by himself: silence public demands for democratic reforms here." After "Iraq's descent into sectarian and ethnic war… even Syrian activists concede that the country's feeble rights movement is moribund." Now, "Advocates of democracy are equated now with supporters of America, even 'traitors.'" Additionally, "the erosion of U.S. stature over Iraq and Lebanon has put Syria in position to try to improve its regional and world standing without giving in to the reform demands of the United States, diplomats and analysts said." While "the United States and the European Union have officially isolated Syria since the February 2005 bombing that killed former Lebanese prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri in Beirut," after this summer's conflict in Lebanon, "Spain, Italy and Germany have renewed contacts…calling Syria's help vital to averting further conflict there."

NYTimes Slams "Contracting Fiascos" In Iraq Reconstruction. The New York Times (10/26, 1.21M) editorializes, "When the full encyclopedia of Bush administration misfeasance in Iraq is compiled, it will have to include a lengthy section on the contracting fiascos that wasted billions of taxpayer dollars in the name of rebuilding the country. It isn't only money that was lost. Washington's disgraceful failure to deliver on its promises to restore electricity, water and oil distribution, and to rebuild education and health facilities, turned millions of once sympathetic Iraqis against the American presence. Their discovery that the world's richest, most technologically advanced country could not restore basic services to minimal prewar levels left an impression of American weakness and, worse, of indifference to the well-being of ordinary Iraqis. That further poisoned a situation already soured by White House intelligence breakdowns, military misjudgments and political blunders."

NBC's Engel Has Covered War Since It Began. In the Washington Post (10/26, C1, 748K), Howard Kurtz profiles NBC's Richard Engel, who "has logged more time in Iraq than any other television correspondent, chronicling 3 1/2 years of carnage." NBC anchor Brian Williams said of Engel, "In an era of instant media criticism, he calls balls and strikes in the middle of a war zone. He is completely unbothered by any Web site that may have problems with his reporting while he's over in Iraq dodging bullets. … He is the most agenda-less person I've met in our business, I think, in the past 20 years."

Taliban Consolidates Control In Pakistani Region. The Washington Times (10/26, Wilkinson, 88K) reports, "Taliban militias in Pakistan have set up offices, introduced taxes and taken control of justice in the tribal agency of North Waziristan, where last month the government signed a peace agreement with militants." And in "violation of the agreement, a Taliban shura, or council, distributed pamphlets of its policies while militants patrolled the area's streets. They have already killed numerous 'American spies.'"

DOJ_NMG_0086376

Veterans Call For Mandatory Public Service Program. In a USA Today (10/26, 2.27M) op-ed, professor Hodding Carter and attorney Ronald Goldfarb, both veterans, write, "As with so many Americans of our generation, we went into military service because that was what you were expected to do. We may have groused at the time, but we are proud of having served our country. It carved a few years out of our lives in the 1950s and '60s, but strengthened our understanding of the country we served and the people with whom we served. … On the campaign trail these days, there are few fresh ideas, and in the wake of the fifth 9/11 anniversary, there are still not enough calls for public sacrifice beyond that made by our troops. … What does the citizen owe the state? Answer: mandated public service without exemptions."

Author Calls For Expansion Of GI Bill Benefits. In a Los Angeles Times (10/26, 918K) op-ed, Edward Humes, author of "Over Here: How the GI Bill Transformed the American Dream," calls for "A GI Bill For The 21st Century," says the 1944 GI Bill "transformed the nation and the very nature of the American dream, opening up the colleges, raising suburbs out of bean fields, creating a new middle class and providing the medical, engineering and scientific prowess that conquered long-feared diseases, ushered in the Information Age and helped win the Cold War. There was never anything like the GI Bill. There's nothing like it on the horizon. And that's a problem. Today's veterans are getting shortchanged. Instead of a full ride to any college, the modern GI Bill's education support tops out at $36,000 for a four-year degree -- barely enough to cover the average state university. … Forget about the private colleges once covered by the GI Bill -- $36,000 would pay for only a year at many of them. Reservists and National Guard troops in Iraq receive even less. … But this is not simply a story of slighted veterans, scandalous as that may be. This is a story of a United States no longer investing it its future. The GI Bill was an engine of opportunity for all of us."

Fallen Soldiers Remembered. The CBS Evening News (10/25, story 11, 2:45, Couric, 7.66M) said, "As we hear about the rising American death toll in Iraq, we sometimes forget that these are not just statistics. They're sons and daughters, husbands and wives, fathers and mothers." After profiling the family of Army Cpl. David Unger of Kansas, CBS (Pitts) added, "The Pentagon's released the names of scores of American soldiers killed in Iraq this month. They came from 29 states and Puerto Rico from Derek Jones of Salem Oregon to Nicholas Arvantis of Salem New Hampshire. Most were 25 years old or younger."

DOJ:

Acosta Sworn In As South Florida US Attorney. The AP (10/26, Anderson) reports, "R. Alexander Acosta was formally sworn in Wednesday as South Florida's top federal prosecutor by Supreme Court Justice Samuel Alito Jr., for whom Acosta clerked shortly after graduating from Harvard Law School." The AP continues, "Alito recalled that during his clerkship in 1994 at the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, Acosta appeared to exercise good judgment and common sense at a young age and that 'and it has developed since then.' Alito, who is a big baseball fan, compared Acosta to players adept at all phases of the game. … 'He reminds me of one of those baseball players who can do everything,' Alito said." The AP adds, "Acosta, 37, a Miami native of Cuban ancestry, was confirmed by the U.S. Senate for the Southern District of Florida post on June 9. Before returning to Florida, he was assistant attorney general for civil rights at the U.S. Justice Department in Washington and prior to that was a member of the National Labor Relations Board. … The Miami job is one of the most prominent and busiest in the country, covering a district that is home to some 6 million people in nine counties. Its major recent cases range from alleged al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff to the Colombian brothers who ran the Cali cocaine cartel."

The Miami Herald (10/26, Weaver) reports, "Alito said that for all his formidable legal talent, Acosta betrayed one 'weakness' when he served as a law clerk in 1994 for the then-federal appellate judge. … 'Alex's knowledge of sports was a little bit lacking,' Alito deadpanned before a standing-room-only gathering of judges, prosecutors and defense lawyers in the historic central courtroom of the Miami federal courthouse." The Herald adds, "Alito, a self-professed baseball fan, joked that Acosta probably didn't know the difference between the Florida Marlins and the Miami Dolphins. … All joking aside, Acosta's star has risen quickly in Republican circles. He served on the National Labor Relations Board and then became the first Hispanic to lead the Justice Department's civil rights office. … He temporarily replaced outgoing U.S. Attorney Marcos Jimenez in June 2005 and was nominated for the job by President Bush earlier this year at age 37. The Senate confirmed Acosta in August, making him one of the nation's youngest top prosecutors."

DOJ_NMG_0086377

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

SEC Files Civil Charges Against Two In Fraud Scheme Targeting Korean Speakers. Dow Jones (10/26, Hughes) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission has filed civil-fraud charges against two men who allegedly took at least $3 million from Korean speakers in Southern California from 2003 through August 2005 through two firms that they portrayed as legitimate securities firms." Dow Jones continues, "The SEC on Wednesday announced the charges against Kangsan Kim, the owner of money-manager Unus Capital Management Inc., and Hyun Soo Jang, the owner of PeopleN Investment Corp., the brokerage firm that was supposed to execute trades for Unus. The two men face civil penalties and orders to return the money to investors. … 'This case provides an unfortunate example of the dangers presented by those seeking to exploit the trust of members of their own community,' said Randall Lee, director of the SEC's office in Los Angeles. 'Such schemes are reprehensible, and the SEC is committed to vigorously prosecuting those who betray that trust for their own profit.'" Dow Jones adds, "Kim was arrested in July on federal mail-fraud and wire-fraud charges, according to a Justice Department press release. He doesn't have a lawyer, according to the SEC, and he couldn't be located. The SEC said it believes Jang is in South Korea."

Judge Issues Secret Ruling In Nacchio Case. The AP (10/26, Shore) reports, "A federal judge has issued a secret ruling about the relevance of classified government documents that former Qwest Chief Executive Officer Joe Nacchio wants to use in his defense against insider trading charges." The AP continues, "In his memorandum and order, which were filed with the court late Tuesday, U.S. District Judge Edward Nottingham said he explained his decision regarding the documents but the bulk of it, 25 pages, was sealed under the Classified Information Procedures Act. … Nottingham's ruling came about two weeks after he met behind closed doors with prosecutors and Nacchio's attorneys to discuss the classified information." The AP adds, "Nacchio is charged with 42 counts of insider trading, accused of selling stock in 2001 based on inside knowledge that Qwest Communications International Inc. would be unable to meet revenue targets. … Each count against Nacchio carries a penalty of up to 10 years in prison and a $1 million (â,¬800,000) fine. The trial is set for March 19 and is expected to last about 30 days." The AP notes, "At issue is whether the classified information will help explain what Nacchio might have known at the time the trades occurred. … The defense has said Nacchio was aware of classified government contracts awarded to Qwest and of plans for future government business dealings with the Denver-based company."

SEC Launches Probe Of Mutual-Fund Firms After Kickback Case Settlement. The Wall Street Journal (10/26, A1, Lauricella) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission has launched an investigation of 27 mutual-fund companies that the agency says have accepted kickbacks totaling hundreds of millions of dollars in recent years." The Journal continues, "The investigation centers on alleged arrangements in which independent contractors agreed to pay rebates to mutual-fund companies in order to win lucrative contracts for jobs like producing shareholder reports and prospectuses. The probe stems from a $21.4 million settlement the SEC reached last month with Bisys Fund Services Inc., an administrative-services provider owned by Bisys Group Inc. … Regulators say Bisys, which is based in Roseland, N.J., paid a total of $230 million in kickbacks between July 1999 and June 2004 as part of an effort to win work from mutual funds. Bisys settled the civil charges without admitting or denying wrongdoing." The Journal adds, "While the alleged kickbacks would have taken only a tiny toll on individual investors, perhaps shaving a few hundredths of a percent a year off their fund accounts and returns, the latest investigation comes as the fund industry is struggling to rebuild its reputation after a series of trading scandals that triggered regulatory crackdowns and fines totaling more than $1 billion. … Critics have long complained about fund companies using shareholder money for their own benefit. For example, funds are allowed to use trading commissions, which are deducted from shareholder funds, to pay for research that may not benefit individual fund investors. They can also levy fees on their investors for marketing, although attracting more investors benefits the fund company and not necessarily its existing shareholders. Both these practices are highly regulated to prevent abuses. Nonetheless, regulators and other observers say the latest scandal is part of a distressing pattern of fund companies misusing shareholder money."

DOJ_NMG_0086378

NASD Fines James River CEO For Market Timing Violations. The AP (10/26, Gordon) reports, "Securities regulators have imposed a record $2.25 million fine on the chairman and CEO of hedge fund James River Capital Corp. for allegedly using deceptive practices in trading in the long-term investments known as variable annuities." The AP continues, "The National Association of Securities Dealers, the brokerage industry's self-policing organization, on Wednesday announced the civil penalty against Paul Saunders, a broker who is the chairman, CEO and majority owner of Richmond, Va.-based James River. Saunders neither admitted nor denied the NASD's allegations in agreeing to the settlement, under which he also will be suspended for 60 days from working as a broker." The AP adds, "The NASD said the $2.25 million penalty was the largest fine it has ever imposed on an individual for alleged improper market timing -- frequent 'in-and-out' trading. It includes restitution of some $750,000 in illicit profits that Saunders allegedly personally made. … In June 2004, the organization fined the brokerage Davenport & Co. $450,000 and ordered it to pay some $288,000 in restitution for allegedly allowing James River and another hedge fund, TFS Capital, to engage in improper market timing in variable annuities. That was the first case against a brokerage for allowing clients to improperly engage in market timing of variable annuities, often described as mutual funds wrapped in an insurance policy. Federal and state securities regulators have brought a number of cases for improper market timing of mutual funds in recent years."

US Argues Former AOL Officials Lied To Auditors. The AP (10/26, Westley) reports, "Two former America Online executives and top officials at a defunct Las Vegas software maker lied to auditors as part of a scheme to boost both companies' revenue as the dot-com boom fizzled in 2001, government lawyers argued Tuesday." The AP continues, "Kent Wakeford, former executive director at AOL's business affairs unit, and John Tuli, a former vice president in AOL's NetBusiness unit, are among the four defendants on trial at U.S. District Court in Alexandria. … The men, along with two former executives at PurchasePro, are charged with securities fraud, making false statements to auditors and wire fraud. The defendants deny wrongdoing." The AP adds, "In opening statements Tuesday, prosecutors alleged that PurchasePro gave AOL a stake in its company in 2000. In exchange, AOL helped sell PurchasePro's core product, a 'marketplace license,' which is software designed to facilitate business-to-business transactions. … But the licenses were a tough sell for AOL. The Dulles-based company was only able to convince companies to make a purchase by cutting secret side deals, including free online advertisements, Assistant U.S. Attorney Charles Connolly told jurors. … The executives engaged in various forms of deception to make it appear the licenses had been sold in the first quarter of 2001 so PurchasePro could meet its quarterly revenue goals and create the illusion of success to its shareholders, Connolly said."

Austria Charges Nine In Refco Probe. The Wall Street Journal (10/26, C4, Crawford, Mollenkamp) reports, "Prosecutors in Vienna have charged nine men, including the former chief executive officer of Bawag PSK, on charges ranging from embezzlement to fraud amid an Austrian probe into ties between U.S. commodity brokerage Refco Inc. and the Vienna bank." The Journal continues, "Among those charged was the former CEO of Bawag, Helmut Elsner, and Wolfgang Flöttl, who traded on behalf of Bawag from New York and is the son of another former Bawag CEO, Walter Flöttl. Robert Reiter, a former auditor at KPMG Alpen-Treuhand GmbH, which oversaw Bawag's books, also was charged. In the indictment, which was made public yesterday in Vienna, prosecutors allege the nine men 'intentionally abused their positions of trust at Bawag' and engaged in transactions that cost the bank €1.44 billion ($1.81 billion)." The Journal adds, "The charges come a year after Refco, a large New York broker of commodities and other securities that catered to corporations, government agencies and hedge funds, disclosed that then-CEO Phillip R. Bennett had used a scheme to hide bad debt from Refco investors. Refco investors and U.S. prosecutors allege the scheme included Bawag, which sought to hide its own bad debt that largely was a result of Wolfgang Flöttl's trading losses. … Mr. Bennett has been charged1 with conspiracy, securities fraud, wire fraud and making false filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission. He pleaded not guilty to the charges yesterday in a U.S. district court in Manhattan. His lawyer, David Frankel, declined comment on the charges in Austria and said Mr. Bennett continues to deny any wrongdoing."

DOJ_NMG_0086379

CRIMINAL LAW:

Republicans Grumble About DOJ Pre-Election Probes. Roll Call (10/26, Bresnahan) reports, "For House Republicans, it seems that every week brings a new report about a GOP lawmaker under investigation by the Justice Department for alleged corruption. And with the elections just 12 days away, Republicans are crying foul, complaining bitterly that the negative press spurred by the public disclosure of those criminal probes could help cost them their House majority." Roll Call continues, "While a Justice Department run by Republican appointees who were nominated by a conservative Republican president would normally get the benefit of the doubt from GOP lawmakers and staffers, some party insiders are privately wondering whether 'rogue elements' within the department — and more specifically the Public Integrity Unit, where corruption cases are handled — are trying to tip the election to Democrats by leaking news of these investigations so late in the cycle. … 'It would seem that the Public Integrity Unit of the Justice Department is running wild,' maintained a top Republican political operative, who would only speak on the condition of anonymity. 'They're trying to have some effect' on the midterm elections. … A House GOP leadership aide suggested that 'rogue elements' within DOJ's bureaucracy are 'working for a Democratic victory' on Nov. 7. … Another senior GOP staffer speculated that it was 'residual anger' from Speaker Dennis Hastert's (R-Ill.) public criticism of the June 20 FBI raid on Rep. William Jefferson's (D-La.) office that is feeding the 'campaign' against House Republicans. … But with the revelations seeming to hit a new Republican target almost weekly, senior Justice Department officials suddenly have found themselves barraged with questions about the leaks, although they strongly deny any suggestion that the department is meddling in political contests. … 'What I can say with great confidence is that the men and women in the Department of Justice and all of its investigative agencies do not take political considerations into play when it comes to discharging their duty,' said Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty at a news conference last week."

Jurisdictional Issues Arise In Federal Probes Of Congressional Members. Roll Call (10/26, Kane, Bresnahan) reports, "The Justice Department has employed a sprawling lineup of investigators and prosecutors to conduct its ever-expanding roster of Congressional investigations, and in the process created a patchwork of probes across the nation." Roll Call continues, "With at least 17 Members of the 109th Congress coming under federal investigation, Justice has used a pair of offices in its Washington, D.C., headquarters to conduct probes while at the same time coordinating with the offices of at least seven U.S. attorneys and roughly as many FBI offices to serve as ground troops for the inquiries. … Aides at Justice, along with other experts and former prosecutors, said the process of sorting out which offices lead investigations and prosecutions can be a sometimes messy division of labor that focuses on questions of jurisdiction and resources. … 'There's no cookie-cutter approach to it,' said Bryan Sierra, spokesman for the Justice Department. … 'There is not any one protocol on who does what — it was designed to be handled on a case-by-case basis,' said Dick Thornburgh, who served as attorney general from 1988 to 1991. … That case-by-case process has led to at least a quartet of Members being investigated the past two years by Justice's Public Integrity Unit, while another half-dozen Members have come under the prosecutorial glare of U.S. attorneys, almost always their local federal prosecutor. … While the Congressional corruption cases are some of the most sensitive for any prosecutor, they also bring with them the kind of big headlines that can make a prosecutor's career. And some U.S. attorneys have been known to employ sharp elbows when competing with other federal prosecutors to lead a probe, initially flooding a case with their agents to demonstrate they've done the most work and stake claim to a case." Roll Call notes, "Sierra said jurisdiction is the most important aspect in determining which office will initially handle a case, leading to U.S. attorneys taking the lead when it involves circumstances such as a Member and a local contributor or contractor seeking favors. That was the case with ex-Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.), now serving a 100-month prison term for orchestrating the largest bribery scheme ever perpetrated by a single Member of Congress."

Gay Rights Group Fires Employee Who First Posted Foley Emails. The New York Times (10/26, Kirkpatrick, 1.21M) reports the "liberal gay rights group" Human Rights Campaign "said Wednesday that one of its employees, acting anonymously, had created the Web site that first published copies of unusually solicitous e-mail messages to teenagers from former Representative Mark Foley, which led to his resignation." A spokesman for the group "said it first learned of its employee's role this week and immediately fired him for misusing the group's resources." Some Republicans "have speculated that the e-mail messages were planted by a Democrat." Human Rights Campaign spokesman David Smith said "the employee, whose name he declined to disclose, was a junior staff member hired last month to help mobilize the organization's members in Michigan."

DOJ_NMG_0086380

Hastert Aide Testifies Before House Ethics Committee. The AP (10/26, Taylor) reports Ted Van Der Meid, an aide to House Speaker Dennis Hastert, "went before ethics investigators in private to explain how the office handled complaints about former Rep. Mark Foley's behavior toward former pages." Van Der Meid, "who oversaw the page program for Hastert, R-Ill., appears to be one of the last witnesses. The House ethics panel is investigating whether lawmakers and staff aides acted properly when learning of Foley's too-friendly messages to ex-pages and other possible inappropriate behavior." The panel is "in its third week of hearing testimony and seems unlikely to complete its probe before the Nov. 7 elections." Van Der Meid "was a central figure in the handling of a complaint last fall from a former page from Louisiana" about Foley's emails.

Second Altar Boy Claims Abuse By Priest Cited By Foley. The Washington Post/AP (10/26, A2) reports, "Another former altar boy says he was sexually abused in the 1970s by the same retired Catholic priest who acknowledged fondling former congressman Mark Foley when Foley was a teenager, the man's attorney said Wednesday." The new allegations "against Anthony Mercieca were made by a man who lived in North Miami and was an altar boy at St. James Catholic Church, where Mercieca worked, attorney Jeffrey Herman said." Herman said "he plans to file a lawsuit against the Archdiocese of Miami. His client, now 40 and identified in the lawsuit only as John Doe No. 26, says Mercieca abused him when he was about 12 years old."

Police Chiefs Discuss Rise In Crime At White House Meeting. The Wall Steet Journal (10/26), in its online "Washington Wire" blog, reports, "Facing a rise in murders, drug shootings and armed robberies, more than a dozen police chiefs met senior White House officials on Wednesday to argue that there's a national epidemic of violent crime and they need federal money to fight it. The 15 police chiefs said that during the 90-minute meeting with Rob Portman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, and several members of President Bush's domestic policy team, they stressed that they needed flexibility in funding to fight both terrorists and criminals, and that each community faced different risks." White House "officials say they are well aware of a spike in violent crime statistics over the last year and are already been considering programs to fight the trade in methamphetamine, which is fueling the crime rise in some cities like Las Vegas. But the violence varies from city to city: Chicago and Miami haven't had increases; in Boston, homicides have hit a 10-year high and in Cincinnati a 20-year high, according to local crime statistics analyzed by the Police Executive Research Forum, or PERF, a think tank and police lobby group."

FBI Investigating LANL Classified Material Found In Drug Raid. ABC World News (10/25, story 7, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Tonight, the FBI is investigating how classified documents from New Mexico's Los Alamos nuclear weapons lab ended up in a suspected drug dealer's mobile home. Police stumbled on the computer files, which could hold sensitive information, while conducting a methamphetamine bust." The Washington Times (10/26, Seper, 88K) adds, "'This appears to be a new low: Even drug dealers can get classified information out of Los Alamos,' said Danielle Brian, executive director of the Project On Government Oversight, a watchdog that has exposed seven incidents involving the mishandling or loss of classified information at nuclear-weapons facilities since 2002. Authorities said the Los Alamos information was located on a computer flash drive," which "have been banned from the…laboratory for the past two years."

The Washington Post (10/26, A12, Eggen, 748K) reports that the LANL "contract employee at the center of a possible security breach…had a high-level clearance that may have given her special access to intelligence intercepts and other closely held national secrets, sources familiar with the case said yesterday. The FBI is examining at least three computer disks that police…discovered last week during a search of a suspected drug dealer's trailer home, according to the FBI and other agencies. … Authorities said the disks appear to contain classified material." The Post notes that the incident "is the latest potential embarrassment for the Los Alamos lab, which is under new management and undergoing changes designed to improve security."

Bloomberg (10/26, Schmidt) reports, "U.S. Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman told reporters in Washington the former employee was a woman and had worked as an archivist. 'We take this matter very seriously,' Bodman said. 'It is on my priority list.' He said the former employee had worked on 'archiving data from past history and making that available in electronic form so that it could be stored and accessed.'"

DOJ_NMG_0086381

Gun Collector Jailed In Wales Murder Probe Seeks Venue Change. The AP (10/26) reports, "A gun collector once jailed as a material witness in the assassination of a federal prosecutor is seeking a change of venue for an unrelated weapons charge." Albert Kwan "says he cannot get a fair trial on the charge -- possession of an unregistered machine gun -- because in the public's mind, his case 'is inseparably intertwined with that of the murder investigation of Assistant United States Attorney Thomas C. Wales,' his lawyers wrote in a court filing this week." However, Kwan lawyer Joe Conte "said Wednesday he did not expect U.S. District Judge Thomas Zilly to move Kwan's trial on the weapons charge out of the Western District of Washington."

New Charges Filed In PRC Military Secrets Case. The AP (10/26, Flaccus) reports, "Five members of a family accused of scheming to send sensitive information about Navy warships to China were indicted Wednesday on new conspiracy charges, prosecutors said. The indictment, handed down by a federal grand jury, added counts of conspiracy to export U.S. defense articles to China; possession of property in aid of a foreign government and making false statements to federal investigators. Named in the supplemental indictment were Chi Mak, a U.S. citizen who worked for Anaheim defense contractor Power Paragon; his wife, Rebecca Laiwah Chiu; his brother, Tai Mak; Tai Mak's wife, Fuk Heung Li; and their son, Billy Yui Mak." The AP notes, "The FBI originally arrested Chi Mak and his wife for investigation of conspiracy to steal U.S. government documents. That allegation was never charged, and no one has been charged with espionage in the case."

The Los Angeles Times (10/26, Reza, 918K) reports, "Federal prosecutors acknowledged last year that the information Chi Mak and the others gathered was not classified. In fact, much of it can be found on the Internet. Wednesday's indictment, however, says the president has the authority 'to control the import and export of defense articles' by placing them on the United States Munitions List, apparently even if they are readily accessible to the public. Articles placed on the list can be exported only by agents of a foreign government registered with the Defense Department, according to the indictment. The court document does not say whether the articles the defendants allegedly conspired to export to China were on the government's munitions list, or when they might have been placed there."

Philadelphia Mob Enforcer Arrested In Illegal Gambling Probe. The Philadelphia Inquirer (10/26, Anastasia, 399K) reports, "Bodybuilder and mob enforcer Vincent 'Big Vincent' Filipelli was ordered held without bail yesterday for allegedly threatening an undercover New Jersey State Police trooper involved in an organized-crime gambling investigation. Authorities said Filipelli, 53, made the threat at a South Philadelphia 'gentleman's club' where a meeting had been set up to discuss a gambling debt he was attempting to collect." Filipelli "was unaware that the two men he was meeting with were both undercover state troopers and that one of them was wearing a body wire. … 'Filipelli [said] that he would track him down and put him in the hospital for a year,' according to an affidavit filed by FBI agent James A. Titcombe, who worked the case with the state police. Later, as he was driving back to Cherry Hill with one of the undercover officials, Filipelli boasted that he was a 'made' member of the Philadelphia mob, according to the document."

The AP (10/26) notes, "State police, working with the FBI's Philadelphia office, arrested" Filipelli at his home on Tuesday, seizing "anabolic steroids and drug paraphernalia valued at $10,000, two stun guns, gambling records and cash, according to state police. … According to state police, Filipelli was a former bodyguard for John Stanfa, boss of the Philadelphia La Cosa Nostra organized crime family."

Gotti Told Federal Investigators NYPD Detective Helped Mob Murder. The New York Sun (10/26, Capeci) reports in its "Gangland" column, "At a secret session with the feds last year, John 'Junior' Gotti fingered a former NYPD detective as a money-hungry rogue who gave up confidential information about a 1983 barroom murder — information that Gambino wiseguys used to kill a witness whose death has been officially ruled a suicide for more than two decades, Gang Land has learned. Law enforcement sources said Gotti attributed his stunning account about the death by hanging of Vinny Cennamo to what he was told several years after the fact by mobster Angelo Ruggiero, a close ally of Gotti's late father who died of cancer in 1989. Police reports state that Cennamo, a friend of the murder victim, fingered Mark Caputo…as the killer and said he left the bar with Junior. … At the time of the conversation" with Caputo, "Junior told the feds, Ruggiero was on the outs with the Dapper Don, who…had placed Ruggiero 'on the shelf,' a designation that essentially stripped him of all his rights and responsibilities as a wiseguy."

DOJ_NMG_0086382

Pellicano Says He Has Rejected Repeated Plea Bargain Offers. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/26, Risling) reports, "Imprisoned private investigator Anthony Pellicano said Wednesday he rejected numerous attempts by federal prosecutors to negotiate a plea bargain in his Hollywood wiretap case because he didn't want to break the trust of celebrities, lawyers and other former clients. 'At least 10 times in this case I've been offered a plea bargain. It's not going to happen,' Pellicano told The Associated Press in a phone interview from federal prison. Pellicano said he intended to remain silent, even though he said Hollywood is infested with 'great white sharks' who don't play by the rules and constantly lie to get what they want." The AP adds, "Pellicano said encrypted audio files taken from his office during FBI raids won't lead to charges against any Hollywood power players. The tapes 'will do nobody any good to learn about my family life and my client life,' he said."

Former California Bank Manager Sentenced To Prison For Embezzlement. The AP (10/26) reports, "A former manager of a Silicon Valley bank was sentenced Wednesday to nearly a year and a half in federal prison for embezzling $1.13 million from her employer over a decade. U.S. District Court Judge Jeremy Fogel ordered Rose Magpantay Valdez…to serve 33 months, followed by three years of supervised release, and also to pay back all of the money she stole. Valdez pleaded guilty to embezzlement in July, after an investigation by the FBI." She "told investigators she began stealing money in 1995, moving funds from one general ledger account to another." Bay City News Wire (10/25) noted, "The investigation in the case was carried out by the FBI together with the bank's security personnel."

Texas Church Employee Sentenced To 12 Years For Child Porn Possession. The Lufkin Daily News (10/26, Savage) reports, "A former Lufkin church employee was sentenced to more than 12 years in federal prison Wednesday for viewing child pornography on the job, according to a federal court document. Troy Matthew Phillips, 32, who had worked at First Assembly of God…was handed a 151-month prison sentence by a U.S. District judge after he was convicted of possessing more than 2,100 images of child porn on a work computer, court documents stated." After a fellow employee grew suspicious, "senior church officials confronted Phillips, who admitted he was addicted to porn," and "a day later…church officials turned over the computer to FBI investigators. Investigators found 'numerous images' of children under age 12, including about 20 that were of infants or toddlers."

Florida Executes Man For 1990 Killings Of Five Students. The New York Times (10/26, Goodnough) reports, "The serial killer who gruesomely murdered five college students here in 1990 was put to death on Wednesday by lethal injection, and relatives of his victims said afterward that they could finally feel the beginnings of relief." The Times continues, "Danny H. Rolling, 52, was pronounced dead at 6:13 p.m. at Florida State Prison in Starke, about 30 miles northeast of Gainesville. Witnesses said he stared toward them and sang a hymn-type song just before the drugs were administered." The Times adds, "Mr. Rolling was 36 when he arrived in Gainesville shortly before the fall semester began at the University of Florida, a drifter with a criminal past who pitched a tent in some woods near campus. He followed two freshman roommates, Sonja Larson, 18, and Christina Powell, 17, to their off-campus apartment, raped Miss Powell, repeatedly stabbed both women with a hunting knife and mutilated their bodies. … The police discovered them on Aug. 26, after Miss Powell's parents reported that their daughter was not answering her door or phone. Later that night, the police found Christa Hoyt, 18, dead in her off-campus duplex. Mr. Rolling had raped and stabbed her, severed her head and placed it on a shelf. … The next day, Tracy Paules and Manuel Taboada, both 23, were discovered stabbed to death in their apartment, not far from where the other killings took place. Mr. Rolling attacked Mr. Taboada, a former high school football player, as he slept, then killed Miss Paules. All of the victims were University of Florida students except for Miss Hoyt, who was attending a nearby community college."

DOJ_NMG_0086383

DC Police Web Site Plots Crime In Street-By-Street Detail. The Washington Post (10/26, B1, Klein) reports, "D.C. police have launched a new crime-mapping tool on the department's Web site, allowing anyone to create a map of a sliver of the city and immediately see what crimes have happened there this year." The Post continues, "Cartoonish icons are used to pinpoint crimes. If you map your neighborhood, you do not want the Zorro-like mask to pop up -- it indicates an armed holdup. Or worse, the red figure of a person lying in the street, which denotes a homicide. The site also features goblin-looking masks for muggings, money sacks for thefts, gas cans for arsons and cracked houses for burglaries. … But it's the easy access to the information, not the symbols, that authorities believe will draw people to http://crimemap.dc.gov . For example, it takes only a few clicks to discover that during the past six months there have been 15 robberies, 72 thefts and 18 vehicles stolen within 1,000 feet of Chinatown's Verizon Center." The Post adds, "Most police departments make crime numbers available to residents, and many have Web sites that allow people to search for the number of crimes in specific areas. But few can match the District's new site, with its searchable fields that include museums, stadiums, gas stations and check-cashing locations. The site's level of detail rivals or surpasses those of departments in Baltimore, Chicago and Los Angeles."

DOJ Webcast Helps Local Police Departments With Recruitment Issues. The Palo Alto (CA) Daily News (10/26, Babcock) reports, "Police departments struggling to hire and retain qualified police officers participated in a U.S. Department of Justice webcast Tuesday to discuss strategies for addressing the problem." The News continues, "While there was a time when departments had the flexibility to reject would-be recruits, a new generation of qualified potential officers isn't interested in the profession, which many regard as short on pay and benefits. … 'Most of us have been in this profession for a while,' said East Palo Alto Police Chief Ron Davis, who took part in the hour-and-a-half webcast. 'Not to date ourselves, but we come from a different era. ... The job became your life and I think, probably for good reasons, this generation looks at a more balanced and tempered approach.'" The News adds, "About 25,000 people logged on to watch mayors and police chiefs from San Diego to Hattiesburg, Miss., discuss ways to grab and keep the attention of potential police officers. … As the panel jumped from topic to topic, a major theme of the webcast was the new generation's wants and needs. The panel discussed ideas such as speeding up the hiring process, which can take up to nine months, and using different techniques and technologies, such as the Internet, to recruit new officers."

CIVIL LAW:

Philip Morris Case Seen As Showing Roberts Court's Hand On Business Issues. In the New York Times editorial observer column (10/26), Adam Cohen says, "When Jesse Williams died of lung cancer, his widow sued Philip Morris, claiming it misled him about the danger of smoking. A jury agreed, awarding her $79.5 million in punitive damages. The Oregon Supreme Court affirmed the award, calling Philip Morris's decades of deception 'extraordinarily reprehensible.'" The Supreme Court is "hearing arguments in the case next week, and the broader business community has joined Philip Morris in asking the court to sharply reduce the damages. They are relying on a controversial line of recent cases in which the court struck down punitive damages awards that it deemed 'excessive.'" The Philip Morris case "will tell us a lot about the John Roberts court, which may be the most pro-business court in decades. It is a test of whether the court will abandon its conservative principles to be activist and 'rights-making' when the party that needs help is a large corporation. It will also reveal whether the court will continue on its current disturbing path of giving corporations more protection from excessive punishment than it gives to people."

Warsaw, IN, Seen As Center Of Orthopedic Device Industry. The Wall Street Journal (10/26, B1, Aeppel) reports from Warsaw, IN, "Silicon Valley has computers. Detroit has cars. But in orthopedic devices, the undisputed world capital is Warsaw, a city of 12,500 with a silver-domed 19th-century courthouse and pickups angled into the curb on Main Street. … Three of the world's five largest makers of artificial joints and related surgical tools have their headquarters here amid the lakes and fields of northeastern Indiana. The local industry has grown so much that it's now a regional force, with orthopedics companies popping up in nearby farm towns and the suburbs of Fort Wayne, about 50 miles to the east." The Journal adds, "Memphis, Tenn., and northern New Jersey are other industry hotspots, but none rivals Warsaw for sheer concentration. And while major orthopedics companies are looking overseas for cheaper places to produce items such as basic bone screws and metal plates, the U.S. retains a firm grip on the industry. … A big reason is that the U.S., with its population of fast-aging baby boomers, injury-prone weekend athletes and overweight people, is by far the world's biggest market for artificial hips and knees. The U.S. represents an estimated $14 billion of the annual spending in a global market of $22.9 billion, according to Knowledge Enterprises Inc., a Chagrin Falls, Ohio, market research firm." The Journal adds, "The U.S. also effectively protects manufacturers in the sector with strict regulations for devices that go inside the human body. Rather than risk problems -- and crippling lawsuits -- U.S. health-care providers buy their artificial joints from companies they know, which generally means buying American. … Profits are so good in the orthopedics industry that there isn't much pressure on suppliers to shave costs by going to low-cost countries. … To be sure, the industry's dynamics may be starting to change. Health-care providers are starting to push back against the industry's steady price increases, raising concerns among investors about whether profits for Warsaw companies and others can keep up the brisk growth. … There are other shadows over Warsaw's future. The U.S. Justice Department has opened two probes of orthopedics makers in the past two years, including an antitrust investigation in which Smith & Nephew PLC, of the U.K., has confirmed that one of its independent sales representatives tried to initiate an industry-pricing strategy in response to a U.S. hospital's bid request. Other producers, including those in Warsaw, have said they didn't respond to the suggestion."

DOJ_NMG_0086384

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Required Voter Lists Often Contain Errors. The AP (10/25, Hastings) reports, "Between every registered voter and the voting booth is The List. And if you're not on it, you might not be able to cast a ballot." The AP continues, "One of the biggest changes wrought by the Help America Vote Act is the mandate that every state must have a voter registration database up and working by the Nov. 7 general election. But a dozen states missed the Jan. 1 deadline for finishing their databases, which produce lists of registered voters for every precinct. And four states have been sued by the Justice Department. … That leaves a confusing array of systems that may or may not work come Election Day, voting rights groups say. And it creates a growing anxiety that registered voters with every right to cast a ballot will be turned away because their names are not on the list for a variety of reasons, including something as innocuous as a typo." The AP adds, "The regulation was designed to assure that each state would have a central, independent repository for all registered voters - created by cross-checking voter registrations with existing state records to make sure dead people, incarcerated felons and others not eligible to cast a ballot were removed from the rolls. It was also supposed to make it easier to vote by having a single list instead of scores of county-based rolls. … Using driver license data and Social Security numbers, state officials were supposed to match that data to voter registration cards. It didn't take long for unforeseen problems to pop up. Someone may use a middle initial on his/her voter registration card, but not on his/her driver license. Married women may change their names, but not on every form of identification. Data entry errors can, and often do, occur. … In September 2004, New York City decided to do a trial run. The board of elections sent 15,000 registration records to the Department of Motor Vehicles to match license numbers on the voter cards to those in the DMV. The results? Nearly 20 percent couldn't be matched because of typos made by city employees. … Earlier this year, the Department of Justice sued New York, Alabama, New Jersey and Maine for failing to implement statewide lists. The states have reached agreements with the Justice Department, most in the form of interim databases."

Georgia Election Board Roiled By Voter ID Letter Dispute. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (10/26, Suggs) reports, "Key leaders of two of Georgia's strongest black organizations are calling for the resignations of three members of the State Election Board for mailing letters to voters that suggested photo ID would be required to cast a ballot Nov. 7." The AJC continues, "At a news conference on the steps of the state Capitol, officials from the Georgia State Conference of the NAACP and the Coalition for the People's Agenda urged Republican-appointed members Tex McIver, Randy Evans and Jeff Israel to resign from the election board for their part in sending out about 300,000 letters that they say were designed to suppress minority turnout on election day." The AJC adds, "David Worley, a Democratic appointment to the five-member board, and Secretary of State Cathy Cox, who is also a Democrat and serves as the board's chair, were not asked to resign. … 'We believe this was a deliberate attempt to confuse the voters. A deliberate attempt to further disenfranchise voters,' said NAACP President Edward O. DuBose. 'The damage has already been done and we are asking those board members to resign.' … McIver, vice chairman of the board who headed up the letter campaign, said he intends to stay in office until his term expires in 2008." The AJC notes, "The election board, under threat of a civil suit filed by former Gov. Roy Barnes, voted this month to mail a second letter clarifying that photo ID is not required to vote in Georgia. … For many, that is not enough. Rep. John Lewis (D-Atlanta) has asked U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales for a federal investigation into the mailings, and the Rev. Jesse Jackson is pushing the issue at a conference he is conducting this week in Atlanta."

DOJ_NMG_0086385

Manassas, VA, May Face Second Suit Over Permit Bias. The Washington Post (10/26, PW01, Miroff) reports, "The Manassas City Council's decision this week to reject the home business permit application of a part-time massage therapist has raised the possibility the city could face another lawsuit alleging discrimination." The Post continues, "West Street homeowner Howard Daniel, who is gay, says that a climate of homophobia pervaded the council's consideration of his application. The 4 to 3 vote Monday to deny his application has prompted him to consider legal action against the city, he said. … 'There's little doubt that we're going to pursue this,' said Daniel, who attended the meeting accompanied by a lawyer. 'It's not over.'" The Post adds, "The threat of civil litigation hangs heavily over Manassas with the city already under investigation by the Justice Department for allegedly discriminating against Hispanic residents in violation of the Fair Housing Act. Some council members said they were frustrated that the decision on Daniel's application was being construed as discriminatory, saying that the matter was strictly a zoning issue."

New Jersey Court Rules Gay Couples Have Same Rights As Heterosexual Couples. ABC World News (10/25, lead story, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "It is one of the most controversial questions of our age. Should same-sex couples be allowed to marry? Today, New Jersey's Supreme Court stepped right into that debate, ruling that 'same-sex couples must be afforded the same rights and benefits enjoyed by married opposite-sex couples.' But the state's court stopped short of actually approving gay marriage." ABC (Tapper) added, "The New Jersey Supreme Court ruled today that Sarah and Suyin Lael, and other same-sex couples in New Jersey, are entitled to the same rights and benefits as heterosexual couples." The court "gave the state legislature six months to either amend the statutes to include same-sex couples or create a parallel arrangement that gives same-sex couples the rights and benefits as married, straight couples. The court stopped short of requiring that it be called it marriage, but gay rights groups celebrated the ruling."

The CBS Evening News (10/25, story 7, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) mentioned the ruling briefly, saying "New Jersey's highest court today stopped short of legalizing gay marriage, but it did say that committed same- sex couples must be given the same rights and privileges as heterosexual married couples." NBC Nightly News (10/25, story 7, 0:25, Williams, 9.87M) ran a similar story, reporting the court "ruled that same sex couples in the state must be given all of the same legal protections and now it is up to the state legislature to make that happen."

Much of the coverage last night and this morning deals with the potential political repercussions of the ruling. A number of reports suggest the issue could possibly help Republicans in some close races. The AP (10/26, Crary) reports Bill Donohue, president of the Catholic League, "called the ruling 'a plus' on the premise it would stir up resentment of 'arrogant judges' and boost conservative election prospects. … To conservative activists, the logic is that right-of-center voters who may have felt alienated by events such as the House page scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley will now be motivated to go to the polls. And those voters will be more inclined to pull the lever for Republican candidates in key races such as that of GOP Sen. George Allen in Virginia."

On ABC World News (10/25, story 2, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M) George Stephanopoulos analyzed the decision's impact on key Senate races. In New Jersey, he said, "the candidates had similar positions on gay marriage, except now, the Republican candidate is coming out for a constitutional amendment banning it. And he is hoping this motivates social conservatives for him. In Tennessee, both candidates the Democrat and the Republican, have the same position on gay marriage. They're for a constitutional amendment banning it. The biggest impact could be in the state of Virginia. This could be the first break that George Allen has had in a long time. He's for the ban on gay marriage in Virginia. His opponent, James Webb, is against it. Social conservatives could be mobilized down there." ABC (Gibson) added, "It puts the issue front and center in a lot of states if not in the entire country."

DOJ_NMG_0086386

The Wall Street Journal (10/26, A3, Bravin, Cummings, 2.03M) reports Sen. Robert Menendez, a Democrat, "is seen as his party's most vulnerable incumbent. In a statement, Mr. Menendez backed the court decision." Republicans "hope yesterday's decision will draw attention to ballot initiatives in eight states -- Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin -- that would ban same-sex marriage."

On CNN's The Situation Room (10/25), analyst Jeff Greenfield said the issue of gay marriage "is on the ballot in eight states, including Virginia and Tennessee where there are two very close Senate races that could decide whether Democrats take the Senate. And we should note that while Americans over the years have become more accepting of gay rights, the issue of marriage still elicits opposition."

Under the headline "Ruling On Gays May Echo At Polls," USA Today (10/26, Jones, Stone, 2.27M) reports "conservative activist Gary Bauer, head of the group American Values, said the ruling could swell the turnout of conservative Republicans in general." But Sherry Bebitch Jeffe, "a political scientist at the University of Southern California, said the ruling 'will remind people in those eight states that the question is alive' but doubted it will energize conservative voters elsewhere."

Most stories say the ruling was greeted with enthusiasm by gay activists. The AP (10/26, Mulvihill) reports the court "opened the door Wednesday to making the state the second in the nation to allow gay marriage," adding "gay rights activists had seen New Jersey as a promising place because it is a largely Democratic state in the Northeast." The New York Times (10/26, Liptak, 1.21M) reports Susan L. Sommer, a lawyer with the Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund, which represents the couples involved in the case, said of the ruling, "It's a win. … We would have liked marriage tomorrow, but this is great progress." The New York Times (10/26, Kocieniewski, 1.21M) also runs a story titled "Gay Marriage Backers Plan Big Push To Sway Trenton Lawmakers," on the expected process in New Jersey.

However, as the New York Times (10/26, Chen, 1.21M) reports, the New Jersey court "did not go as far as Massachusetts, which in 2003 became the first state to permit gay marriage. Instead, it could be considered the new Vermont, which created civil unions for gay couples in 2000, in the politically, legally and culturally charged world of same-sex marriage." The New York Times (10/26, Kocieniewski, 1.21M) also runs a story titled "Gay Marriage Backers Plan Big Push To Sway Trenton Lawmakers," on the expected process in New Jersey. McClatchy (10/26) reports "cases similar to New Jersey's are pending in California, Connecticut, Iowa and Maryland." The Los Angeles Times (10/26, Barry, 918K) runs a similar story under the headline "NJ Court Grants Rights, Not Marriage, To Gays." The Washington Times (10/26, Wetzstein, 88K) carries a similar report.

The New York Times (10/26, Mansnerus, 1.21M), in a story on the New Jersey Court, says "it is not always easy to identify partisan fault lines in New Jersey. In the New Jersey Supreme Court, it is all but impossible, and nothing reflects that more clearly than Wednesday's 4-to-3 decision on same-sex marriage." Three justices "appointed by a Republican governor would recognize the full status of marriage for same-sex couples. And of the three justices appointed by a Democrat -- a gay Democrat, at that -- none would go that far, and they joined in the majority opinion." New Jersey's highest court "has often been described as liberal, and, what is probably more important to the other branches of state government here, assertive."

The New York Times (10/26, Chen, 1.21M) also reports, "That was the reaction of former Gov. James E. McGreevey when asked on Wednesday whether he would marry his partner if the New Jersey Legislature -- in the aftermath of the State Supreme Court decision that same-sex couples are entitled to the same rights as heterosexuals -- decides that gay marriage will be honored. After gathering his thoughts, Mr. McGreevey said that while he had no plans to marry his partner immediately, he did feel that a ceremony would be in his future."

The New Jersey Law Journal (10/26, Booth) reports, "The state's high court, while declaring unconstitutional state laws that deny same-sex couples the financial and social benefits and privileges given to married heterosexuals, held that fixing the problem is a legislative task -- and gave lawmakers 180 days in which to do it. … 'At this point, we do not consider whether committed same-sex couples should be allowed to marry, but only whether those couples are entitled to the same rights and benefits afforded to married heterosexual couples,' a divided court wrote in Lewis v. Harris, A68-05. … 'Cast in that light, the issue is not about the transformation of the traditional definition of marriage, but about the unequal dispensation of benefits and privileges to one of two similarly situated classes of people.'" The Journal notes, "The justices did not require the Legislature to amend the civil marriage statutes to include same-sex couples but only to come up with a statutory scheme that affords same-sex couples the same rights and benefits as those statutes. … The court offered the Legislature the option of either amending the marriage statutes to include same-sex couples or enacting a parallel statutory structure by another name."

DOJ_NMG_0086387

NYTimes, WPost Praise Ruling. Under the headline "A Ruling For Equality In New Jersey," the New York Times (10/26, 1.21M) editorializes, "The New Jersey Supreme Court brought the United States a little closer to the ideal of equality yesterday when it ruled that the state's Constitution requires that committed same-sex couples be accorded the same rights as married heterosexual couples. … The court ruling secures important rights, and paves the way for the full equality that will no doubt come."

The Washington Post (10/26, A24, 748K), in an editorial titled "New Jersey's Step Forward" says "this nuanced decision risks getting lost beneath angry rhetoric about activist judges and protecting marriage. That would be unfortunate. No reasonable reading of this decision could argue for, say, changing Virginia's constitution to ban same-sex marriages that are already illegal there or for adding a noxious amendment to the federal Constitution." It "argues only for letting the residents of New Jersey digest what their court has said and decide how best to make same-sex couples equal under the law."

Civil Liberties Endangered By Expanded DNA Collection, Experts Warn. The Austin American-Statesman (10/26, Relerford) reports, "Dramatic expansions in the collection and retention of DNA by state and local law enforcement officials threatens individual privacy rights and racial justice, a panel of legal experts concluded Wednesday." The A-S continues, "A four-member panel of lawyers and DNA experts, including New York lawyer Barry Scheck and Helen Wallace of Genewatch UK, spoke about the subject as part of a discussion sponsored by the American Civil Liberties Union." The A-S adds, "Experts characterized law enforcement officials' efforts to add samples to DNA databases as a slippery slope regarding privacy rights, and they criticized expansions at the state and local level of what they referred to as permanent, rogue databases not tied into the FBI's national DNA index. … 'You've got to be smart about crime, smart about using these databases and smart about protecting civil liberties,' Scheck said." The A-S notes, "Panel members, including the ACLU's science advisor, Tania Simoncelli, said expansion efforts are eroding the performance of crime labs, which already face months or years of backlogged evidence. … Scheck also pointed to a scandal surrounding the Houston Police Department's crime lab as proof that DNA evidence is not impenetrable. … This summer, independent investigator Michael Bromwich concluded that crime lab officials in Houston failed to report the results of DNA tests that did not corroborate suspects identified by police in more than 20 cases beginning in the 1980s. … Bromwich, a former U.S. Justice Department official, was selected to investigate the crime lab in 2005. Houston's lab was closed for more than three years after errors were exposed in the lab divisions that test firearms, body fluids and controlled substances."

Close Vote Expected On South Dakota Abortion Referendum. USA Today (10/26, Keen, 2.27M) reports on the South Dakota "referendum on the Nov. 7 ballot that will decide whether the USA's toughest abortion restrictions will become law or be repealed. … If voters uphold the law, which also would make it a felony for doctors to perform abortions unless the woman's life is in jeopardy, Planned Parenthood plans a lawsuit asserting the ban is unconstitutional. Supporters of the ban would use the case to challenge Roe v. Wade, the landmark 1973 Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion nationwide." Republican Gov. Mike Rounds "signed the law in March. Opponents gathered signatures to put the issue on the ballot. The latest statewide poll in July showed 47% of voters opposed the ban and 39% supported it; 14% were undecided. Both sides expect a close vote."

New Voting Equipment Could Cause Election Day Problems. The Wall Street Journal (10/26, Kronholz, 2.03M) reports the Help America Vote Act "gave the states $3.8 billion to replace punch-card and mechanical-lever voting machines, and to set up statewide voter lists to resolve election-day questions over who could vote and where." States and counties "bought a variety of new voting systems with the federal money, including optical scanners that read paper ballots and, in at least 34 states, touch-screen machines." With the elections looming, "voting-equipment makers and many election clerks say the new technology will eliminate lost or spoiled ballots and buoy voter confidence." But groups "that track voting laws and practices are warning of problems that could cost or lose votes. A Princeton University study has ignited additional worries that a hacker could alter results on the touch screens, although voting-machine makers -- led by Diebold Inc., the largest of a half-dozen manufacturers -- reject the possibility." The Journal also outlines several potential equipment problems that could arise on election day.

DOJ_NMG_0086388

Maryland Voting Machines Had Defective Component. The Washington Post (10/26, B5, Barr, 748K) reports the maker "of Maryland's electronic voting system replaced a flawed electronic component in several thousand touch-screen voting machines in 2005, state election officials acknowledged this week." To "eliminate unpredictable 'screen freezes' that have occurred since the machines were first used in Maryland in 2002, Diebold Election Systems installed new system boards in about 4,700 voting machines from four Maryland counties: Allegany, Dorchester, Montgomery and Prince George's."

Target Sued By Advocacy Group For Blind Over Web Site. USA Today (10/26, Parker) reports, "Bruce Sexton is blind. He would like to shop on Target's website, but says he can't 'read' it. He says the site lacks certain coding — found on many other websites — that would activate software to allow blind computer users to hear audio descriptions of what is on Internet pages." USA continues, "Sexton, 24, who lives in Berkeley, Calif., and the National Federation of the Blind are suing Target on behalf of the 1.3 million blind people in the USA. The suit alleges that the giant retailer discriminates against the visually impaired by violating state and federal laws that protect the disabled." USA adds, "The case draws national attention because it could have implications for virtually every retailer and business in the USA that operates a website. The case also fuels a wider debate starting to play out in courtrooms: whether anti-discrimination laws apply to the Internet. … It's a key question in lawsuits across the nation. Craigslist.org, a popular advertising and networking website, is being sued in federal court in Chicago over allegations it has allowed ads for apartments and other housing that discriminate on the basis of race, sex, class, religion or familial status."

NAACP Chairman, Judge Brown To Attend White House Fellowship Program Meeting. The Washington Times (10/26, McCaslin, 88K) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column, "Inside the Beltway has learned that NAACP Chairman Julian Bond, who has repeatedly denounced the Republican Party and conservative black leaders alike, will come face-to-face this evening with US Court of Appeals Judge Janice Rogers Brown. Judge Brown was nominated to her position by President Bush and is frequently mentioned as a possible Supreme Court nominee." The two are "among three prominent black leaders being saluted at a reception for the White House Fellowships program, hosted by conservative commentator Armstrong Williams in his Northeast Washington home. Renowned neurosurgeon Dr. Benjamin Carson of Johns Hopkins Hospital fame is the third honoree."

ANTITRUST:

FCC Seen Likely To Avoid Net Neutrality Debate In AT&T-BellSouth Ruling. The San Antonio Express-News (10/26, Nowlin) reports, "As the Federal Communications Commission mulls conditions on AT&T Inc.'s $83 billion merger with BellSouth Corp., the commission faces pressure to turn the process into a fight over network neutrality, the concept that Internet service providers like AT&T should treat all traffic the same. .. It's pressure, experts add, that the FCC is likely to resist." The Express-News continues, "Net neutrality proponents — consumer groups and Internet companies like Google, among them — worry San Antonio-based AT&T wants to create a two-tiered Internet where it picks which sites thrive and which flounder. … And some now view the debate over deal conditions as their golden opportunity to make AT&T sign off on net neutrality protections before it closes the largest telecom deal in history. … '(AT&T) wants this merger to happen before the end of the year,' said Gigi Sohn, president of Public Knowledge, which filed comments Tuesday asking the FCC to make AT&T treat all Internet content equally. 'I think that's the biggest card we hold.'" TheExpress-News notes, "The FCC originally was set to rule on the merger Oct. 12, but pushed back its vote to Nov. 3 after commissioners reached an impasse over what conditions, if any, to impose on the deal. Republican FCC Chairman Kevin Martin proposed approving the merger without conditions, but the two Democrats commissioners said they wanted to see consumer-friendly safeguards. … In response, AT&T offered a set of conditions to which it would agree, including making speedy Web access available for $10 a month if bundled with phone service and not increasing rates competitors pay to access its networks. … Competitors and consumer groups had until Tuesday to file remarks about the AT&T proposals. … Analysts said they would be surprised if the FCC deviates too far from the conditions AT&T has already offered up — especially into territory as controversial as net neutrality. So far, the Justice Department and 18 states have approved the transaction, making the FCC its last regulatory hurdle to clear."

DOJ_NMG_0086389

Constellation, FPL Abandon Merger Plans. The Baltimore Sun (10/26, Adams) reports, "Constellation Energy Group Inc. and Florida's FPL Group Inc. officially gave up on their merger plans Wednesday after executives concluded the deal was hopelessly mired in a populist political debate in Maryland over deregulation and rising electricity rates." The Sun continues, "The move means control over Constellation and its BGE utility will remain in local hands, rather than shifting to Florida. But it weakens the hand of lawmakers and regulators, who were expecting to use the merger's approval as leverage to extract more concessions to offset a 72 percent BGE rate increase." The Sun adds, "Constellation asked to pull out of the $12.4 billion deal and FPL agreed, ending weeks of speculation that the end was near. The companies had suspended integration activities in May, and two weeks ago FPL Chief Executive Lewis Hay III made it clear in a conversation with analysts that his patience was wearing thin. … Hay had said he would assess the deal's prospects after the governor's election, but the two companies concluded that the outcome probably would not have made any difference in regulatory treatment of the deal." The Sun notes, "The merger would have created a Fortune 100 company with an estimated $28 billion in annual revenue and operations stretching from Maine to California. It would have been the largest seller of wholesale power to large industrial users, municipalities and utilities in markets where competition is allowed. … But the utilities agreed to their deal just months before electricity rate caps were about to come off at BGE as part of the transition to a deregulated market. Citing soaring energy costs, BGE announced a 72 percent rate increase, which was approved by the PSC without hearings. Outraged legislators later passed a law temporarily lowering the increase and firing the PSC, which had authority to rule on the merger."

The Wall Street Journal (10/26, A12, Dowell, Buurma) reports, "The merger, announced in December, faltered after being caught up in partisan battles between Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich and the Democrat-controlled state Legislature. In June, state lawmakers passed a law that disbanded the Ehrlich-appointed Maryland Public Service Commission after the commission approved a 72% rate rise for Constellation's utility subsidiary, Baltimore Gas & Electric. … In September, the Maryland Court of Appeals ruled that the Legislature couldn't fire the commissioners. But the court left intact a provision of the law that prevents the commission from ruling on the FPL-Constellation deal until its members are replaced, leaving regulatory review of the merger uncertain."

The Washington Post (10/26, D1, Mufson) reports, "The proposed takeover, unveiled in December, has been at the center of a political brawl in Maryland, made more intense by a request this year by Constellation's Baltimore Gas and Electric Co. unit for a 72 percent increase in electric rates. Litigation was continuing, and Maryland's Public Service Commission still needed to approve the FPL merger. … 'It's been a long time in coming, and I'm not surprised,' Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) said yesterday. He blamed Democratic legislative leaders for creating uncertainty with a law that temporarily lowered rates and dismissed the state's utility regulators. Maryland's highest court later reinstated the PSC members but let stand a provision of the legislation that prevented those members from ruling on the merger." The Post notes, "The coming elections were unlikely to alter the outlook. Democrats are expected to retain control of the state legislature. And Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, Ehrlich's Democratic challenger, has vowed to fire the PSC members, who he said yesterday had showed an 'utter lack of leadership and professionalism.' … The end of the merger does not mean any relief for Maryland ratepayers, who still face sharply higher energy costs in a deregulated electricity market."

Yankee Candle Agrees To $1.4 Billion Buyout By Equity Firm. The Wall Street Journal (10/26, A14, Covert) reports, "Yankee Candle Co. agreed to be acquired by a private-equity firm for $1.4 billion, plus the assumption of $300 million of debt." The Journal continues, "The South Deerfield, Mass., maker of scented candles and home fragrances said Madison Dearborn Partners LLC will buy it for $34.75 a share, in a deal expected to close in the first quarter. Yankee Candle shares soared $5.01, or 17%, to $33.73 apiece in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading. … The company in July said it had hired Lehman Brothers to help it explore alternatives, including a possible sale. Yesterday, Yankee Candle's chief financial officer, Bruce Besanko, said the auction attracted 'multiple interested parties,' but he declined to be more specific." The Journal adds, "Credit Suisse analyst Paul Lejuez said the deal came sooner than expected and the price was surprisingly high, possibly 'an indication that private equity is willing to accept a lower rate of return than one would typically assume.'"

DOJ_NMG_0086390

Administration To Issue Position On Dot-Com IPO Class Action Case. The Wall Street Journal (10/26) says in an editorial, "Milberg Weiss is under federal indictment, but that doesn't mean the class-action specialist isn't still making legal mischief. A case in point is Billing v. Credit Suisse First Boston, in which Milberg has even managed to get part of the Bush Administration on its side. Someone in the White House should be embarrassed about this one." In Billing, Milberg is "suing investment banks on behalf of investors who participated in dot-com era IPOs that later went south." The Justice Department's Antitrust Division "has sided with Milberg, even as the SEC has submitted briefs in defense of the banks." Sometime "in the next few days," the Solicitor Generals' "office will file a brief recommending that the Supremes overturn the appeals court -- meaning, in short, that the SEC will have won the turf war. But the brief is being circulated within the Administration, so things could still change."

Clear Channel Radio Chain Said To Be Up For Sale. The New York Times (10/26, Belson, Sorkin) reports, "The Mays Family, which built Clear Channel Communications into the country's largest network of radio stations through decades of acquisitions, is in negotiations to be taken private by a consortium of investors for more than $18.5 billion, people involved in the talks said yesterday." The Times continues, "The investors, who have been in discussions with Clear Channel for months, include Providence Equity Partners, the Blackstone Group and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company, these people said." The Times adds, "The negotiations come as family- controlled media companies across the nation explore the possibility of selling their companies or taking them private. Cox Communications, the cable company based in Atlanta, went private in 2004. Cablevision, which is controlled by the Dolan family, is in the middle of negotiations to become private. … Clear Channel said yesterday in a statement that it was 'evaluating various strategic alternatives to enhance shareholder value.' The company has hired Goldman, Sachs & Company as its financial adviser. … Other potential suitors have emerged in recent days. They include Cerberus Capital Management, Oak Hill Capital Partners and Thomas H. Lee Partners, people briefed on the negotiations said. Now that the company is seeking alternatives, other suitors, including big media companies, could surface."

Dewey, Orrick Close To Merger. The New York Times (10/26, De La Merced) reports, "Two major law firms — Dewey Ballantine and Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe — came closer to walking down the aisle yesterday." The Times continues, "Top committees of the two firms recommended a deal, the two said yesterday. The combined firm would be called Dewey Orrick, with 1,500 lawyers and offices around the world. Together, they would form the seventh-largest law office in New York, and have revenue around $1 billion, the firms said in a joint statement. … The merger would be the latest in a wave of consolidation among law firms." The Times adds, "A merger 'gives us a stronger geographical reach, complementary practice areas and gives us financial strength to continue to build practice areas,' the chairman of the management and executive committees, Morton A. Pierce, said. … Orrick's chairman, Ralph H. Baxter Jr., said: 'This will create a new and highly unusual, if not unique, value proposition for our clients. Few firms will match the depth we'll have.'" The Times notes, "Some terms of the deal are not yet final, and it is subject to approval by each firm's partners. Mr. Pierce said the firms hoped to obtain approval by mid-December, paving the way for Dewey Orrick by Jan. 1."

Blackstone Group To Expand Private-Equity Fund. The Wall Street Journal (10/26, C1, Singer, Sender) reports, "Accelerating the buyout boom and putting some of the world's biggest public companies in reach, Blackstone Group has decided to increase the size of the world's largest private-equity fund to $20 billion." The Journal continues, "The move by Blackstone, which already had raised a record $15.6 billion for the fund from investors, secures bragging rights for now in an industry that has several other giants looking to create funds of $15 billion or more. … But there is much more than pride at stake: Private-equity firms have been on a tear lately, buying up publicly traded businesses with the intention of making them more profitable -- frequently by aggressively cutting costs -- and then selling them for big gains, either to other companies or to public shareholders via new stock listings. Fifteen out of the top 20 buyouts on record have been announced in the past 18 months, and private-equity firms this year have accounted for 17% of all major mergers and acquisitions." The Journal adds, 'Now, all but the largest public companies are potential acquisition targets, especially given the growing trend of "club deals" involving multiple private-equity firms. Their increased financial firepower -- aided by heavy borrowing at low rates by companies they own -- has giant buyout firms already eyeing takeover targets with stock-market values of $50 billion or more, say people familiar with the matter."

DOJ_NMG_0086391

NYSE To Purchase Rest Of American Stock Exchange Stake. The Wall Street Journal (10/26, C5, Lucchetti) reports, "NYSE Group Inc. plans to buy the one third of its technology unit that it doesn't own for about $40 million from the American Stock Exchange, according to people familiar with the matter." The Journal continues, "NYSE, which operates the New York Stock Exchange, will become full owner of Securities Industry Automation Corp., or SIAC, with the transaction. Amex and NYSE have been negotiating for months to complete a deal. … Both markets see the move as necessary as electronic trading and technology become crucial to gaining business for exchanges now structured as for-profit companies. In that environment, the sharing of technology between two exchange rivals became unpalatable." The Journal adds, "NYSE wanted full control of the subsidiary, which handles the exchanges' communications networks and computer systems among other things. Amex gets cash to build its own technology, which it is hoping to roll out later this year after getting regulatory approval. … The deal will make it easier for NYSE to integrate its communications and market-data operations with those of Archipelago Holdings Inc., the electronic-exchange operator that the Big Board merged with in March. Analysts say cost cutting and layoffs are possible at the unit as NYSE tries to expand profit. A deal could close as soon as next month. … NYSE is also hoping to merge with pan-European exchange operator Euronext NV, and a good chunk of the more than $250 million in cost savings anticipated from that deal will come from reducing the number of technology platforms."

German Antitrust Regulators Nix Coherent's Proposed Excel Buy. The AP (10/26) reports, "Coherent Inc., a Santa Clara, Calif.-based maker of lasers for commercial and scientific uses, said Wednesday German regulators are prohibiting its $376 million acquisition of Excel Technology Inc." The AP continues, "Although the acquisition had passed U.S. antitrust authorities, the German Federal Cartel Office issued a prohibition order on the deal. … 'While we are clearly very disappointed and disagree with the FCO's decision, we remain committed to accomplishing acquisitions that meet all our criteria for growth, diversification and financial performance,' said John Ambroseo, Coherent's president and chief executive, in a statement." The AP adds, "The deal, announced in February, valued Excel, a maker of electro-optical and laser systems used for scientific, industrial and medical purposes, at $30 per share. … The acquisition was expected to close in the June quarter."

Wal-Mart's German Expansion Approved. The AP (10/26) reports, "Metro AG's deal to buy Wal-Mart Stores Inc.'s German operations received approval Wednesday from Germany's antitrust regulator, clearing the way for an acquisition that will expand Metro's presence in its home market." The AP continues, "The Federal Cartel Office approved the deal after deciding the addition of the 85 Wal-Mart stores would not give Metro a dominant position in the market. … The deal calls for Duesseldorf-based Metro to take over 19 pieces of Wal-Mart real estate and lease the remaining locations. Neither company has disclosed the deal's value." The AP adds, "Metro will fold the stores, which had sales of nearly euro2 billion in 2005, into its Real hypermarket brand. The first conversions are set to be finished before Christmas, and the rest should be integrated by mid-2007. … The addition of Wal-Mart's warehouses and logistics systems is expected to strengthen the position of Metro's existing 550 Real stores in the German market. … The deal, announced in July, marked Wal-Mart's second withdrawal from a major foreign market."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

US Tells 9th Circuit Hawaii Stryker Unit Is Vital. The Honolulu Star-Bulletin (10/26, Kakesako) reports, "Government lawyers say that halting Schofield Barracks' $1.5

DOJ_NMG_0086392

billion Stryker unit would do 'irreparable harm' to the Army, soldiers of the 2nd Brigade and the nation's security. … They oppose a motion by island environmentalists and Hawaiian activists who want the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to approve a temporary order halting all work on Stryker-related activities in Hawaii." The Star-Bulletin continues, "U.S. Justice Department attorneys Andrew Mergen and Michael Gray on Monday said 'national security concerns' are more compelling today than they were on Nov. 5, 2004, when a federal court judge rejected environmentalists' first petition for a preliminary injunction. … The Army argued that the 2nd Brigade is scheduled to become a 'fully manned, trained and equipped Stryker Brigade Combat Team, ready for deployment by November 2007.'" The Star-Bulletin adds, "Lt. Gen. John Brown, who heads Army troops in the Pacific, wrote in a letter published Monday in the Honolulu Star-Bulletin that the combat deployment will be to Iraq. This will be the second time the 25th Infantry Division's 2nd Brigade will pull combat duty there. … David Henkin, attorney with Earthjustice, said he expects the 9th Circuit in San Francisco will rule on its request for a temporary injunction by Tuesday. … Henkin said Earthjustice wants to temporarily stop the project so the environmental group and the Army can discuss what activities can proceed."

Russia Threatens Criminal Charges Over Shell Natural Gas Project. The New York Times (10/26, Kramer) reports Yuri Trutnev, Russia's minister of natural resources, "threatened criminal prosecutions against employees of Royal Dutch Shell, ratcheting up pressure" on the Sakhalin-2 project." The Times says, "The remarks suggested a further unraveling of the relationship between Western energy companies and the Russian government, which is intent on gaining control of the energy sector. Shell and two Japanese partners were accused of violating Russian environmental law at their Sakhalin 2 project." The Times notes, "Lower-ranked Russian officials had threatened criminal charges earlier this month. The statement by Mr. Trutnev, however, carried more force and suggested an escalation because he is a member of the cabinet." Trutnev said his ministry's September inspection of Sakhalin-2 "provided enough grounds to revoke a major environmental permit. He had said the permit would very likely be canceled this week. He delayed a decision on that permit, however, by one month for further study."

NYTimes Criticizes Bush Recess Appointment For Mine Safety Agency. The New York Times (10/26, 1.21M) says in an editorial, "Despite being twice rebuffed by the Senate, President Bush has named Richard Stickler, a stolid mining industry careerist, to run the mine safety agency whose serial ineptitude has been laid bare this year by the deaths of 42 mineworkers. Waiting until the Senate left town for the elections, Mr. Bush resorted to a recess appointment to place Mr. Stickler at the heart of enforcing new safety reforms that, in earlier hearings, the appointee himself had claimed were not at all that necessary." But lawmakers "should demand a bulldog enforcement director rather than another industry lapdog."

Apache Police Chief, Tribal Officer Arrested On Embezzlement Charges. The AP (10/26) reports, "The White Mountain Apache tribal police chief and another officer have been charged with manipulating records in a federal investigation after the FBI began looking into the use of departmental funds at casinos. Police Chief Lincoln Perry and Officer Tim Goode pleaded not guilty Wednesday in U.S. District Court, said Wyn Hornbuckle, spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office. They were each arraigned on one count of conspiracy to falsify records and 17 counts of falsifying records." The AP notes, "Federal officials alleged the two men embezzled between $10,000 and $20,000 over a five-year period" from an account "used for undercover purchases and payment to informants. … Hornbuckle said Perry and Goode submitted fake receipts to tribal police in response to FBI agents looking into the bank account."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Maine Civil Liberties Union Releases Peace Group Emails Collected By FBI. WCSH-TV Portland, ME (10/25, Erskine) reports on its Web site from a story broadcast yesterday, "The FBI has apparently been keeping files on the emails of peace activists in Maine." The Maine Civil Liberties Union on Wednesday released "18 pages of emails that the FBI had in its files" and were obtained through a FOIA request. "Those emails were put out by 'Peace Action Maine,' the 'Maine Center for Peace and Justice' and 'Veterans for Peace' as they were organizing for two different protests. Activists say they were shocked that their government was 'spying' on them." WCHS added, "A spokesperson for the FBI, Nenette Day, says the agency does not monitor or investigate peace groups in Maine. Day says the emails were likely forwarded to the FBI, then placed in a file."

DOJ_NMG_0086393

The AP (10/26) reports, "Obtaining the e-mails…is a waste of FBI resources, and it has a chilling effect on people who want to speak out against government policies, said Shenna Bellows, executive director of the MCLU. It also brings to mind the FBI's clandestine surveillance in decades past of Martin Luther King Jr., John Lennon and civil rights organizations, she said." However, the AP notes, Day said that "it is incorrect to suggest that the FBI was spying on the Maine peace groups or intercepting their e-mails electronically," and she "said a federal court order would be required to obtain them electronically. The FBI would request such a court order only if it had evidence that a crime or an act of violence was going to be committed, or that national security was being compromised, she said. 'We do not investigate individuals engaged in their constitutional rights, including the right to free speech and assembly,' Day said."

FBI Arrests Chicago Police Officers In Drug Money Theft Sting. The Chicago Tribune (10/26, Coen, 623K) reports, "Two Chicago police officers believed they were stealing from drug dealers who had stashed money in a Grand Avenue storage locker, but in fact, FBI agents had planted the cash to snare them, federal prosecutors said Wednesday." Richard Doroniuk and Mahmoud Shamah "allegedly stole more than $31,000 from the locker. Doroniuk and Shamah were arrested Wednesday and appeared in federal court before U.S. Magistrate Judge Nan Nolan, who ordered them held pending a detention hearing next week." The Tribune notes that an FBI informant "help set up the officers and tapped telephones to monitor conversations about their plans. Agents were listening when Doroniuk allegedly told Shamah they needed to be careful to hide the cash." The Chicago Sun-Times (10/2, Main) adds, "They also planned to conduct a home invasion on one of the drug dealers whose lockers they targeted, but the ripoff was never carried out, officials said. They intended to buy a diamond necklace or something else valuable for an unidentified person who was going to help them with the robbery, authorities said."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/26, Robinson) reports, "Doroniuk attorney Robert Clarke said the officer 'is going to get his full day in court and that's what he wants,' while Shamah attorney Anthony Pinelli declined to comment because he was still studying the case." The AP notes, "Officials said the officers used information from a third defendant, Larry 'Peanut' Cross…to obtain search warrants for the lockers. According to the complaint, the officers failed to report any of the money seized from a locker in June and only part of the cash taken in a second theft in August. … A criminal complaint unsealed following the arrests charged all three men with conspiracy to steal government funds."

California Jailer Snared By FBI Bribery Sting. The AP (10/26) reports, "A federal grand jury indicted a jail guard Wednesday on charges he accepted $6,000 from an inmate in exchange for smuggling in banned cell phones." Santa Ana City jailer Jose Abel Flores "was being held on $100,000 bond and was scheduled to be arraigned Nov. 6." The AP notes, "Flores accepted two $3,000 bribes in exchange for bringing cellular telephones to a federal inmate being held in jail on narcotics and weapons charges, according to the indictment. The bribes were paid from a purported friend of Flores, but in fact the friend was an undercover FBI agent, authorities said."

Authorities Say Colorado Ring Hid Meth Inside Elmo Doll, Other Toys. There are more than 100 media references to the investigation of a Colorado meth ring in which the accused leader reportedly tried to dominate the meth trade in the northern part of the state. For example, the AP (10/26) reports agents "broke up an aggressive northern Colorado ring that shipped methamphetamine hidden in Elmo dolls and other toys, authorities said Wednesday. The alleged ringleader was among 19 people in custody. Agents said they seized more than 45 pounds of what they described as high-quality methamphetamine worth $864,000 and capable of supplying 4 million doses." According to the AP, officials said alleged ringleader Rigoverto Valle-Sierra "was trying to take over the methamphetamine trade in northern Colorado with an operation that used night-vision goggles and bulletproof vests." In a separate AP (10/25) story, the AP notes Jeffrey D. Sweetin, regional DEA special agent in charge, "said the operation was selling methamphetamine that was about 99 percent pure." News outlets that used a version of the AP story include ABC News, FOX News, the New York Times, Washington Post, Los Angeles Times, Houston Chronicle, Chicago Tribune, Seattle Post Intelligencer, and Coloradoan.

DOJ_NMG_0086394

The Denver Post (10/25) reports agents "raided a number of homes and a business in Greeley Monday and Tuesday, arresting 10 people and confiscating more than 45 pounds of methamphetamine. … Agents from the Drug Enforcement Administration and officers from the Weld County Drug Task Force confiscated $59,000 in cash, four weapons, one of which had been stolen, a bullet-proof vest and a night-vision goggles." Sweetin "said the methamphetamine was made in California and transported to Colorado."

In a separate story, the Denver Post (10/26) writes that smugglers "used various means to hide the meth, including putting it in plastic bags and stuffing it into tires and an Elmo Sesame Street doll. Drugs were transported from Mexico through Los Angeles to Greeley, which served as the hub city, and then to Wyoming, Nebraska and Virginia," according to authorities. Denver DEA agent Dennis Follett said the 21 suspects "represent the upper tier of a drug operation in which hundreds of dealers, including Greeley gang members, distributed the meth to customers that included school-age children."

The Rocky Mountain News (10/26) reports, "Twelve of the 21 people indicted, including one with at least 10 aliases, were in the country illegally. … 'Most meth is seized in ounces. This was a monstrous amount,' said Sweetin. 'This will have an impact for decades in Greeley.'"

The Greeley (CO) Tribune (10/25) reports the investigation, which "began in September 2005, resulted in the seizure of more than 45 pounds of ICE methamphetamine, 1.1 kilos of cocaine and $59,000 in cash. The organization used buses and cars to transport the high-quality meth from California to Colorado. … DEA agents and Weld County Drug Task Force officers arrested 10 people this week, including Rigoverto Valle-Sierra, the alleged leader of the organization."

Local TV Coverage. KCNC-TV, Denver (10/25, 6:00 p.m.) aired, "This morning, agents showed us how this group hid some of the drugs on the road trip from the Mexican border in California to right here in Weld County. … Elmo is not just a child's toy. In the hands of sinister people, it's a concealment device to smuggle methamphetamine. An Elmo doll like this holds meth hidden in the stuffing. … The task force worked with federal DEA agents over the past 13 months, an effort they hope sends a warning to other drug traffickers."

KDVR-TV, Denver (10/25, 9:00 p.m.) aired, "Agents are still looking for two people connected to the case. They say 12 of the 21 indictments are for people in this country illegally."

KUSA-TV, Denver (10/25, 10:00 p.m.) aired, "A drug ring in Colorado used toys to hide meth. The suspects shipped the drugs inside Elmo dolls and other toys; agents seized more than 45 pounds of what they describe as high quality methamphetamine worth 800,000 dollars. ... Investigators are still looking for two more suspects."

DEA Agent Accused Of Tipping Off Friends About Cocaine-Trafficking Investigation. In Memphis, Tennessee, the Commercial Appeal (10/26) reports a DEA agent "was indicted Wednesday on charges that he tipped off former high school classmates that one of them was a target in a large cocaine-trafficking case…in August. Tommie Purifoy II of West Memphis turned himself in to federal authorities in South Florida where he was assigned as a special agent in the Drug Enforcement Administration's Miami field office. … Purifoy…allegedly passed sensitive DEA information along to Christopher Ivy, who called Sean Williams, who called his cousin, Brian Nicholas Williams, an alleged drug trafficker. All attended West Memphis High School together and had been friends since at least 1996."

Also in Memphis, the AP (10/26) reports, "Despite the tip, three days later authorities made the largest drug bust in the area for the year, when they seized more than 88 pounds of cocaine and over $500,000 cash. Brian Williams and 10 others were charged in connection with the drug ring."

WPTY-TV, Memphis (10/26) reports on its Web site that Purifoy "is charged with obstruction of justice and disclosure of electronic surveillance. Federal authorities say Purifoy and two other men were indicted Wednesday for telling a Mid-South drug dealer he was being investigated by the DEA."

WMC-TV, Memphis (10/25) reports on its Web site that according to the indictment, Purifoy "set aside his duties as a special agent for the DEA to warn his friends about a pending drug bust, a wire tap investigation Purifoy learned about while visiting the DEA office in Memphis."

FBI, California Police Arrest 15 In Crackdown On Violent Drug Gang. The San Francisco Chronicle (10/26, Lee, 405K) reports, "About 200 federal and local law-enforcement officers targeting a street gang known for drug activity swooped down on North Richmond"

DOJ_NMG_0086395

Wednesday, "arresting 15 people and seizing nearly a pound of methamphetamine. … Contra Costa County sheriff's deputies, Richmond police and FBI SWAT team members dressed in camouflage jumpsuits served at least a dozen federal search warrants." The Chronicle notes, "Many of the suspects sought today were named in sealed federal indictments on various drug and gang-related charges, said Special Agent Joseph Schadler, FBI spokesman in San Francisco. … 'It's a continual process to make this community safer,' said David Johnson, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI in San Francisco." Bay City News Wires (10/25) reported, "Authorities were targeting people believed to be established gang leaders of the Project Trojans street gang, Schadler said. 'The key to this is we're trying to take the head off the organization,' Schadler said. … Wiretap and undercover operations ended in February and the first raid was conducted in March, Schadler said. At that time nine people were arrested for manufacturing and distributing cocaine, crack and methamphetamine."

US Charges New York Man With "Club Drug" Smuggling. The Rochester (NY) Democrat & Chronicle (10/26, Daneman) reports, "A Pittsford man is one of 10 people indicted on federal drug trafficking charges for allegedly smuggling 'club drugs' into the United States." The D&C continues, "The U.S. Attorney's Office for the Western District of New York announced the charges, which came after an investigation of nearly two years into what the U.S. Justice Department called 'a large scale drug smuggling and trafficking group operating in and around Buffalo and Rochester.'" The D&C adds, "The drug ring allegedly smuggled such club drugs as Ecstasy, GHB, ketamine and crystal methamphetamine from Toronto. … Jeffrey Parasida, 28, of Pittsford was charged with a pair of violations under the federal Controlled Substances Act, as were nine other defendants from the Buffalo region, according to the Justice Department."

Owner Of New York Pharmacy Accused Of Illegally Distributing Painkiller. In White Plains, the Journal News (10/25) reports the owner of a pharmacy "is accused of illegally dispensing tens of thousands of doses of the generic form of the…painkiller Vicodin. Syed Zahid Ali, 58, owner of Post Pharmacy…is due in court next week to face charges he illegally distributed hydrocodone as well as a stimulant used to treat sleep disorders." He "cannot account for 100,000 tablets of the painkiller, federal authorities said. He is also accused of refilling prescriptions for the drug despite the bottles being marked 'no refill.'"

Trial Date Set In Sacramento For Accused "Drug Kingpin." Vacaville, California's Reporter (10/26) writes that a 2007 trial date "has been set in federal court for a Fairfield man described as a regional drug kingpin by the Drug Enforcement Administration. Federal magistrate Lawrence K. Karlton on Tuesday scheduled…Jan. 23 for the trial of…Eduardo Pichardo - also known as Eddie Nunez - in Eastern District Federal Court in Sacramento. … Pichardo was arrested by DEA agents on June 21 on suspicion of distribution and conspiracy to distribute cocaine and methamphetamine. A DEA spokesman said the arrest culminated a seven-year investigation into a drug-trafficking network that stretched from Northern California to Arizona and Alabama."

Big-City Mayors Lead Efforts To Curb Gun Violence. The AP (10/25, D'Alessio) reports from Chicago, "New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg, Chicago Mayor Richard Daley and Milwaukee Mayor Thomas Barrett had harsh words Wednesday for the Bush administration and the gun lobby's influence on Congress. … 'When Washington makes bad decisions to protect criminals rather than the public, we suffer the consequences,' Bloomberg said at a news conference outlining the agenda for Thursday's Midwestern summit of Mayors Against Illegal Guns, a group Bloomberg founded with Boston Mayor Thomas Menino." The AP adds, "Bloomberg said he had hoped to have 50 of the nation's mayors on board by the end of this year, but 109 mayors from 44 states already have joined. … 'These cities represent more than 44 million Americans,' the New York Republican said." The AP notes, "Daley, Bloomberg and Barrett, accompanied by counterparts from a number of smaller cities, complained that inaction by the federal executive branch and the influence of the gun lobby, particularly the National Rifle Association, on Congress have left local officials to combat the problem of illegal weapons. … 'Mayors know that illegal guns have nothing to do with the Second Amendment and everything to do with law enforcement,' Bloomberg said. 'But cities can lead where Congress won't.' … He added that the goal of the mayors' group is to 'hold Congress' feet to the fire.' … White House spokesman Tony Fratto said violent crime has been reduced significantly in recent years, especially in many large cities. … 'A lot of the credit for that goes to mayors and law enforcement personnel and cooperation at the local, state and federal levels,' Fratto said in an e-mailed statement. 'Enforcing gun laws that are on the books is an essential facet of our efforts. The president and Attorney General (Alberto) Gonzales are committed to making sure that existing laws are enforced.'" The AP notes, "Bloomberg said the Federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives keeps its own records of multiple firearms purchases and attempted purchases but denies that information to local authorities."

DOJ_NMG_0086396

Texas Gun Dealer Pleads Guilty To Illegal Firearm Sales. The Longview (TX) News-Journal (10/26) reports, "A gun dealer in Gladewater faces up to five years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000 after pleading guilty to falsifying records needed to purchase a firearm, said U.S. Attorney Matthew D. Orwin in a Wednesday media release." The News-Journal continues, "According to court records, Michael Zirkle, 41, agreed to allow an ATF confidential informant to use someone else's identity on the forms necessary to purchase a .40-caliber pistol. … Zirkle has surrendered his gun dealer's license and forfeited 47 firearms, valued at approximately $19,000, as part of the plea agreement. As a convicted felon he is not permitted to possess a firearm again."

The Tyler (TX) Morning Telegraph (10/26, Knaupp) reports, "On Jan. 6 in Gregg County, a confidential informant for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives entered the 'Ace of Pawn' pawn shop in Gladewater, owned by Zirkle. He told the defendant he wanted to buy a .40-caliber pistol for himself, but he wanted to use the identity and personal information of another person when filling out the required ATF form. Zirkle agreed, according to court documents. … U.S. Magistrate Judge John Love allowed Zirkle to continue to remain out of jail on bond pending his sentencing hearing after there were no objections from Assistant U.S. Attorney Jim Noble." The Telegraph adds, "Zirkle surrendered his firearm license and forfeited 47 guns - 31 rifles, six pistols, eight shotguns, a revolver and a machine gun rifle - he possessed as a firearms dealer, defense attorney F.R. 'Buck' Files Jr. said during the hearing. … In the plea agreement, Zirkle agreed that the 47 weapons were used to perpetrate the violations stated in the indictment, which includes selling firearms to felons."

Old West Town Still Plagued By Guns, Now Carried By Gangs. The AP (10/25, Fisher) reports from Dodge City, KS, "Dodge City has a rich history as an Old West frontier town, where cowboys and gunslingers could take a break from the trail and get their fill of saloons and brothels. … Today, the tidy town built on meatpacking and rodeos is again plagued by gunfighters. But this time they're in street gangs, some of which have second-generation members as young as 11. The drug of choice is methamphetamine and the weapons range from automatic rifles to baseball bats." The AP continues, "Street gangs, often thought of as a big-city problem, have been turning up in rural areas across the country since the 1980s, frightening residents and straining smaller law enforcement departments. Rural gangs are often more transitory than their urban counterparts, but they appear to have a foothold in several communities. … About 24,000 gangs operate around the country, according to the U.S. Department of Justice, which estimates there are about 760,000 members in 2,900 communities." The AP adds, "The 2004 Youth Gang Survey conducted by the Justice Department, 82 percent of large cities surveyed, 42 percent of suburban counties, 27 percent of smaller cities and 14 percent of rural counties reported active youth gangs. … In Ottumwa, Iowa, Chief of Police Jim Clark says gangs are starting to show up in his town of about 25,000. Five years ago, Ottumwa had an occasional visit from a gang member from Los Angeles or Chicago. Now, Clark estimates there about 100 gang members in town. Some moved to Ottumwa with their families. Others have been sent to live with relatives to escape gangs in bigger cities, Clark said."

Fugitive Killed In Georgia While Pointing Shoe At Agents. In Lithonia, the AP (10/25) reports federal agents "fatally shot a fugitive early Wednesday after the man refused to put down what they thought was a gun but turned out to be a shoe. Agents went to an apartment complex in suburban Atlanta to arrest 24-year-old Youwiers Vilpie, said U.S. Marshal Richard Mecum. They were serving a warrant from the Drug Enforcement Administration office in south Florida. Vilpie also was wanted for questioning in two homicides in Ft. Myers, Fla., Mecum said." The Washington Post and Miami Herald used the AP story.

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (10/25) reports a similar story.

DOJ_NMG_0086397

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration Officials Arrest California Man Linked To Murder Of Salvadoran Priests. The Los Angeles Times (10/26, Becerra) reports, "Gonzalo Guevara Cerritos was a decorated, American-trained officer in the Salvadoran army. … But for the last year, the 43-year-old toiled away as a janitor at a West L.A.-area motel, a man with a secret who was always looking over his shoulder, his common law wife said." The Times continues, "His clandestine existence came to an end Wednesday, when federal authorities announced his arrest -- branding him a human-rights violator who was in the U.S. illegally. … The Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency said Guevara Cerritos was among nine Salvadoran officers and soldiers implicated in one of the most notorious massacres in El Salvador's history: the 1989 death-squad murders of six Jesuit priests." The Times adds, "Guevara Cerritos was convicted in El Salvador for his role in the slayings. In 1993, he was granted a pardon as part of a general amnesty that occurred after the country's 12-year civil war. … His wife, Eusebia Mejia, 45, said her husband could never escape the shadow of the massacre and fled to the United States in hopes of getting a new start. … But when he arrived in Los Angeles -- home to more than 250,000 Salvadorans -- he quickly realized he would not find peace. Fearing that someone would recognize him on the streets of Los Angeles, he kept his head down and rarely went out. … But the strategy apparently didn't work: Federal authorities said it was a tip from the public that put them on Guevara Cerritos' trail. … He was taken into custody last Thursday as part of an effort by U.S. immigration agents to catch and deport human-rights violators."

Arizona Seen As Microcosm For Nation On Immigration Debate. The Christian Science Monitor (10/26, Chaddock, 58K) reports that while "much of America hit the pause button this fall on the flaming debate over illegal immigration, once it became clear Congress would not act before the election. But not Arizona." In a "state where the wave of border crossers is so great that it washes over every aspect of life, illegal immigration is a flash point in virtually every political race this fall. Moreover, there's a candidate for every view - from those saying 'send 'em back and bar the door' to those who'd provide a path for citizenship for some undocumented workers." Republican Randy Graf, who takes a "tough stance" on immigration, is "in an uphill battle to hold the Eighth Congressional District for the Republicans." Outgoing Rep. Jim Kolbe "holds a more moderate view of immigration reform, as does Graf's Democratic challenger, Gabrielle Giffords. But Graf is banking that a majority of voters in this district feel as he does - and there are signs that Arizonans are, indeed, worked up over illegal immigration." But the state's "all-Republican congressional delegation - some of whom are in unexpectedly close contests for reelection - is deeply divided on the immigration issue. Sharing Representative Kolbe's view are Rep. Jeff Flake, in the upscale Phoenix suburb of Mesa, and the very popular Sen. John McCain." On the other side "are Graf and Rep. J.D. Hayworth, who represents the also-upscale Fifth Congressional District in Scottsdale. They say their colleagues' plan amounts to amnesty for illegal immigrants and would reward people for breaking the law." Farrell Quinlan, a spokesman for the Arizona Chamber of Commerce in Phoenix, said, "Arizona is a microcosm of the nation when it comes to views on this issue. We're ground zero for the debate. Our economy is growing, and a lot of industries have grown to rely on that source of labor."

TAX:

Charitable Giving By Wealthy Said To Be Immune To Tax Changes. The Wall Street Journal (10/26, D3, Beatty) reports, "Many wealthy people would still give a lot to charity even if Congress wiped out popular breaks for donating, a study suggests. While these high-net-worth Americans already contribute two-thirds of household charitable giving, donating $126 billion last year alone, they would give more if nonprofits could rein in administrative costs and better demonstrate the impact of donations." The Journal continues, "The researchers at the Center on Philanthropy at Indiana University, underwritten by Bank of America Corp., distributed 30,000 surveys between June and September in neighborhoods where the average household had liquid assets of $3 million or more. Responses from 945 were used in the analysis. The survey, designed as a nationally representative random sample, defined high-net-worth households as those with incomes of greater than $200,000 or assets over $1 million. Such homes represent 3.1% of U.S. households, the researchers said." The Journal adds, '"The results are at odds with several stereotypes about how and why rich people give to charity. Patrick Rooney, director of research at the center, said previous research has shown that giving declines generally when the value of tax deductions on the donation declines. But 52% of responding households said their giving would stay the same if they received no income-tax deductions for it. And 38% said such giving would somewhat decrease, but only 7% said it would dramatically decrease."

DOJ_NMG_0086398

IRS Help Line May Not Be Much Help, Audit Finds. USA Today (10/26, McCoy) reports, "Got a complex tax problem? Phoning an IRS Taxpayer Assistance Center for an appointment won't necessarily produce a solution, a federal audit shows." USA continues, "The Treasury Department inspector general overseeing the IRS called 50 assistance centers — 36 with tax account problems and 14 with tax law questions. Auditors reported that eight phone messages weren't returned, and five weren't returned within two business days as IRS guidelines require. … Moreover, auditors managed to schedule appointments for just five of the 36 calls that involved tax account problems, the type of complex tax issues that often require a face-to-face session to resolve." USA adds, "That performance, outlined in an audit released late last week, undermined the centers' mission, the auditors concluded. They stressed that the 'convenience of scheduling appointments could encourage taxpayers to try to resolve tax account problems earlier, thus reducing taxpayer burden.' … The IRS maintains 400 Taxpayer Assistance Centers nationwide. It encourages taxpayers to request face-to-face appointments for tax account issues that are difficult to resolve over the telephone. … Designated taxpayer phone lines in the offices logged about 500,000 calls during the 2006 federal tax season, from January through mid-April, the audit reported."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Portman Says A Democratic Congress Would Boost Spending, Raise Taxes. The Financial Times (10/26, Guha) reports, "A Democrat victory in next month's midterm elections would jeopardise efforts to contain government spending, put upward pressure on taxes and undermine -America's ability to negotiate free trade agreements, Rob Portman, the White House budget director, claimed on Wednesday." In an interview with the Financial Times, Portman "said voters had an economic choice to make at the polls on November 7. 'There is a clear distinction between Republicans and Democrats, both on the revenue side and on the spending side.' Portman told the Financial Times that "if the Democrats took control of Congress, there would be more pressure for higher spending on non-defence discretionary expenditure." He "warned voters against assuming that President George W. Bush could veto all extra spending proposals. 'Yes, the president has veto power, and could use it more frequently. But we also need to get these bills done. It is always a matter of negotiation,' he said." Portman also "suggested that Mr Bush might not veto an increase in the minimum wage proposed by a Democrat Congress, provided it was part of a 'package' that included relief for small businesses." On taxes, Portman said of Democrats, "They are not going to make the tax cuts permanent." He also "claimed a Democrat-run Congress would seek to raise taxes in other areas to offset reform of the Alternative Minimum Tax."

OMB Set To Roll "Smart Card" IDs For Federal Employees. Under the headline, "Entering The Era Of Smart Card ID," the Washington Post's (10/26, D1, Barr) "Federal Diary" section reports, "The government begins issuing a new identification card tomorrow, the kickoff of a multiyear effort to provide all government workers and many contractors with a 'smart card' that can be used to verify their identity when they enter a building or log onto computer networks." The chip can show "a person's name and agency," and "contain personal data, such as images from two fingerprints, a special identification number and digital certificates that permit access to places and systems." The Post adds that the "goal is to have government employees carry one ID card, replacing the multiple cards many employees must use to get into offices or obtain sensitive information." The Post adds, "Groups concerned about privacy rights" are watching the "card project, in part because it may provide lessons for ongoing debates on whether Americans should carry a national identification card." OMB officials "hope to see the cards roll out tomorrow in cities with large numbers of federal employees, such as Washington, Atlanta, Denver, Seattle and New York."

OTHER NEWS:

Fed Leaves Interest Rates Unchanged. ABC World News (10/25, story 8, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In economic news tonight, interest rates are staying put for now, for the third meeting in a row. The Federal Reserve voted to keep the key Fed funds rate at 5.25%."

DOJ_NMG_0086399

NBC Nightly News(10/25, story 9, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported the Fed statement "said the economy has slowed but the growth will probably pick up in the coming months." USA Today (10/26, Kirchhoff, 2.27M), meanwhile, notes "the central bank cautioned that inflation remains a threat given the tight job market, even after the recent fall in energy prices." Fed Chairman Ben "Bernanke and other officials have said they expect inflation to gradually moderate as growth slows. However, they repeated their warning that incoming data will determine whether they need to raise rates again."

The Wall Street Journal (10/26, Ip, 2.03M) reports, "Since Ben Bernanke became Fed chairman in February, he has faced, first, the threat of rising inflation and then a housing-led economic slowdown. The latest data, and the statement released by the Fed after its meeting yesterday, suggest that the central bank sees the risks on both sides diminishing. That makes it less likely that rates will change in either direction in coming months." The Journal adds, "For the third straight meeting, Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond President Jeffrey Lacker cast the lone dissent among the 11 voting members of the Federal Open Market Committee. He argued in favor of a quarter-percentage point rate increase in the target federal-funds rate, charged on overnight loans between banks."

The New York Times (10/26, Leonhardt, 1.21M) notes "the statement accompanying the Fed's decision on interest rates was nearly identical the one that the Fed released after its policy meeting last month. Since then, the economy has continued to slow, but at a stable pace, giving Fed officials reason to hope that they have achieved a soft landing, in which interest-rate hikes bring down inflation without causing a recession." But "a sharp drop in oil prices — with gasoline falling this week to $2.20 a gallon on average, from more than $3 in early August — appears to have reduced the chances that the slowdown could turn into something more severe, economists say. A Labor Department report earlier this month also showed this summer's job market to be healthier than had been earlier believed."

The Washington Post (10/26, D2, Henderson, 748K) reports that while inflation "has fallen as fuel prices have tumbled since mid-August," economists also "look for signs of underlying inflation by studying core measures that exclude volatile food and fuel prices. The core CPI rose 0.2 percent last month and 2.9 percent from September 2005 -- the highest 12-month increase in a decade."

Housing Markets Continues Slide. NBC Nightly News (10/25, story 8, 0:25, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There is news on the economy. The housing market continues to slide. Sales of existing homes last month fell by 1.9%. It is the sixth month in a row that sales have dropped. Home prices fell as well by 2.5%. What is notable here, that is the largest price drop on record."

The Wall Street Journal (10/26, Hagerty, 2.03M) reports, "The latest report is likely to encourage many potential buyers to hold off in the hope of further price declines." USA Today (10/26, Knox, 2.27M) runs a similar report under the headline "Sellers Sing The Blues As Price Drop Sets Record." The Washington Post (10/26, D1, Downey, 748K), in a story titled "A Record Drop In Home Prices," says "prices fell everywhere in the country, with the Northeast and West most affected. Declines were more moderate in the South, which includes the Washington area."

Dow Reaches New High After Modest Gains. NBC Nightly News (10/25, story 10, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today modest gains at the end of the day. The Dow was up almost 7 points [to close at 12,134.68]. NASDAQ was up almost 12 points [to close at 2,256.59] on today's trading." USA Today (10/26, 2.27M) notes the Standard & Poor's 500 "set another 2006 high as it rose 4.84 points to 1382.22 and stretched its gain for the year to 10.7%." The Wall Street Journal (10/26, C1, McKay, 2.03M) says "the stock market rallied on news that the Federal Reserve isn't raising rates but gains were held in check by a jump in crude-oil prices, which typically hurts stocks."

Report Faults Amtrak For Management Of Outside Counsel. The Wall Street Journal (10/26, Koppel, Jones) reports, "Amtrak has been careless in managing law firms that have billed it millions in legal fees, according to a report released Wednesday by federal investigators." The Journal continues, "The report, issued jointly by Amtrak's Office of Inspector General and the U.S. Department of Transportation Inspector General, said that the law department of the passenger railroad, for example, failed consistently to request and manage budgets for legal work. Also, law firms engaged in 'block billing,' in which firms lump tasks under one entry of an invoice rather than showing the costs of each task. The practice is prohibited by Amtrak's billing guidelines, the report says." The Journal adds, "Amtrak, which is federally subsidized, has been struggling to reverse years of losses and has faced Bush administration calls to sharply reduce its long-distance train service. … A letter addressed to Rep. (John) Mica and released Wednesday from the chairman of Amtrak's board, David Laney, said Amtrak reduced annual legal fees by 26%, or $8 million, since 2003, and in the past five years, working with outside law firms, recovered $79 million in cash from legal settlements. 'Still … the report should provide us with valuable guidance as we continue to improve Law Department operations,' the letter said."

DOJ_NMG_0086400

Poll Finds Majority Believe Democrats Will Retake House Majority. USA Today (10/26, Page, 2.27M) reports most Americans "predict Democrats will win control of the House of Representatives in the elections Nov. 7, and they expect big things to follow — some good, some not — if Democrats take over the Senate, too, a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll shows." If Democrats "take over the House and Senate in January, more than 8 in 10 say, Congress would probably set a timetable to withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq, a step favored by nearly two-thirds." An expected move that is "less popular: Nearly two-thirds expect a Democratic Congress would raise federal income taxes. Three-fourths disapprove of that." The survey "of 1,002 adults Friday through Sunday underscores the high expectations and some trepidations around the prospect that Democrats could regain control of Congress for the first time since 1994. A 54% majority, including 1 in 4 Republicans, say a takeover of the House is likely."

GOP House Prospects Seen As Hurt By Scandals, "Developing Wave." In his Roll Call column (10/26), Stuart Rothenberg says, "Two factors have come together to enhance Democratic prospects for a major House sweep — and neither one has much to do with the quality of Democratic recruiting in the two dozen or so top-tier Democratic House opportunities." First, a "handful of Republican House nominees with considerable political baggage have created competitive races for Democrats in places they couldn't have anticipated. And second, even relatively weak second- and third-tier Democratic candidates are in competitive races because of the developing political wave." By "traditional measures, Republicans have a long list of well-qualified, well-prepared Congressional candidates, many of them incumbents. Unfortunately for them, many voters don't seem to care much about credentials this year. They just want to send a message, and they don't care about the messenger as long as he or she has a 'D' behind his or her name." It is "remarkable how similar this group of Democratic candidates is to the GOP class of 1994, when, by my count, 37 freshmen were elected without having held a previous elective office."

Republicans Raise Specter Of "Speaker Pelosi" In Closing Days Of Campaign. The Financial Times (10/26, Yeager) reports that in the "waning days of the campaign, Republicans have stepped up their attention to" House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, "calling her a San Francisco liberal and warning about the wrong-headed policies of a 'Perilous Pelosi Majority.'" They have "hammered away at what they say is her weak stance on security," and Vice President Dick Cheney "told an interviewer that Mrs Pelosi 'is not in sync with the vast majority of the American people,' and represents "that side of the Democratic party that has not been supportive of and does not believe in a really robust, aggressive prosecution of the global war on terror.'"

USA Today (10/26, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) reports if the Democrats flip the House, "liberal Charles Rangel of New York, an outspoken critic of President Bush's sweeping tax cuts, will chair the powerful Ways and Means Committee, overseeing taxes, trade and Social Security." So it's "no surprise that Republicans from Bush on down warn that a Democratic victory would spell higher taxes and slower growth." While the "war in Iraq, congressional page and influence-peddling scandals and parochial concerns have been top issues this campaign season, the election could have big implications for the business agenda — taxes, trade, regulation and spending — which has been set in recent years by a GOP White House and Congress." Republicans, "lagging in some key House and Senate races, are making the case that a Democratic victory would endanger economic gains. Voters don't seem to agree; USA TODAY/Gallup and other surveys show Americans by a wide margin trust Democrats more to manage the economy." USA also examines particulars of the Democratic agenda on issues such as the minimum wage, trade, the budget and taxes, and others.

Bush Jokes About People "Dancing In The Endzone," "Measuring Their Drapes." The Washington Times (10/26, Dinan, 88K) reports that in a press conference yesterday, President Bush weighed in on the midterm elections. He "staked the Republican agenda for the final two years of his administration to tax cuts and Iraq, saying next month's election is a referendum on both, and chided Democrats for 'dancing in the end zone' to celebrate victory prematurely." Said Bush, "The two issues I see in the campaign can be boiled down to who best to protect this country and who best to keep taxes low. That's what the referendum's about." The Times adds, "For a president who in 2003 famously said he doesn't read newspapers, Mr. Bush appears to have closely followed news reports this year and seemed amused at the amount of attention being paid to Democratic leaders who would hold top positions if power changed hands. 'We got some people dancing in the end zone here in Washington, D.C. They got them measuring their drapes,' he said. 'They're going over to the Capitol and saying, well, "My new office looks beautiful. I think I'm going to have this size drape there or this color."'" That "was an apparent reference to House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, who could become the next speaker of the House, and who joked to the Associated Press recently that she could then have any office suite she wanted."

DOJ_NMG_0086401

Wall Street Handicaps Winners, Losers Should Democrats Control Congress. USA Today (10/26, Shell, 2.27M) reports Democrats "aren't big fans of Wal-Mart. Nor are they fond of Halliburton, due to the energy firm's activities in Iraq and ties to Vice President Cheney. Democrats aren't chummy with tobacco companies such as Altria, either." That's why "those companies' stocks might be hurt if Democrats sweep the upcoming midterm elections and seize control of the Senate and House of Representatives from Republicans, say UBS analysts in a report." Wall Street analysts "have been handicapping which stocks and industry sectors will go up and which will go down, depending on the outcome of the vote." But even "the scenario that will result in the biggest change — a Democratic sweep — is unlikely to result in the type of major policy changes that could seriously rattle financial markets, says Thomas Doerflinger, strategist at UBS." Doerflinger adds the reason is that if "Democrats win, they will likely hold slim majorities and will avoid appearing too liberal to improve their chances of winning the presidential election in 2008." The likely "result would be legislative 'gridlock,' which historically has been bullish for stocks, notes Mark Riepe of the Schwab Center for Investment Research."

Republican Advantage On Cultural Issues Examined. In a USA Today op-ed (10/26), Amy Sullivan, a contributing editor for The Washington Monthly magazine, says, "On the surface, solid majorities of Americans agree with Democratic Party values. They want universal health care, support increasing the minimum wage, believe stricter environmental regulations are needed and worth paying for, and think the best way to achieve peace is through diplomacy." But while Democrats "should be beating Republicans at the ballot box…precisely the opposite has happened in the past few national elections." One answer "is that national security is still a major issue, generally favoring Republicans. But more important is the fact that abortion and gay marriage are proxies for deeply held cultural concerns." Most voters "worry about escalating challenges to family stability and the losing battle to instill good values in their children instead of the materialism and coarseness peddled by popular culture. They fear that our society has developed a casualness about life, especially as science has made it easier to manipulate and create beings. Banning gay marriage and outlawing abortion don't directly address those anxieties. But proposals like these at least acknowledge that the concerns exist and are valid. So while Republicans offer the wrong prescriptions, they get the diagnosis right. And they win because most of the time, Democrats won't admit that anything is wrong."

Democrats Hope To Win Upstate New York House Races. The New York Times (10/26, Hernandez, 1.21M) reports, "Once pessimistic about making gains in the Republican bastion of upstate New York, Democrats have now made the region a focal point in their campaign to retake Congress, pouring money and troops into several districts where they believe the Republican incumbents are vulnerable." The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee is "financing hard-hitting advertisements in three districts that criticize the Republicans for ethical lapses, supporting the war in Iraq and advancing President Bush's agenda. It has spent $2 million in races in the state so far." There are "also extensive get-out-the-vote campaigns being organized in at least four Republican-held districts, with Democratic challengers receiving heavy support from national and state party operatives, as well as legions of volunteers and workers from unions, third parties and liberal advocacy groups like MoveOn.org." Former President Bill Clinton "is scheduled to swing through New York on Thursday, when he will headline airport rallies for three Democratic candidates from Albany to Syracuse." Democrats "feel that their best opportunity" is the 24th CD race between Republican state Sen. Raymond A. Meier and Democrat Michael A. Arcuri. In the 26th CD, Democrats are targeting Rep. Thomas Reynolds, "who is trailing his Democratic challenger, Jack Davis, in recent polls after facing questions about whether he responded vigorously enough after learning about e-mail exchanges between" Rep. Mark Foley and a congressional page. In three "other New York races, Democrats say that their chances are less certain, but still believe they are within striking range if there is a powerful Democratic tide on Election Day." John Randy Kuhl Jr. "faces a challenge from Eric Massa in the 29th Congressional District in the Southern Tier region of the state; James T. Walsh who is battling Dan Maffei in the 25th District in the Syracuse region; and John E. Sweeney who is in a race against Kirsten Gillibrand in the 20th District outside Albany."

DOJ_NMG_0086402

Kentucky's 4th CD Race A Test For Democrats' Effort To Nationalize Campaign. In his syndicated column, run in the Washington Post (10/26, A25, 748K), Robert Novak analyzes the 4th CD race in Kentucky between Republican Rep. Geoff Davis and former Democratic Rep. Ken Lucas. Lucas "looked like he would rather be any place other than Kentucky's public television studios Monday night as he debated" Davis. A "moderate conservative, Lucas was not going deep into the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) liberal playbook that is intended to nationalize midterm congressional elections." Lucas showed Monday night that this has not been a happy campaign for him. While Democratic candidates nationwide pillory George W. Bush, Lucas did not mention the president's name and appeared uncomfortable with the DCCC attack litany." Democrats "must win seats such as this one to achieve a substantial working majority in the House. But Republicans have limited the election in Kentucky's 4th Congressional District to a 'choice' between two candidates instead of a 'referendum' on an unpopular Republican president and Congress. That demonstrates that the struggle for Congress is not really a national election but is about 50 hotly contested local ones."

GOP Faces Hostile Political Environment In Ohio. The Washington Times (10/26, Dinan, 88K) reports that in Ohio's 15th CD, Republican Rep. Deborah Pryce "has cruised to victory" the "past six times with at least 60 percent of the vote, in a dead-heat district where President Bush and Sen. John Kerry just about split the vote in 2004." But with "Bush sliding into disastrous levels in the polls and Republicans in Ohio imploding amid corruption charges and unpopular policies, she is struggling against a boilerplate Democratic candidate whose attacks are similar to those being used across the nation by Democratic challengers." Mary Jo Kilroy, "a Franklin County commissioner from the left wing of the Democratic Party," said, "This is a referendum on the policies of this current administration." The Times adds Democrats "expect major victories up and down the Ohio ballot, leading off with Ted Strickland, a Democratic congressman who is on the verge of trouncing Republican Ken Blackwell in the governor's race." Republicans' "problems in Ohio are not primarily the national mood or antipathy toward Mr. Bush, who polls above 40 percent in approval ratings, higher than his national average. Instead, it is local -- a mixture of a faltering economy, state Republicans who pushed through huge tax increases, a school system that few voters seem pleased with, and Bob Taft, the departing Republican governor, who pleaded no contest last year to violating state ethics laws."

GOP Woes Leave DeWine At Risk. NBC Nightly News (10/25, story 6, 3:55, Williams, 9.87M) reported in Ohio, "some here are stunned to see Republican Senator Mike DeWine in trouble. The latest poll has him down by eight to his opponent." DeWine, "conservative to moderate, he voted for the war but not always in lock step with President Bush. He knows he sees the issue heading south, along with the President's approval rating." Democrat Sherrod Brown "is a former Eagle Scout who majored in Russian studies at Yale. He is pro abortion rights and anti-free trade. He doesn't like the way the war on terror is being fought."

On CNN's The Situation Room (10/25), Rep. Sherrod Brown said, "I don't think the Administration's listening to the generals enough. The President's comments and Mike DeWine's comments consistently are 'stay the course, stay the course, stay the course.' And if people want to stay the course in Iraq, they should vote for Mike DeWine, but I don't think they do."

Also on CNN's The Situation Room (10/25), RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman said, "We're spending millions of dollars in the final days of the campaign in Ohio. We're spending it on television ads. We're spending it in turning out the vote. We're spending it in mailing and contacting the voters working with the state party. Look, I think Mike DeWine will get re-elected."

DOJ_NMG_0086403

Trade Issues The Focus Of North Carolina 8th CD Race. The New York Times (10/26, Weisman, 1.21M) reports on the North Carolina 8th CD race between Republican Rep. Robin Hayes and Democrat Larry Kissell, whose "campaign is organized around the threat of foreign competition and Mr. Hayes's tiebreaking vote last year for a trade accord with Central America." Kissell said, "The No. 1 issue voters care about this year is jobs. We have lost 10,000 jobs in the textile industry here in the last several years. Free trade has not been good for this district." The Times adds, "By most accounts, Mr. Kissell has an uphill battle in trying to unseat Mr. Hayes, who has withstood challenges on the trade issue in the past." But Kissell is "one of a dozen Democratic candidates for the House, and a few for the Senate, who are making at least some headway in tapping voter anxiety about trade." If "many pro-trade Republicans lose on Election Day, President Bush, who has had trouble winning approval of trade deals in the past, could face even tougher odds."

Herbert Says Indiana 2nd CD Voters Lack Confidence In Both Parties. In his New York Times column (10/26), Bob Herbert says that in Indiana's 2nd CD, Republican Rep. Chris Chocola "is in big political trouble and he knows that President Bush is much more the cause than the solution. Any mention of the Bush administration tends to turn local Republicans as chilly as the dusting of lake-effect snow that fell over South Bend the other night." Bush has "come into this northern Indiana district to raise money for the Chocola campaign but he has not been asked to appear with the congressman publicly to rally the dispirited troops." Chocola said, "I don't know that it would help me." He "candidly acknowledged that being seen as aligned with Mr. Bush 'is not as much of a positive as it used to be.'" Herbert adds that with "control of the House at stake, the G.O.P. can hardly afford to lose Mr. Chocola's seat. Two years ago he defeated his Democratic opponent, Joe Donnelly, by roughly nine percentage points." Donnelly is "his opponent again this year, and a recent public poll showed him leading Mr. Chocola by about five points. Mr. Chocola said his own internal polls showed the race as a dead heat." But the "overwhelming sense I took away from interviews with voters in and around South Bend was a feeling of disillusionment with government. Republicans and Democrats spoke sourly about the Bush administration, but no one expected dramatic changes if the Democrats gained control of one or both houses of Congress." 2nd CD resident Vernon DeWitt said, "People say the Democrats are weak, and frankly, I think they are. I'm fed up with everybody." Herbert concludes, "There are only two major parties. Where do troubled voters turn if the country is in a serious fix and neither party is seen as having an adequate solution?"

Schumer Surprised At Extent Of Democrats' Senate Prospects. The Washington Times (10/26, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer "says he is just as surprised as anyone that Democrats have a legitimate shot at taking control of the Senate in the November election." At a National Press Club appearance with National Republican Senatorial Committee Chairman Elizabeth Dole, said, "In 2005, most people were predicting we'd be lucky just to keep our 45 [seats]. And now, I'd be disappointed if we just hold." The Times adds Dole "acknowledged the negative draw President Bush's Iraq policy is having on her party's candidates, but she asked what leaving Iraq now would accomplish and questioned the national security credentials of Democrats." Dole said, "If Democrats were to take over the Senate, you're going to see a weaker security situation."

RNC Pulls Controversial Tennessee Senate Ad. ABC World News (10/25, story 5, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported the Tennessee Senate race "has just about everything. Hints of sex. Allegations of racism. And the possibility that a Southern state could elect a black senator for the first time since Reconstruction." ABC (Reynolds) added, "Bob Corker should be coasting. A Republican running in a conservative red state that was carried twice by President Bush, his prospects should be looking good." But Democrat Harold Ford "has proven to be a more adept campaigner, insinuating at every stop that Corker's undeniable wealth includes ill-gotten gains and tying Corker to an unpopular war and an unpopular President." Faced with "the loss of a must-win Senate seat, the Republicans decided to down-shift away from Ford's politics to his persona. Drawing on Ford's attendance at a 'Playboy' magazine Super Bowl party last year, the national GOP is running this commercial, what many see as racial overtones. First, they lampoon Ford's positions. Then, a woman in a suggestive pose says this." Unidentified female: "I met Harold at the 'Playboy' party."

DOJ_NMG_0086404

Reynolds: "And she adds this to drive the point home." Unidentified female: "Harold, call me." Reynolds: "To many, the message is clear, and in parts of Tennessee, potentially incendiary." Prof. John Greer, Vanderbilt University: "It's talking about interracial sex relations and it's amazing. It's not the kind of ad you would expect somebody to be running if they thought they were ahead or in a tie." Reynolds: "Late today, officials at the Republican National Committee says the ad in question has received a lot of negative attention. And they have decided to stop running it here."

The New York Times (10/26, Toner, 1.21M) reports the Tennessee Senate race, "one of the most competitive and potentially decisive battles of the midterm election, became even more unpredictable this week after a furor over a Republican television commercial that stood out even in a year of negative advertising." The ad "featured a series of people in mock man-on-the street interviews talking sarcastically about Mr. Ford and his stands on issues including the estate tax and national security." Critics "asserted that the advertisement was a clear effort to play to racial stereotypes and fears, essentially, playing the race card in an election where Mr. Ford is trying to break a century of history and become the first black senator from the South since Reconstruction." Hilary Shelton, director of the NAACP's Washington bureau, "said the spot took aim at the sensitivities many Americans still have about interracial dating."

On CNN's The Situation Room (10/25), RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman said, "I think what our party is doing is working to focus on the issues. The ad is down now, and the focus, I think, is going to be on taxes, it's going to be on defense, it is going to be on judges and issues like that in the Senate race."

Appearing on MSNBC's Hardball (10/25, Matthews), Sen. Richard Durbin said, "Some of the ads that are up on the air now on the Republican side really go way beyond the pale. Running ads against Tammy Duckworth, a disabled veteran from the Iraqi war, in the Chicagoland area. The ads that they've run against Sherrod Brown that have been totally discredited. Now I think they've reached to the bottom of the barrel with this ad against Harold Ford. I'm glad they had the good sense to pull it."

During an interview about the midterm elections on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (10/25), Jack Kemp said, "I'm going to tell the Republican National Committee to take out that dumb ad on the air against Harold Ford."

Demographic Shift Gives Ford A Boost. The Wall Street Journal (10/26, A1, Dade, Deogun, 2.03M) reports in a front page story that parts "of the upper South -- including Tennessee, Virginia and North Carolina -- are attracting significant numbers of people from other parts of the country who aren't steeped in the region's traditions but are drawn to good jobs, lower taxes, top-notch universities and affordable real estate." This "migratory shift is scrambling the region's electoral politics. It is raising Democratic hopes that some parts of the South may no longer be as monolithic in their support of the Republican Party and may be more accepting of African-American candidates." That "helps explain why" Ford "is in a statistical dead heat with his Republican opponent in the race for the U.S. Senate seat being vacated by Majority Leader Bill Frist. If Mr. Ford wins, he will become the first black senator from the South since Reconstruction. One major factor may be an unheralded demographic shift."

Ford Campaign Seen As Playbook For Other Southern Democrats. In a Wall Street Journal column (10/26, A19), editorial board member Kimberly Strassel says, "Ford is dogging Mr. Corker at the polls, threatening an upset in a race that could determine the balance of power in the Senate. Over the past year the Democrat has run right on social issues and defense, neutralizing two areas that so often hurt Democrats. That has freed him up to run a more populist campaign on economic issues. The calculation is proving a winner, and offers some lessons to national Democrats still interested in again becoming viable in the South."

Unusual Number Of Conservative Democrats Running For House. The Los Angeles Times (10/26, Hook, 918K) reports Heath Shuler "is part of a phalanx of unusually conservative Democratic candidates who may deliver crucial victories over GOP incumbents and help their party win control of the House." Republicans are "ringing alarms about what the House would be like if the GOP lost control: a throwback to the unreconstructed liberalism of big-government activism, tax increases and a weak-kneed defense policy. They point with Halloween-season horror to the likely lineup of Democratic committee chairs, including Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles) and other liberal old-timers." But, like Shuler, "many of the Democratic candidates most likely to be elected are cut from a different cloth. Sixteen of them have been endorsed by the Blue Dogs, a coalition of conservative Democrats." With "so many conservative-leaning candidates at the forefront of the Democratic effort, House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) has, at least for now, stuck to a minimalist agenda that steers clear of grand, liberal ambitions. Instead, Democratic leaders are focusing — and almost all serious Democratic candidates are campaigning on — a more limited, six-point agenda that includes raising the minimum wage, repealing tax breaks for oil companies, restoring college tuition tax breaks, cutting Medicare drug costs and other plans they believe could draw bipartisan support."

DOJ_NMG_0086405

Controversy Over Michael J. Fox Ad Raises Stem Cell Issue Into National Debate. The CBS Evening News (10/25, story 5, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The issue of embryonic stem cell research has suddenly exploded again in the middle this campaign. Missouri is holding a referendum on whether to guarantee that research in its Constitution. And everyone from movie stars to star athletes is joining the fight." CBS (Bowers) added, "When St. Louis cardinal pitcher Jeff Suppan takes the mound tonight, he's not only pitching for a World Series win, he's also going to bat for conservatives on the hot button issue of stem cell research." He is "joined by a number of local sports heroes and even the man who played Jesus in Mel Gibson's passion of the Christ. A conservative group produced it to fight back against a series of hard-hitting and poignant ads put out by actor Michael J. Fox." Michael J. Fox: "Senator Talent even wanted to criminalize the science that gives us a chance for hope." Bowers: "The ads shown locally here in Missouri during the first three games of the World Series, a visibly shaking Fox urges fans to vote yes to stem cell research and Democratic challenger Claire McCaskill and no to the Republican incumbent. Senator Jim Talent was out campaigning today, and his office declined comment but his opponent is enjoying the unexpected attention." McCaskill "credits conservative talk show host Rush Limbaugh for that because what had been a limited ad campaign targeting a few Senate races in a few key states like this one where stem cells are an issue suddenly went national when Limbaugh suggested Fox was exaggerating the symptoms of his Parkinson's disease."

On Fox News' On The Record (10/25), correspondent Carl Cameron said the stem cell issue is, "particularly in Missouri, potentially very big. That battle you see amongst those two ads is being fought out between the two Senate candidates. Claire McCaskill, the Democrat, is very pro-embryonic stem cell research. Jim Talent is against embryonic stem cell research but is in favor of adult stem cell research and various different other alternatives. And most of the Missouri polls suggest that the public is in favor of the ballot initiative. And as a consequence, that could help Claire McCaskill and Democratic candidates. It's going to make it a little bit tougher for Jim Talent."

USA Today (10/26, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports, "Opponents of a Missouri ballot measure that would amend the state constitution to allow research using embryonic stem cells have produced a star-studded TV ad to press their cause. The ad features former St. Louis Rams quarterback and Super Bowl hero Kurt Warner, St. Louis Cardinals pitcher Jeff Suppan, Kansas City Royals baseball player Mike Sweeney, Everybody Loves Raymond actress Patricia Heaton and The Passion of the Christ star James Caviezel." Supporters of the measure "have been running ads featuring singer Sheryl Crow, a Missouri native. And Democratic Senate candidate Claire McCaskill's campaign is airing ads featuring a quivering Michael J. Fox, who has Parkinson's disease, urging voters to elect her because of her support for stem cell research."

The Los Angeles Times (10/26, Simon, 918K) reports the stem cell research ad "has drawn more attention than the 2004 ads because Fox looks so debilitated. His body jerks so violently in the 30-second spot that conservative talk show host Rush Limbaugh mockingly mimicked the tremors and suggested that Fox was exaggerating his symptoms. Limbaugh later apologized, but the uproar over his remarks made the Fox ad the talk of the political world — and prompted thousands of people to view it online."

"Passion Of The Christ" Star Uses Biblical Language. The Washington Times (10/26, Bellantoni, 88K) reports the actor "who played Jesus in 'The Passion of the Christ' is drawing on his knowledge of that film's Aramaic language and his image as Christ for his latest role -- using Jesus' words to ask Missouri voters to oppose a stem-cell research measure on the Nov. 7 ballot." Actor Jim Caviezel "opens the political ad with a brief statement in Aramaic, the common tongue of biblical-era Palestine and the language of Mel Gibson's blockbuster movie, saying: 'Le-bar nash be-neshak.'" Bill Fulco, "the Loyola Marymount professor who translated Mr. Gibson's script for 'Passion' and coached the actors on the ancient language, told The Washington Times yesterday the phrase means: 'You betray the Son of Man with a kiss,' a reference to Judas' betraying Christ and a phrase used in the Greek of Luke's Gospel." Tom Schreiner, "a professor of New Testament interpretation at the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, said yesterday Mr. Caviezel is implying the amendment may seem "loving and kind" to its supporters, but when read closely, it is "actually a betrayal.'"

DOJ_NMG_0086406

NRSC To Spend $3.5 Million On Ads In Closing Days Of New Jersey Senate Race. The New York Times (10/26, Rutenberg, 1.21M) reports, "National Republican campaign strategists are beginning an intensive last-minute offensive in New Jersey, seizing on the tight race between Senator Robert Menendez, a Democrat, and his Republican challenger, Thomas H. Kean Jr." NRSC officials "said they were putting $3.5 million into the race in its final 12 days to pay for television advertisements attacking Mr. Menendez that were expected to be on major stations by Thursday morning." NRSC spokesman Brian Nick "said Mr. Kean had remained at least competitive with Mr. Menendez -- though trailing in two recent polls -- despite being outspent. Mr. Nick said the committee believed that the new advertising, produced by a quasi-independent arm of the committee created under federal campaign finance law, had the potential to change the dynamic of the race." RNC spokesman Brian Jones "said the party would provide an extra push for Mr. Kean with an aggressive drive to get out the vote. 'We feel that there's a real opportunity in New Jersey,' Mr. Jones said. The $3.5 million advertising outlay is a major investment in two of the most expensive media markets in the nation, New York and Philadelphia, both of which transmit into New Jersey."

Steele, Cardin Clash In "Tempestuous" Debate. The Baltimore Sun (10/26, Skalka, 262K) reports that in the "most tempestuous encounter to date of Maryland's U.S. Senate contest, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele and Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin played a heated game of gotcha during a televised debate Wednesday, with Steele pressed into offering his clear support for the war in Iraq and Cardin stumbling when queried about the location of a planned Metro line in the vote-rich Washington suburbs." The candidates "sparred for an hour, talking over each other from the start and bickering about their views on embryonic stem cell research, health care and the Iraq conflict. Each contender claimed he could better bring change to Washington and that his opponent is beholden to party bosses." Cardin said, "George Bush helped finance his [Steele's] campaign for the United States Senate. The lieutenant governor agrees with George Bush's agenda on Social Security, on health care, the war in Iraq." The Sun adds that Steele "snapped back: 'This gentleman, this congressman has been running against George Bush for over a year. Haven't you noticed, sir, he's not represented on this stage.'" Steele added, "You were hand-picked by Congressman Steny Hoyer to get in this race. If you weren't, Kweisi Mfume should be sitting here."

The Washington Post (10/25, Mosk, Marimow, 748K) reported that Steele attempted "to quiz" Cardin "on the route of the proposed Metro rail Purple Line. After starting to hazard a guess, sputtering out 'Chevy Chase,' Cardin snapped, 'I'm not going to answer your question,' and pushed back at Steele, asking him about national health insurance. Later, Cardin was asked repeatedly by reporters if he knew the Purple Line route and while he insisted that he did, he refused to risk an answer. 'I support the Purple Line,' he said, then added, 'I'm not sure they've settled on specific sites.'" During "the debate, Cardin pressed Steele on his initial support for the Iraq war. Steele responded by calling it 'heartening to see the president move to where the American people have been for some time.' 'How would you have voted in Congress if you'd had the chance?' Cardin pressed, adding that he believes Steele would have supported the president. 'Do not disrespect me and tell me what I would have done at the time,' Steele replied. He then acknowledged he did support going into Iraq."

The Washington Times (10/26, Ward, 88K) relates that Steele "reiterated his support for stem-cell research using adult stem cells and his opposition to embryonic research, which he considers abortion. Mr. Cardin said he supports embryonic research. … At one point, Mr. Steele, sitting next to Mr. Cardin, said the 10-term congressman had failed as a leader. 'For 20 years, sir, you have sat in the [congressional] seat and wasted the opportunity to lead,' he said." The AP (10/26) reports, "The debate also included third-party candidate Kevin Zeese, who said both Steele and Cardin cannot be independent senators because they've taken contributions from business interests. … The candidates will also debate Thursday in Charles County and Sunday on NBC's 'Meet The Press.'"

Black Democratic Leaders Not Criticizing Steele. The Washington Times (10/26, DeBose, Ward, 88K) reports, "Local black Democratic leaders will not attack Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele in his U.S. Senate race, even as they

DOJ_NMG_0086407

campaign and appear in ads for his opponent -- Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, a fellow Democrat." Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton said, "I think that is a tactical decision. If [Mr. Steele] has a large or fairly large black vote, why or how could you alienate that vote by going after him doing personal attacks? There is just no way." The Times adds former Prince George's County Executive Wayne K. Curry, "who has not yet endorsed anyone in the Senate race, said it is wise for black politicians to avoid criticizing Mr. Steele, a Republican and the first black to win a statewide election in Maryland."

Allen, Webb Both Support Revisions To No Child Left Behind. The Washington Post (10/26, B6, Glod, 748K) reports that in a "state skeptical of federal intrusion in local school affairs, Virginia Sen. George Allen and challenger James Webb each say they support the goals of No Child Left Behind but quarrel with how the federal law has played out." Webb says "schools need more federal funding to fulfill mandates to test students and narrow achievement gaps. The Republican incumbent, who voted for the landmark legislation five years ago, now argues that states need more flexibility in how they grade schools. But neither candidate supports an outright repeal of the law." The winner of the race "will have a vote when Congress debates whether to renew the controversial law, which aims to push students in a range of grades to attain near-universal proficiency in reading and math by 2014." As Virginia governor "in the mid-1990s, Allen was chief architect of the school accountability program that measures progress using the Standards of Learning tests. Since voting for No Child Left Behind, he has become critical of the federal initiative. State officials in that time have also complained about aspects of the law."

Wilder Backs Webb To Send Message Over Iraq War. The Washington Post (10/26, B5, Craig, Rein, 748K) reports Webb "campaigned yesterday in Northern Virginia with the state's current governor at his side, and hours later he picked up a key endorsement from a former governor in Richmond." Webb, "joined by Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D), appealed to retirees and students at stops in Fairfax and Prince William counties before heading to Richmond to appear with former Gov. L. Douglas Wilder, now the mayor of Richmond and a popular figure among African American voters." Sen. Allen "stumped through southwestern Virginia yesterday with Kentucky Sen. Mitch McConnell (R), the majority whip. The Allen campaign also released a radio commercial featuring Allen's most prominent black supporter, state Sen. Benjamin J. Lambert III (D-Richmond)." The Post adds Allen and Webb had each "courted Wilder for his support. Wilder, a Democrat, is independent-minded and likes to build suspense for his endorsements by waiting until late in a campaign to announce his choices. His support isn't always guaranteed; in 1997, he declined to endorse Democrat Donald S. Beyer Jr. for governor." Wilder "said voters should choose Webb to send the message that they are opposed to the war in Iraq and Republican economic policies. He said he would do all he could, including campaign events and TV ads, to support Webb." Wilder said he "considers Allen a 'close friend' but cannot support him because he is a reliable vote for GOP leaders in Congress. Wilder called Allen yesterday morning."

The New York Times/AP (10/26) reports Wilder "promised to help Mr. Webb, a Democrat, with voter turnout in the weeks leading to the Nov. 7 election. He said Mr. Webb could beat Mr. Allen, a Republican, if he got a large voter turnout in Hampton Roads and Richmond." Wilder, "who remains the nation's first and only elected black governor, said he was angry at the way President Bush had handled the Iraq war."

The Washington Times (10/26, McLaughlin, Bellantoni, 88K) reports Wilder's "endorsement comes at a crucial time for Mr. Webb, with most polls showing that he still trails" Sen. Allen. Wilder said he "is endorsing Mr. Webb, a former Navy secretary under President Reagan, because he will fight against the 'pattern of inefficiency, ineptitude and scandal' in the Republican-controlled Congress." The Allen campaign "said the endorsement was no surprise. They noted their radio ad featuring state Sen. Benjamin J. Lambert III, a black Richmond Democrat who has endorsed Mr. Allen. In the ad, Mr. Lambert notes Mr. Allen's support for black farmers and the Voting Rights Act."

Allen's Racial Views Examined. The Washington Post (10/26, A1, Turque, 748K) profiles Sen. Allen in a front page story, noting that in the "sun-splashed Los Angeles suburbs," some of Allen's "classmates at Palos Verdes High School recall a lone tobacco-chewing teenage cowboy who was disliked, even feared." Don Gause, a wide receiver on the football team, said, "George was not what I would call mainstream." One reason, Gause said, "was that Allen used anti-black epithets and 'ran with a group of guys off the football field' who used the same language." Gause said, "George took some hard lines in that area." The Post adds,

DOJ_NMG_0086408

"Who George Allen was, and who he is today after 23 years in politics, remains an issue as the Virginia Republican seeks reelection. Supporters say the pilgrimage was one leg of a journey that has led to genuine maturation for Allen, 54, whose style melds Ronald Reagan's optimism with George W. Bush's Texas swagger." But the "macaca" incident "raises a question: Has Allen really evolved, or did his true nature slip into public view?" Those "closest to him say that Allen is no bigot and that partisan enemies have seized on murky 30-year-old anecdotes and meaningless lapses in political correctness to damage him." Others "from Allen's past said they saw a distressingly familiar, coldly taunting hatred when they viewed the macaca tape."

Republicans Hope For Upset In Michigan Senate Race. The Washington Times (10/26, Hurt, 88K) reports Republicans are "turning to Michigan in the final days of the campaign in search of a major upset that would protect their majority in the U.S. Senate." Mike Bouchard, "the popular Republican sheriff of Michigan's second-largest county, trails Democratic incumbent Sen. Debbie Stabenow. But recent polls suggest that Mr. Bouchard may be closing the gap, with two surveys indicating a single-digit difference." Republican "heavy-hitters, such as former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, Sen. John McCain of Arizona and Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney have been to the state to campaign for Mr. Bouchard. President Bush travels there today." The NRSC "spent $1 million on the" Bouchard campaign's "behalf, one of only three states where the national Republicans have gone on the offense. Also, members of the conservative group Club for Growth donated more than $250,000."

Both Parties Seek Advantage From Poor Michigan Economy. USA Today (10/26, Wolf, 2.27M) reports that in 'an election dominated by the war in Iraq, the impact of an economy recovering from recession is less clear. Democrats note that wages have not kept up with some prices, particularly for health care and college tuition. That, they say, should help their party. Others cite three years of job creation, a 4.6% national unemployment rate, declining gas prices and high stock prices as evidence the country is on the right course — a plus for Republicans." President Bush, "who arrives in the Detroit suburbs today to raise money for GOP Senate candidate Mike Bouchard, has spent much of the week highlighting the economy as a strong point for Republican candidates." Yet "even if the economy works to the benefit of Republicans, it may not do so in Michigan." Democratic Gov. Jennifer Granholm "is struggling with a difficult state economy — only Mississippi, wracked by Hurricane Katrina, has a higher jobless rate (7.2%) — but she is leading narrowly in recent polls, and incumbent Democratic Sen. Debbie Stabenow enjoys a bigger lead over Bouchard."

DeVos Criticized For Failing To Provide Economic Vision For State. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (10/26, A18), Shikha Dalmia of the Reason Foundation says, "Besides the Tigers, the main thing on the minds of Michigan residents is the state's tanking economy. So when the state's most prominent Republican businessman entered the gubernatorial fray promising to turn things around, it should have been a home run. Instead, 10 days before the election, Dick DeVos has lost his 15-point summer lead over Jennifer Granholm, the Democratic incumbent, and is now trailing by more than eight points in most polls. The fault is not in his stars but in himself: At a time when Michigan needs economic leadership, he has so far shown little charisma, creativity -- or courage of convictions." DeVos "has done little to challenge" Granholm "on economic fundamentals -- her big vulnerability given that two-thirds of Michigan voters believe that the state has been going in the wrong economic direction under her."

Connecticut Senate Race Seen As Harbinger For US Involvement In Iraq. In his Washington Post column (10/26, A25), David Broder says, "When the three candidates in Connecticut's celebrated Senate race met for their final debate on Monday night in New London, only one of them appeared to be having a good time." It was "not Ned Lamont, the tense and fidgety businessman who had captured the Democratic nomination as an opponent of the Iraq war." It was "certainly not Joseph Lieberman, the three-term Democratic senator who had lost the primary to Lamont because of his support of that war and is running as an independent. Lieberman looked exhausted and exasperated by his situation, even though polls show him to be in front." Rather, the "only person who was relaxed, good-humored and reveling in the moment was Alan Schlesinger, the bulky Republican nominee whom no one gives a chance of winning. He jabbed humorously and effectively at both his opponents, noting how ironic it was that 'a Greenwich multimillionaire' such as Lamont was running as a Democrat, while Lieberman, whose long list of liberal positions Schlesinger cited, was 'masquerading as a Republican.'" But the race "constitutes perhaps the nation's clearest test on the Iraq war." A Lieberman win "would slow, if not reverse, growing pressure from the Democrats for an early pullout of U.S. forces." A Lamont win "would add immeasurably to the momentum of the antiwar forces."

DOJ_NMG_0086409

Sophisticated "Google Bombing" Campaign Targets 50 Republicans. The New York Times (10/26, Zeller, 1.21M) reports if things "go as planned for liberal bloggers in the next few weeks, searching Google for 'Jon Kyl,' the Republican senator from Arizona now running for re-election, will produce high among the returns a link to an April 13 article from The Phoenix New Times, an alternative weekly." Kyl "'has spent his time in Washington kowtowing to the Bush administration and the radical right,' the article suggests, 'very often to the detriment of Arizonans.'" Searching Google "for 'Peter King,' the Republican congressman from Long Island, would bring up a link to a Newsday article headlined 'King Endorses Ethnic Profiling.'" The Times adds, "Fifty or so other Republican candidates have also been made targets in a sophisticated 'Google bombing' campaign intended to game the search engine's ranking algorithms. By flooding the Web with references to the candidates and repeatedly cross-linking to specific articles and sites on the Web, it is possible to take advantage of Google's formula and force those articles to the top of the list of search results." The project "was originally aimed at 70 Republican candidates but was scaled back to roughly 50 because Chris Bowers, who conceived it, thought some of the negative articles too partisan."

Poll Finds Majorities Of Arab Americans Backing Democratic Candidates. The Washington Times (10/26, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports a "new poll of Arab Americans in four battleground states shows a large shift in voter preferences that now favors Democratic candidates. If true, it represents a major shift from as recently as the 2000 presidential election, when then-Gov. George Bush won nearly 50 percent of Arab Americans' votes." The survey, "conducted by Zogby International for the Arab American Institute (AAI), of likely voters in Ohio, Florida and Pennsylvania found that Arab Americans are supporting Democrat gubernatorial and Senate candidates by close to 3-1 margins." With a "number of close races potentially shifting the control of Congress, the major shift of even a small ethnic bloc could give one side the edge."

Woman Claims Bribe Offer Made Over Allegations Of Gibbons Assault. USA Today (10/26, Kasindorf, 2.27M) reports a Las Vegas cocktail waitress said "she was offered money to recant allegations that a Republican congressman running for Nevada governor assaulted and propositioned her." The "alleged bribery attempt that Chrissy Mazzeo, 32, described at a news conference reignited a sex-tinged controversy that Rep. Jim Gibbons says could influence his tight contest with Democratic state Sen. Dina Titus." Gibbon's lawyer, Don Campbell, "later at a news conference called Mazzeo 'an exceedingly troubled young woman' with a 'troubled past,' who was making 'wild and reckless allegations.'" Gibbons, 61, "who is married, has denied the allegations."

Late Campaign Stress Leads Candidates To Make Ill-Advised Statements. The New York Times (10/26, Hulse, 1.21M) reports, "Fighting for their jobs in an increasingly frenzied political environment, several candidates are showing signs of strain, uttering words they later wish they could take back, running last-ditch advertisements that push the envelope and taking other actions that are out of the political ordinary. The gaffes can have real consequences, coming when voters are paying the closest attention." Rep. Barbara Cubin, "facing a strong challenge in what should be a safe seat, this week told an opponent who uses a wheelchair that she would slap him were he not disabled." Rep. Christopher Shays, "normally a low-key moderate, portrayed the treatment of Iraqis at the Abu Ghraib prison as the product of a sex ring rather than of abuse." And Rep. Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, "the No. 2 Democrat in the House, accused a black Senate candidate of 'slavishly' supporting Republican policies and later apologized for a poor choice of words." GOP strategist Ed Rollins said, "It is definitely the funny season. When everybody thinks they are in jeopardy, whether they are or not, there is real panic. All these Republicans who thought they were in safe seats have seen their numbers drop dramatically. They are freaked."

Doubts About Hillary Clinton's "Authenticity" Said To Remain. The Financial Times (10/26, Luce) reports, under the headline "Hillary Clinton Wins Minds But Not Yet Hearts," that "there are reasons to believe the Republicans might be too sanguine about how easy it would be for their candidate to defeat Mrs Clinton in 2008, regardless of which party wins the mid-term congressional elections on November 7." Watching Clinton, "on the campaign trail in Long Island explains why many people who used to be hostile to her have become more open-minded." Clinton has "worked assiduously to win federal contracts and funding for communities in her state," and she "campaigns tirelessly to get better treatment for the fire and police employees who were affected by the dust at Ground Zero." But in "spite of her evident crowd-pulling abilities, doubts about her authenticity are unlikely to fade." Clinton has been "dogged by two recurring questions. Will she still be a senator six years from now when her term elapses? And how can she criticise Mr Bush for invading Iraq when she supported the congressional resolution which authorised it?" She "evades both with lawyerly consistency."

DOJ_NMG_0086410

US Said To Be Facing Growing Skills Gap. The Financial Times (10/26, Guerrera, Waters, Knight) reports, "Azim Premji, chairman of Wipro, the Indian outsourcing group, has warned that the US faces a more acute skills shortage in information technology than India, blaming failings in America's education system and restrictive immigration policies." Premji, "a Stanford University graduate, said the US education system was not doing enough to attract mathematics and science teachers or to steer students towards those subjects." Microsoft's Bill Gates has also "been warning about the evaporation of interest in computer science at US universities for more than two years." And GE's Jeffrey Immelt "told a Washington audience in January that the US was on its way to becoming 'the massage capital of the world', with more students graduating in sports sciences than electrical engineering."

Brooks Says US Entering Era Of Ideological Dealignment. In his New York Times column (10/26), David Brooks says, "In some eras there is no dominant political tendency. The 1970's were such a period. That decade was marked not by a change in political winds so much as by disillusionment and a scrambling of political categories. People who once had been liberals drifted away. Voters became cynical about politics itself. The pendulum swung not only from left to right but from politics to antipolitics. Jimmy Carter promised a break from the normal methods of political life. We're about to enter another of those periods without a dominant ideology. It's clear that this election will mark the end of conservative dominance. This election is a period, not a comma in political history." Conservatives "have exhausted their agenda," are "beset by scandals, the kind of institutional decay that afflicts movements at the end of their political lives. Third, the Reagan coalition is splintering, with the factions going off in wildly different directions." Fourth, there "is no viable orthodox conservative candidate for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination."

Liberal Radio Network Seen As Evading Campaign Contribution Limits. In a Washington Times op-ed (10/26), John R. Lott Jr., dean's visiting professor at SUNY-Binghamton, and Bradley A. Smith of Capital University Law School, says, "When is a campaign donation not a campaign donation? Apparently if you spend the money to run a radio program instead of paying for campaign ads that run on that same program. Just look at Air America. With $41 million in losses since 2004, and $9.8 million owed just to Robert Glaser, RealNetworks chairman, Democrats who bankrolled this 'company' weren't so much investors as campaign contributors. The losses are seen as simple business ineptitude, but Air America effectively, and perhaps intentionally, cleverly avoided the campaign finance limits which Democrats had worked so hard to pass." Since Air America "started, successful radio entrepreneurs — most notably Rush Limbaugh — have argued that Air America never had a business model that made sense. But perhaps it had a model that made political sense. It's hardly a coincidence that Air America debuted in time for the 2004 presidential campaign or that the bankruptcy filing was put off long enough so that creditors actions won't stop broadcasts before the Nov. 7 election. As if the willingness to lose money weren't already obvious, over a year ago the network started asking listeners to donate money to keep the programs on the air."

Bush "Assassination" Movie Faces Marketing Challenges. USA Today (10/26, Breznican, 2.27M) reports, "How do you get people to go to a movie that sounds like it's committing treason? That's the challenge facing Newmarket Films' new Death of a President, a fictional documentary about what could happen if President Bush were assassinated." Richard Abramowitz, marketing director for Newmarket, said, "The film does not promote violence on any level. It no more advocates for assassination of the president than Silence of the Lambs advocates for cannibalism." USA adds Death of a President, "from British director and co-writer Gabriel Range, has raised hackles ever since it premiered in September at the Toronto Film Festival. Some large theater chains balked at featuring it, and the film will open Friday in about 100 theaters, mostly art houses. CNN and Fox News refused to run ads for the movie."

DOJ_NMG_0086411

WPost Backs DC-Beijing Flights. The Washington Post (10/26, A24, 748K) reports, "The quality of communication between the Washington area and Beijing could influence global stability. But there is no direct flight between the two capitals. Over the next couple of months, the Transportation Department will consider whether that should change. For economic reasons as well as geopolitical ones, the department should back a United Airlines proposal to launch daily service to Beijing from Dulles International Airport."

WSJournal Says Decline In Oil Prices Shows Folly Of "Windfall Profits" Tax. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (10/26, 2.03M) writes, "Exxon Mobil, Royal Dutch Shell, BP and other members of the vast energy conspiracy may have a hard time keeping their run of profit growth going now that oil prices have fallen to $60 or so a barrel from upwards of $80." The decline in oil prices is "proof of the folly of a 'windfall profits' tax or similar punitive measures against Big Oil favored by so many politicians. Only this week, however, Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi repeated her pledge to soak the oil companies if her party takes over the House next month." The Journal says, "Her policy seems to be that when oil prices decline, oil company shareholders must absorb all the market risk and the lower profits. But when oil prices rise, the companies must hand over a cut of their profits to Members of Congress to spend as they like. The only 'windfall' is for the political class."

US, European Allies At Odds Over Iran Resolution. The Washington Post (10/26, A20, Lynch, Kessler, 748K) reports, "The United States and its European allies split Wednesday over the terms of a U.N. resolution calling for a ban on Iranian trade in ballistic missiles and nuclear materials." While "the Bush administration supports the Europeans' broad aims of sanctioning Tehran for refusing to halt nuclear activities," it feels the resolution "would be too weak to constrain Iran from developing nuclear weapons." Although the resolution "requires states to 'prevent the supply, sale or transfer' of Iran's nuclear and ballistic programs and would halt Tehran's ability to secure financing and technical assistance for them" and would "ban travel and freeze the assets of individuals associated with the weapons programs," it still "exempts Russia from the trade embargo, allowing it to continue a previously approved nuclear energy agreement to support the construction of Iran's Bushehr nuclear power plant." The Europeans also rejected U.S. amendments "that characterized Iran's nuclear activities as a threat to international peace and security," saying the resolution the US wishes "may have provoked a Russian veto." The "European negotiators thought they had secured U.S. backing for the proposal to exempt Russia from the trade ban at a meeting of political directors in late September." Still, the European negotiators agreed "to include a proposal by U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton to invoke a provision known as Article 41, which obliges states to enforce U.N. sanctions."

The Wall Street Journal (10/26, A6, King, 2.03M) adds, "The Bush administration has raised sharp but unspecified objections," as "administration officials yesterday declined to provide details on how they would like the draft resolution altered, other than to say it isn't yet stringent enough." One "U.S. official who reviewed the draft said, 'The Europeans have a fundamental difference with us on how to proceed."

The New York Times (10/26, Cooper, Shanker, 1.21M) downplays the differences between the US and Europe, writing that "the bickering of late has largely been tactical." While Ambassador John R. Bolton "demanded that the draft resolution bar Russia from continuing to build Iran's first nuclear power plant," other American officials acknowledged that a provision against all work on Bushehr was unrealistic," and European diplomats said "Mr. Bolton wanted to put it on the table as a bargaining chip to get other Russian concessions." Still, "Bush administration officials and their European counterparts have been squabbling over details of the draft resolution for the past week, and the horse-trading will probably increase now that the Russians and the Chinese have been given the draft." While "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice urged the Security Council to move rapidly to adopt the resolution, saying the authority and standing of the international community were at stake," following "five months of missed deadlines, counterproposals and diplomatic overtures on Iran, few officials from any of the six countries involved were willing to predict when a final sanctions resolution might pass the Security Council."

DOJ_NMG_0086412

The Financial Times (10/26, Bozorgmeh, Dinmore) follows the New York Times' tone, reporting "Nicholas Burns, US under secretary of state, said he did not think the Bushehr issue would be a major stumbling block." Meanwhile, "Iran was reported on Wednesday to be accelerating its uranium enrichment process" as "Iran's semi-official student news agency, ISNA, quoted an unnamed Iranian official who said a second network, or cascade, of centrifuges used to produce enriched uranium was installed last week, and that injection of the gas feed would take place this week." Some experts "believe Iran's installation of the second cascade is intended to signal its defiance of sanctions that have been threatened."

Iranian Journalist Notes Comforts Enjoyed By Wealthy Disincline Them To Political Change. Farouz Farzami, the pseudonym of a journalist who is forbidden to publish in Iran, writes in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (10/26, A18, 2.03M) "the well-to-do Iranian drinks and reads and watches what he wishes. He does as he pleases behind the walls of his private mansions and villas. In return for his private comforts, the affluent Iranian is happy to sacrifice freedom of speech, most of his civil rights, and his freedom of association. The upper-middle class has been bought off by this pact, which makes a virtue of hypocrisy." As one well-off Iranian notes, "We may be forfeiting our freedoms, as you say, but when the price of avoiding the authorities is so affordable, why would we risk everything to take on the regime?" In fact, "it is only the principled intellectuals of moderate means who suffer."

WSJournal Criticizes ElBaradei's Objectivity. The Wall Street Journal (10/26, A18, 2.03M) editorializes that lately Mohamed ElBaradei has "been sounding more like the real life Jimmy Carter than" Jack Webb. He said, "I don't think sanctions work as a penalty," for North Korea "after meeting with Condoleezza Rice, and "for Iran, 'the jury is still out on whether they are developing a nuclear weapon.'" His assurances that "the IAEA can be trusted to be 'continuously objective and impartial'" now "look disingenuous," as he "is offering confident judgments, well above his pay grade, about Kim Jong Il's motives -- and cautious ones about Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's. It's even harder to believe given the selective leaks and political hits the IAEA has recently practiced against the Bush Administration and its allies in Congress." Meanwhile, if "Mr. ElBaradei been doing his real job, he might have made a more strenuous effort at pointing out publicly Iran's failures to comply with its obligations, rather than offer grand pronouncements on diplomacy and making partisan intrusions into American politics."

Argentine Prosecutor Calls For Arrest Of Former Iranian President. The Washington Post/AP (10/26, A19, Serrat) reports, "Argentine prosecutors asked a federal judge on Wednesday to order the arrest of former Iranian president Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani and seven others in the 1994 bombing of a Jewish cultural center that killed 85," saying that "the decision to attack the center 'was undertaken in 1993 by the highest authorities of the then-government of Iran'" and "was entrusted to the Lebanon-based group Hezbollah." Prosecutors "said they suspected that Hezbollah undertook activities outside Lebanon only 'under orders directly emanating from the regime in Tehran.'" They also requested the "arrest of two former commanders of Iran's Revolutionary Guards, two former Iranian diplomats and a former Hezbollah security chief," and "asked the judge to detain other former Iranian officials, including an intelligence chief, Ali Fallahijan, and a foreign minister, Ali Ar Velayati." USA Today/AP (10/26, 11A, Serrat) runs an abbreviated version of the AP story.

McClatchy Newspapers (10/26, Sanchez, Chang, Hall) adds that Prosecutor Alberto Nisman "charged that the plot involved not only top political officials, but also lower-level diplomats in the Iranian Embassy in Buenos Aires." He said it was a "well-calculated plan that was part of a 'terrorist matrix' that included assassinations in France, Germany and Switzerland." Nisman "is the first Argentine official to publicly accuse officials in Tehran of involvement in the attack," and these charges "lend credence to longstanding American claims that Iran and Hezbollah are sponsors of international terrorism."

Rice Prods South Korea On Sanctions. The AP (10/26, Gearan) reports, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice gently prodded South Korea on Wednesday to show a strong commitment to international sanctions imposed against North Korea for its nuclear test this month," saying that while "the U.S. has no wish to tell Seoul how it should coexist with its neighbor," the North's "test of a nuclear device Oct. 9 'requires a strong response,' and said that adherence to a U.N. resolution banning the sale of weapons material, luxury goods and more to North Korea is key." She added, "North Korea's behavior poses a regional challenge and it must be addressed in a regional context," and "South Korea must be part of the solution, as should Japan and China and Russia."

DOJ_NMG_0086413

South Korean Unification Minister Resigns. The Washington Times (10/26, Salmon, 88K) reports that Lee Jong-seok, South Korea's unification minister, "resigned yesterday, the highest-profile casualty yet in a battle over the government's North Korea policy after an Oct. 9 nuclear test by Pyongyang." He was "a strong advocate of engagement and reconciliation with the communist North." According to Lee, "efforts to achieve 'peace and security and inter-Korean reconciliation on the peninsula are being recklessly politicized.'"

Rice "Plays Down" Putin's Remarks That Nuclear Test Was Response To Being Cornered. The AFP (10/26) reports, "The United States brushed aside a complaint by Russian President Vladimir Putin that North Korea tested a nuclear weapon because it had been backed into a corner by its rivals." Secretary Rice "played down" Putin's comments, "In what was seen as veiled criticism of the aggressive US policy on North Korea,…that one of the reasons Pyongyang chose to set off its first nuclear explosion was that "not all participants in the (six-party) talks process could find the right tone in the talks.'"

Japan Denies Report That It Seeks Nuclear Meeting. The AP (10/26, Greimel) reports, "Japan's foreign ministry Thursday denied a news report that the government is planning a meeting with the U.S. and South Korea as early as next month to solidify a common stance on the North Korean nuclear standoff." Kyodo News agency, had, "citing unidentified government officials, said the meeting among the allies will likely be held in Seoul" as "Japan wants the trilateral meeting to reaffirm the demand that the North Korean nuclear crisis be resolved through six-party talks that include North Korea, South Korea, the United States, Japan, China and Russia."

North Korea Threatens South Over Sanctions. The AP (10/26, Chang) reports that North Korea's the Committee for the Peaceful Reunification of the Fatherland "warned South Korea against joining international sanctions, saying Wednesday that its neighbor would 'pay a high price' if it joins the U.S.-led drive to punish the reclusive communist nation for its nuclear test." However, "President Bush dismissed North Korea's threats, saying leader Kim Jong Il was probing for weaknesses in the international community." As for South Korea, "there was no immediate response to Wednesday's statement."

Former Assistant Secretary Of Defense Advocates Negotiations. Henry S. Rowen, the assistant secretary of defense from 1989-91 and currently senior fellow of the Hoover Institution and director emeritus of Stanford University's Shorenstein Asia Pacific Research Center, writes in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (10/26, A18, 2.03M), "The United Nations sanctions on North Korea are useful, but unless China and South Korea change their policies, these sanctions will not have much effect." We should "be braced for more North Korean tests," as the Chinese don't see "Pyongyang's programs as seriously damaging to its own interests." They "don't want chaos in North Korea with millions of refugees coming across the border; and they don't want American forces on their border, either. We and the South Koreans urgently need to discuss these matters with the Chinese -- along with the contingency known, colloquially, as 'loose nukes.'" After all, "a serious divergence of perceived interests" between the US and China "would not be good for either of us," and "it is distressing to contemplate the possibility of members of Congress coming to see China's help to North Korea as supporting a major security threat to the U.S." Additionally, "South Korea has been part of the problem" and "there is the potential here for a disastrous breach between Washington and Seoul."

Bush, Dominican Leader Agree To Push Trade Accord. The AP (10/26, Riechmann) reports, "President Bush and the leader of the Dominican Republic agreed on Wednesday to jump-start a delayed free trade agreement to remove barriers to commerce between the two nations." In an Oval Office meeting, Bush "told Leonel Fernandez, the president of the Caribbean nation, that the United States will implement the Central American Free Trade Agreement as soon as possible. 'To that end, I had my trade minister, Ambassador Susan Schwab here, to make sure that we both heard the message of the president -- that this was a very important piece of legislation,' Bush said."

Putin Says He Won't Run Again, But Vows To Remain Influential. The New York Times (10/26, Kramer, 1.21M) reports that Russian President Vladimir V. Putin "said Wednesday that he would continue to 'influence the life in our country' after his second term is up in 2008, but that he would not run for president again" and "would step down 'even though I like my work.'" While "a third consecutive term is forbidden under Russia's 1993 Constitution, his supporters have called for a referendum to do away with that ban." Despite "much speculation about his future, Mr. Putin did not elaborate." Still, the comments are "a strong hint that Mr. Putin, who has quashed most dissent here, would remain in politics in some fashion after 2008. Analysts say Mr. Putin has several options, including assuming the leadership of the party he founded, United Russia, becoming speaker of Parliament or the chairman of Gazprom." In his "town-hall-style show," Putin also "criticized North Korea for testing a nuclear device" and on Georgia "said that Russia recognized its territorial integrity but noted that two separatist regions, South Ossetia and Abkhazia, were not historically part of Georgia when that country was annexed by the Russian empire. He said Georgia's attempts to regain control would lead to 'bloodshed.'"

DOJ_NMG_0086414

The Washington Post (10/26, A21, Finn, 748K) adds that Putin had "his trademark indefatigability and command of detail," and his "session reinforces the popular perception here of Putin as an open, capable and responsive leader." The Post focuses less than the New York Times on his announcement about not amending the constitution to run again. "Putin condemned the targeting of Georgians living here by Russian law enforcement agencies," saying "I cannot approve of selective actions on ethnic grounds. On the contrary, I am calling on all law enforcement bodies and administrative bodies to refrain from such actions."

The Financial Times (10/26, Buckley) notes "Vyacheslav Nikonov, a political consultant close to the Kremlin, noted on Russia Today news channel the constitution would allow Mr Putin to stand for president in 2012 after a four-year break." After the broadcast "Putin told reporters…he would name a suggested successor in due course but 'the Russian people must decide who is the strongest candidate'. Speculation centres on two deputy prime ministers – Dmitry Medvedev, who heads several multi-billion dollar social development programmes, and Sergei Ivanov, defence minister – as likely successors. But analysts believe a dark horse candidate could emerge, such as Vladimir Yakunin, head of Russian railways and a friend of the president." The Washington Times/AP (10/26, Meyer) and Los Angeles Times (10/25, Holley, 918K) run similar reports.

Contest For Latin American Security Council Seat Still Stalled. The AP (10/26, Lederer) reports, "The vote has been repeated — over and over, 41 times — and with each count, there is no winner in the diplomatic battle over Latin America's seat on the UN Security Council. The two contenders -- US-backed Guatemala and Venezuela, led by its fiercely anti-American President Hugo Chavez -- refuse to budge, though it has been clear since the early ballots that neither can gain the needed two-thirds support in the 192-nation UN General Assembly." The AP adds, "Frustrated diplomats from Latin America and the Caribbean met Wednesday, hoping to find a solution that would avoid another fruitless confrontation in the General Assembly."

The Financial Times (10/26, Webb-Vidal) says Venezuela and Guatemala "appeared ready to agree to find a consensus candidate to fill a temporary seat on the United Nations Security Council after a 40th round of voting failed to break a week-long diplomatic deadlock." Chávez "conceded on Wednesday that his government had virtually no chance of being able to win the seat, but he claimed to have captured the moral high ground in his ongoing sparring effort with Washington. 'It's going to be very difficult for us to win two-thirds of the vote,' Mr Chávez said. 'But we have achieved a great moral victory that no-one can take away from us.'"

The New York Times (10/26, Hoge, 1.21M), however, says "Venezuela has put forward Bolivia as a substitute, but Guatemala has made it clear the choice is unacceptable." In "the six rounds of balloting on Wednesday, Guatemala averaged 104 votes and Venezuela averaged 79, much the same outcome as after last week's 35 rounds of voting. A two-thirds majority of those voting and not abstaining, or roughly 124, is needed to win."

US Officials Concerned By Rights Abuses In Colombia. The Washington Post (10/26, A18, Forero, 748K) report from Colombias, "Beyond the hearty handshakes, a high-level US delegation that visited here this week raised concerns with President Álvaro Uribe's government about human rights abuses by the army and about the scandal-plagued effort to disarm paramilitary groups." R. Nicholas Burns, undersecretary of state for political affairs, "led 15 Bush administration officials from six agencies for meetings with virtually every top Colombian ministry. In reiterating support for Uribe, whose government receives more US assistance than any country outside the Middle East, Burns told the Colombians that Washington would continue providing about $600 million a year through 2008 for programs from aerial fumigation of drug crops to training of the army." But "the delegation's two-day mission, which ended Wednesday, also confronted a string of reports that Colombia's army has been embroiled in drug-related scandals and murdered dozens of peasant farmers, only to pass them off as dead guerrillas."

DOJ_NMG_0086415

Nicaraguan Congress Expected To Ban All Abortions. The Los Angeles Times (10/26, Tobar, 918K) reports, "Nicaragua's legislature Thursday is expected to approve a law that outlaws all forms of abortion, including those procedures intended to save the life of a pregnant mother." The measure "has been supported by most major political parties, heading into the Nov. 5 presidential election, as they seek to win over voters in this overwhelmingly Catholic country. Leaders of the Roman Catholic Church helped draft the bill and have mobilized followers to support it." However, "medical associations in Nicaragua and international human-rights groups have strongly criticized the proposal." The Times adds, "Since the late 1980s,Latin America's El Salvador and Chile have adopted similar measures. At least 34 countries, mostly in Africa and the Middle East, prohibit all abortions, without exception, according to the Center for Reproductive Rights, a nonprofit advocacy group based in New York." The law "would establish prison sentences of 6 to 30 years for women who abort their pregnancies and the doctors who perform the procedure."

Brutal War Between Drug Gangs Underway In Mexico. The New York Times (10/26, McKinley, 1.21M) reports, "An underworld war between drug gangs is raging in Mexico, medieval in its barbarity, its foot soldiers operating with little fear of interference from the police, its scope and brutality unprecedented, even in a country accustomed to high levels of drug violence." In recent months "the violence has included a total of two dozen beheadings, a raid on a local police station by men with grenades and a bazooka, and daytime kidnappings of top law enforcement officials. At least 123 law enforcement officials, among them 2 judges and 3 prosecutors, have been gunned down or tortured to death. Five police officers were among those beheaded." In all, "the violence has claimed more than 1,700 civilian lives this year, and federal officials say the killings are on course to top the estimated 1,800 underworld killings last year."

South African Political Analyst Denied Entry Into US. The Washington Post (10/26, A20, Timberg, 748K) reports Adam Habib, executive director of the Democracy and Governance Research Program for South Africa's Human Sciences Research Council, "said Wednesday that US border agents had denied him entry into the United States and questioned him about his views on terrorism." He said the agents, who detained him after he arrived at John F. Kennedy International Airport in New York, "did not give him a reason. A US Embassy spokesman, Mark M. Schlachter, confirmed the incident but said he did not know why Habib had been denied entry. … The Human Sciences Research Council has asked the US Embassy in Pretoria to investigate, and Habib said he had written the US Customs and Border Protection office in Washington seeking an explanation."

Activists Urge UN Action Against Regime In Burma. Pu Chin Sian Thang and U Thein Pe, members of Burma's parliament, "which was chosen in the country's last democratic elections but has never been permitted to meet," write in today's Washington Post (10/26, A25, 748K), "Last month the UN Security Council formally discussed the situation in Burma for the first time. For Burmese people such as us, who live under the country's oppressive regime, this was a welcome development." However, "much of the world has failed to understand the gravity of the crisis in our country. It is shocking that the Security Council has taken so long to get involved. No fewer than 3,000 villages have been destroyed or dislocated by the military regime in eastern Burma in the past decade. During the regime's systematic attacks on ethnic populations, women have been raped, children conscripted as child soldiers and rice supplies burned. Recently the regime instituted a practice of using soldiers' bayonets to pierce the bottoms of rice bowls, leaving villagers unable to cook their most basic foodstuff." They add that "there is overwhelming evidence that the people of Burma want an end to the dictatorship that has been forced upon them. Without this understanding and without a Security Council resolution, the United Nations is likely to fail in Burma yet again."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Bush Insists He'll Stand By His Iraq Goals."
"Perils Among The Palms."
"Taurus Approaches The End Of Its Road."

DOJ_NMG_0086416

"N.J. Justices Clear The Way For Gay Unions."
"A Right Kind Of Democrat."
"Janitor's Secret Past: A Death Squad."

USA Today:
"IRS Help Can Be Hard To Get, Audit Says."
"Sellers Sing The Blues As Price Drop Sets Record."
"Ruling On Gays May Echo At Polls."
"On The Ballot."

New York Times:
"New Jersey Court Backs Full Rights For Gay Couples."
"Conceding Missteps, Bush Urges Patience On Iraq."
"Study Sees Gain On Lung Cancer."
"In Tight Race, Ad On Black Candidate Stirs Furor."
"With Beheadings, Drug Gangs Terrorize Mexico."

Washington Post:
"More U.S. Troops May Be Iraq-Bound."
"The GOP Leans On A Proven Strategy."
"A Sense Of Service."
"A Contentious Campaign In A Battleground State."
"DNA Testing A Mixed Bag For Immigrants."
"FBI's Fairfax Agents Packing For Pr. William."
"Failing Schools Are Fighting Back In Md."

Washington Times:
"Black Democrats Pull Punches In Maryland Race."
"Jersey Court Orders Ok Of Gay Unions."
"S. Korea Official Quits Over North Policy."
"Obesity Drives Up US Fuel Appetite."
"Bush Backs Setting 'Benchmarks' In Iraq."
"A Hard Year To Be An Ohio Republican."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Senator Criticizes Use Of CDC Jet."
"Feds Pass Up Tips On Immigrant Violators."
"'I'm Not Satisfied Either.'"
"Libertarian Candidate Makes Some Noise."

Houston Chronicle:
"New Tensions Between U.S., Iraq."
"Republican Oil Their Successful Turnout Machine."
"Caregiver Charged In Mother's Death."
"Small Signs Of Acceptance."
"Strayhorn Never Saw Hill She Couldn't Climb."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Gay Marriage; Gay Marriage Analysis; Bush& Iraq; Maliki's Response To Timetable; Tennessee Senate Race; Separate Education; Classified Documents Found; Interest Rates; CAT Scans For Smokers; Playing Tag Banned.
CBS: Bush & Iraq; Maliki's Response To Timeline; Bush & Iraq Analysis; American Voters-Iraq; Stem Cell research Debate; CBS: Cost Of Campaign 2006; Gay Marriage; Risk Of Shingles; Cancer Screening; Separate Education; Fallen Soldiers-Iraq.
NBC: Bush & Iraq; Maliki's Response To Timeline; Iraq War Analysis; Cancer Screening; Risk OF Shingles; Ohio Senate Race; Gay Marriage; Housing Market; Interest Rates; Stock Market; Madonna's Adoption; Separate Education.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Signs HR 6061, the Secure Fence Act of 2006, Roosevelt Room; attends Lamberti for Congress and Iowa Victory 2006 reception, Iowa State Fairgrounds, Des Moines, Iowa, pool for cameras; attends a Bouchard for US Senate reception, Mabry Banquet and Convention Center, Warren, Mich., pool for cameras.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: US-CHINA _ Five-day meeting of the US-China Economic and Security Review Commission. Location: Hall of the States, 444 N. Capitol St.

POLAR SATELLITES _ NOAA holds Polar Max 2006, a forum for US and global users of polar-orbiting satellite data. Highlights: 8:10 a.m. Mary Kicza, deputy assistant administrator for NOAA's Satellite and Information Service. 8:45 a.m. Col. Dan Stockton, program director, NPOESS. Location: NOAA Science Center, 1301 East West Highway, Silver Spring.

LEGAL REFORM _ 8:45 a.m. - 5 p.m. US Chamber of Commerce holds 4th annual Legal Reform Summit. Participants include Iowa Attorney General Tom Miller; Utah Attorney General Mark Shurtleff; columnist Stuart Rothenberg; others. Location: 1615 H St. NW.

ELECTIONS-VOTING SYSTEMS _ 10 a.m. - 4 p.m. National Election Assistance Commission meets to discuss Voting System Testing and the Certification Program. Panel members, representatives of the National Institute of Standards and Technology (NIST), testing laboratories, equipment manufacturers, election officials, and certification specialists will receive presentations and hear public comments. Location: EAC Offices, 1225 New York Ave. NW, Suite 150.

DOJ_NMG_0086417

EYONG _ 9 a.m. Arraignment for Njock Eyong before U.S. District Judge John Bates on charges of impersonating a federal official, possession of fraudulent visa documents and fraud by wire scheme. Location: Courtroom 8, U.S. District Court, 3rd St. and Constitution Ave. NW.

GREENSPAN SPEECH _ 9 a.m. Former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan speaks to annual convention of the Commercial Finance Association at 9 a.m. APPROX. Location: Marriott Wardman Park Hotel, 2660 Woodley Road.

AFRICAN-AMERICAN VOTERS _ 10:30 a.m. Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies holds briefing on what factors will influence African-American voter turnout for the upcoming elections, and how the black vote will impact the outcome. With David Bositis, senior political analyst. Location: 1090 Vermont Avenue, NW, Suite 1100.

CLEAN ENERGY-LIST _ 11 a.m. Coalition of environmental, labor, and consumer groups unveils list of the Ten Best Opportunities for a New Energy Future. List is based on a new report by the U.S. Public Interest Research Group. Location: University of the District of Columbia, Van Ness campus between Bldg 46 West and Bldg 47.

CIGARETTE POLL _ 11:30 a.m. Teleconference call to release Drug Policy Alliance's Zogby Poll. Survey asked 1,200 Americans if they'd support federal legislation making cigarettes illegal. Contacts: Tony Newman, 646-335-5384. Notes: Call 877-270-2156; password: Zogby.

CHAO-DISABILITIES EMPLOYMENT _ 11:45 a.m. Secretary of Labor Elaine L. Chao will host a New Freedom Initiatives Awards ceremony to mark National Disabilities Employment Awareness Month. Awards will be presented to four non-profit groups, four companies and one individual for outstanding efforts in supporting the employment of people with disabilities. Location: Washington Renaissance Hotel, 999 9th St. NW.

CRACK COCAINE-SENTENCING REPORT _ 12 p.m. ACLU issues report on discriminatory criminal justice policies to mark 20th anniversary of the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1986. Report is titled ``Cracks in the System: Twenty Years of the Unjust Federal Crack Cocaine Law" and will be discussed in conference call briefing. Contacts: Elizabeth Rose, 202-675-2303. Notes: Dial-In Number: 800-816-4134; 69922.

IRAQ WAR VETS _ 12:30 p.m. Iraq war veterans with VoteVets.org hold conference call on new ad calling for defeat of Reps. Gutknecht, Porter, Sweeney, and Doolittle. Contacts: Eric Schmeltzer, 646-290-8586. Notes: Call 641-985-1000; access code: 451701.

REED-IRAQ _ 12:30 p.m. - 1:30 p.m. The Saban Center holds a ``Statesman's Forum: A Conversation on Iraq with Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I." Reed will discuss his meetings with U.S. troops, military commanders, Afghan and Iraqi officials; the resurgent Taliban in Afghanistan; sectarian violence in Iraq; current reconstruction efforts in both countries; and the options for redeploying U.S. troops from Iraq in a safe and timely manner. The session will be moderated by Martin Indyk, director of the Saban Center for Middle East Policy. Location: Brookings Institution, Falk Auditorium, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

IRAN-ISLAM _ 3 p.m. Council on Foreign Relations holds conference call on ``Hidden Iran: Paradox and Power in the Islamic Republic." With Ray Takeyh, senior fellow for Middle Eastern studies. Contacts: Darin Kingston, 212-434-9677. Notes: Call 800-247-5110; passcode: TAKEYH.

DEMOCRACY IN IRAN _ 3:30 p.m. Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty briefing by Mariam Memarsadeghi, senior program Manager for the Middle East & North Africa, Freedom House. Topics include democracy and human rights in Iran. Location: 1201 Connecticut Ave. NW.

BUSH-RICE _ 7 p.m. Elisabeth Bumiller, formerly of the New York Times, and Steve Weisman of the Times discuss the problems covering President Bush and Secretary of State Rice, sponsored by the National Press Club and SPJ. Location: National Press Club.

ELECTIONS-SLATE _ 8 p.m. George Washington University and Slate host panel discussion on the mid-term elections. With John Dickerson, Slate's chief political correspondentl; Mickey Kaus, Slate's ``Kausfiles"; others. Location: GWU, Morton Audit., 805 21st St. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0086418

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, OCTOBER 26, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

In Berlin, Gonzales Urges Europeans To Receive Released Detainees ... 3
Cheney Confirms US Has Used "Water-Boarding" To Question Al Qaeda Detainees ... 3
US Proposes Limits To Contacts Between Detainees And Their Lawyers ... 3
Binalshibh Files Legal Challenge To Detention, Seeks Lawyer ... 3
Teen Once Detained As Potential Terrorist Says She Faces Mutilation If Deported ... 3

Homeland Response:

Federal Agencies Sharpen Surveillance Methods ... 4
Grassley Demands FBI Brief Congress On Its Anthrax Investigation ... 4
DHS Pushing Mass-Evacuation Planning ... 5
Expert Sees Holes In Freight Rail Security ... 5
Little Progress Seen On TSA ID Programs ... 5

War News:

A "Somber" Bush Says He Is "Not Satisfied" With Iraq Situation ... 5
Maliki Says He Did Not Agree To US Timelines ... 7
US-Led Forces Raid Sadr City ... 8
Author Suggests Bin Laden Wants US To Pull Out Of Iraq ... 8
Situation In Iraq Said To Strengthen Syria Domestically, Internationally ... 8
NYTimes Slams "Contracting Fiascos" In Iraq Reconstruction ... 9
NBC's Engel Has Covered War Since It Began ... 9
Taliban Consolidates Control In Pakistani Region ... 9
Veterans Call For Mandatory Public Service Program ... 9
Author Calls For Expansion Of GI Bill Benefits ... 9
Fallen Soldiers Remembered ... 9

DOJ:

Acosta Sworn In As South Florida US Attorney ... 10

Corporate Scandals:

SEC Files Civil Charges Against Two In Fraud Scheme Targeting Korean Speakers ... 10
Judge Issues Secret Ruling In Nacchio Case ... 10
SEC Launches Probe Of Mutual-Fund Firms After Kickback Case Settlement ... 11
NASD Fines James River CEO For Market Timing Violations ... 11
US Argues Former AOL Officials Lied To Auditors ... 11
Austria Charges Nine In Refco Probe ... 11

Criminal Law:

Republicans Grumble About DOJ Pre-Election Probes ... 12
Gay Rights Group Fires Employee Who First Posted Foley Emails ... 13
Police Chiefs Discuss Rise In Crime At White House Meeting ... 13
FBI Investigating LANL Classified Material Found In Drug Raid ... 13
Gun Collector Jailed In Wales Murder Probe Seeks Venue Change ... 14
New Charges Filed In PRC Military Secrets Case ... 14
Philadelphia Mob Enforcer Arrested In Illegal Gambling Probe ... 14
Gotti Told Federal Investigators NYPD Detective Helped Mob Murder ... 14
Pellicano Says He Has Rejected Repeated Plea Bargain Offers 14
Former California Bank Manager Sentenced To Prison For Embezzlement ... 15
Texas Church Employee Sentenced To 12 Years For Child Porn Possession ... 15
Florida Executes Man For 1990 Killings Of Five Students ... 15
DC Police Web Site Plots Crime In Street-By-Street Detail ... 15
DOJ Webcast Helps Local Police Departments With Recruitment Issues ... 16

Civil Law:

Philip Morris Case Seen As Showing Roberts Court's Hand On Business Issues ... 16
Warsaw, IN, Seen As Center Of Orthopedic Device Industry ... 16

Civil Rights:

Required Voter Lists Often Contain Errors ... 16
Georgia Election Board Roiled By Voter ID Letter Dispute ... 17
Manassas, VA, May Face Second Suit Over Permit Bias ... 17
New Jersey Court Rules Gay Couples Have Same Rights As Heterosexual Couples ... 17
Civil Liberties Endangered By Expanded DNA Collection, Experts Warn ... 19
Close Vote Expected On South Dakota Abortion Referendum ... 19
New Voting Equipment Could Cause Election Day Problems ... 20
Target Sued By Advocacy Group For Blind Over Web Site ... 20
NAACP Chairman, Judge Brown To Attend White House Fellowship Program Meeting ... 20

Antitrust:

FCC Seen Likely To Avoid Net Neutrality Debate In AT&T-BellSouth Ruling ... 20
Constellation, FPL Abandon Merger Plans ... 21
Yankee Candle Agrees To $1.4 Billion Buyout By Equity Firm ... 21
Administration To Issue Position On Dot-Com IPO Class Action Case ... 22
Clear Channel Radio Chain Said To Be Up For Sale ... 22
Dewey, Orrick Close To Merger ... 22
Blackstone Group To Expand Private-Equity Fund ... 22
NYSE To Purchase Rest Of American Stock Exchange Stake ... 22
German Antitrust Regulators Nix Coherent's Proposed Excel Buy ... 23

Environment/Indian Affairs:

US Tells 9th Circuit Hawaii Stryker Unit Is Vital ... 23
Russia Threatens Criminal Charges Over Shell Natural Gas Project ... 23
NYTimes Criticizes Bush Recess Appointment For Mine Safety Agency ... 24
Apache Police Chief, Tribal Officer Arrested On Embezzlement Charges ... 24

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Maine Civil Liberties Union Releases Peace Group Emails Collected By FBI ... 24
FBI Arrests Chicago Police Officers In Drug Money Theft Sting ... 24
California Jailer Snared By FBI Bribery Sting ... 25
Authorities Say Colorado Ring Hid Meth Inside Elmo Doll, Other Toys ... 25
DEA Agent Accused Of Tipping Off Friends About Cocaine-Trafficking Investigation ... 25
FBI, California Police Arrest 15 In Crackdown On Violent Drug Gang ... 26
US Charges New York Man With "Club Drug" Smuggling ... 26
Owner Of New York Pharmacy Accused Of Illegally Distributing Painkiller ... 26
Trial Date Set In Sacramento For Accused "Drug Kingpin." ... 26
Big-City Mayors Lead Efforts To Curb Gun Violence ... 26
Texas Gun Dealer Pleads Guilty To Illegal Firearm Sales ... 27
Old West Town Still Plagued By Guns, Now Carried By Gangs ... 27
Fugitive Killed In Georgia While Pointing Shoe At Agents ... 27

Immigration:

Immigration Officials Arrest California Man Linked To Murder Of Salvadoran Priests ... 28
Arizona Seen As Microcosm For Nation On Immigration Debate ... 28

Tax:

Charitable Giving By Wealthy Said To Be Immune To Tax Changes ... 28
IRS Help Line May Not Be Much Help, Audit Finds ... 29

Congress-Administration:

Portman Says A Democratic Congress Would Boost Spending, Raise Taxes ... 29
OMB Set To Roll "Smart Card" IDs For Federal Employees ... 29

Other News:

Fed Leaves Interest Rates Unchanged ... 29
Report Faults Amtrak For Management Of Outside Counsel ... 30
Poll Finds Majority Believe Democrats Will Retake House Majority ... 30
Republicans Raise Specter Of "Speaker Pelosi" In Closing Days Of Campaign ... 31
Democrats Hope To Win Upstate New York House Races ... 32
Kentucky's 4th CD Race A Test For Democrats' Effort To Nationalize Campaign ... 32
GOP Faces Hostile Political Environment In Ohio ... 32
Trade Issues The Focus Of North Carolina 8th CD Race ... 33
Herbert Says Indiana 2nd CD Voters Lack Confidence In Both Parties ... 33
Schumer Surprised At Extent Of Democrats' Senate Prospects ... 33
RNC Pulls Controversial Tennessee Senate Ad ... 34
Unusual Number Of Conservative Democrats Running For House ... 34
Controversy Over Michael J. Fox Ad Raises Stem Cell Issue Into National Debate ... 35
NRSC To Spend $3.5 Million On Ads In Closing Days Of New Jersey Senate Race ... 36
Steele, Cardin Clash In "Tempestuous" Debate ... 36
Allen, Webb Both Support Revisions To No Child Left Behind ... 37
Republicans Hope For Upset In Michigan Senate Race ... 37
Connecticut Senate Race Seen As Harbinger For US Involvement In Iraq ... 38
Sophisticated "Google Bombing" Campaign Targets 50 Republicans ... 38
Poll Finds Majorities Of Arab Americans Backing Democratic Candidates ... 38
Woman Claims Bribe Offer Made Over Allegations Of Gibbons Assault ... 39
Late Campaign Stress Leads Candidates To Make Ill-Advised Statements ... 39
Doubts About Hillary Clinton's "Authenticity" Said To Remain ... 39
US Said To Be Facing Growing Skills Gap ... 39
Brooks Says US Entering Era Of Ideological Dealignment ... 39
Liberal Radio Network Seen As Evading Campaign Contribution Limits ... 40
Bush "Assassination" Movie Faces Marketing Challenges ... 40
WPost Backs DC-Beijing Flights ... 40
WSJournal Says Decline In Oil Prices Shows Folly Of "Windfall Profits" Tax ... 40
US, European Allies At Odds Over Iran Resolution ... 40
Rice Prods South Korea On Sanctions ... 42
Bush, Dominican Leader Agree To Push Trade Accord ... 42
Putin Says He Won't Run Again, But Vows To Remain Influential ... 42
Contest For Latin American Security Council Seat Still Stalled ... 43
US Officials Concerned By Rights Abuses In Colombia ... 43
Nicaraguan Congress Expected To Ban All Abortions ... 43
Brutal War Between Drug Gangs Underway In Mexico ... 44
South African Political Analyst Denied Entry Into US ... 44
Activists Urge UN Action Against Regime In Burma ... 44

DOJ_NMG_0086421

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages 44

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington 45

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

In Berlin, Gonzales Urges Europeans To Receive Released Detainees. The AP (10/26) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said European countries should do more to take back detainees released from the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, while defending Washington's treatment of prisoners." The AP continues, "Gonzales is touring European capitals to discuss a recently passed U.S. law covering the prosecution of terror suspects. … Speaking in Berlin at an event organized by the German Marshall Fund, he said the United States is 'not interested in serving as the world's jailer,' and urged Europeans to be more willing to repatriate released prisoners, as well as to increase pressure on third countries to do so. … 'Despite demands from others that Guantanamo be closed, the United States has received little help from our European allies regarding the fate of these detainees,' Gonzales said." The AP adds, "Gonzales also detailed the U.S. Military Commissions Act, a law that provides for trials of captured terrorists, saying it was proof that 'just because the U.S. still believes a state of war exists, that does not mean that the rule of law has no place.' … Gonzales was conciliatory toward expressions of frustration from German members of parliament who attended the discussion over what they view as insufficient respect by the United States for international law. … 'We understand the anxiety and the tension this has created,' Gonzales said. However, he urged German and other allies to be open for discussion, saying 'we need you in the long haul as partners.'"

Cheney Confirms US Has Used "Water-Boarding" To Question Al Qaeda Detainees. McClatchy (10/26, Landay) reports, "Vice President Dick Cheney has confirmed that US interrogators subjected captured senior al-Qaida suspects to a controversial interrogation technique called 'water-boarding,' which creates a sensation of drowning." Cheney "indicated that the Bush administration doesn't regard water-boarding as torture and allows the CIA to use it. 'It's a no-brainer for me,' Cheney said at one point in an interview." Cheney's comments, "in a White House interview on Tuesday with a conservative radio talk show host, appeared to reflect the Bush administration's view that the president has the constitutional power to do whatever he deems necessary to fight terrorism."

US Proposes Limits To Contacts Between Detainees And Their Lawyers. The AP (10/26, Melia) reports, "The US government has proposed limiting contact between defense lawyers and detainees at Guantanamo Bay, according to court documents." The government "argues that it must restrict the detainees' communications, as news of world events could incite the prisoners to violence." The US "proposed the rules in a filing to a federal appeals court in Washington that was examined by The Associated Press. The case deals with an Afghani detainee but the government wants them to apply to other prisoners at Guantanamo Bay Naval Base in southeast Cuba. The prison camp holds some 430 detainees."

Binalshibh Files Legal Challenge To Detention, Seeks Lawyer. The Washington Post (10/26, A3, Leonnig, Tate, 748K) reports admitted 9/11 planner Ramzi Binalshibh "filed a legal challenge in federal court in Washington on Oct. 10, asserting his rights to contest his detention and requesting that a court-appointed lawyer represent him free of charge. In so doing, Binalshibh brought to life the two arguments at the heart of the recent, furious debate over stripping such habeas corpus rights from so-called enemy combatants: the administration's position that alleged terrorists like him do not deserve access to U.S. courts, and his opponents' assertion that the American justice system is a model for the world precisely because it accords such basic rights to all." The Post notes, "Because of Binalshibh's alleged admission that he was a key player in the Hamburg cell that carried out the attacks, his legal suit may provide the starkest test yet of America's justice system, legal experts said."

Teen Once Detained As Potential Terrorist Says She Faces Mutilation If Deported. In a story taking a sympathetic tone toward 18-year-old Manhattan resident Adama Bah, jailed for six weeks on suspicion of being a potential suicide bomber, the New York Times (10/26, Bernstein, 1.21M) reports that she is "still wearing an electronic ankle bracelet and tethered to a 10 p.m. government curfew, restrictions that were conditions of her release." Bah also faces "deportation to Guinea, where she has not lived since she was 2. Today, at a closed hearing in Manhattan's federal building, she will plead for political asylum from Guinea's entrenched practice of female genital mutilation, which has marked all the women in her extended family, including her mother. … 'I'm worried about being sent back,' Ms. Bah said on Tuesday in her first extended interview about the lasting consequences of a case that briefly became a cause célèbre in the debate over government vigilance and the protection of individual liberties."

DOJ_NMG_0086422

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Federal Agencies Sharpen Surveillance Methods. Government Executive (10/26, Marino) reports, "A senior Coast Guard official on Tuesday praised homeland security and intelligence agencies' efforts to develop new surveillance tools and bolster information sharing." GE continues, "Guy Thomas, the Coast Guard's science and technology adviser, said improved surveillance techniques would help provide better protection against the possibility of attacks launched from boats offshore. … A 60- to 70-foot boat loaded with ordinary explosives and a biological or chemical weapon could deliver and spread a deadly substance - five pounds of anthrax, for example - to coastal areas with thousands of people, Thomas said. 'I don't think I want to live in Los Angeles anymore,' he told guests of the Border Management Summit, which was organized by the Institute for Defense and Government Advancement." GE adds, "Protecting the coastal waters requires improved sensory techniques, an official with a company that provides security solutions said. He said his company has been working on multiple projects aimed at identifying incoming ships from farther away to detect suspicious ones. Recent advances mean that even the material from which a ship is built -- whether it is wood, plastic or metal -- can be determined from a distance, he said. … As part of more general efforts to improve surveillance, technology capable of recording biometric identifiers such as leg or facial muscle movement without alerting the subject is being refined. Gait recognition, for instance, is part of the 'long-range surveillance' that the FBI may start using to help track suspects, said Duane Blackburn, the bureau's representative to the National Science and Technology Council. It remains in the research phase, and is being tested at universities, Blackburn said. … Other techniques in development include keystroke analyses of typing rhythms, and the production of video and photographic images clear enough to display biometric patterns. … Like gait surveillance, these remain in the early research stages. 'Video is a real challenge,' said Christopher Miles, senior program manager of the Justice Department's National Institute of Justice."

Grassley Demands FBI Brief Congress On Its Anthrax Investigation. FNC News Live PM (10/25, 2:06 p.m., Jane Skinner) reported, "Five years after those deadly anthrax attacks in this country, there is nobody in custody. The FBI does not seem to be any closer to solving the case. Those attacks killed five people, infected 17 back in 2001. Now, a top Republican is slamming the Justice Department, saying the FBI may actually have botched the investigation. … According to senior Republican, the FBI gave a briefing to Congress on the anthrax case more than two and a half years ago because there were so many leaks in the media. Now Senator Charles Grassley is joining other lawmakers to question whether the bureau has messed up the case and that's the real reason the FBI Is unwilling to talk about it. Senator Grassley has written a letter of complaint to the Attorney General."

At least two local television networks reported that Senator Charles Grassley sent a letter to attorney general Alberto Gonzales, slamming the FBI's refusal to brief Congress on its investigation into the 2001 anthrax attacks. WXIX-TV Cincinnati, (10/25, 10:28 p.m.) broadcasted, "A top ranking Republican wants answers from the FBI about the lack of results from its five-year anthrax investigation. In a letter to attorney general Alberto Gonzales, Iowa Senator Charles Grassley says numerous questions need to be answered both about the investigation itself and how the FBI has handled it. Grassley calls the FBI's refusal to brief Congress over the last several years 'outrageous.'"

KHON-TV Honolulu, (10/25, 5:32 p.m.) broadcasted, "A top ranking Republican wants answers from the FBI about the lack of results from its five- year anthrax investigation. Iowa senator Charles Grassley says numerous questions need to be answered both about the investigation itself and how the FBI has handled it. Grassley calls the FBI's refusal to brief congress over the last several years 'outrageous.'"

Judge Issues Two-Day Stay For NYTimes To Reveal Hatfill Sources. The New York Sun (10/26, Gerstein) reports, "A federal judge gave the New York Times a brief reprieve from an order forcing it to identify confidential sources for columns about the 2001 anthrax attacks, but the paper could still face the possibility of being held in contempt of court as soon as tomorrow. Judge Claude Hilton of Alexandria, Va., issued a two-day stay of a magistrate's order that would have required the Times to name the sources by yesterday" for Steven Hatfill's lawsuit claiming "he was defamed by five columns written by Nicholas Kristof." Judge Hilton said "that he was still reviewing whether the Times should be compelled to identify the sources. … But the Times suffered a setback yesterday when Judge Hilton upheld a magistrate's ruling denying its request to suspend action on the libel suit until the government completes its investigation into the anthrax mailings."

DOJ_NMG_0086423

DHS Pushing Mass-Evacuation Planning. The Washington Post (10/26, A23, Hsu, 748K) reports, "Making a familiar case for more roads and using the newer argument of homeland security, a trade association for highway builders and the automotive industry recently gave most of the nation's biggest metropolitan areas failing grades for how well they would evacuate their populations in a disaster." The American Highways Users Alliance gave failed twenty of 37 urban areas, including "New York City, Los Angeles, Chicago, Philadelphia and Washington." The report cards followed a DHS study over released this summer that found mass-evacuation plans "inadequate in about 90 percent of the nation's top 75 cities and 'an area of profound concern.' Pushed by Congress, DHS will award $1.3 billion in homeland security grants next year, partly on the basis of fixing them." However, "many state and local officials warn that Washington is focusing too much on a replay of a Katrina-like disaster instead of drawing broader lessons about preparedness."

Expert Sees Holes In Freight Rail Security. Kevin M. Lynch, a former captain of police for the Conrail Police Department and a consultant on railroad police practices, in an op-ed in the Washington Times (10/26, 88K) writes that while the US has been successful thus far in "creating a safer air traffic system" following 9/11, the nation's freight railroad infrastructure "remains vulnerable to attack and sabotage." However, "Even since September 11, the freight railroads have continued to trim their police departments." Lynch says the answer to this security issue "is to stop giving lip service to protection and prevention and to fence strategic railroad property and drastically increase the number of sworn railroad police officers across the nation."

Little Progress Seen On TSA ID Programs. In an article appearing on no fewer than 38 news websites, the AP (10/25, Miller) reported, "Two anti-terrorism ID programs have been sent back to the drawing board and a third is being farmed out to private companies after costing hundreds of millions of dollars. … So far, the Transportation Security Administration _ which has been overseeing development of the three programs_ has not gone beyond testing, has issued no IDs and has screened no passengers against terrorist lists." TSA chief Kip Hawley said this week that the Transportation Worker Identity Credential, Secure Flight and Registered Traveler programs "by their very nature use expensive and unreliable advanced technology. All three are back on track, Hawley said." However, documents obtained by The Associated Press, show that on each of the three projects, "the TSA and contractors hired by the agency have spent more than anticipated, missed deadlines and raised questions about their ability to protect the public's privacy and the private sector's commercial interests."

WAR NEWS:

A "Somber" Bush Says He Is "Not Satisfied" With Iraq Situation. The AP (10/26, Hunt) reports, "Acknowledging painful losses in Iraq, President Bush said Wednesday he is not satisfied with the progress of the long and unpopular war, but he still insisted the United States was winning and should not think about withdrawing. Thirteen days before elections in which Republicans fear Iraq could cost them control of the House or Senate, Bush expressed unwavering confidence in Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, the US generals running the war and Iraq's prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, despite new strains between Baghdad and Washington." Said Bush, "The ultimate accountability rests with me. If people are unhappy about it, look right to the president." In answer to a question, the President said, "I know many Americans are not satisfied with the situation in Iraq. … I'm not satisfied either." However, he added that "the United States was changing tactics to deal with circumstances in Iraq but shouldn't change the overall direction of the war. 'Absolutely we're winning,' the president asserted."

The President's comments received heavy coverage, leading two of the major network newscasts and receiving front page articles in major newspapers. The network news devoted just under 13 minutes to the story in aggregate. Most of the coverage continued to be negative toward the President. There were some exceptions, however, as some media reports an opinion pieces praised Bush's "candor." The CBS Evening News (10/25, lead story, 2:55, Axelrod, 7.66M), for example, said "Bush took the podium with rare candor about the mess in Iraq." However, added CBS, "as soon as the questions began, it was back to familiar territory. Resolute and defiant." And the Los Angeles Times (10/26, 918K), usually very critical of Bush's Iraq policies, editorializes this morning, "If there was good news from President Bush's news conference Wednesday, it's that the president is not adopting a bunker mentality and is addressing the deteriorating conditions in Iraq. The bad news is that the more he talks, the more apparent it becomes that there is no easy way to reverse them." That is "a painful admission for an administration two weeks before a midterm election, so any sense of despair was wrapped in more purposeful language." The Times concludes, "Here's hoping that it won't get much worse in the next two weeks, and that Bush will be more candid about his plans on Nov. 8."

Media coverage generally focuses on what is seen as a new demeanor on Bush's part – described as "somber" in several stories – and also a change in his rhetoric. NBC Nightly News (10/25, lead story, 3:25, Gregory, 9.87M) Gregory) said Bush was "somber as he acknowledged the public's anxiety and anger over Iraq. At the same time he was also insistent that US losses in Iraq are worth it." NBC Nightly News (10/25, story 3, 2:00, Russert, 9.87M) later reported, "The one thing every candidate's, Democratic or Republican polls show is pessimism about Iraq. The President knows that. He had to come forward to reassure the American people that he has a plan. That he is not being overly stubborn about Iraq, and that he is not stuck, as he would say, in the ground on Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0086424

The CBS Evening News (10/25, story 3, 1:45, Schieffer, 7.66M) said, "Most polls show the majority believe it was wrong to go there and it's making no difference to keep our troops there. That is what the President is trying to change that attitude." Couric: "While there is all very nuanced today did represent a shift in the President's stance, didn't it?" Schieffer: "I think what it represents is a change in tone." The CBS Evening News (10/25, story 4, 1:55, Couric, 7.66M) also reported, "What are voters saying about the President's latest position on Iraq? The war is a big issue all over this country. Especially in Connecticut. So today I sat down with a group of Democrats and Republicans at a diner in Norwalk to get their take." Tommy Jackson, Pastor: "I've been encouraged by the President's position to pass two to three weeks. I hope this is not an election ploy but one that is sin veer." Alex Savvidis, dinner owner, was asked, "Are you encouraged by the President's words? No?" Savvidis: "No." Couric: "Why not?" Savvidis: "Just words. I want to see it. When I see it, I'll believe it."

Bush's "tone" is being linked to the homestretch of the midterm campaigns. The New York Times (10/26, Broder, 1.21M) says that with his "shift in tone and the suggestion of flexibility on tactics in Iraq," Bush "gambled Wednesday that he could rescue Republican candidates who are having a hard time defending the war and an even harder time running away from it." Bush's "decision to address the war and its problems so prominently carries the risk that he will strengthen the Democrats' case that the midterm election is primarily a referendum on his own handling of the war."

More negative is another New York Times piece (10/26, Stanley) that couples Bush's appearance with that of Madonna on the Oprah Winfrey Show. Both, says the Times, "are famous people famously under fire for a ruckus overseas. Both are famous for never bending to public opprobrium and for pushing their agendas with single-minded assurance. The president and the pop star went on television yesterday looking more like victims of circumstances beyond their control than visionaries." Both "showed viewers an unfamiliar side of themselves. The president, whose political identity is founded on an image of unwavering cowboy resolve, looked uncertain and chastened behind the lectern, at one moment staring downward and gnawing his lip in a rare tableau of weary anxiety."

But in several reports, Bush is accused of changing his rhetoric without altering the substance of his Iraq policies. MSNBC (10/25, Shuster) reported "a sober President Bush admitted what most Americans have been saying for a year: that the Iraq war is not going well. … But the only change from President Bush today seemed to be his words, not his policy. The President did not offer a new strategy for stopping the loss of American lives or preventing an all-out Iraqi civil war. … Now just 13 days before the Congressional elections, the President is caught between his own party getting bludgeoned over the Iraq war and suggestions he is making changes only because of domestic politics."

Along similar lines, ABC World News (10/25, story 3, 2:45, Stephanopoulos, 8.78M) said the President "displayed a variety of moods. Somber," as well as "assured" and "combative." Stephanopoulos added, "The President pushed today, flexibility." Stephanopoulos added, "The only evidence in the change in tactics is the President's promise that he is working with the Iraqi government to develop benchmarks for progress on security, reconstruction and political reconciliation. But he refused to spell out any consequences if those goals are not met." The Washington Post (10/26, A17, Ricks, 748K) makes a similar point, reporting, "The text of President Bush's news conference yesterday ran to nearly 10,000 words, but what may have been more significant were the things he did not say. The president talked repeatedly about 'benchmarks' for progress in Iraq, using that word 13 times." But "he did not discuss the consequences of the Iraqi government missing those targets. Such a question, he said, was 'hypothetical.'" That response "left unclear how the benchmarks would be different from previous times when the United States has set out intentions, only to back down."

In a front page article, the New York Times (10/26, A1, Rutenberg, 1.21M) describes Bush's remarks as "the latest iteration in a recent rhetorical evolution that has seen him move from vowing to 'stay the course' in Iraq to promising flexibility." Still, "Bush indicated no major changes in his overall strategy in Iraq, saying he continued to support Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and the generals overseeing the war." He also "urged Americans to look beyond the violence…and avoid disillusionment over a war he said was being won."

Also in a front page story, the Washington Post (10/26, Baker, 748K) focuses on the President's assertion the US is winning, reporting the President was "trying to walk a careful line between optimism and pessimism" and "balance a variety of competing ideas." The Los Angeles Times (10/16, Gerstenzang, 918K) headlines its story "Bush Takes Sober Iraq Tone but Says Goals 'Unchanging,'" and describes Bush's remarks as "a strenuous attempt to shore up pre-election support for the Iraq war, acknowledged three years of setbacks Wednesday and expressed dissatisfaction over a frustrating and deadly month." The Wall Street Journal

DOJ_NMG_0086425

(10/26, Pulizzi, 2.03M) says "with the debate over the strategy in Iraq heating up two weeks ahead of the mid-term Congressional elections, Wednesday's press conference was billed as a chance for Mr. Bush to give the public an update on the war."

The Financial Times (10/26, Daniel) also describes the press conference as "sombre," and says Bush "spent nearly 15 minutes in an opening statement trying to knit together often-contradictory arguments." He "moved from expressing 'serious concern' about Iraq, while emphasising progress was being made, to being resolute about the ultimate outcome in the country but flexible about military tactics to attain that end."

The Washington Times (10/26, Curl, 88K), meanwhile, says Bush was "combative and defensive at times," adding "Democrats on Capitol Hill immediately took aim at Mr. Bush. 'President Bush's Iraq policy has been a dismal failure. The president has abandoned his "stay the course" slogan; it is long past time he abandon his "stay the course," policy,' House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said." Added Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, "The Bush administration's Iraq policy, like Iraq itself, is in complete disarray. One day, the administration calls for a timetable, the next day, Iraqi Prime Minister Maliki objects to it. ... One day, it's stay the course, the next day, it's change the course."

Appearing on MSNBC's Hardball (10/25, Matthews), Democratic Sen. Richard Durbin echoed those criticism, saying, "The only change I saw is the President started to acknowledge the position that the Democrats have held for a long time, a position which suggests this would be a year of change, that we would be talking to the Iraqi government in no uncertain terms about their responsibility to defend their own country, talking about timetables. But it was a lot of brave talk two weeks before an election, but no real change in strategy, in terms of where he's going."

USA Today (10/26, 2.27M), meanwhile, says in an editorial, "There is little doubting the sincerity of…Bush's commitment to the mission in Iraq. On Wednesday, amid sinking public approval less than two weeks before congressional elections, Bush set out yet another course for a victory he optimistically predicted was achievable." The President's "conviction is obvious. But whether it's supported by facts -- and whether there's a real path to victory as he defines it -- is dubious. There continues to be a yawning gap between his rhetoric and reality."

Snow Defends US Flexibility In Iraq. Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, writes in USA Today (10/26, 2.27M), "It seems odd to be defending the commanding general and the US ambassador to Iraq from charges that they don't understand the situation in the country in which they work, especially when the complaining sages live thousands of miles from the battlefront. The business of war requires constant vigilance, enterprise and determination. Our goal and a key to our security at home: to help Iraq sustain, govern and defend itself, and emerge as a key ally in the war on terror. We have pursued that aim according to the challenges on the ground and have adjusted to shifting realities -- from the early resistance by Saddam Hussein's armies, to early battles in such places as Fallujah to today's Iraq, where 14 of 18 provinces live in relative peace. Gen. George Casey noted earlier this week that 90% of the violence in Iraq now occurs within a 30-mile radius of Baghdad. … The combined Iraqi-U.S. forces will win that fight, as they have every other engagement of the war. But peace in Iraq will require more than superiority of arms. Iraqis need some other basics for good and free lives — a political system that will guarantee rights and representation for all, and an economy that can provide jobs." Snow adds that when the enemy adjust its "tactics, we must adjust ours, taking the fight to them. That is what we have done and what we will continue to do. And we will win."

Iraq Seen As A Negative For Republican Candidates. The Washington Post (10/26, A1, Slevin, Powell, 748K) reports, "Just three months ago, Republican strategists believed that doubts about Iraq could be contained -- or even turned into an electoral advantage -- if the battle was framed as a vital front in the war against terrorism. Voters would be invited to choose: Stand firm or capitulate." But "the issue is not playing out that way. In both parties, a consensus now exists -- buttressed by polls -- that disaffection with a war grown costly and difficult to manage is the gravest threat to continued Republican rule." Iraq "is not only a potent issue in its own right, but is also a resonant metaphor for doubts about the competence and accountability of the Republican Party."

The AP (10/25) reports Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, visiting New Hampshire, said if Republicans "want to succeed on Election Day, they should turn their focus away from the Iraq war." Frist said, "The challenge is to get Americans to focus on pocketbook issues, and not on the Iraq and terror issue."

Maliki Says He Did Not Agree To US Timelines.

NBC Nightly News (10/25, story 2, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There appears to be something of a disconnect between what we heard from the White House today and what is going on the ground." NBC (Engel) added, "Certainly a disconnect. Yesterday the top US officials in Iraq announced the Iraqi government had accepted a planned time line. Today the Iraqi prime minister said not so and accused Washington of trying to bully him. Anger and defiance today on the streets of Baghdad and from the prime minister. … Maliki went on the defensive claiming he did not approve the raid. … Then Maliki went further, yesterday US officials claimed his government developed a timetable for economic and political process. Maliki today said this government represents the will of the people and no one has the right to impose a timetable on us."

DOJ_NMG_0086426

ABC World News (10/25, story 4, 2:10, McCarthy, 8.78M) reported, "About-face. Only yesterday, the US Ambassador announced Prime Minister Maliki had signed off on a timetable for change. Today, Maliki said he had agreed to no such thing. … Maliki went further, saying the US timetable giving him 12 to 18 months to take over security was influenced by the upcoming US elections. Truth is, he wants to be seen as his own man. The Prime Minister demanded an explanation for a US led raid, launched this morning in Baghdad's Sadr City."

The CBS Evening News (10/25, story 2, 2:10, Loganc, 7.66M) reported, "The Prime Minister has repeatedly promised to disarm militias, a promise that so far has seen no results. Not surprising, considering every major political group in the Iraqi government has its own militia."

The AP (10/26, Bodeen) described Maliki as "angry," while the Washington Post (10/26, A15, Anderson, 748K) says he "lashed out at the United States on Wednesday, saying his popularly elected government would not bend to U.S.-imposed benchmarks and timelines." He "accused US officials of election-year grandstanding, saying that deadlines were not logical." Maliki also "distanced himself from and criticized a U.S.-Iraqi military "deadly early-morning…raid in Sadr City" intended to capture the leader of a Shiite death squad "that left at least five people dead and 20 wounded."

McClatchy (10/26, Youssef) describes US and Iraqi officials as "increasingly at odds over strategy and goals, a division that American officials in Iraq say is making it harder to pursue their objectives in Iraq." The New York Times (10/26, Tavernise, 1.21M) also says Malikis's comments "pointed to a widening schism between the Shiite-led Iraqi government and the Americans who support it." Maliki "tailored his remarks to a domestic audience, reassuring the millions of Shiites who form his power base that he would not bend to pressure by the American government," as "the very forces that elevated him to power and whose support he must retain — religious Shiite parties with their own militias — are complicit in the violence." He is "forced to navigate between the rising tide of frustration among Shiites who form his base and the American government that wields the power." Makili's stance "fits snugly inside the circle of hardening Shiite sentiment that the American military, in keeping full control of security, has not given the Iraqi government full power to intervene when Sunni militias or insurgents carry out sectarian cleansing."

The Financial Times (10/26, Negus) lead that Maliki "dismissed Washington's claim that Iraqi politicians had agreed a timetable." The "statements were a challenge to US officials" and "suggest that Mr Maliki either believes that Washington has no option but to continue backing his government, or feels that he cannot afford to alienate other members of his Shia-led coalition."

In a separate front page story focusing on the President's comments on Iraq, the Washington Post (10/26, A1, Baker, 748K) reports that Bush and Maliki's "dueling messages" have "exposed rising tensions between Washington and Baghdad as the fighting worsens." In another New York Times (10/26, Rutenberg, 1.21M) also on the President's Iraq comments, Bush "expressed general support for Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq, even as Mr. Maliki used his own news conference to distance himself from the United States." The US and Iraq's "political tumult…carries the potential to drive them further apart."

USA Today (10/26, Jackson, Jervis, 2.27M) runs a similar report under the headline "Iraqi Leader Bristles At Idea Of Timetable." The Washington Times/AP (10/26, Yacoub),among other newspapers, also runs a story on Maliki's comments.

US-Led Forces Raid Sadr City. The Los Angeles Times (10/26, Roug, 918K) reports US-led forces battled insurgents in Baghdad's Sadr City "during a rare foray into the capital's vast Shiite Muslim slum. Troops searching for an alleged death squad leader called in airstrikes when they came under attack, killing four people, according to Iraqi authorities." While the US military said the raid "had been authorized by the Iraqi government," PM Nouri al-Maliki "quickly renounced the operation. He told reporters at a news conference that the raid was an example of the continued lack of coordination between Iraqi and American officials." Maliki said, "We are going to request some explanations from the multinational forces to prevent a similar incident and to ensure coordination with the Iraqi security forces."

Author Suggests Bin Laden Wants US To Pull Out Of Iraq. In a New York Times (10/26, 1.21M) op-ed, the New America Foundation's Peter Bergen, author of "The Osama bin Laden I Know: An Oral History of Al Qaeda's Leader," writes under the headline "What Osama Wants" that for the US to "pull entirely out" of Iraq now "would be to snatch an unqualified disaster from the jaws of an enormous blunder. … Vietnam often looms large in the debate over Iraq, but the better analogy is what happened in Afghanistan since the Soviet invasion," when the end of US aid helped lead to the "rise of the Taliban and its Qaeda allies. We can't make the same mistake again in Iraq. A total withdrawal from Iraq would play into the hands of the jihadist terrorists."

Situation In Iraq Said To Strengthen Syria Domestically, Internationally. The Washington Post (10/26, A18, Knickmeyer, 748K) reports, "Horror at the bloodshed accompanying the U.S. effort to bring democracy to Iraq has accomplished what human rights activists, analysts and others say Syrian President Bashar al-Assad had been unable to do by himself: silence public demands for democratic reforms here." After "Iraq's descent into sectarian and ethnic war… even Syrian activists concede that the country's feeble rights movement is moribund." Now, "Advocates of democracy are equated now with supporters of America, even 'traitors.'" Additionally, "the erosion of U.S. stature over Iraq and Lebanon has put Syria in position to try to improve its regional and world standing without giving in to the reform demands of the United States, diplomats and analysts said." While "the United States and the European Union have officially isolated Syria since the February 2005 bombing that killed former Lebanese prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri in Beirut," after this summer's conflict in Lebanon, "Spain, Italy and Germany have renewed contacts…calling Syria's help vital to averting further conflict there."

DOJ_NMG_0086427

NYTimes Slams "Contracting Fiascos" In Iraq Reconstruction. The New York Times (10/26, 1.21M) editorializes, "When the full encyclopedia of Bush administration misfeasance in Iraq is compiled, it will have to include a lengthy section on the contracting fiascos that wasted billions of taxpayer dollars in the name of rebuilding the country. It isn't only money that was lost. Washington's disgraceful failure to deliver on its promises to restore electricity, water and oil distribution, and to rebuild education and health facilities, turned millions of once sympathetic Iraqis against the American presence. Their discovery that the world's richest, most technologically advanced country could not restore basic services to minimal prewar levels left an impression of American weakness and, worse, of indifference to the well-being of ordinary Iraqis. That further poisoned a situation already soured by White House intelligence breakdowns, military misjudgments and political blunders."

NBC's Engel Has Covered War Since It Began. In the Washington Post (10/26, C1, 748K), Howard Kurtz profiles NBC's Richard Engel, who "has logged more time in Iraq than any other television correspondent, chronicling 3 1/2 years of carnage." NBC anchor Brian Williams said of Engel, "In an era of instant media criticism, he calls balls and strikes in the middle of a war zone. He is completely unbothered by any Web site that may have problems with his reporting while he's over in Iraq dodging bullets. … He is the most agenda-less person I've met in our business, I think, in the past 20 years."

Taliban Consolidates Control In Pakistani Region. The Washington Times (10/26, Wilkinson, 88K) reports, "Taliban militias in Pakistan have set up offices, introduced taxes and taken control of justice in the tribal agency of North Waziristan, where last month the government signed a peace agreement with militants." And in "violation of the agreement, a Taliban shura, or council, distributed pamphlets of its policies while militants patrolled the area's streets. They have already killed numerous 'American spies.'"

Veterans Call For Mandatory Public Service Program. In a USA Today (10/26, 2.27M) op-ed, professor Hodding Carter and attorney Ronald Goldfarb, both veterans, write, "As with so many Americans of our generation, we went into military service because that was what you were expected to do. We may have groused at the time, but we are proud of having served our country. It carved a few years out of our lives in the 1950s and '60s, but strengthened our understanding of the country we served and the people with whom we served. … On the campaign trail these days, there are few fresh ideas, and in the wake of the fifth 9/11 anniversary, there are still not enough calls for public sacrifice beyond that made by our troops. … What does the citizen owe the state? Answer: mandated public service without exemptions."

Author Calls For Expansion Of GI Bill Benefits. In a Los Angeles Times (10/26, 918K) op-ed, Edward Humes, author of "Over Here: How the GI Bill Transformed the American Dream," calls for "A GI Bill For The 21st Century," says the 1944 GI Bill "transformed the nation and the very nature of the American dream, opening up the colleges, raising suburbs out of bean fields, creating a new middle class and providing the medical, engineering and scientific prowess that conquered long-feared diseases, ushered in the Information Age and helped win the Cold War. There was never anything like the GI Bill. There's nothing like it on the horizon. And that's a problem. Today's veterans are getting shortchanged. Instead of a full ride to any college, the modern GI Bill's education support tops out at $36,000 for a four-year degree -- barely enough to cover the average state university. … Forget about the private colleges once covered by the GI Bill -- $36,000 would pay for only a year at many of them. Reservists and National Guard troops in Iraq receive even less. … But this is not simply a story of slighted veterans, scandalous as that may be. This is a story of a United States no longer investing it its future. The GI Bill was an engine of opportunity for all of us."

Fallen Soldiers Remembered. The CBS Evening News (10/25, story 11, 2:45, Couric, 7.66M) said, "As we hear about the rising American death toll in Iraq, we sometimes forget that these are not just statistics. They're sons and daughters, husbands and wives, fathers and mothers." After profiling the family of Army Cpl. David Unger of Kansas, CBS (Pitts) added, "The Pentagon's released the names of scores of American soldiers killed in Iraq this month. They came from 29 states and Puerto Rico from Derek Jones of Salem Oregon to Nicholas Arvantis of Salem New Hampshire. Most were 25 years old or younger."

DOJ_NMG_0086428

DOJ:

Acosta Sworn In As South Florida US Attorney. The AP (10/26, Anderson) reports, "R. Alexander Acosta was formally sworn in Wednesday as South Florida's top federal prosecutor by Supreme Court Justice Samuel Alito Jr., for whom Acosta clerked shortly after graduating from Harvard Law School." The AP continues, "Alito recalled that during his clerkship in 1994 at the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, Acosta appeared to exercise good judgment and common sense at a young age and that 'and it has developed since then.' Alito, who is a big baseball fan, compared Acosta to players adept at all phases of the game. … 'He reminds me of one of those baseball players who can do everything,' Alito said." The AP adds, "Acosta, 37, a Miami native of Cuban ancestry, was confirmed by the U.S. Senate for the Southern District of Florida post on June 9. Before returning to Florida, he was assistant attorney general for civil rights at the U.S. Justice Department in Washington and prior to that was a member of the National Labor Relations Board. … The Miami job is one of the most prominent and busiest in the country, covering a district that is home to some 6 million people in nine counties. Its major recent cases range from alleged al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff to the Colombian brothers who ran the Cali cocaine cartel."

The Miami Herald (10/26, Weaver) reports, "Alito said that for all his formidable legal talent, Acosta betrayed one 'weakness' when he served as a law clerk in 1994 for the then-federal appellate judge. … 'Alex's knowledge of sports was a little bit lacking,' Alito deadpanned before a standing-room-only gathering of judges, prosecutors and defense lawyers in the historic central courtroom of the Miami federal courthouse." The Herald adds, "Alito, a self-professed baseball fan, joked that Acosta probably didn't know the difference between the Florida Marlins and the Miami Dolphins. … All joking aside, Acosta's star has risen quickly in Republican circles. He served on the National Labor Relations Board and then became the first Hispanic to lead the Justice Department's civil rights office. … He temporarily replaced outgoing U.S. Attorney Marcos Jimenez in June 2005 and was nominated for the job by President Bush earlier this year at age 37. The Senate confirmed Acosta in August, making him one of the nation's youngest top prosecutors."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

SEC Files Civil Charges Against Two In Fraud Scheme Targeting Korean Speakers. Dow Jones (10/26, Hughes) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission has filed civil-fraud charges against two men who allegedly took at least $3 million from Korean speakers in Southern California from 2003 through August 2005 through two firms that they portrayed as legitimate securities firms." Dow Jones continues, "The SEC on Wednesday announced the charges against Kangsan Kim, the owner of money-manager Unus Capital Management Inc., and Hyun Soo Jang, the owner of PeopleN Investment Corp., the brokerage firm that was supposed to execute trades for Unus. The two men face civil penalties and orders to return the money to investors. … 'This case provides an unfortunate example of the dangers presented by those seeking to exploit the trust of members of their own community,' said Randall Lee, director of the SEC's office in Los Angeles. 'Such schemes are reprehensible, and the SEC is committed to vigorously prosecuting those who betray that trust for their own profit.'" Dow Jones adds, "Kim was arrested in July on federal mail-fraud and wire-fraud charges, according to a Justice Department press release. He doesn't have a lawyer, according to the SEC, and he couldn't be located. The SEC said it believes Jang is in South Korea."

Judge Issues Secret Ruling In Nacchio Case. The AP (10/26, Shore) reports, "A federal judge has issued a secret ruling about the relevance of classified government documents that former Qwest Chief Executive Officer Joe Nacchio wants to use in his defense against insider trading charges." The AP continues, "In his memorandum and order, which were filed with the court late Tuesday, U.S. District Judge Edward Nottingham said he explained his decision regarding the documents but the bulk of it, 25 pages, was sealed under the Classified Information Procedures Act. … Nottingham's ruling came about two weeks after he met behind closed doors with prosecutors and Nacchio's attorneys to discuss the classified information." The AP adds, "Nacchio is charged with 42 counts of insider trading, accused of selling stock in 2001 based on inside knowledge that Qwest Communications International Inc. would be unable to meet revenue targets. … Each count against Nacchio carries a penalty of up to 10 years in prison and a $1 million (â‚¬800,000) fine. The trial is set for March 19 and is expected to last about 30 days." The AP notes, "At issue is whether the classified information will help explain what Nacchio might have known at the time the trades occurred. … The defense has said Nacchio was aware of classified government contracts awarded to Qwest and of plans for future government business dealings with the Denver-based company."

DOJ_NMG_0086429

SEC Launches Probe Of Mutual-Fund Firms After Kickback Case Settlement. The Wall Street Journal (10/26, A1, Lauricella) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission has launched an investigation of 27 mutual-fund companies that the agency says have accepted kickbacks totaling hundreds of millions of dollars in recent years." The Journal continues, "The investigation centers on alleged arrangements in which independent contractors agreed to pay rebates to mutual-fund companies in order to win lucrative contracts for jobs like producing shareholder reports and prospectuses. The probe stems from a $21.4 million settlement the SEC reached last month with Bisys Fund Services Inc., an administrative-services provider owned by Bisys Group Inc. … Regulators say Bisys, which is based in Roseland, N.J., paid a total of $230 million in kickbacks between July 1999 and June 2004 as part of an effort to win work from mutual funds. Bisys settled the civil charges without admitting or denying wrongdoing." The Journal adds, "While the alleged kickbacks would have taken only a tiny toll on individual investors, perhaps shaving a few hundredths of a percent a year off their fund accounts and returns, the latest investigation comes as the fund industry is struggling to rebuild its reputation after a series of trading scandals that triggered regulatory crackdowns and fines totaling more than $1 billion. … Critics have long complained about fund companies using shareholder money for their own benefit. For example, funds are allowed to use trading commissions, which are deducted from shareholder funds, to pay for research that may not benefit individual fund investors. They can also levy fees on their investors for marketing, although attracting more investors benefits the fund company and not necessarily its existing shareholders. Both these practices are highly regulated to prevent abuses. Nonetheless, regulators and other observers say the latest scandal is part of a distressing pattern of fund companies misusing shareholder money."

NASD Fines James River CEO For Market Timing Violations. The AP (10/26, Gordon) reports, "Securities regulators have imposed a record $2.25 million fine on the chairman and CEO of hedge fund James River Capital Corp. for allegedly using deceptive practices in trading in the long-term investments known as variable annuities." The AP continues, "The National Association of Securities Dealers, the brokerage industry's self-policing organization, on Wednesday announced the civil penalty against Paul Saunders, a broker who is the chairman, CEO and majority owner of Richmond, Va.-based James River. Saunders neither admitted nor denied the NASD's allegations in agreeing to the settlement, under which he also will be suspended for 60 days from working as a broker." The AP adds, "The NASD said the $2.25 million penalty was the largest fine it has ever imposed on an individual for alleged improper market timing -- frequent 'in-and-out' trading. It includes restitution of some $750,000 in illicit profits that Saunders allegedly personally made. … In June 2004, the organization fined the brokerage Davenport & Co. $450,000 and ordered it to pay some $288,000 in restitution for allegedly allowing James River and another hedge fund, TFS Capital, to engage in improper market timing in variable annuities. That was the first case against a brokerage for allowing clients to improperly engage in market timing of variable annuities, often described as mutual funds wrapped in an insurance policy. Federal and state securities regulators have brought a number of cases for improper market timing of mutual funds in recent years."

US Argues Former AOL Officials Lied To Auditors. The AP (10/26, Westley) reports, "Two former America Online executives and top officials at a defunct Las Vegas software maker lied to auditors as part of a scheme to boost both companies' revenue as the dot-com boom fizzled in 2001, government lawyers argued Tuesday." The AP continues, "Kent Wakeford, former executive director at AOL's business affairs unit, and John Tuli, a former vice president in AOL's NetBusiness unit, are among the four defendants on trial at U.S. District Court in Alexandria. … The men, along with two former executives at PurchasePro, are charged with securities fraud, making false statements to auditors and wire fraud. The defendants deny wrongdoing." The AP adds, "In opening statements Tuesday, prosecutors alleged that PurchasePro gave AOL a stake in its company in 2000. In exchange, AOL helped sell PurchasePro's core product, a 'marketplace license,' which is software designed to facilitate business-to-business transactions. … But the licenses were a tough sell for AOL. The Dulles-based company was only able to convince companies to make a purchase by cutting secret side deals, including free online advertisements, Assistant U.S. Attorney Charles Connolly told jurors. … The executives engaged in various forms of deception to make it appear the licenses had been sold in the first quarter of 2001 so PurchasePro could meet its quarterly revenue goals and create the illusion of success to its shareholders, Connolly said."

Austria Charges Nine In Refco Probe. The Wall Street Journal (10/26, C4, Crawford, Mollenkamp) reports, "Prosecutors in Vienna have charged nine men, including the former chief executive officer of Bawag PSK, on charges ranging from embezzlement to fraud amid an Austrian probe into ties between U.S. commodity brokerage Refco Inc. and the Vienna bank." The Journal continues, "Among those charged was the former CEO of Bawag, Helmut Elsner, and Wolfgang Flöttl, who traded on behalf of Bawag from New York and is the son of another former Bawag CEO, Walter Flöttl. Robert Reiter, a former auditor at KPMG Alpen-Treuhand GmbH, which oversaw Bawag's books, also was charged. In the indictment, which was made public yesterday in Vienna, prosecutors allege the nine men 'intentionally abused their positions of trust at Bawag' and engaged in transactions that cost the bank €1.44 billion ($1.81 billion)." The Journal adds, "The charges come a year after Refco, a large New York broker of commodities and other securities that catered to corporations, government agencies and hedge funds, disclosed that then-CEO Phillip R. Bennett had used a scheme to hide bad debt from Refco investors. Refco investors and U.S. prosecutors allege the scheme included Bawag, which sought to hide its own bad debt that largely was a result of Wolfgang Flöttl's trading losses. … Mr. Bennett has been charged1 with conspiracy, securities fraud, wire fraud and making false filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission. He pleaded not guilty to the charges yesterday in a U.S. district court in Manhattan. His lawyer, David Frankel, declined comment on the charges in Austria and said Mr. Bennett continues to deny any wrongdoing."

DOJ_NMG_0086430

CRIMINAL LAW:

Republicans Grumble About DOJ Pre-Election Probes. Roll Call (10/26, Bresnahan) reports, "For House Republicans, it seems that every week brings a new report about a GOP lawmaker under investigation by the Justice Department for alleged corruption. And with the elections just 12 days away, Republicans are crying foul, complaining bitterly that the negative press spurred by the public disclosure of those criminal probes could help cost them their House majority." Roll Call continues, "While a Justice Department run by Republican appointees who were nominated by a conservative Republican president would normally get the benefit of the doubt from GOP lawmakers and staffers, some party insiders are privately wondering whether 'rogue elements' within the department — and more specifically the Public Integrity Unit, where corruption cases are handled — are trying to tip the election to Democrats by leaking news of these investigations so late in the cycle. … 'It would seem that the Public Integrity Unit of the Justice Department is running wild,' maintained a top Republican political operative, who would only speak on the condition of anonymity. 'They're trying to have some effect' on the midterm elections. … A House GOP leadership aide suggested that 'rogue elements' within DOJ's bureaucracy are 'working for a Democratic victory' on Nov. 7. … Another senior GOP staffer speculated that it was 'residual anger' from Speaker Dennis Hastert's (R-Ill.) public criticism of the June 20 FBI raid on Rep. William Jefferson's (D-La.) office that is feeding the 'campaign' against House Republicans. … But with the revelations seeming to hit a new Republican target almost weekly, senior Justice Department officials suddenly have found themselves barraged with questions about the leaks, although they strongly deny any suggestion that the department is meddling in political contests. … 'What I can say with great confidence is that the men and women in the Department of Justice and all of its investigative agencies do not take political considerations into play when it comes to discharging their duty,' said Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty at a news conference last week."

Jurisdictional Issues Arise In Federal Probes Of Congressional Members. Roll Call (10/26, Kane, Bresnahan) reports, "The Justice Department has employed a sprawling lineup of investigators and prosecutors to conduct its ever-expanding roster of Congressional investigations, and in the process created a patchwork of probes across the nation." Roll Call continues, "With at least 17 Members of the 109th Congress coming under federal investigation, Justice has used a pair of offices in its Washington, D.C., headquarters to conduct probes while at the same time coordinating with the offices of at least seven U.S. attorneys and roughly as many FBI offices to serve as ground troops for the inquiries. … Aides at Justice, along with other experts and former prosecutors, said the process of sorting out which offices lead investigations and prosecutions can be a sometimes messy division of labor that focuses on questions of jurisdiction and resources. … 'There's no cookie-cutter approach to it,' said Bryan Sierra, spokesman for the Justice Department. … 'There is not any one protocol on who does what — it was designed to be handled on a case-by-case basis,' said Dick Thornburgh, who served as attorney general from 1988 to 1991. … That case-by-case process has led to at least a quartet of Members being investigated the past two years by Justice's Public Integrity Unit, while another half-dozen Members have come under the prosecutorial glare of U.S. attorneys, almost always their local federal prosecutor. … While the Congressional corruption cases are some of the most sensitive for any prosecutor, they also bring with them the kind of big headlines that can make a prosecutor's career. And some U.S. attorneys have been known to employ sharp elbows when competing with other federal prosecutors to lead a probe, initially flooding a case with their agents to demonstrate they've done the most work and stake claim to a case." Roll Call notes, "Sierra said jurisdiction is the most important aspect in determining which office will initially handle a case, leading to U.S. attorneys taking the lead when it involves circumstances such as a Member and a local contributor or contractor seeking favors. That was the case with ex-Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.), now serving a 100-month prison term for orchestrating the largest bribery scheme ever perpetrated by a single Member of Congress."

DOJ_NMG_0086431

Gay Rights Group Fires Employee Who First Posted Foley Emails. The New York Times (10/26, Kirkpatrick, 1.21M) reports the "liberal gay rights group" Human Rights Campaign "said Wednesday that one of its employees, acting anonymously, had created the Web site that first published copies of unusually solicitous e-mail messages to teenagers from former Representative Mark Foley, which led to his resignation." A spokesman for the group "said it first learned of its employee's role this week and immediately fired him for misusing the group's resources." Some Republicans "have speculated that the e-mail messages were planted by a Democrat." Human Rights Campaign spokesman David Smith said "the employee, whose name he declined to disclose, was a junior staff member hired last month to help mobilize the organization's members in Michigan."

Hastert Aide Testifies Before House Ethics Committee. The AP (10/26, Taylor) reports Ted Van Der Meid, an aide to House Speaker Dennis Hastert, "went before ethics investigators in private to explain how the office handled complaints about former Rep. Mark Foley's behavior toward former pages." Van Der Meid, "who oversaw the page program for Hastert, R-Ill., appears to be one of the last witnesses. The House ethics panel is investigating whether lawmakers and staff aides acted properly when learning of Foley's too-friendly messages to ex-pages and other possible inappropriate behavior." The panel is "in its third week of hearing testimony and seems unlikely to complete its probe before the Nov. 7 elections." Van Der Meid "was a central figure in the handling of a complaint last fall from a former page from Louisiana" about Foley's emails.

Second Altar Boy Claims Abuse By Priest Cited By Foley. The Washington Post/AP (10/26, A2) reports, "Another former altar boy says he was sexually abused in the 1970s by the same retired Catholic priest who acknowledged fondling former congressman Mark Foley when Foley was a teenager, the man's attorney said Wednesday." The new allegations "against Anthony Mercieca were made by a man who lived in North Miami and was an altar boy at St. James Catholic Church, where Mercieca worked, attorney Jeffrey Herman said." Herman said "he plans to file a lawsuit against the Archdiocese of Miami. His client, now 40 and identified in the lawsuit only as John Doe No. 26, says Mercieca abused him when he was about 12 years old."

Police Chiefs Discuss Rise In Crime At White House Meeting. The Wall Steet Journal (10/26), in its online "Washington Wire" blog, reports, "Facing a rise in murders, drug shootings and armed robberies, more than a dozen police chiefs met senior White House officials on Wednesday to argue that there's a national epidemic of violent crime and they need federal money to fight it. The 15 police chiefs said that during the 90-minute meeting with Rob Portman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, and several members of President Bush's domestic policy team, they stressed that they needed flexibility in funding to fight both terrorists and criminals, and that each community faced different risks." White House "officials say they are well aware of a spike in violent crime statistics over the last year and are already been considering programs to fight the trade in methamphetamine, which is fueling the crime rise in some cities like Las Vegas. But the violence varies from city to city: Chicago and Miami haven't had increases; in Boston, homicides have hit a 10-year high and in Cincinnati a 20-year high, according to local crime statistics analyzed by the Police Executive Research Forum, or PERF, a think tank and police lobby group."

FBI Investigating LANL Classified Material Found In Drug Raid. ABC World News (10/25, story 7, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Tonight, the FBI is investigating how classified documents from New Mexico's Los Alamos nuclear weapons lab ended up in a suspected drug dealer's mobile home. Police stumbled on the computer files, which could hold sensitive information, while conducting a methamphetamine bust." The Washington Times (10/26, Seper, 88K) adds, "'This appears to be a new low: Even drug dealers can get classified information out of Los Alamos,' said Danielle Brian, executive director of the Project On Government Oversight, a watchdog that has exposed seven incidents involving the mishandling or loss of classified information at nuclear-weapons facilities since 2002. Authorities said the Los Alamos information was located on a computer flash drive," which "have been banned from the…laboratory for the past two years."

The Washington Post (10/26, A12, Eggen, 748K) reports that the LANL "contract employee at the center of a possible security breach…had a high-level clearance that may have given her special access to intelligence intercepts and other closely held national secrets, sources familiar with the case said yesterday. The FBI is examining at least three computer disks that police…discovered last week during a search of a suspected drug dealer's trailer home, according to the FBI and other agencies. … Authorities said the disks appear to contain classified material." The Post notes that the incident "is the latest potential embarrassment for the Los Alamos lab, which is under new management and undergoing changes designed to improve security."

Bloomberg (10/26, Schmidt) reports, "U.S. Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman told reporters in Washington the former employee was a woman and had worked as an archivist. 'We take this matter very seriously,' Bodman said. 'It is on my priority list.' He said the former employee had worked on 'archiving data from past history and making that available in electronic form so that it could be stored and accessed.'"

DOJ_NMG_0086432

Gun Collector Jailed In Wales Murder Probe Seeks Venue Change. The AP (10/26) reports, "A gun collector once jailed as a material witness in the assassination of a federal prosecutor is seeking a change of venue for an unrelated weapons charge." Albert Kwan "says he cannot get a fair trial on the charge -- possession of an unregistered machine gun -- because in the public's mind, his case 'is inseparably intertwined with that of the murder investigation of Assistant United States Attorney Thomas C. Wales,' his lawyers wrote in a court filing this week." However, Kwan lawyer Joe Conte "said Wednesday he did not expect U.S. District Judge Thomas Zilly to move Kwan's trial on the weapons charge out of the Western District of Washington."

New Charges Filed In PRC Military Secrets Case. The AP (10/26, Flaccus) reports, "Five members of a family accused of scheming to send sensitive information about Navy warships to China were indicted Wednesday on new conspiracy charges, prosecutors said. The indictment, handed down by a federal grand jury, added counts of conspiracy to export U.S. defense articles to China; possession of property in aid of a foreign government and making false statements to federal investigators. Named in the supplemental indictment were Chi Mak, a U.S. citizen who worked for Anaheim defense contractor Power Paragon; his wife, Rebecca Laiwah Chiu; his brother, Tai Mak; Tai Mak's wife, Fuk Heung Li; and their son, Billy Yui Mak." The AP notes, "The FBI originally arrested Chi Mak and his wife for investigation of conspiracy to steal U.S. government documents. That allegation was never charged, and no one has been charged with espionage in the case."

The Los Angeles Times (10/26, Reza, 918K) reports, "Federal prosecutors acknowledged last year that the information Chi Mak and the others gathered was not classified. In fact, much of it can be found on the Internet. Wednesday's indictment, however, says the president has the authority 'to control the import and export of defense articles' by placing them on the United States Munitions List, apparently even if they are readily accessible to the public. Articles placed on the list can be exported only by agents of a foreign government registered with the Defense Department, according to the indictment. The court document does not say whether the articles the defendants allegedly conspired to export to China were on the government's munitions list, or when they might have been placed there."

Philadelphia Mob Enforcer Arrested In Illegal Gambling Probe. The Philadelphia Inquirer (10/26, Anastasia, 399K) reports, "Bodybuilder and mob enforcer Vincent 'Big Vincent' Filipelli was ordered held without bail yesterday for allegedly threatening an undercover New Jersey State Police trooper involved in an organized-crime gambling investigation. Authorities said Filipelli, 53, made the threat at a South Philadelphia 'gentleman's club' where a meeting had been set up to discuss a gambling debt he was attempting to collect." Filipelli "was unaware that the two men he was meeting with were both undercover state troopers and that one of them was wearing a body wire. … 'Filipelli [said] that he would track him down and put him in the hospital for a year,' according to an affidavit filed by FBI agent James A. Titcombe, who worked the case with the state police. Later, as he was driving back to Cherry Hill with one of the undercover officials, Filipelli boasted that he was a 'made' member of the Philadelphia mob, according to the document."

The AP (10/26) notes, "State police, working with the FBI's Philadelphia office, arrested" Filipelli at his home on Tuesday, seizing "anabolic steroids and drug paraphernalia valued at $10,000, two stun guns, gambling records and cash, according to state police. … According to state police, Filipelli was a former bodyguard for John Stanfa, boss of the Philadelphia La Cosa Nostra organized crime family."

Gotti Told Federal Investigators NYPD Detective Helped Mob Murder. The New York Sun (10/26, Capeci) reports in its "Gangland" column, "At a secret session with the feds last year, John 'Junior' Gotti fingered a former NYPD detective as a money-hungry rogue who gave up confidential information about a 1983 barroom murder — information that Gambino wiseguys used to kill a witness whose death has been officially ruled a suicide for more than two decades, Gang Land has learned. Law enforcement sources said Gotti attributed his stunning account about the death by hanging of Vinny Cennamo to what he was told several years after the fact by mobster Angelo Ruggiero, a close ally of Gotti's late father who died of cancer in 1989. Police reports state that Cennamo, a friend of the murder victim, fingered Mark Caputo…as the killer and said he left the bar with Junior. … At the time of the conversation" with Caputo, "Junior told the feds, Ruggiero was on the outs with the Dapper Don, who…had placed Ruggiero 'on the shelf,' a designation that essentially stripped him of all his rights and responsibilities as a wiseguy."

Pellicano Says He Has Rejected Repeated Plea Bargain Offers. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/26, Risling) reports, "Imprisoned private investigator Anthony Pellicano said Wednesday he rejected numerous attempts by federal prosecutors to negotiate a plea bargain in his Hollywood wiretap case because he didn't want to break the trust of celebrities, lawyers and other former clients. 'At least 10 times in this case I've been offered a plea bargain. It's not going to happen,' Pellicano told The Associated Press in a phone interview from federal prison. Pellicano said he intended to remain silent, even though he said Hollywood is infested with 'great white sharks' who don't play by the rules and constantly lie to get what they want." The AP adds, "Pellicano said encrypted audio files taken from his office during FBI raids won't lead to charges against any Hollywood power players. The tapes 'will do nobody any good to learn about my family life and my client life,' he said."

DOJ_NMG_0086433

Former California Bank Manager Sentenced To Prison For Embezzlement. The AP (10/26) reports, "A former manager of a Silicon Valley bank was sentenced Wednesday to nearly a year and a half in federal prison for embezzling $1.13 million from her employer over a decade. U.S. District Court Judge Jeremy Fogel ordered Rose Magpantay Valdez…to serve 33 months, followed by three years of supervised release, and also to pay back all of the money she stole. Valdez pleaded guilty to embezzlement in July, after an investigation by the FBI." She "told investigators she began stealing money in 1995, moving funds from one general ledger account to another." Bay City News Wire (10/25) noted, "The investigation in the case was carried out by the FBI together with the bank's security personnel."

Texas Church Employee Sentenced To 12 Years For Child Porn Possession. The Lufkin Daily News (10/26, Savage) reports, "A former Lufkin church employee was sentenced to more than 12 years in federal prison Wednesday for viewing child pornography on the job, according to a federal court document. Troy Matthew Phillips, 32, who had worked at First Assembly of God…was handed a 151-month prison sentence by a U.S. District judge after he was convicted of possessing more than 2,100 images of child porn on a work computer, court documents stated." After a fellow employee grew suspicious, "senior church officials confronted Phillips, who admitted he was addicted to porn," and "a day later…church officials turned over the computer to FBI investigators. Investigators found 'numerous images' of children under age 12, including about 20 that were of infants or toddlers."

Florida Executes Man For 1990 Killings Of Five Students. The New York Times (10/26, Goodnough) reports, "The serial killer who gruesomely murdered five college students here in 1990 was put to death on Wednesday by lethal injection, and relatives of his victims said afterward that they could finally feel the beginnings of relief." The Times continues, "Danny H. Rolling, 52, was pronounced dead at 6:13 p.m. at Florida State Prison in Starke, about 30 miles northeast of Gainesville. Witnesses said he stared toward them and sang a hymn-type song just before the drugs were administered." The Times adds, "Mr. Rolling was 36 when he arrived in Gainesville shortly before the fall semester began at the University of Florida, a drifter with a criminal past who pitched a tent in some woods near campus. He followed two freshman roommates, Sonja Larson, 18, and Christina Powell, 17, to their off-campus apartment, raped Miss Powell, repeatedly stabbed both women with a hunting knife and mutilated their bodies. … The police discovered them on Aug. 26, after Miss Powell's parents reported that their daughter was not answering her door or phone. Later that night, the police found Christa Hoyt, 18, dead in her off-campus duplex. Mr. Rolling had raped and stabbed her, severed her head and placed it on a shelf. … The next day, Tracy Paules and Manuel Taboada, both 23, were discovered stabbed to death in their apartment, not far from where the other killings took place. Mr. Rolling attacked Mr. Taboada, a former high school football player, as he slept, then killed Miss Paules. All of the victims were University of Florida students except for Miss Hoyt, who was attending a nearby community college."

DC Police Web Site Plots Crime In Street-By-Street Detail. The Washington Post (10/26, B1, Klein) reports, "D.C. police have launched a new crime-mapping tool on the department's Web site, allowing anyone to create a map of a sliver of the city and immediately see what crimes have happened there this year." The Post continues, "Cartoonish icons are used to pinpoint crimes. If you map your neighborhood, you do not want the Zorro-like mask to pop up -- it indicates an armed holdup. Or worse, the red figure of a person lying in the street, which denotes a homicide. The site also features goblin-looking masks for muggings, money sacks for thefts, gas cans for arsons and cracked houses for burglaries. … But it's the easy access to the information, not the symbols, that authorities believe will draw people to http://crimemap.dc.gov . For example, it takes only a few clicks to discover that during the past six months there have been 15 robberies, 72 thefts and 18 vehicles stolen within 1,000 feet of Chinatown's Verizon Center." The Post adds, "Most police departments make crime numbers available to residents, and many have Web sites that allow people to search for the number of crimes in specific areas. But few can match the District's new site, with its searchable fields that include museums, stadiums, gas stations and check-cashing locations. The site's level of detail rivals or surpasses those of departments in Baltimore, Chicago and Los Angeles."

DOJ_NMG_0086434

DOJ Webcast Helps Local Police Departments With Recruitment Issues. The Palo Alto (CA) Daily News (10/26, Babcock) reports, "Police departments struggling to hire and retain qualified police officers participated in a U.S. Department of Justice webcast Tuesday to discuss strategies for addressing the problem." The News continues, "While there was a time when departments had the flexibility to reject would-be recruits, a new generation of qualified potential officers isn't interested in the profession, which many regard as short on pay and benefits. … 'Most of us have been in this profession for a while,' said East Palo Alto Police Chief Ron Davis, who took part in the hour-and-a-half webcast. 'Not to date ourselves, but we come from a different era. ... The job became your life and I think, probably for good reasons, this generation looks at a more balanced and tempered approach.'" The News adds, "About 25,000 people logged on to watch mayors and police chiefs from San Diego to Hattiesburg, Miss., discuss ways to grab and keep the attention of potential police officers. … As the panel jumped from topic to topic, a major theme of the webcast was the new generation's wants and needs. The panel discussed ideas such as speeding up the hiring process, which can take up to nine months, and using different techniques and technologies, such as the Internet, to recruit new officers."

CIVIL LAW:

Philip Morris Case Seen As Showing Roberts Court's Hand On Business Issues. In the New York Times editorial observer column (10/26), Adam Cohen says, "When Jesse Williams died of lung cancer, his widow sued Philip Morris, claiming it misled him about the danger of smoking. A jury agreed, awarding her $79.5 million in punitive damages. The Oregon Supreme Court affirmed the award, calling Philip Morris's decades of deception 'extraordinarily reprehensible.'" The Supreme Court is "hearing arguments in the case next week, and the broader business community has joined Philip Morris in asking the court to sharply reduce the damages. They are relying on a controversial line of recent cases in which the court struck down punitive damages awards that it deemed 'excessive.'" The Philip Morris case "will tell us a lot about the John Roberts court, which may be the most pro-business court in decades. It is a test of whether the court will abandon its conservative principles to be activist and 'rights-making' when the party that needs help is a large corporation. It will also reveal whether the court will continue on its current disturbing path of giving corporations more protection from excessive punishment than it gives to people."

Warsaw, IN, Seen As Center Of Orthopedic Device Industry. The Wall Street Journal (10/26, B1, Aeppel) reports from Warsaw, IN, "Silicon Valley has computers. Detroit has cars. But in orthopedic devices, the undisputed world capital is Warsaw, a city of 12,500 with a silver-domed 19th-century courthouse and pickups angled into the curb on Main Street. … Three of the world's five largest makers of artificial joints and related surgical tools have their headquarters here amid the lakes and fields of northeastern Indiana. The local industry has grown so much that it's now a regional force, with orthopedics companies popping up in nearby farm towns and the suburbs of Fort Wayne, about 50 miles to the east." The Journal adds, "Memphis, Tenn., and northern New Jersey are other industry hotspots, but none rivals Warsaw for sheer concentration. And while major orthopedics companies are looking overseas for cheaper places to produce items such as basic bone screws and metal plates, the U.S. retains a firm grip on the industry. … A big reason is that the U.S., with its population of fast-aging baby boomers, injury-prone weekend athletes and overweight people, is by far the world's biggest market for artificial hips and knees. The U.S. represents an estimated $14 billion of the annual spending in a global market of $22.9 billion, according to Knowledge Enterprises Inc., a Chagrin Falls, Ohio, market research firm." The Journal adds, "The U.S. also effectively protects manufacturers in the sector with strict regulations for devices that go inside the human body. Rather than risk problems -- and crippling lawsuits -- U.S. health-care providers buy their artificial joints from companies they know, which generally means buying American. … Profits are so good in the orthopedics industry that there isn't much pressure on suppliers to shave costs by going to low-cost countries. … To be sure, the industry's dynamics may be starting to change. Health-care providers are starting to push back against the industry's steady price increases, raising concerns among investors about whether profits for Warsaw companies and others can keep up the brisk growth. … There are other shadows over Warsaw's future. The U.S. Justice Department has opened two probes of orthopedics makers in the past two years, including an antitrust investigation in which Smith & Nephew PLC, of the U.K., has confirmed that one of its independent sales representatives tried to initiate an industry-pricing strategy in response to a U.S. hospital's bid request. Other producers, including those in Warsaw, have said they didn't respond to the suggestion."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Required Voter Lists Often Contain Errors. The AP (10/25, Hastings) reports, "Between every registered voter and the voting booth is The List. And if you're not on it, you might not be able to cast a ballot." The AP continues, "One of the biggest changes wrought by the Help America Vote Act is the mandate that every state must have a voter registration database up and working by the Nov. 7 general election. But a dozen states missed the Jan. 1 deadline for finishing their databases, which produce lists of registered voters for every precinct. And four states have been sued by the Justice Department. … That leaves a confusing array of systems that may or may not work come Election Day, voting rights groups say. And it creates a growing anxiety that registered voters with every right to cast a ballot will be turned away because their names are not on the list for a variety of reasons, including something as innocuous as a typo." The AP adds, "The regulation was designed to assure that each state would have a central, independent repository for all registered voters - created by cross-checking voter registrations with existing state records to make sure dead people, incarcerated felons and others not eligible to cast a ballot were removed from the rolls. It was also supposed to make it easier to vote by having a single list instead of scores of county-based rolls. … Using driver license data and Social Security numbers, state officials were supposed to match that data to voter registration cards. It didn't take long for unforeseen problems to pop up. Someone may use a middle initial on his/her voter registration card, but not on his/her driver license. Married women may change their names, but not on every form of identification. Data entry errors can, and often do, occur. … In September 2004, New York City decided to do a trial run. The board of elections sent 15,000 registration records to the Department of Motor Vehicles to match license numbers on the voter cards to those in the DMV. The results? Nearly 20 percent couldn't be matched because of typos made by city employees. … Earlier this year, the Department of Justice sued New York, Alabama, New Jersey and Maine for failing to implement statewide lists. The states have reached agreements with the Justice Department, most in the form of interim databases."

DOJ_NMG_0086435

Georgia Election Board Roiled By Voter ID Letter Dispute. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (10/26, Suggs) reports, "Key leaders of two of Georgia's strongest black organizations are calling for the resignations of three members of the State Election Board for mailing letters to voters that suggested photo ID would be required to cast a ballot Nov. 7." The AJC continues, "At a news conference on the steps of the state Capitol, officials from the Georgia State Conference of the NAACP and the Coalition for the People's Agenda urged Republican-appointed members Tex McIver, Randy Evans and Jeff Israel to resign from the election board for their part in sending out about 300,000 letters that they say were designed to suppress minority turnout on election day." The AJC adds, "David Worley, a Democratic appointment to the five-member board, and Secretary of State Cathy Cox, who is also a Democrat and serves as the board's chair, were not asked to resign. … 'We believe this was a deliberate attempt to confuse the voters. A deliberate attempt to further disenfranchise voters,' said NAACP President Edward O. DuBose. 'The damage has already been done and we are asking those board members to resign.' … McIver, vice chairman of the board who headed up the letter campaign, said he intends to stay in office until his term expires in 2008." The AJC notes, "The election board, under threat of a civil suit filed by former Gov. Roy Barnes, voted this month to mail a second letter clarifying that photo ID is not required to vote in Georgia. … For many, that is not enough. Rep. John Lewis (D-Atlanta) has asked U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales for a federal investigation into the mailings, and the Rev. Jesse Jackson is pushing the issue at a conference he is conducting this week in Atlanta."

Manassas, VA, May Face Second Suit Over Permit Bias. The Washington Post (10/26, PW01, Miroff) reports, "The Manassas City Council's decision this week to reject the home business permit application of a part-time massage therapist has raised the possibility the city could face another lawsuit alleging discrimination." The Post continues, "West Street homeowner Howard Daniel, who is gay, says that a climate of homophobia pervaded the council's consideration of his application. The 4 to 3 vote Monday to deny his application has prompted him to consider legal action against the city, he said. … 'There's little doubt that we're going to pursue this,' said Daniel, who attended the meeting accompanied by a lawyer. 'It's not over.'" The Post adds, "The threat of civil litigation hangs heavily over Manassas with the city already under investigation by the Justice Department for allegedly discriminating against Hispanic residents in violation of the Fair Housing Act. Some council members said they were frustrated that the decision on Daniel's application was being construed as discriminatory, saying that the matter was strictly a zoning issue."

New Jersey Court Rules Gay Couples Have Same Rights As Heterosexual Couples. ABC World News (10/25, lead story, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "It is one of the most controversial questions of our age. Should same-sex couples be allowed to marry? Today, New Jersey's Supreme Court stepped right into that debate, ruling that 'same-sex couples must be afforded the same rights and benefits enjoyed by married opposite-sex couples.' But the state's court stopped short of actually approving gay marriage." ABC (Tapper) added, "The New Jersey Supreme Court ruled today that Sarah and Suyin Lael, and other same-sex couples in New Jersey, are entitled to the same rights and benefits as heterosexual couples." The court "gave the state legislature six months to either amend the statutes to include same-sex couples or create a parallel arrangement that gives same-sex couples the rights and benefits as married, straight couples. The court stopped short of requiring that it be called it marriage, but gay rights groups celebrated the ruling."

DOJ_NMG_0086436

The CBS Evening News (10/25, story 7, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) mentioned the ruling briefly, saying "New Jersey's highest court today stopped short of legalizing gay marriage, but it did say that committed same- sex couples must be given the same rights and privileges as heterosexual married couples." NBC Nightly News (10/25, story 7, 0:25, Williams, 9.87M) ran a similar story, reporting the court "ruled that same sex couples in the state must be given all of the same legal protections and now it is up to the state legislature to make that happen."

Much of the coverage last night and this morning deals with the potential political repercussions of the ruling. A number of reports suggest the issue could possibly help Republicans in some close races. The AP (10/26, Crary) reports Bill Donohue, president of the Catholic League, "called the ruling 'a plus' on the premise it would stir up resentment of 'arrogant judges' and boost conservative election prospects. … To conservative activists, the logic is that right-of-center voters who may have felt alienated by events such as the House page scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley will now be motivated to go to the polls. And those voters will be more inclined to pull the lever for Republican candidates in key races such as that of GOP Sen. George Allen in Virginia."

On ABC World News (10/25, story 2, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M) George Stephanopoulos analyzed the decision's impact on key Senate races. In New Jersey, he said, "the candidates had similar positions on gay marriage, except now, the Republican candidate is coming out for a constitutional amendment banning it. And he is hoping this motivates social conservatives for him. In Tennessee, both candidates the Democrat and the Republican, have the same position on gay marriage. They're for a constitutional amendment banning it. The biggest impact could be in the state of Virginia. This could be the first break that George Allen has had in a long time. He's for the ban on gay marriage in Virginia. His opponent, James Webb, is against it. Social conservatives could be mobilized down there." ABC (Gibson) added, "It puts the issue front and center in a lot of states if not in the entire country."

The Wall Street Journal (10/26, A3, Bravin, Cummings, 2.03M) reports Sen. Robert Menendez, a Democrat, "is seen as his party's most vulnerable incumbent. In a statement, Mr. Menendez backed the court decision." Republicans "hope yesterday's decision will draw attention to ballot initiatives in eight states -- Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin -- that would ban same-sex marriage."

On CNN's The Situation Room (10/25), analyst Jeff Greenfield said the issue of gay marriage "is on the ballot in eight states, including Virginia and Tennessee where there are two very close Senate races that could decide whether Democrats take the Senate. And we should note that while Americans over the years have become more accepting of gay rights, the issue of marriage still elicits opposition."

Under the headline "Ruling On Gays May Echo At Polls," USA Today (10/26, Jones, Stone, 2.27M) reports "conservative activist Gary Bauer, head of the group American Values, said the ruling could swell the turnout of conservative Republicans in general." But Sherry Bebitch Jeffe, "a political scientist at the University of Southern California, said the ruling 'will remind people in those eight states that the question is alive' but doubted it will energize conservative voters elsewhere."

Most stories say the ruling was greeted with enthusiasm by gay activists. The AP (10/26, Mulvihill) reports the court "opened the door Wednesday to making the state the second in the nation to allow gay marriage," adding "gay rights activists had seen New Jersey as a promising place because it is a largely Democratic state in the Northeast." The New York Times (10/26, Liptak, 1.21M) reports Susan L. Sommer, a lawyer with the Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund, which represents the couples involved in the case, said of the ruling, "It's a win. … We would have liked marriage tomorrow, but this is great progress." The New York Times (10/26, Kocieniewski, 1.21M) also runs a story titled "Gay Marriage Backers Plan Big Push To Sway Trenton Lawmakers," on the expected process in New Jersey.

However, as the New York Times (10/26, Chen, 1.21M) reports, the New Jersey court "did not go as far as Massachusetts, which in 2003 became the first state to permit gay marriage. Instead, it could be considered the new Vermont, which created civil unions for gay couples in 2000, in the politically, legally and culturally charged world of same-sex marriage." The New York Times (10/26, Kocieniewski, 1.21M) also runs a story titled "Gay Marriage Backers Plan Big Push To Sway Trenton Lawmakers," on the expected process in New Jersey. McClatchy (10/26) reports "cases similar to New Jersey's are pending in California, Connecticut, Iowa and Maryland." The Los Angeles Times (10/26, Barry, 918K) runs a similar story under the headline "NJ Court Grants Rights, Not Marriage, To Gays." The Washington Times (10/26, Wetzstein, 88K) carries a similar report.

The New York Times (10/26, Mansnerus, 1.21M), in a story on the New Jersey Court, says "it is not always easy to identify partisan fault lines in New Jersey. In the New Jersey Supreme Court, it is all but impossible, and nothing reflects that more clearly than Wednesday's 4-to-3 decision on same-sex marriage." Three justices "appointed by a Republican governor would recognize the full status of marriage for same-sex couples. And of the three justices appointed by a Democrat -- a gay Democrat, at that -- none would go that far, and they joined in the majority opinion." New Jersey's highest court "has often been described as liberal, and, what is probably more important to the other branches of state government here, assertive."

DOJ_NMG_0086437

The New York Times (10/26, Chen, 1.21M) also reports, "That was the reaction of former Gov. James E. McGreevey when asked on Wednesday whether he would marry his partner if the New Jersey Legislature -- in the aftermath of the State Supreme Court decision that same-sex couples are entitled to the same rights as heterosexuals -- decides that gay marriage will be honored. After gathering his thoughts, Mr. McGreevey said that while he had no plans to marry his partner immediately, he did feel that a ceremony would be in his future."

The New Jersey Law Journal (10/26, Booth) reports, "The state's high court, while declaring unconstitutional state laws that deny same-sex couples the financial and social benefits and privileges given to married heterosexuals, held that fixing the problem is a legislative task -- and gave lawmakers 180 days in which to do it. … 'At this point, we do not consider whether committed same-sex couples should be allowed to marry, but only whether those couples are entitled to the same rights and benefits afforded to married heterosexual couples,' a divided court wrote in Lewis v. Harris, A68-05. … 'Cast in that light, the issue is not about the transformation of the traditional definition of marriage, but about the unequal dispensation of benefits and privileges to one of two similarly situated classes of people.'" The Journal notes, "The justices did not require the Legislature to amend the civil marriage statutes to include same-sex couples but only to come up with a statutory scheme that affords same-sex couples the same rights and benefits as those statutes. … The court offered the Legislature the option of either amending the marriage statutes to include same-sex couples or enacting a parallel statutory structure by another name."

NYTimes, WPost Praise Ruling. Under the headline "A Ruling For Equality In New Jersey," the New York Times (10/26, 1.21M) editorializes, "The New Jersey Supreme Court brought the United States a little closer to the ideal of equality yesterday when it ruled that the state's Constitution requires that committed same-sex couples be accorded the same rights as married heterosexual couples. … The court ruling secures important rights, and paves the way for the full equality that will no doubt come."

The Washington Post (10/26, A24, 748K), in an editorial titled "New Jersey's Step Forward" says "this nuanced decision risks getting lost beneath angry rhetoric about activist judges and protecting marriage. That would be unfortunate. No reasonable reading of this decision could argue for, say, changing Virginia's constitution to ban same-sex marriages that are already illegal there or for adding a noxious amendment to the federal Constitution." It "argues only for letting the residents of New Jersey digest what their court has said and decide how best to make same-sex couples equal under the law."

Civil Liberties Endangered By Expanded DNA Collection, Experts Warn. The Austin American-Statesman (10/26, Relerford) reports, "Dramatic expansions in the collection and retention of DNA by state and local law enforcement officials threatens individual privacy rights and racial justice, a panel of legal experts concluded Wednesday." The A-S continues, "A four-member panel of lawyers and DNA experts, including New York lawyer Barry Scheck and Helen Wallace of Genewatch UK, spoke about the subject as part of a discussion sponsored by the American Civil Liberties Union." The A-S adds, "Experts characterized law enforcement officials' efforts to add samples to DNA databases as a slippery slope regarding privacy rights, and they criticized expansions at the state and local level of what they referred to as permanent, rogue databases not tied into the FBI's national DNA index. … 'You've got to be smart about crime, smart about using these databases and smart about protecting civil liberties,' Scheck said." The A-S notes, "Panel members, including the ACLU's science advisor, Tania Simoncelli, said expansion efforts are eroding the performance of crime labs, which already face months or years of backlogged evidence. … Scheck also pointed to a scandal surrounding the Houston Police Department's crime lab as proof that DNA evidence is not impenetrable. … This summer, independent investigator Michael Bromwich concluded that crime lab officials in Houston failed to report the results of DNA tests that did not corroborate suspects identified by police in more than 20 cases beginning in the 1980s. … Bromwich, a former U.S. Justice Department official, was selected to investigate the crime lab in 2005. Houston's lab was closed for more than three years after errors were exposed in the lab divisions that test firearms, body fluids and controlled substances."

Close Vote Expected On South Dakota Abortion Referendum. USA Today (10/26, Keen, 2.27M) reports on the South Dakota "referendum on the Nov. 7 ballot that will decide whether the USA's toughest abortion restrictions will become law or be repealed. … If voters uphold the law, which also would make it a felony for doctors to perform abortions unless the woman's life is in jeopardy, Planned Parenthood plans a lawsuit asserting the ban is unconstitutional. Supporters of the ban would use the case to challenge Roe v. Wade, the landmark 1973 Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion nationwide." Republican

DOJ_NMG_0086438

Gov. Mike Rounds "signed the law in March. Opponents gathered signatures to put the issue on the ballot. The latest statewide poll in July showed 47% of voters opposed the ban and 39% supported it; 14% were undecided. Both sides expect a close vote."

New Voting Equipment Could Cause Election Day Problems. The Wall Street Journal (10/26, Kronholz, 2.03M) reports the Help America Vote Act "gave the states $3.8 billion to replace punch-card and mechanical-lever voting machines, and to set up statewide voter lists to resolve election-day questions over who could vote and where." States and counties "bought a variety of new voting systems with the federal money, including optical scanners that read paper ballots and, in at least 34 states, touch-screen machines." With the elections looming, "voting-equipment makers and many election clerks say the new technology will eliminate lost or spoiled ballots and buoy voter confidence." But groups "that track voting laws and practices are warning of problems that could cost or lose votes. A Princeton University study has ignited additional worries that a hacker could alter results on the touch screens, although voting-machine makers -- led by Diebold Inc., the largest of a half-dozen manufacturers -- reject the possibility." The Journal also outlines several potential equipment problems that could arise on election day.

Maryland Voting Machines Had Defective Component. The Washington Post (10/26, B5, Barr, 748K) reports the maker "of Maryland's electronic voting system replaced a flawed electronic component in several thousand touch-screen voting machines in 2005, state election officials acknowledged this week." To "eliminate unpredictable 'screen freezes' that have occurred since the machines were first used in Maryland in 2002, Diebold Election Systems installed new system boards in about 4,700 voting machines from four Maryland counties: Allegany, Dorchester, Montgomery and Prince George's."

Target Sued By Advocacy Group For Blind Over Web Site. USA Today (10/26, Parker) reports, "Bruce Sexton is blind. He would like to shop on Target's website, but says he can't 'read' it. He says the site lacks certain coding — found on many other websites — that would activate software to allow blind computer users to hear audio descriptions of what is on Internet pages." USA continues, "Sexton, 24, who lives in Berkeley, Calif., and the National Federation of the Blind are suing Target on behalf of the 1.3 million blind people in the USA. The suit alleges that the giant retailer discriminates against the visually impaired by violating state and federal laws that protect the disabled." USA adds, "The case draws national attention because it could have implications for virtually every retailer and business in the USA that operates a website. The case also fuels a wider debate starting to play out in courtrooms: whether anti-discrimination laws apply to the Internet. … It's a key question in lawsuits across the nation. Craigslist.org, a popular advertising and networking website, is being sued in federal court in Chicago over allegations it has allowed ads for apartments and other housing that discriminate on the basis of race, sex, class, religion or familial status."

NAACP Chairman, Judge Brown To Attend White House Fellowship Program Meeting. The Washington Times (10/26, McCaslin, 88K) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column, "Inside the Beltway has learned that NAACP Chairman Julian Bond, who has repeatedly denounced the Republican Party and conservative black leaders alike, will come face-to-face this evening with US Court of Appeals Judge Janice Rogers Brown. Judge Brown was nominated to her position by President Bush and is frequently mentioned as a possible Supreme Court nominee." The two are "among three prominent black leaders being saluted at a reception for the White House Fellowships program, hosted by conservative commentator Armstrong Williams in his Northeast Washington home. Renowned neurosurgeon Dr. Benjamin Carson of Johns Hopkins Hospital fame is the third honoree."

ANTITRUST:

FCC Seen Likely To Avoid Net Neutrality Debate In AT&T-BellSouth Ruling. The San Antonio Express-News (10/26, Nowlin) reports, "As the Federal Communications Commission mulls conditions on AT&T Inc.'s $83 billion merger with BellSouth Corp., the commission faces pressure to turn the process into a fight over network neutrality, the concept that Internet service providers like AT&T should treat all traffic the same. .. It's pressure, experts add, that the FCC is likely to resist." The Express-News continues, "Net neutrality proponents — consumer groups and Internet companies like Google, among them — worry San Antonio-based AT&T wants to create a two-tiered Internet where it picks which sites thrive and which flounder. … And some now view the debate over deal conditions as their golden opportunity to make AT&T sign off on net neutrality protections before it closes the largest telecom deal in history. … '(AT&T) wants this merger to happen before the end of the year,' said Gigi Sohn, president of Public Knowledge, which filed comments Tuesday asking the FCC to make AT&T treat all Internet content equally. 'I think that's the biggest card we hold.'" TheExpress-News notes, "The FCC originally was set to rule on the merger Oct. 12, but pushed back its vote to Nov. 3 after commissioners reached an impasse over what conditions, if any, to impose on the deal. Republican FCC Chairman Kevin Martin proposed approving the merger without conditions, but the two Democrats commissioners said they wanted to see consumer-friendly safeguards. … In response, AT&T offered a set of conditions to which it would agree, including making speedy Web access available for $10 a month if bundled with phone service and not increasing rates competitors pay to access its networks. … Competitors and consumer groups had until Tuesday to file remarks about the AT&T proposals. … Analysts said they would be surprised if the FCC deviates too far from the conditions AT&T has already offered up — especially into territory as controversial as net neutrality. So far, the Justice Department and 18 states have approved the transaction, making the FCC its last regulatory hurdle to clear."

DOJ_NMG_0086439

Constellation, FPL Abandon Merger Plans. The Baltimore Sun (10/26, Adams) reports, "Constellation Energy Group Inc. and Florida's FPL Group Inc. officially gave up on their merger plans Wednesday after executives concluded the deal was hopelessly mired in a populist political debate in Maryland over deregulation and rising electricity rates." The Sun continues, "The move means control over Constellation and its BGE utility will remain in local hands, rather than shifting to Florida. But it weakens the hand of lawmakers and regulators, who were expecting to use the merger's approval as leverage to extract more concessions to offset a 72 percent BGE rate increase." The Sun adds, "Constellation asked to pull out of the $12.4 billion deal and FPL agreed, ending weeks of speculation that the end was near. The companies had suspended integration activities in May, and two weeks ago FPL Chief Executive Lewis Hay III made it clear in a conversation with analysts that his patience was wearing thin. … Hay had said he would assess the deal's prospects after the governor's election, but the two companies concluded that the outcome probably would not have made any difference in regulatory treatment of the deal." The Sun notes, "The merger would have created a Fortune 100 company with an estimated $28 billion in annual revenue and operations stretching from Maine to California. It would have been the largest seller of wholesale power to large industrial users, municipalities and utilities in markets where competition is allowed. … But the utilities agreed to their deal just months before electricity rate caps were about to come off at BGE as part of the transition to a deregulated market. Citing soaring energy costs, BGE announced a 72 percent rate increase, which was approved by the PSC without hearings. Outraged legislators later passed a law temporarily lowering the increase and firing the PSC, which had authority to rule on the merger."

The Wall Street Journal (10/26, A12, Dowell, Buurma) reports, "The merger, announced in December, faltered after being caught up in partisan battles between Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich and the Democrat-controlled state Legislature. In June, state lawmakers passed a law that disbanded the Ehrlich-appointed Maryland Public Service Commission after the commission approved a 72% rate rise for Constellation's utility subsidiary, Baltimore Gas & Electric. … In September, the Maryland Court of Appeals ruled that the Legislature couldn't fire the commissioners. But the court left intact a provision of the law that prevents the commission from ruling on the FPL-Constellation deal until its members are replaced, leaving regulatory review of the merger uncertain."

The Washington Post (10/26, D1, Mufson) reports, "The proposed takeover, unveiled in December, has been at the center of a political brawl in Maryland, made more intense by a request this year by Constellation's Baltimore Gas and Electric Co. unit for a 72 percent increase in electric rates. Litigation was continuing, and Maryland's Public Service Commission still needed to approve the FPL merger. … 'It's been a long time in coming, and I'm not surprised,' Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) said yesterday. He blamed Democratic legislative leaders for creating uncertainty with a law that temporarily lowered rates and dismissed the state's utility regulators. Maryland's highest court later reinstated the PSC members but let stand a provision of the legislation that prevented those members from ruling on the merger." The Post notes, "The coming elections were unlikely to alter the outlook. Democrats are expected to retain control of the state legislature. And Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, Ehrlich's Democratic challenger, has vowed to fire the PSC members, who he said yesterday had showed an 'utter lack of leadership and professionalism.' … The end of the merger does not mean any relief for Maryland ratepayers, who still face sharply higher energy costs in a deregulated electricity market."

Yankee Candle Agrees To $1.4 Billion Buyout By Equity Firm. The Wall Street Journal (10/26, A14, Covert) reports, "Yankee Candle Co. agreed to be acquired by a private-equity firm for $1.4 billion, plus the assumption of $300 million of debt." The Journal continues, "The South Deerfield, Mass., maker of scented candles and home fragrances said Madison Dearborn Partners LLC will buy it for $34.75 a share, in a deal expected to close in the first quarter. Yankee Candle shares soared $5.01, or 17%, to $33.73 apiece in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading. … The company in July said it had hired Lehman Brothers to help it explore alternatives, including a possible sale. Yesterday, Yankee Candle's chief financial officer, Bruce Besanko, said the auction attracted 'multiple interested parties,' but he declined to be more specific." The Journal adds, "Credit Suisse analyst Paul Lejuez said the deal came sooner than expected and the price was surprisingly high, possibly 'an indication that private equity is willing to accept a lower rate of return than one would typically assume.'"

DOJ_NMG_0086440

Administration To Issue Position On Dot-Com IPO Class Action Case. The Wall Street Journal (10/26) says in an editorial, "Milberg Weiss is under federal indictment, but that doesn't mean the class-action specialist isn't still making legal mischief. A case in point is Billing v. Credit Suisse First Boston, in which Milberg has even managed to get part of the Bush Administration on its side. Someone in the White House should be embarrassed about this one." In Billing, Milberg is "suing investment banks on behalf of investors who participated in dot-com era IPOs that later went south." The Justice Department's Antitrust Division "has sided with Milberg, even as the SEC has submitted briefs in defense of the banks." Sometime "in the next few days," the Solicitor Generals' "office will file a brief recommending that the Supremes overturn the appeals court -- meaning, in short, that the SEC will have won the turf war. But the brief is being circulated within the Administration, so things could still change."

Clear Channel Radio Chain Said To Be Up For Sale. The New York Times (10/26, Belson, Sorkin) reports, "The Mays Family, which built Clear Channel Communications into the country's largest network of radio stations through decades of acquisitions, is in negotiations to be taken private by a consortium of investors for more than $18.5 billion, people involved in the talks said yesterday." The Times continues, "The investors, who have been in discussions with Clear Channel for months, include Providence Equity Partners, the Blackstone Group and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company, these people said." The Times adds, "The negotiations come as family- controlled media companies across the nation explore the possibility of selling their companies or taking them private. Cox Communications, the cable company based in Atlanta, went private in 2004. Cablevision, which is controlled by the Dolan family, is in the middle of negotiations to become private. … Clear Channel said yesterday in a statement that it was 'evaluating various strategic alternatives to enhance shareholder value.' The company has hired Goldman, Sachs & Company as its financial adviser. … Other potential suitors have emerged in recent days. They include Cerberus Capital Management, Oak Hill Capital Partners and Thomas H. Lee Partners, people briefed on the negotiations said. Now that the company is seeking alternatives, other suitors, including big media companies, could surface."

Dewey, Orrick Close To Merger. The New York Times (10/26, De La Merced) reports, "Two major law firms — Dewey Ballantine and Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe — came closer to walking down the aisle yesterday." The Times continues, "Top committees of the two firms recommended a deal, the two said yesterday. The combined firm would be called Dewey Orrick, with 1,500 lawyers and offices around the world. Together, they would form the seventh-largest law office in New York, and have revenue around $1 billion, the firms said in a joint statement. … The merger would be the latest in a wave of consolidation among law firms." The Times adds, "A merger 'gives us a stronger geographical reach, complementary practice areas and gives us financial strength to continue to build practice areas,' the chairman of the management and executive committees, Morton A. Pierce, said. … Orrick's chairman, Ralph H. Baxter Jr., said: 'This will create a new and highly unusual, if not unique, value proposition for our clients. Few firms will match the depth we'll have.'" The Times notes, "Some terms of the deal are not yet final, and it is subject to approval by each firm's partners. Mr. Pierce said the firms hoped to obtain approval by mid-December, paving the way for Dewey Orrick by Jan. 1."

Blackstone Group To Expand Private-Equity Fund. The Wall Street Journal (10/26, C1, Singer, Sender) reports, "Accelerating the buyout boom and putting some of the world's biggest public companies in reach, Blackstone Group has decided to increase the size of the world's largest private-equity fund to $20 billion." The Journal continues, "The move by Blackstone, which already had raised a record $15.6 billion for the fund from investors, secures bragging rights for now in an industry that has several other giants looking to create funds of $15 billion or more. … But there is much more than pride at stake: Private-equity firms have been on a tear lately, buying up publicly traded businesses with the intention of making them more profitable -- frequently by aggressively cutting costs -- and then selling them for big gains, either to other companies or to public shareholders via new stock listings. Fifteen out of the top 20 buyouts on record have been announced in the past 18 months, and private-equity firms this year have accounted for 17% of all major mergers and acquisitions." The Journal adds, 'Now, all but the largest public companies are potential acquisition targets, especially given the growing trend of "club deals" involving multiple private-equity firms. Their increased financial firepower -- aided by heavy borrowing at low rates by companies they own -- has giant buyout firms already eyeing takeover targets with stock-market values of $50 billion or more, say people familiar with the matter."

NYSE To Purchase Rest Of American Stock Exchange Stake. The Wall Street Journal (10/26, C5, Lucchetti) reports, "NYSE Group Inc. plans to buy the one third of its technology unit that it doesn't own for about $40 million from the American Stock Exchange, according to people familiar with the matter." The Journal continues,

DOJ_NMG_0086441

"NYSE, which operates the New York Stock Exchange, will become full owner of Securities Industry Automation Corp., or SIAC, with the transaction. Amex and NYSE have been negotiating for months to complete a deal. … Both markets see the move as necessary as electronic trading and technology become crucial to gaining business for exchanges now structured as for-profit companies. In that environment, the sharing of technology between two exchange rivals became unpalatable." The Journal adds, "NYSE wanted full control of the subsidiary, which handles the exchanges' communications networks and computer systems among other things. Amex gets cash to build its own technology, which it is hoping to roll out later this year after getting regulatory approval. … The deal will make it easier for NYSE to integrate its communications and market-data operations with those of Archipelago Holdings Inc., the electronic-exchange operator that the Big Board merged with in March. Analysts say cost cutting and layoffs are possible at the unit as NYSE tries to expand profit. A deal could close as soon as next month. … NYSE is also hoping to merge with pan-European exchange operator Euronext NV, and a good chunk of the more than $250 million in cost savings anticipated from that deal will come from reducing the number of technology platforms."

German Antitrust Regulators Nix Coherent's Proposed Excel Buy. The AP (10/26) reports, "Coherent Inc., a Santa Clara, Calif.-based maker of lasers for commercial and scientific uses, said Wednesday German regulators are prohibiting its $376 million acquisition of Excel Technology Inc." The AP continues, "Although the acquisition had passed U.S. antitrust authorities, the German Federal Cartel Office issued a prohibition order on the deal. … 'While we are clearly very disappointed and disagree with the FCO's decision, we remain committed to accomplishing acquisitions that meet all our criteria for growth, diversification and financial performance,' said John Ambroseo, Coherent's president and chief executive, in a statement." The AP adds, "The deal, announced in February, valued Excel, a maker of electro-optical and laser systems used for scientific, industrial and medical purposes, at $30 per share. … The acquisition was expected to close in the June quarter."

Wal-Mart's German Expansion Approved. The AP (10/26) reports, "Metro AG's deal to buy Wal-Mart Stores Inc.'s German operations received approval Wednesday from Germany's antitrust regulator, clearing the way for an acquisition that will expand Metro's presence in its home market." The AP continues, "The Federal Cartel Office approved the deal after deciding the addition of the 85 Wal-Mart stores would not give Metro a dominant position in the market. … The deal calls for Duesseldorf-based Metro to take over 19 pieces of Wal-Mart real estate and lease the remaining locations. Neither company has disclosed the deal's value." The AP adds, "Metro will fold the stores, which had sales of nearly euro2 billion in 2005, into its Real hypermarket brand. The first conversions are set to be finished before Christmas, and the rest should be integrated by mid-2007. … The addition of Wal-Mart's warehouses and logistics systems is expected to strengthen the position of Metro's existing 550 Real stores in the German market. … The deal, announced in July, marked Wal-Mart's second withdrawal from a major foreign market."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

US Tells 9th Circuit Hawaii Stryker Unit Is Vital. The Honolulu Star-Bulletin (10/26, Kakesako) reports, "Government lawyers say that halting Schofield Barracks' $1.5 billion Stryker unit would do 'irreparable harm' to the Army, soldiers of the 2nd Brigade and the nation's security. … They oppose a motion by island environmentalists and Hawaiian activists who want the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to approve a temporary order halting all work on Stryker-related activities in Hawaii." The Star-Bulletin continues, "U.S. Justice Department attorneys Andrew Mergen and Michael Gray on Monday said 'national security concerns' are more compelling today than they were on Nov. 5, 2004, when a federal court judge rejected environmentalists' first petition for a preliminary injunction. … The Army argued that the 2nd Brigade is scheduled to become a 'fully manned, trained and equipped Stryker Brigade Combat Team, ready for deployment by November 2007.'" The Star-Bulletin adds, "Lt. Gen. John Brown, who heads Army troops in the Pacific, wrote in a letter published Monday in the Honolulu Star-Bulletin that the combat deployment will be to Iraq. This will be the second time the 25th Infantry Division's 2nd Brigade will pull combat duty there. … David Henkin, attorney with Earthjustice, said he expects the 9th Circuit in San Francisco will rule on its request for a temporary injunction by Tuesday. … Henkin said Earthjustice wants to temporarily stop the project so the environmental group and the Army can discuss what activities can proceed."

Russia Threatens Criminal Charges Over Shell Natural Gas Project. The New York Times (10/26, Kramer) reports Yuri Trutnev, Russia's minister of natural resources, "threatened criminal prosecutions against employees of Royal Dutch Shell, ratcheting up pressure" on the Sakhalin-2 project." The Times says, "The remarks suggested a further unraveling of the relationship between Western energy companies and the Russian government, which is intent on gaining control of the energy sector. Shell and two Japanese partners were accused of violating Russian environmental law at their Sakhalin 2 project." The Times notes, "Lower-ranked Russian officials had threatened criminal charges earlier this month. The statement by Mr. Trutnev, however, carried more force and suggested an escalation because he is a member of the cabinet." Trutnev said his ministry's September inspection of Sakhalin-2 "provided enough grounds to revoke a major environmental permit. He had said the permit would very likely be canceled this week. He delayed a decision on that permit, however, by one month for further study."

DOJ_NMG_0086442

NYTimes Criticizes Bush Recess Appointment For Mine Safety Agency. The New York Times (10/26, 1.21M) says in an editorial, "Despite being twice rebuffed by the Senate, President Bush has named Richard Stickler, a stolid mining industry careerist, to run the mine safety agency whose serial ineptitude has been laid bare this year by the deaths of 42 mineworkers. Waiting until the Senate left town for the elections, Mr. Bush resorted to a recess appointment to place Mr. Stickler at the heart of enforcing new safety reforms that, in earlier hearings, the appointee himself had claimed were not at all that necessary." But lawmakers "should demand a bulldog enforcement director rather than another industry lapdog."

Apache Police Chief, Tribal Officer Arrested On Embezzlement Charges. The AP (10/26) reports, "The White Mountain Apache tribal police chief and another officer have been charged with manipulating records in a federal investigation after the FBI began looking into the use of departmental funds at casinos. Police Chief Lincoln Perry and Officer Tim Goode pleaded not guilty Wednesday in U.S. District Court, said Wyn Hornbuckle, spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office. They were each arraigned on one count of conspiracy to falsify records and 17 counts of falsifying records." The AP notes, "Federal officials alleged the two men embezzled between $10,000 and $20,000 over a five-year period" from an account "used for undercover purchases and payment to informants. … Hornbuckle said Perry and Goode submitted fake receipts to tribal police in response to FBI agents looking into the bank account."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Maine Civil Liberties Union Releases Peace Group Emails Collected By FBI. WCSH-TV Portland, ME (10/25, Erskine) reports on its Web site from a story broadcast yesterday, "The FBI has apparently been keeping files on the emails of peace activists in Maine." The Maine Civil Liberties Union on Wednesday released "18 pages of emails that the FBI had in its files" and were obtained through a FOIA request. "Those emails were put out by 'Peace Action Maine,' the 'Maine Center for Peace and Justice' and 'Veterans for Peace' as they were organizing for two different protests. Activists say they were shocked that their government was 'spying' on them." WCHS added, "A spokesperson for the FBI, Nenette Day, says the agency does not monitor or investigate peace groups in Maine. Day says the emails were likely forwarded to the FBI, then placed in a file."

The AP (10/26) reports, "Obtaining the e-mails…is a waste of FBI resources, and it has a chilling effect on people who want to speak out against government policies, said Shenna Bellows, executive director of the MCLU. It also brings to mind the FBI's clandestine surveillance in decades past of Martin Luther King Jr., John Lennon and civil rights organizations, she said." However, the AP notes, Day said that "it is incorrect to suggest that the FBI was spying on the Maine peace groups or intercepting their e-mails electronically," and she "said a federal court order would be required to obtain them electronically. The FBI would request such a court order only if it had evidence that a crime or an act of violence was going to be committed, or that national security was being compromised, she said. 'We do not investigate individuals engaged in their constitutional rights, including the right to free speech and assembly,' Day said."

FBI Arrests Chicago Police Officers In Drug Money Theft Sting. The Chicago Tribune (10/26, Coen, 623K) reports, "Two Chicago police officers believed they were stealing from drug dealers who had stashed money in a Grand Avenue storage locker, but in fact, FBI agents had planted the cash to snare them, federal prosecutors said Wednesday." Richard Doroniuk and Mahmoud Shamah "allegedly stole more than $31,000 from the locker. Doroniuk and Shamah were arrested Wednesday and appeared in federal court before U.S. Magistrate Judge Nan Nolan, who ordered them held pending a detention hearing next week." The Tribune notes that an FBI informant "help set up the officers and tapped telephones to monitor conversations about their plans. Agents were listening when Doroniuk allegedly told Shamah they needed to be careful to hide the cash." The Chicago Sun-Times (10/2, Main) adds, "They also planned to conduct a home invasion on one of the drug dealers whose lockers they targeted, but the ripoff was never carried out, officials said. They intended to buy a diamond necklace or something else valuable for an unidentified person who was going to help them with the robbery, authorities said."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/26, Robinson) reports, "Doroniuk attorney Robert Clarke said the officer 'is going to get his full day in court and that's what he wants,' while Shamah attorney Anthony Pinelli declined to comment because he was still studying the case." The AP notes, "Officials said the officers used information from a third defendant, Larry 'Peanut' Cross…to obtain search warrants for the lockers. According to the complaint, the officers failed to report any of the money seized from a locker in June and only part of the cash taken in a second theft in August. … A criminal complaint unsealed following the arrests charged all three men with conspiracy to steal government funds."

DOJ_NMG_0086443

California Jailer Snared By FBI Bribery Sting. The AP (10/26) reports, "A federal grand jury indicted a jail guard Wednesday on charges he accepted $6,000 from an inmate in exchange for smuggling in banned cell phones." Santa Ana City jailer Jose Abel Flores "was being held on $100,000 bond and was scheduled to be arraigned Nov. 6." The AP notes, "Flores accepted two $3,000 bribes in exchange for bringing cellular telephones to a federal inmate being held in jail on narcotics and weapons charges, according to the indictment. The bribes were paid from a purported friend of Flores, but in fact the friend was an undercover FBI agent, authorities said."

Authorities Say Colorado Ring Hid Meth Inside Elmo Doll, Other Toys. There are more than 100 media references to the investigation of a Colorado meth ring in which the accused leader reportedly tried to dominate the meth trade in the northern part of the state. For example, the AP (10/26) reports agents "broke up an aggressive northern Colorado ring that shipped methamphetamine hidden in Elmo dolls and other toys, authorities said Wednesday. The alleged ringleader was among 19 people in custody. Agents said they seized more than 45 pounds of what they described as high-quality methamphetamine worth $864,000 and capable of supplying 4 million doses." According to the AP, officials said alleged ringleader Rigoverto Valle-Sierra "was trying to take over the methamphetamine trade in northern Colorado with an operation that used night-vision goggles and bulletproof vests." In a separate AP (10/25) story, the AP notes Jeffrey D. Sweetin, regional DEA special agent in charge, "said the operation was selling methamphetamine that was about 99 percent pure." News outlets that used a version of the AP story include ABC News, FOX News, the New York Times, Washington Post, Los Angeles Times, Houston Chronicle, Chicago Tribune, Seattle Post Intelligencer, and Coloradoan.

The Denver Post (10/25) reports agents "raided a number of homes and a business in Greeley Monday and Tuesday, arresting 10 people and confiscating more than 45 pounds of methamphetamine. … Agents from the Drug Enforcement Administration and officers from the Weld County Drug Task Force confiscated $59,000 in cash, four weapons, one of which had been stolen, a bullet-proof vest and a night-vision goggles." Sweetin "said the methamphetamine was made in California and transported to Colorado."

In a separate story, the Denver Post (10/26) writes that smugglers "used various means to hide the meth, including putting it in plastic bags and stuffing it into tires and an Elmo Sesame Street doll. Drugs were transported from Mexico through Los Angeles to Greeley, which served as the hub city, and then to Wyoming, Nebraska and Virginia," according to authorities. Denver DEA agent Dennis Follett said the 21 suspects "represent the upper tier of a drug operation in which hundreds of dealers, including Greeley gang members, distributed the meth to customers that included school-age children."

The Rocky Mountain News (10/26) reports, "Twelve of the 21 people indicted, including one with at least 10 aliases, were in the country illegally. … 'Most meth is seized in ounces. This was a monstrous amount,' said Sweetin. 'This will have an impact for decades in Greeley.'"

The Greeley (CO) Tribune (10/25) reports the investigation, which "began in September 2005, resulted in the seizure of more than 45 pounds of ICE methamphetamine, 1.1 kilos of cocaine and $59,000 in cash. The organization used buses and cars to transport the high-quality meth from California to Colorado. … DEA agents and Weld County Drug Task Force officers arrested 10 people this week, including Rigoverto Valle-Sierra, the alleged leader of the organization."

Local TV Coverage. KCNC-TV, Denver (10/25, 6:00 p.m.) aired, "This morning, agents showed us how this group hid some of the drugs on the road trip from the Mexican border in California to right here in Weld County. … Elmo is not just a child's toy. In the hands of sinister people, it's a concealment device to smuggle methamphetamine. An Elmo doll like this holds meth hidden in the stuffing. … The task force worked with federal DEA agents over the past 13 months, an effort they hope sends a warning to other drug traffickers."

KDVR-TV, Denver (10/25, 9:00 p.m.) aired, "Agents are still looking for two people connected to the case. They say 12 of the 21 indictments are for people in this country illegally."

KUSA-TV, Denver (10/25, 10:00 p.m.) aired, "A drug ring in Colorado used toys to hide meth. The suspects shipped the drugs inside Elmo dolls and other toys; agents seized more than 45 pounds of what they describe as high quality methamphetamine worth 800,000 dollars. ... Investigators are still looking for two more suspects."

DEA Agent Accused Of Tipping Off Friends About Cocaine-Trafficking Investigation. In Memphis, Tennessee, the Commercial Appeal (10/26) reports a DEA agent "was indicted Wednesday on charges that he tipped off former high school classmates that one of them was a target in a large cocaine-trafficking case…in August. Tommie Purifoy II of West Memphis turned himself in to federal authorities in South Florida where he was assigned as a special agent in the Drug Enforcement Administration's Miami field office. … Purifoy…allegedly passed sensitive DEA information along to Christopher Ivy, who called Sean Williams, who called his cousin, Brian Nicholas Williams, an alleged drug trafficker. All attended West Memphis High School together and had been friends since at least 1996."

DOJ_NMG_0086444

Also in Memphis, the AP (10/26) reports, "Despite the tip, three days later authorities made the largest drug bust in the area for the year, when they seized more than 88 pounds of cocaine and over $500,000 cash. Brian Williams and 10 others were charged in connection with the drug ring."

WPTY-TV, Memphis (10/26) reports on its Web site that Purifoy "is charged with obstruction of justice and disclosure of electronic surveillance. Federal authorities say Purifoy and two other men were indicted Wednesday for telling a Mid-South drug dealer he was being investigated by the DEA."

WMC-TV, Memphis (10/25) reports on its Web site that according to the indictment, Purifoy "set aside his duties as a special agent for the DEA to warn his friends about a pending drug bust, a wire tap investigation Purifoy learned about while visiting the DEA office in Memphis."

FBI, California Police Arrest 15 In Crackdown On Violent Drug Gang. The San Francisco Chronicle (10/26, Lee, 405K) reports, "About 200 federal and local law-enforcement officers targeting a street gang known for drug activity swooped down on North Richmond" Wednesday, "arresting 15 people and seizing nearly a pound of methamphetamine. … Contra Costa County sheriff's deputies, Richmond police and FBI SWAT team members dressed in camouflage jumpsuits served at least a dozen federal search warrants." The Chronicle notes, "Many of the suspects sought today were named in sealed federal indictments on various drug and gang-related charges, said Special Agent Joseph Schadler, FBI spokesman in San Francisco. … 'It's a continual process to make this community safer,' said David Johnson, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI in San Francisco." Bay City News Wires (10/25) reported, "Authorities were targeting people believed to be established gang leaders of the Project Trojans street gang, Schadler said. 'The key to this is we're trying to take the head off the organization,' Schadler said. … Wiretap and undercover operations ended in February and the first raid was conducted in March, Schadler said. At that time nine people were arrested for manufacturing and distributing cocaine, crack and methamphetamine."

US Charges New York Man With "Club Drug" Smuggling. The Rochester (NY) Democrat & Chronicle (10/26, Daneman) reports, "A Pittsford man is one of 10 people indicted on federal drug trafficking charges for allegedly smuggling 'club drugs' into the United States." The D&C continues, "The U.S. Attorney's Office for the Western District of New York announced the charges, which came after an investigation of nearly two years into what the U.S. Justice Department called 'a large scale drug smuggling and trafficking group operating in and around Buffalo and Rochester.'" The D&C adds, "The drug ring allegedly smuggled such club drugs as Ecstasy, GHB, ketamine and crystal methamphetamine from Toronto. … Jeffrey Parasida, 28, of Pittsford was charged with a pair of violations under the federal Controlled Substances Act, as were nine other defendants from the Buffalo region, according to the Justice Department."

Owner Of New York Pharmacy Accused Of Illegally Distributing Painkiller. In White Plains, the Journal News (10/25) reports the owner of a pharmacy "is accused of illegally dispensing tens of thousands of doses of the generic form of the…painkiller Vicodin. Syed Zahid Ali, 58, owner of Post Pharmacy…is due in court next week to face charges he illegally distributed hydrocodone as well as a stimulant used to treat sleep disorders." He "cannot account for 100,000 tablets of the painkiller, federal authorities said. He is also accused of refilling prescriptions for the drug despite the bottles being marked 'no refill.'"

Trial Date Set In Sacramento For Accused "Drug Kingpin." Vacaville, California's Reporter (10/26) writes that a 2007 trial date "has been set in federal court for a Fairfield man described as a regional drug kingpin by the Drug Enforcement Administration. Federal magistrate Lawrence K. Karlton on Tuesday scheduled…Jan. 23 for the trial of…Eduardo Pichardo - also known as Eddie Nunez - in Eastern District Federal Court in Sacramento. … Pichardo was arrested by DEA agents on June 21 on suspicion of distribution and conspiracy to distribute cocaine and methamphetamine. A DEA spokesman said the arrest culminated a seven-year investigation into a drug-trafficking network that stretched from Northern California to Arizona and Alabama."

Big-City Mayors Lead Efforts To Curb Gun Violence. The AP (10/25, D'Alessio) reports from Chicago, "New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg, Chicago Mayor Richard Daley and Milwaukee Mayor Thomas Barrett had harsh words Wednesday for the Bush administration and the gun lobby's influence on Congress. … 'When Washington makes bad decisions to protect criminals rather than the public, we suffer the consequences,' Bloomberg said at a news conference outlining the agenda for Thursday's Midwestern summit of Mayors Against Illegal Guns, a group Bloomberg founded with Boston Mayor Thomas Menino." The AP adds, "Bloomberg said he had hoped to have 50 of the nation's mayors on board by the end of this year, but 109 mayors from 44 states already have joined. … 'These cities represent more than 44 million Americans,' the New York Republican said." The AP notes, "Daley, Bloomberg and Barrett, accompanied by counterparts from a number of smaller cities, complained that inaction by the federal executive branch and the influence of the gun lobby, particularly the National Rifle Association, on Congress have left local officials to combat the problem of illegal weapons. … 'Mayors know that illegal guns have nothing to do with the Second Amendment and everything to do with law enforcement,' Bloomberg said. 'But cities can lead where Congress won't.' … He added that the goal of the mayors' group is to 'hold Congress' feet to the fire.' … White House spokesman Tony Fratto said violent crime has been reduced significantly in recent years, especially in many large cities. … 'A lot of the credit for that goes to mayors and law enforcement personnel and cooperation at the local, state and federal levels,' Fratto said in an e-mailed statement. 'Enforcing gun laws that are on the books is an essential facet of our efforts. The president and Attorney General (Alberto) Gonzales are committed to making sure that existing laws are enforced.'" The AP notes, "Bloomberg said the Federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives keeps its own records of multiple firearms purchases and attempted purchases but denies that information to local authorities."

DOJ_NMG_0086445

Texas Gun Dealer Pleads Guilty To Illegal Firearm Sales. The Longview (TX) News-Journal (10/26) reports, "A gun dealer in Gladewater faces up to five years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000 after pleading guilty to falsifying records needed to purchase a firearm, said U.S. Attorney Matthew D. Orwin in a Wednesday media release." The News-Journal continues, "According to court records, Michael Zirkle, 41, agreed to allow an ATF confidential informant to use someone else's identity on the forms necessary to purchase a .40-caliber pistol. … Zirkle has surrendered his gun dealer's license and forfeited 47 firearms, valued at approximately $19,000, as part of the plea agreement. As a convicted felon he is not permitted to possess a firearm again."

The Tyler (TX) Morning Telegraph (10/26, Knaupp) reports, "On Jan. 6 in Gregg County, a confidential informant for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives entered the 'Ace of Pawn' pawn shop in Gladewater, owned by Zirkle. He told the defendant he wanted to buy a .40-caliber pistol for himself, but he wanted to use the identity and personal information of another person when filling out the required ATF form. Zirkle agreed, according to court documents. … U.S. Magistrate Judge John Love allowed Zirkle to continue to remain out of jail on bond pending his sentencing hearing after there were no objections from Assistant U.S. Attorney Jim Noble." The Telegraph adds, "Zirkle surrendered his firearm license and forfeited 47 guns - 31 rifles, six pistols, eight shotguns, a revolver and a machine gun rifle - he possessed as a firearms dealer, defense attorney F.R. 'Buck' Files Jr. said during the hearing. … In the plea agreement, Zirkle agreed that the 47 weapons were used to perpetrate the violations stated in the indictment, which includes selling firearms to felons."

Old West Town Still Plagued By Guns, Now Carried By Gangs. The AP (10/25, Fisher) reports from Dodge City, KS, "Dodge City has a rich history as an Old West frontier town, where cowboys and gunslingers could take a break from the trail and get their fill of saloons and brothels. … Today, the tidy town built on meatpacking and rodeos is again plagued by gunfighters. But this time they're in street gangs, some of which have second-generation members as young as 11. The drug of choice is methamphetamine and the weapons range from automatic rifles to baseball bats." The AP continues, "Street gangs, often thought of as a big-city problem, have been turning up in rural areas across the country since the 1980s, frightening residents and straining smaller law enforcement departments. Rural gangs are often more transitory than their urban counterparts, but they appear to have a foothold in several communities. … About 24,000 gangs operate around the country, according to the U.S. Department of Justice, which estimates there are about 760,000 members in 2,900 communities." The AP adds, "The 2004 Youth Gang Survey conducted by the Justice Department, 82 percent of large cities surveyed, 42 percent of suburban counties, 27 percent of smaller cities and 14 percent of rural counties reported active youth gangs. … In Ottumwa, Iowa, Chief of Police Jim Clark says gangs are starting to show up in his town of about 25,000. Five years ago, Ottumwa had an occasional visit from a gang member from Los Angeles or Chicago. Now, Clark estimates there about 100 gang members in town. Some moved to Ottumwa with their families. Others have been sent to live with relatives to escape gangs in bigger cities, Clark said."

Fugitive Killed In Georgia While Pointing Shoe At Agents. In Lithonia, the AP (10/25) reports federal agents "fatally shot a fugitive early Wednesday after the man refused to put down what they thought was a gun but turned out to be a shoe. Agents went to an apartment complex in suburban Atlanta to arrest 24-year-old Youwiers Vilpie, said U.S. Marshal Richard Mecum. They were serving a warrant from the Drug Enforcement Administration office in south Florida. Vilpie also was wanted for questioning in two homicides in Ft. Myers, Fla., Mecum said." The Washington Post and Miami Herald used the AP story.

DOJ_NMG_0086446

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (10/25) reports a similar story.

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration Officials Arrest California Man Linked To Murder Of Salvadoran Priests. The Los Angeles Times (10/26, Becerra) reports, "Gonzalo Guevara Cerritos was a decorated, American-trained officer in the Salvadoran army. … But for the last year, the 43-year-old toiled away as a janitor at a West L.A.-area motel, a man with a secret who was always looking over his shoulder, his common law wife said." The Times continues, "His clandestine existence came to an end Wednesday, when federal authorities announced his arrest -- branding him a human-rights violator who was in the U.S. illegally. … The Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency said Guevara Cerritos was among nine Salvadoran officers and soldiers implicated in one of the most notorious massacres in El Salvador's history: the 1989 death-squad murders of six Jesuit priests." The Times adds, "Guevara Cerritos was convicted in El Salvador for his role in the slayings. In 1993, he was granted a pardon as part of a general amnesty that occurred after the country's 12-year civil war. … His wife, Eusebia Mejia, 45, said her husband could never escape the shadow of the massacre and fled to the United States in hopes of getting a new start. … But when he arrived in Los Angeles -- home to more than 250,000 Salvadorans -- he quickly realized he would not find peace. Fearing that someone would recognize him on the streets of Los Angeles, he kept his head down and rarely went out. … But the strategy apparently didn't work: Federal authorities said it was a tip from the public that put them on Guevara Cerritos' trail. … He was taken into custody last Thursday as part of an effort by U.S. immigration agents to catch and deport human-rights violators."

Arizona Seen As Microcosm For Nation On Immigration Debate. The Christian Science Monitor (10/26, Chaddock, 58K) reports that while "much of America hit the pause button this fall on the flaming debate over illegal immigration, once it became clear Congress would not act before the election. But not Arizona." In a "state where the wave of border crossers is so great that it washes over every aspect of life, illegal immigration is a flash point in virtually every political race this fall. Moreover, there's a candidate for every view - from those saying 'send 'em back and bar the door' to those who'd provide a path for citizenship for some undocumented workers." Republican Randy Graf, who takes a "tough stance" on immigration, is "in an uphill battle to hold the Eighth Congressional District for the Republicans." Outgoing Rep. Jim Kolbe "holds a more moderate view of immigration reform, as does Graf's Democratic challenger, Gabrielle Giffords. But Graf is banking that a majority of voters in this district feel as he does - and there are signs that Arizonans are, indeed, worked up over illegal immigration." But the state's "all-Republican congressional delegation - some of whom are in unexpectedly close contests for reelection - is deeply divided on the immigration issue. Sharing Representative Kolbe's view are Rep. Jeff Flake, in the upscale Phoenix suburb of Mesa, and the very popular Sen. John McCain." On the other side "are Graf and Rep. J.D. Hayworth, who represents the also-upscale Fifth Congressional District in Scottsdale. They say their colleagues' plan amounts to amnesty for illegal immigrants and would reward people for breaking the law." Farrell Quinlan, a spokesman for the Arizona Chamber of Commerce in Phoenix, said, "Arizona is a microcosm of the nation when it comes to views on this issue. We're ground zero for the debate. Our economy is growing, and a lot of industries have grown to rely on that source of labor."

TAX:

Charitable Giving By Wealthy Said To Be Immune To Tax Changes. The Wall Street Journal (10/26, D3, Beatty) reports, "Many wealthy people would still give a lot to charity even if Congress wiped out popular breaks for donating, a study suggests. While these high-net-worth Americans already contribute two-thirds of household charitable giving, donating $126 billion last year alone, they would give more if nonprofits could rein in administrative costs and better demonstrate the impact of donations." The Journal continues, "The researchers at the Center on Philanthropy at Indiana University, underwritten by Bank of America Corp., distributed 30,000 surveys between June and September in neighborhoods where the average household had liquid assets of $3 million or more. Responses from 945 were used in the analysis. The survey, designed as a nationally representative random sample, defined high-net-worth households as those with incomes of greater than $200,000 or assets over $1 million. Such homes represent 3.1% of U.S. households, the researchers said." The Journal adds, '"The results are at odds with several stereotypes about how and why rich people give to charity. Patrick Rooney, director of research at the center, said previous research has shown that giving declines generally when the value of tax deductions on the donation declines. But 52% of responding households said their giving would stay the same if they received no income-tax deductions for it. And 38% said such giving would somewhat decrease, but only 7% said it would dramatically decrease."

DOJ_NMG_0086447

IRS Help Line May Not Be Much Help, Audit Finds. USA Today (10/26, McCoy) reports, "Got a complex tax problem? Phoning an IRS Taxpayer Assistance Center for an appointment won't necessarily produce a solution, a federal audit shows." USA continues, "The Treasury Department inspector general overseeing the IRS called 50 assistance centers — 36 with tax account problems and 14 with tax law questions. Auditors reported that eight phone messages weren't returned, and five weren't returned within two business days as IRS guidelines require. … Moreover, auditors managed to schedule appointments for just five of the 36 calls that involved tax account problems, the type of complex tax issues that often require a face-to-face session to resolve." USA adds, "That performance, outlined in an audit released late last week, undermined the centers' mission, the auditors concluded. They stressed that the 'convenience of scheduling appointments could encourage taxpayers to try to resolve tax account problems earlier, thus reducing taxpayer burden.' … The IRS maintains 400 Taxpayer Assistance Centers nationwide. It encourages taxpayers to request face-to-face appointments for tax account issues that are difficult to resolve over the telephone. … Designated taxpayer phone lines in the offices logged about 500,000 calls during the 2006 federal tax season, from January through mid-April, the audit reported."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Portman Says A Democratic Congress Would Boost Spending, Raise Taxes. The Financial Times (10/26, Guha) reports, "A Democrat victory in next month's midterm elections would jeopardise efforts to contain government spending, put upward pressure on taxes and undermine -America's ability to negotiate free trade agreements, Rob Portman, the White House budget director, claimed on Wednesday." In an interview with the Financial Times, Portman "said voters had an economic choice to make at the polls on November 7. 'There is a clear distinction between Republicans and Democrats, both on the revenue side and on the spending side.' Portman told the Financial Times that "if the Democrats took control of Congress, there would be more pressure for higher spending on non-defence discretionary expenditure." He "warned voters against assuming that President George W. Bush could veto all extra spending proposals. 'Yes, the president has veto power, and could use it more frequently. But we also need to get these bills done. It is always a matter of negotiation,' he said." Portman also "suggested that Mr Bush might not veto an increase in the minimum wage proposed by a Democrat Congress, provided it was part of a 'package' that included relief for small businesses." On taxes, Portman said of Democrats, "They are not going to make the tax cuts permanent." He also "claimed a Democrat-run Congress would seek to raise taxes in other areas to offset reform of the Alternative Minimum Tax."

OMB Set To Roll "Smart Card" IDs For Federal Employees. Under the headline, "Entering The Era Of Smart Card ID," the Washington Post's (10/26, D1, Barr) "Federal Diary" section reports, "The government begins issuing a new identification card tomorrow, the kickoff of a multiyear effort to provide all government workers and many contractors with a 'smart card' that can be used to verify their identity when they enter a building or log onto computer networks." The chip can show "a person's name and agency," and "contain personal data, such as images from two fingerprints, a special identification number and digital certificates that permit access to places and systems." The Post adds that the "goal is to have government employees carry one ID card, replacing the multiple cards many employees must use to get into offices or obtain sensitive information." The Post adds, "Groups concerned about privacy rights" are watching the "card project, in part because it may provide lessons for ongoing debates on whether Americans should carry a national identification card." OMB officials "hope to see the cards roll out tomorrow in cities with large numbers of federal employees, such as Washington, Atlanta, Denver, Seattle and New York."

OTHER NEWS:

Fed Leaves Interest Rates Unchanged. ABC World News (10/25, story 8, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In economic news tonight, interest rates are staying put for now, for the third meeting in a row. The Federal Reserve voted to keep the key Fed funds rate at 5.25%."

NBC Nightly News(10/25, story 9, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported the Fed statement "said the economy has slowed but the growth will probably pick up in the coming months." USA Today (10/26, Kirchhoff, 2.27M), meanwhile, notes "the central bank cautioned that inflation remains a threat given the tight job market, even after the recent fall in energy prices." Fed Chairman Ben "Bernanke and other officials have said they expect inflation to gradually moderate as growth slows. However, they repeated their warning that incoming data will determine whether they need to raise rates again."

The Wall Street Journal (10/26, lp, 2.03M) reports, "Since Ben Bernanke became Fed chairman in February, he has faced, first, the threat of rising inflation and then a housing-led economic slowdown. The latest data, and the statement released by the Fed after its meeting yesterday, suggest that the central bank sees the risks on both sides diminishing. That makes it less likely that rates will change in either direction in coming months." The Journal adds, "For the third straight meeting, Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond President Jeffrey Lacker cast the lone dissent among the 11 voting members of the Federal Open Market Committee. He argued in favor of a quarter-percentage point rate increase in the target federal-funds rate, charged on overnight loans between banks."

DOJ_NMG_0086448

The New York Times (10/26, Leonhardt, 1.21M) notes "the statement accompanying the Fed's decision on interest rates was nearly identical the one that the Fed released after its policy meeting last month. Since then, the economy has continued to slow, but at a stable pace, giving Fed officials reason to hope that they have achieved a soft landing, in which interest-rate hikes bring down inflation without causing a recession." But "a sharp drop in oil prices — with gasoline falling this week to $2.20 a gallon on average, from more than $3 in early August — appears to have reduced the chances that the slowdown could turn into something more severe, economists say. A Labor Department report earlier this month also showed this summer's job market to be healthier than had been earlier believed."

The Washington Post (10/26, D2, Henderson, 748K) reports that while inflation "has fallen as fuel prices have tumbled since mid-August," economists also "look for signs of underlying inflation by studying core measures that exclude volatile food and fuel prices. The core CPI rose 0.2 percent last month and 2.9 percent from September 2005 -- the highest 12-month increase in a decade."

Housing Markets Continues Slide. NBC Nightly News (10/25, story 8, 0:25, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There is news on the economy. The housing market continues to slide. Sales of existing homes last month fell by 1.9%. It is the sixth month in a row that sales have dropped. Home prices fell as well by 2.5%. What is notable here, that is the largest price drop on record."

The Wall Street Journal (10/26, Hagerty, 2.03M) reports, "The latest report is likely to encourage many potential buyers to hold off in the hope of further price declines." USA Today (10/26, Knox, 2.27M) runs a similar report under the headline "Sellers Sing The Blues As Price Drop Sets Record." The Washington Post (10/26, D1, Downey, 748K), in a story titled "A Record Drop In Home Prices," says "prices fell everywhere in the country, with the Northeast and West most affected. Declines were more moderate in the South, which includes the Washington area."

Dow Reaches New High After Modest Gains. NBC Nightly News (10/25, story 10, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today modest gains at the end of the day. The Dow was up almost 7 points [to close at 12,134.68]. NASDAQ was up almost 12 points [to close at 2,256.59] on today's trading." USA Today (10/26, 2.27M) notes the Standard & Poor's 500 "set another 2006 high as it rose 4.84 points to 1382.22 and stretched its gain for the year to 10.7%." The Wall Street Journal (10/26, C1, McKay, 2.03M) says "the stock market rallied on news that the Federal Reserve isn't raising rates but gains were held in check by a jump in crude-oil prices, which typically hurts stocks."

Report Faults Amtrak For Management Of Outside Counsel. The Wall Street Journal (10/26, Koppel, Jones) reports, "Amtrak has been careless in managing law firms that have billed it millions in legal fees, according to a report released Wednesday by federal investigators." The Journal continues, "The report, issued jointly by Amtrak's Office of Inspector General and the U.S. Department of Transportation Inspector General, said that the law department of the passenger railroad, for example, failed consistently to request and manage budgets for legal work. Also, law firms engaged in 'block billing,' in which firms lump tasks under one entry of an invoice rather than showing the costs of each task. The practice is prohibited by Amtrak's billing guidelines, the report says." The Journal adds, "Amtrak, which is federally subsidized, has been struggling to reverse years of losses and has faced Bush administration calls to sharply reduce its long-distance train service. … A letter addressed to Rep. (John) Mica and released Wednesday from the chairman of Amtrak's board, David Laney, said Amtrak reduced annual legal fees by 26%, or $8 million, since 2003, and in the past five years, working with outside law firms, recovered $79 million in cash from legal settlements. 'Still … the report should provide us with valuable guidance as we continue to improve Law Department operations,' the letter said."

Poll Finds Majority Believe Democrats Will Retake House Majority. USA Today (10/26, Page, 2.27M) reports most Americans "predict Democrats will win control of the House of Representatives in the elections Nov. 7, and they expect big things to follow — some good, some not — if Democrats take over the Senate, too, a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll shows." If Democrats "take over the House and Senate in January, more than 8 in 10 say, Congress would probably set a timetable to withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq, a step favored by nearly two-thirds." An expected move that is "less popular: Nearly two-thirds expect a Democratic Congress would raise federal income taxes. Three-fourths disapprove of that." The survey "of 1,002 adults Friday through Sunday underscores the high expectations and some trepidations around the prospect that Democrats could regain control of Congress for the first time since 1994. A 54% majority, including 1 in 4 Republicans, say a takeover of the House is likely."

DOJ_NMG_0086449

GOP House Prospects Seen As Hurt By Scandals, "Developing Wave." In his Roll Call column (10/26), Stuart Rothenberg says, "Two factors have come together to enhance Democratic prospects for a major House sweep — and neither one has much to do with the quality of Democratic recruiting in the two dozen or so top-tier Democratic House opportunities." First, a "handful of Republican House nominees with considerable political baggage have created competitive races for Democrats in places they couldn't have anticipated. And second, even relatively weak second- and third-tier Democratic candidates are in competitive races because of the developing political wave." By "traditional measures, Republicans have a long list of well-qualified, well-prepared Congressional candidates, many of them incumbents. Unfortunately for them, many voters don't seem to care much about credentials this year. They just want to send a message, and they don't care about the messenger as long as he or she has a 'D' behind his or her name." It is "remarkable how similar this group of Democratic candidates is to the GOP class of 1994, when, by my count, 37 freshmen were elected without having held a previous elective office."

Republicans Raise Specter Of "Speaker Pelosi" In Closing Days Of Campaign. The Financial Times (10/26, Yeager) reports that in the "waning days of the campaign, Republicans have stepped up their attention to" House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, "calling her a San Francisco liberal and warning about the wrong-headed policies of a 'Perilous Pelosi Majority.'" They have "hammered away at what they say is her weak stance on security," and Vice President Dick Cheney "told an interviewer that Mrs Pelosi 'is not in sync with the vast majority of the American people,' and represents "that side of the Democratic party that has not been supportive of and does not believe in a really robust, aggressive prosecution of the global war on terror.'"

USA Today (10/26, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) reports if the Democrats flip the House, "liberal Charles Rangel of New York, an outspoken critic of President Bush's sweeping tax cuts, will chair the powerful Ways and Means Committee, overseeing taxes, trade and Social Security." So it's "no surprise that Republicans from Bush on down warn that a Democratic victory would spell higher taxes and slower growth." While the "war in Iraq, congressional page and influence-peddling scandals and parochial concerns have been top issues this campaign season, the election could have big implications for the business agenda — taxes, trade, regulation and spending — which has been set in recent years by a GOP White House and Congress." Republicans, "lagging in some key House and Senate races, are making the case that a Democratic victory would endanger economic gains. Voters don't seem to agree; USA TODAY/Gallup and other surveys show Americans by a wide margin trust Democrats more to manage the economy." USA also examines particulars of the Democratic agenda on issues such as the minimum wage, trade, the budget and taxes, and others.

Bush Jokes About People "Dancing In The Endzone," "Measuring Their Drapes." The Washington Times (10/26, Dinan, 88K) reports that in a press conference yesterday, President Bush weighed in on the midterm elections. He "staked the Republican agenda for the final two years of his administration to tax cuts and Iraq, saying next month's election is a referendum on both, and chided Democrats for 'dancing in the end zone' to celebrate victory prematurely." Said Bush, "The two issues I see in the campaign can be boiled down to who best to protect this country and who best to keep taxes low. That's what the referendum's about." The Times adds, "For a president who in 2003 famously said he doesn't read newspapers, Mr. Bush appears to have closely followed news reports this year and seemed amused at the amount of attention being paid to Democratic leaders who would hold top positions if power changed hands. 'We got some people dancing in the end zone here in Washington, D.C. They got them measuring their drapes,' he said. 'They're going over to the Capitol and saying, well, "My new office looks beautiful. I think I'm going to have this size drape there or this color."'" That "was an apparent reference to House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, who could become the next speaker of the House, and who joked to the Associated Press recently that she could then have any office suite she wanted."

Wall Street Handicaps Winners, Losers Should Democrats Control Congress. USA Today (10/26, Shell, 2.27M) reports Democrats "aren't big fans of Wal-Mart. Nor are they fond of Halliburton, due to the energy firm's activities in Iraq and ties to Vice President Cheney. Democrats aren't chummy with tobacco companies such as Altria, either." That's why "those companies' stocks might be hurt if Democrats sweep the upcoming midterm elections and seize control of the Senate and House of Representatives from Republicans, say UBS analysts in a report." Wall Street analysts "have been handicapping which stocks and industry sectors will go up and which will go down, depending on the outcome of the vote." But even "the scenario that will result in the biggest change — a Democratic sweep — is unlikely to result in the type of major policy changes that could seriously rattle financial markets, says Thomas Doerflinger, strategist at UBS." Doerflinger adds the reason is that if "Democrats win, they will likely hold slim majorities and will avoid appearing too liberal to improve their chances of winning the presidential election in 2008." The likely "result would be legislative 'gridlock,' which historically has been bullish for stocks, notes Mark Riepe of the Schwab Center for Investment Research."

DOJ_NMG_0086450

Republican Advantage On Cultural Issues Examined. In a USA Today op-ed (10/26), Amy Sullivan, a contributing editor for The Washington Monthly magazine, says, "On the surface, solid majorities of Americans agree with Democratic Party values. They want universal health care, support increasing the minimum wage, believe stricter environmental regulations are needed and worth paying for, and think the best way to achieve peace is through diplomacy." But while Democrats "should be beating Republicans at the ballot box…precisely the opposite has happened in the past few national elections." One answer "is that national security is still a major issue, generally favoring Republicans. But more important is the fact that abortion and gay marriage are proxies for deeply held cultural concerns." Most voters "worry about escalating challenges to family stability and the losing battle to instill good values in their children instead of the materialism and coarseness peddled by popular culture. They fear that our society has developed a casualness about life, especially as science has made it easier to manipulate and create beings. Banning gay marriage and outlawing abortion don't directly address those anxieties. But proposals like these at least acknowledge that the concerns exist and are valid. So while Republicans offer the wrong prescriptions, they get the diagnosis right. And they win because most of the time, Democrats won't admit that anything is wrong."

Democrats Hope To Win Upstate New York House Races. The New York Times (10/26, Hernandez, 1.21M) reports, "Once pessimistic about making gains in the Republican bastion of upstate New York, Democrats have now made the region a focal point in their campaign to retake Congress, pouring money and troops into several districts where they believe the Republican incumbents are vulnerable." The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee is "financing hard-hitting advertisements in three districts that criticize the Republicans for ethical lapses, supporting the war in Iraq and advancing President Bush's agenda. It has spent $2 million in races in the state so far." There are "also extensive get-out-the-vote campaigns being organized in at least four Republican-held districts, with Democratic challengers receiving heavy support from national and state party operatives, as well as legions of volunteers and workers from unions, third parties and liberal advocacy groups like MoveOn.org." Former President Bill Clinton "is scheduled to swing through New York on Thursday, when he will headline airport rallies for three Democratic candidates from Albany to Syracuse." Democrats "feel that their best opportunity" is the 24th CD race between Republican state Sen. Raymond A. Meier and Democrat Michael A. Arcuri. In the 26th CD, Democrats are targeting Rep. Thomas Reynolds, "who is trailing his Democratic challenger, Jack Davis, in recent polls after facing questions about whether he responded vigorously enough after learning about e-mail exchanges between" Rep. Mark Foley and a congressional page. In three "other New York races, Democrats say that their chances are less certain, but still believe they are within striking range if there is a powerful Democratic tide on Election Day." John Randy Kuhl Jr. "faces a challenge from Eric Massa in the 29th Congressional District in the Southern Tier region of the state; James T. Walsh who is battling Dan Maffei in the 25th District in the Syracuse region; and John E. Sweeney who is in a race against Kirsten Gillibrand in the 20th District outside Albany."

Kentucky's 4th CD Race A Test For Democrats' Effort To Nationalize Campaign. In his syndicated column, run in the Washington Post (10/26, A25, 748K), Robert Novak analyzes the 4th CD race in Kentucky between Republican Rep. Geoff Davis and former Democratic Rep. Ken Lucas. Lucas "looked like he would rather be any place other than Kentucky's public television studios Monday night as he debated" Davis. A "moderate conservative, Lucas was not going deep into the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) liberal playbook that is intended to nationalize midterm congressional elections." Lucas showed Monday night that this has not been a happy campaign for him. While Democratic candidates nationwide pillory George W. Bush, Lucas did not mention the president's name and appeared uncomfortable with the DCCC attack litany." Democrats "must win seats such as this one to achieve a substantial working majority in the House. But Republicans have limited the election in Kentucky's 4th Congressional District to a 'choice' between two candidates instead of a 'referendum' on an unpopular Republican president and Congress. That demonstrates that the struggle for Congress is not really a national election but is about 50 hotly contested local ones."

GOP Faces Hostile Political Environment In Ohio. The Washington Times (10/26, Dinan, 88K) reports that in Ohio's 15th CD, Republican Rep. Deborah Pryce "has cruised to victory" the "past six times with at least 60 percent of the vote, in a dead-heat district where President Bush and Sen. John Kerry just about split the vote in 2004." But with "Bush sliding into disastrous levels in the polls and Republicans in Ohio imploding amid corruption charges and unpopular policies, she is struggling against a boilerplate Democratic candidate whose attacks are similar to those being used across the nation by Democratic challengers." Mary Jo Kilroy, "a Franklin County commissioner from the left wing of the Democratic Party," said, "This is a referendum on the policies of this current administration." The Times adds Democrats "expect major victories up and down the Ohio ballot, leading off with Ted Strickland, a Democratic congressman who is on the verge of trouncing Republican Ken Blackwell in the governor's race." Republicans' "problems in Ohio are not primarily the national mood or antipathy toward Mr. Bush, who polls above 40 percent in approval ratings, higher than his national average. Instead, it is local -- a mixture of a faltering economy, state Republicans who pushed through huge tax increases, a school system that few voters seem pleased with, and Bob Taft, the departing Republican governor, who pleaded no contest last year to violating state ethics laws."

DOJ_NMG_0086451

GOP Woes Leave DeWine At Risk. NBC Nightly News (10/25, story 6, 3:55, Williams, 9.87M) reported in Ohio, "some here are stunned to see Republican Senator Mike DeWine in trouble. The latest poll has him down by eight to his opponent." DeWine, "conservative to moderate, he voted for the war but not always in lock step with President Bush. He knows he sees the issue heading south, along with the President's approval rating." Democrat Sherrod Brown "is a former Eagle Scout who majored in Russian studies at Yale. He is pro abortion rights and anti-free trade. He doesn't like the way the war on terror is being fought."

On CNN's The Situation Room (10/25), Rep. Sherrod Brown said, "I don't think the Administration's listening to the generals enough. The President's comments and Mike DeWine's comments consistently are 'stay the course, stay the course, stay the course.' And if people want to stay the course in Iraq, they should vote for Mike DeWine, but I don't think they do."

Also on CNN's The Situation Room (10/25), RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman said, "We're spending millions of dollars in the final days of the campaign in Ohio. We're spending it on television ads. We're spending it in turning out the vote. We're spending it in mailing and contacting the voters working with the state party. Look, I think Mike DeWine will get re-elected."

Trade Issues The Focus Of North Carolina 8th CD Race. The New York Times (10/26, Weisman, 1.21M) reports on the North Carolina 8th CD race between Republican Rep. Robin Hayes and Democrat Larry Kissell, whose "campaign is organized around the threat of foreign competition and Mr. Hayes's tiebreaking vote last year for a trade accord with Central America." Kissell said, "The No. 1 issue voters care about this year is jobs. We have lost 10,000 jobs in the textile industry here in the last several years. Free trade has not been good for this district." The Times adds, "By most accounts, Mr. Kissell has an uphill battle in trying to unseat Mr. Hayes, who has withstood challenges on the trade issue in the past." But Kissell is "one of a dozen Democratic candidates for the House, and a few for the Senate, who are making at least some headway in tapping voter anxiety about trade." If "many pro-trade Republicans lose on Election Day, President Bush, who has had trouble winning approval of trade deals in the past, could face even tougher odds."

Herbert Says Indiana 2nd CD Voters Lack Confidence In Both Parties. In his New York Times column (10/26), Bob Herbert says that in Indiana's 2nd CD, Republican Rep. Chris Chocola "is in big political trouble and he knows that President Bush is much more the cause than the solution. Any mention of the Bush administration tends to turn local Republicans as chilly as the dusting of lake-effect snow that fell over South Bend the other night." Bush has "come into this northern Indiana district to raise money for the Chocola campaign but he has not been asked to appear with the congressman publicly to rally the dispirited troops." Chocola said, "I don't know that it would help me." He "candidly acknowledged that being seen as aligned with Mr. Bush 'is not as much of a positive as it used to be.'" Herbert adds that with "control of the House at stake, the G.O.P. can hardly afford to lose Mr. Chocola's seat. Two years ago he defeated his Democratic opponent, Joe Donnelly, by roughly nine percentage points." Donnelly is "his opponent again this year, and a recent public poll showed him leading Mr. Chocola by about five points. Mr. Chocola said his own internal polls showed the race as a dead heat." But the "overwhelming sense I took away from interviews with voters in and around South Bend was a feeling of disillusionment with government. Republicans and Democrats spoke sourly about the Bush administration, but no one expected dramatic changes if the Democrats gained control of one or both houses of Congress." 2nd CD resident Vernon DeWitt said, "People say the Democrats are weak, and frankly, I think they are. I'm fed up with everybody." Herbert concludes, "There are only two major parties. Where do troubled voters turn if the country is in a serious fix and neither party is seen as having an adequate solution?"

Schumer Surprised At Extent Of Democrats' Senate Prospects. The Washington Times (10/26, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer "says he is just as surprised as anyone that Democrats have a legitimate shot at taking control of the Senate in the November election." At a National Press Club appearance with National Republican Senatorial Committee Chairman Elizabeth Dole, said, "In 2005, most people were predicting we'd be lucky just to keep our 45 [seats]. And now, I'd be disappointed if we just hold." The Times adds Dole "acknowledged the negative draw

DOJ_NMG_0086452

President Bush's Iraq policy is having on her party's candidates, but she asked what leaving Iraq now would accomplish and questioned the national security credentials of Democrats." Dole said, "If Democrats were to take over the Senate, you're going to see a weaker security situation."

RNC Pulls Controversial Tennessee Senate Ad. ABC World News (10/25, story 5, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported the Tennessee Senate race "has just about everything. Hints of sex. Allegations of racism. And the possibility that a Southern state could elect a black senator for the first time since Reconstruction." ABC (Reynolds) added, "Bob Corker should be coasting. A Republican running in a conservative red state that was carried twice by President Bush, his prospects should be looking good." But Democrat Harold Ford "has proven to be a more adept campaigner, insinuating at every stop that Corker's undeniable wealth includes ill-gotten gains and tying Corker to an unpopular war and an unpopular President." Faced with "the loss of a must-win Senate seat, the Republicans decided to down-shift away from Ford's politics to his persona. Drawing on Ford's attendance at a 'Playboy' magazine Super Bowl party last year, the national GOP is running this commercial, what many see as racial overtones. First, they lampoon Ford's positions. Then, a woman in a suggestive pose says this." Unidentified female: "I met Harold at the 'Playboy' party." Reynolds: "And she adds this to drive the point home." Unidentified female: "Harold, call me." Reynolds: "To many, the message is clear, and in parts of Tennessee, potentially incendiary." Prof. John Greer, Vanderbilt University: "It's talking about interracial sex relations and it's amazing. It's not the kind of ad you would expect somebody to be running if they thought they were ahead or in a tie." Reynolds: "Late today, officials at the Republican National Committee says the ad in question has received a lot of negative attention. And they have decided to stop running it here."

The New York Times (10/26, Toner, 1.21M) reports the Tennessee Senate race, "one of the most competitive and potentially decisive battles of the midterm election, became even more unpredictable this week after a furor over a Republican television commercial that stood out even in a year of negative advertising." The ad "featured a series of people in mock man-on-the street interviews talking sarcastically about Mr. Ford and his stands on issues including the estate tax and national security." Critics "asserted that the advertisement was a clear effort to play to racial stereotypes and fears, essentially, playing the race card in an election where Mr. Ford is trying to break a century of history and become the first black senator from the South since Reconstruction." Hilary Shelton, director of the NAACP's Washington bureau, "said the spot took aim at the sensitivities many Americans still have about interracial dating."

On CNN's The Situation Room (10/25), RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman said, "I think what our party is doing is working to focus on the issues. The ad is down now, and the focus, I think, is going to be on taxes, it's going to be on defense, it is going to be on judges and issues like that in the Senate race."

Appearing on MSNBC's Hardball (10/25, Matthews), Sen. Richard Durbin said, "Some of the ads that are up on the air now on the Republican side really go way beyond the pale. Running ads against Tammy Duckworth, a disabled veteran from the Iraqi war, in the Chicagoland area. The ads that they've run against Sherrod Brown that have been totally discredited. Now I think they've reached to the bottom of the barrel with this ad against Harold Ford. I'm glad they had the good sense to pull it."

During an interview about the midterm elections on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (10/25), Jack Kemp said, "I'm going to tell the Republican National Committee to take out that dumb ad on the air against Harold Ford."

Demographic Shift Gives Ford A Boost. The Wall Street Journal (10/26, A1, Dade, Deogun, 2.03M) reports in a front page story that parts "of the upper South -- including Tennessee, Virginia and North Carolina -- are attracting significant numbers of people from other parts of the country who aren't steeped in the region's traditions but are drawn to good jobs, lower taxes, top-notch universities and affordable real estate." This "migratory shift is scrambling the region's electoral politics. It is raising Democratic hopes that some parts of the South may no longer be as monolithic in their support of the Republican Party and may be more accepting of African-American candidates." That "helps explain why" Ford "is in a statistical dead heat with his Republican opponent in the race for the U.S. Senate seat being vacated by Majority Leader Bill Frist. If Mr. Ford wins, he will become the first black senator from the South since Reconstruction. One major factor may be an unheralded demographic shift."

Ford Campaign Seen As Playbook For Other Southern Democrats. In a Wall Street Journal column (10/26, A19), editorial board member Kimberly Strassel says, "Ford is dogging Mr. Corker at the polls, threatening an upset in a race that could determine the balance of power in the Senate. Over the past year the Democrat has run right on social issues and defense, neutralizing two areas that so often hurt Democrats. That has freed him up to run a more populist campaign on economic issues. The calculation is proving a winner, and offers some lessons to national Democrats still interested in again becoming viable in the South."

Unusual Number Of Conservative Democrats Running For House. The Los Angeles Times (10/26, Hook, 918K) reports Heath Shuler "is part of a phalanx of unusually conservative Democratic candidates who may deliver crucial victories over GOP incumbents and help their party win control of the House." Republicans are "ringing alarms about what the House would be like if the GOP lost control: a throwback to the unreconstructed liberalism of big-government activism, tax increases and a weak-kneed defense policy. They point with Halloween-season horror to the likely lineup of Democratic committee chairs, including Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles) and other liberal old-timers." But, like Shuler, "many of the Democratic candidates most likely to be elected are cut from a different cloth. Sixteen of them have been endorsed by the Blue Dogs, a coalition of conservative Democrats." With "so many conservative-leaning candidates at the forefront of the Democratic effort, House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) has, at least for now, stuck to a minimalist agenda that steers clear of grand, liberal ambitions. Instead, Democratic leaders are focusing — and almost all serious Democratic candidates are campaigning on — a more limited, six-point agenda that includes raising the minimum wage, repealing tax breaks for oil companies, restoring college tuition tax breaks, cutting Medicare drug costs and other plans they believe could draw bipartisan support."

DOJ_NMG_0086453

Controversy Over Michael J. Fox Ad Raises Stem Cell Issue Into National Debate. The CBS Evening News (10/25, story 5, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The issue of embryonic stem cell research has suddenly exploded again in the middle this campaign. Missouri is holding a referendum on whether to guarantee that research in its Constitution. And everyone from movie stars to star athletes is joining the fight." CBS (Bowers) added, "When St. Louis cardinal pitcher Jeff Suppan takes the mound tonight, he's not only pitching for a World Series win, he's also going to bat for conservatives on the hot button issue of stem cell research." He is "joined by a number of local sports heroes and even the man who played Jesus in Mel Gibson's passion of the Christ. A conservative group produced it to fight back against a series of hard-hitting and poignant ads put out by actor Michael J. Fox." Michael J. Fox: "Senator Talent even wanted to criminalize the science that gives us a chance for hope." Bowers: "The ads shown locally here in Missouri during the first three games of the World Series, a visibly shaking Fox urges fans to vote yes to stem cell research and Democratic challenger Claire McCaskill and no to the Republican incumbent. Senator Jim Talent was out campaigning today, and his office declined comment but his opponent is enjoying the unexpected attention." McCaskill "credits conservative talk show host Rush Limbaugh for that because what had been a limited ad campaign targeting a few Senate races in a few key states like this one where stem cells are an issue suddenly went national when Limbaugh suggested Fox was exaggerating the symptoms of his Parkinson's disease."

On Fox News' On The Record (10/25), correspondent Carl Cameron said the stem cell issue is, "particularly in Missouri, potentially very big. That battle you see amongst those two ads is being fought out between the two Senate candidates. Claire McCaskill, the Democrat, is very pro-embryonic stem cell research. Jim Talent is against embryonic stem cell research but is in favor of adult stem cell research and various different other alternatives. And most of the Missouri polls suggest that the public is in favor of the ballot initiative. And as a consequence, that could help Claire McCaskill and Democratic candidates. It's going to make it a little bit tougher for Jim Talent."

USA Today (10/26, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports, "Opponents of a Missouri ballot measure that would amend the state constitution to allow research using embryonic stem cells have produced a star-studded TV ad to press their cause. The ad features former St. Louis Rams quarterback and Super Bowl hero Kurt Warner, St. Louis Cardinals pitcher Jeff Suppan, Kansas City Royals baseball player Mike Sweeney, Everybody Loves Raymond actress Patricia Heaton and The Passion of the Christ star James Caviezel." Supporters of the measure "have been running ads featuring singer Sheryl Crow, a Missouri native. And Democratic Senate candidate Claire McCaskill's campaign is airing ads featuring a quivering Michael J. Fox, who has Parkinson's disease, urging voters to elect her because of her support for stem cell research."

The Los Angeles Times (10/26, Simon, 918K) reports the stem cell research ad "has drawn more attention than the 2004 ads because Fox looks so debilitated. His body jerks so violently in the 30-second spot that conservative talk show host Rush Limbaugh mockingly mimicked the tremors and suggested that Fox was exaggerating his symptoms. Limbaugh later apologized, but the uproar over his remarks made the Fox ad the talk of the political world — and prompted thousands of people to view it online."

"Passion Of The Christ" Star Uses Biblical Language. The Washington Times (10/26, Bellantoni, 88K) reports the actor "who played Jesus in 'The Passion of the Christ' is drawing on his knowledge of that film's Aramaic language and his image as Christ for his latest role -- using Jesus' words to ask Missouri voters to oppose a stem-cell research measure on the Nov. 7 ballot." Actor Jim Caviezel "opens the political ad with a brief statement in Aramaic, the common tongue of biblical-era Palestine and the language of Mel Gibson's blockbuster movie, saying: 'Le-bar nash be-neshak.'" Bill Fulco, "the Loyola Marymount professor who translated Mr. Gibson's script for 'Passion' and coached the actors on the ancient language, told The Washington Times yesterday the phrase means: 'You betray the Son of Man with a kiss,' a reference to Judas' betraying Christ and a phrase used in the Greek of Luke's Gospel." Tom Schreiner, "a professor of New Testament interpretation at the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, said yesterday Mr. Caviezel is implying the amendment may seem "loving and kind" to its supporters, but when read closely, it is "actually a betrayal.'"

DOJ_NMG_0086454

NRSC To Spend $3.5 Million On Ads In Closing Days Of New Jersey Senate Race. The New York Times (10/26, Rutenberg, 1.21M) reports, "National Republican campaign strategists are beginning an intensive last-minute offensive in New Jersey, seizing on the tight race between Senator Robert Menendez, a Democrat, and his Republican challenger, Thomas H. Kean Jr." NRSC officials "said they were putting $3.5 million into the race in its final 12 days to pay for television advertisements attacking Mr. Menendez that were expected to be on major stations by Thursday morning." NRSC spokesman Brian Nick "said Mr. Kean had remained at least competitive with Mr. Menendez -- though trailing in two recent polls -- despite being outspent. Mr. Nick said the committee believed that the new advertising, produced by a quasi-independent arm of the committee created under federal campaign finance law, had the potential to change the dynamic of the race." RNC spokesman Brian Jones "said the party would provide an extra push for Mr. Kean with an aggressive drive to get out the vote. 'We feel that there's a real opportunity in New Jersey,' Mr. Jones said. The $3.5 million advertising outlay is a major investment in two of the most expensive media markets in the nation, New York and Philadelphia, both of which transmit into New Jersey."

Steele, Cardin Clash In "Tempestuous" Debate. The Baltimore Sun (10/26, Skalka, 262K) reports that in the "most tempestuous encounter to date of Maryland's U.S. Senate contest, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele and Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin played a heated game of gotcha during a televised debate Wednesday, with Steele pressed into offering his clear support for the war in Iraq and Cardin stumbling when queried about the location of a planned Metro line in the vote-rich Washington suburbs." The candidates "sparred for an hour, talking over each other from the start and bickering about their views on embryonic stem cell research, health care and the Iraq conflict. Each contender claimed he could better bring change to Washington and that his opponent is beholden to party bosses." Cardin said, "George Bush helped finance his [Steele's] campaign for the United States Senate. The lieutenant governor agrees with George Bush's agenda on Social Security, on health care, the war in Iraq." The Sun adds that Steele "snapped back: 'This gentleman, this congressman has been running against George Bush for over a year. Haven't you noticed, sir, he's not represented on this stage.'" Steele added, "You were hand-picked by Congressman Steny Hoyer to get in this race. If you weren't, Kweisi Mfume should be sitting here."

The Washington Post (10/25, Mosk, Marimow, 748K) reported that Steele attempted "to quiz" Cardin "on the route of the proposed Metro rail Purple Line. After starting to hazard a guess, sputtering out 'Chevy Chase,' Cardin snapped, 'I'm not going to answer your question,' and pushed back at Steele, asking him about national health insurance. Later, Cardin was asked repeatedly by reporters if he knew the Purple Line route and while he insisted that he did, he refused to risk an answer. 'I support the Purple Line,' he said, then added, 'I'm not sure they've settled on specific sites.'" During "the debate, Cardin pressed Steele on his initial support for the Iraq war. Steele responded by calling it 'heartening to see the president move to where the American people have been for some time.' 'How would you have voted in Congress if you'd had the chance?' Cardin pressed, adding that he believes Steele would have supported the president. 'Do not disrespect me and tell me what I would have done at the time,' Steele replied. He then acknowledged he did support going into Iraq."

The Washington Times (10/26, Ward, 88K) relates that Steele "reiterated his support for stem-cell research using adult stem cells and his opposition to embryonic research, which he considers abortion. Mr. Cardin said he supports embryonic research. … At one point, Mr. Steele, sitting next to Mr. Cardin, said the 10-term congressman had failed as a leader. 'For 20 years, sir, you have sat in the [congressional] seat and wasted the opportunity to lead,' he said." The AP (10/26) reports, "The debate also included third-party candidate Kevin Zeese, who said both Steele and Cardin cannot be independent senators because they've taken contributions from business interests. … The candidates will also debate Thursday in Charles County and Sunday on NBC's 'Meet The Press.'"

Black Democratic Leaders Not Criticizing Steele. The Washington Times (10/26, DeBose, Ward, 88K) reports, "Local black Democratic leaders will not attack Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele in his U.S. Senate race, even as they campaign and appear in ads for his opponent -- Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, a fellow Democrat." Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton said, "I think that is a tactical decision. If [Mr. Steele] has a large or fairly large black vote, why or how could you alienate that vote by going after him doing personal attacks? There is just no way." The Times adds former Prince George's County Executive Wayne K. Curry, "who has not yet endorsed anyone in the Senate race, said it is wise for black politicians to avoid criticizing Mr. Steele, a Republican and the first black to win a statewide election in Maryland."

DOJ_NMG_0086455

Allen, Webb Both Support Revisions To No Child Left Behind. The Washington Post (10/26, B6, Glod, 748K) reports that in a "state skeptical of federal intrusion in local school affairs, Virginia Sen. George Allen and challenger James Webb each say they support the goals of No Child Left Behind but quarrel with how the federal law has played out." Webb says "schools need more federal funding to fulfill mandates to test students and narrow achievement gaps. The Republican incumbent, who voted for the landmark legislation five years ago, now argues that states need more flexibility in how they grade schools. But neither candidate supports an outright repeal of the law." The winner of the race "will have a vote when Congress debates whether to renew the controversial law, which aims to push students in a range of grades to attain near-universal proficiency in reading and math by 2014." As Virginia governor "in the mid-1990s, Allen was chief architect of the school accountability program that measures progress using the Standards of Learning tests. Since voting for No Child Left Behind, he has become critical of the federal initiative. State officials in that time have also complained about aspects of the law."

Wilder Backs Webb To Send Message Over Iraq War. The Washington Post (10/26, B5, Craig, Rein, 748K) reports Webb "campaigned yesterday in Northern Virginia with the state's current governor at his side, and hours later he picked up a key endorsement from a former governor in Richmond." Webb, "joined by Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D), appealed to retirees and students at stops in Fairfax and Prince William counties before heading to Richmond to appear with former Gov. L. Douglas Wilder, now the mayor of Richmond and a popular figure among African American voters." Sen. Allen "stumped through southwestern Virginia yesterday with Kentucky Sen. Mitch McConnell (R), the majority whip. The Allen campaign also released a radio commercial featuring Allen's most prominent black supporter, state Sen. Benjamin J. Lambert III (D-Richmond)." The Post adds Allen and Webb had each "courted Wilder for his support. Wilder, a Democrat, is independent-minded and likes to build suspense for his endorsements by waiting until late in a campaign to announce his choices. His support isn't always guaranteed; in 1997, he declined to endorse Democrat Donald S. Beyer Jr. for governor." Wilder "said voters should choose Webb to send the message that they are opposed to the war in Iraq and Republican economic policies. He said he would do all he could, including campaign events and TV ads, to support Webb." Wilder said he "considers Allen a 'close friend' but cannot support him because he is a reliable vote for GOP leaders in Congress. Wilder called Allen yesterday morning."

The New York Times/AP (10/26) reports Wilder "promised to help Mr. Webb, a Democrat, with voter turnout in the weeks leading to the Nov. 7 election. He said Mr. Webb could beat Mr. Allen, a Republican, if he got a large voter turnout in Hampton Roads and Richmond." Wilder, "who remains the nation's first and only elected black governor, said he was angry at the way President Bush had handled the Iraq war."

The Washington Times (10/26, McLaughlin, Bellantoni, 88K) reports Wilder's "endorsement comes at a crucial time for Mr. Webb, with most polls showing that he still trails" Sen. Allen. Wilder said he "is endorsing Mr. Webb, a former Navy secretary under President Reagan, because he will fight against the 'pattern of inefficiency, ineptitude and scandal' in the Republican-controlled Congress." The Allen campaign "said the endorsement was no surprise. They noted their radio ad featuring state Sen. Benjamin J. Lambert III, a black Richmond Democrat who has endorsed Mr. Allen. In the ad, Mr. Lambert notes Mr. Allen's support for black farmers and the Voting Rights Act."

Allen's Racial Views Examined. The Washington Post (10/26, A1, Turque, 748K) profiles Sen. Allen in a front page story, noting that in the "sun-splashed Los Angeles suburbs," some of Allen's "classmates at Palos Verdes High School recall a lone tobacco-chewing teenage cowboy who was disliked, even feared." Don Gause, a wide receiver on the football team, said, "George was not what I would call mainstream." One reason, Gause said, "was that Allen used anti-black epithets and 'ran with a group of guys off the football field' who used the same language." Gause said, "George took some hard lines in that area." The Post adds, "Who George Allen was, and who he is today after 23 years in politics, remains an issue as the Virginia Republican seeks reelection. Supporters say the pilgrimage was one leg of a journey that has led to genuine maturation for Allen, 54, whose style melds Ronald Reagan's optimism with George W. Bush's Texas swagger." But the "macaca" incident "raises a question: Has Allen really evolved, or did his true nature slip into public view?" Those "closest to him say that Allen is no bigot and that partisan enemies have seized on murky 30-year-old anecdotes and meaningless lapses in political correctness to damage him." Others "from Allen's past said they saw a distressingly familiar, coldly taunting hatred when they viewed the macaca tape."

Republicans Hope For Upset In Michigan Senate Race. The Washington Times (10/26, Hurt, 88K) reports Republicans are "turning to Michigan in the final days of the campaign in search of a major upset that would protect their majority in the U.S. Senate." Mike Bouchard, "the popular Republican sheriff of Michigan's second-largest county, trails Democratic incumbent Sen. Debbie Stabenow. But recent polls suggest that Mr. Bouchard may be closing the gap, with two surveys indicating a single-digit difference."

DOJ_NMG_0086456

Republican "heavy-hitters, such as former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, Sen. John McCain of Arizona and Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney have been to the state to campaign for Mr. Bouchard. President Bush travels there today." The NRSC "spent $1 million on the" Bouchard campaign's "behalf, one of only three states where the national Republicans have gone on the offense. Also, members of the conservative group Club for Growth donated more than $250,000."

Both Parties Seek Advantage From Poor Michigan Economy. USA Today (10/26, Wolf, 2.27M) reports that in 'an election dominated by the war in Iraq, the impact of an economy recovering from recession is less clear. Democrats note that wages have not kept up with some prices, particularly for health care and college tuition. That, they say, should help their party. Others cite three years of job creation, a 4.6% national unemployment rate, declining gas prices and high stock prices as evidence the country is on the right course — a plus for Republicans." President Bush, "who arrives in the Detroit suburbs today to raise money for GOP Senate candidate Mike Bouchard, has spent much of the week highlighting the economy as a strong point for Republican candidates." Yet "even if the economy works to the benefit of Republicans, it may not do so in Michigan." Democratic Gov. Jennifer Granholm "is struggling with a difficult state economy — only Mississippi, wracked by Hurricane Katrina, has a higher jobless rate (7.2%) — but she is leading narrowly in recent polls, and incumbent Democratic Sen. Debbie Stabenow enjoys a bigger lead over Bouchard."

DeVos Criticized For Failing To Provide Economic Vision For State. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (10/26, A18), Shikha Dalmia of the Reason Foundation says, "Besides the Tigers, the main thing on the minds of Michigan residents is the state's tanking economy. So when the state's most prominent Republican businessman entered the gubernatorial fray promising to turn things around, it should have been a home run. Instead, 10 days before the election, Dick DeVos has lost his 15-point summer lead over Jennifer Granholm, the Democratic incumbent, and is now trailing by more than eight points in most polls. The fault is not in his stars but in himself: At a time when Michigan needs economic leadership, he has so far shown little charisma, creativity -- or courage of convictions." DeVos "has done little to challenge" Granholm "on economic fundamentals -- her big vulnerability given that two-thirds of Michigan voters believe that the state has been going in the wrong economic direction under her."

Connecticut Senate Race Seen As Harbinger For US Involvement In Iraq. In his Washington Post column (10/26, A25), David Broder says, "When the three candidates in Connecticut's celebrated Senate race met for their final debate on Monday night in New London, only one of them appeared to be having a good time." It was "not Ned Lamont, the tense and fidgety businessman who had captured the Democratic nomination as an opponent of the Iraq war." It was "certainly not Joseph Lieberman, the three-term Democratic senator who had lost the primary to Lamont because of his support of that war and is running as an independent. Lieberman looked exhausted and exasperated by his situation, even though polls show him to be in front." Rather, the "only person who was relaxed, good-humored and reveling in the moment was Alan Schlesinger, the bulky Republican nominee whom no one gives a chance of winning. He jabbed humorously and effectively at both his opponents, noting how ironic it was that 'a Greenwich multimillionaire' such as Lamont was running as a Democrat, while Lieberman, whose long list of liberal positions Schlesinger cited, was 'masquerading as a Republican.'" But the race "constitutes perhaps the nation's clearest test on the Iraq war." A Lieberman win "would slow, if not reverse, growing pressure from the Democrats for an early pullout of U.S. forces." A Lamont win "would add immeasurably to the momentum of the antiwar forces."

Sophisticated "Google Bombing" Campaign Targets 50 Republicans. The New York Times (10/26, Zeller, 1.21M) reports if things "go as planned for liberal bloggers in the next few weeks, searching Google for 'Jon Kyl,' the Republican senator from Arizona now running for re-election, will produce high among the returns a link to an April 13 article from The Phoenix New Times, an alternative weekly." Kyl "'has spent his time in Washington kowtowing to the Bush administration and the radical right,' the article suggests, 'very often to the detriment of Arizonans.'" Searching Google "for 'Peter King,' the Republican congressman from Long Island, would bring up a link to a Newsday article headlined 'King Endorses Ethnic Profiling.'" The Times adds, "Fifty or so other Republican candidates have also been made targets in a sophisticated 'Google bombing' campaign intended to game the search engine's ranking algorithms. By flooding the Web with references to the candidates and repeatedly cross-linking to specific articles and sites on the Web, it is possible to take advantage of Google's formula and force those articles to the top of the list of search results." The project "was originally aimed at 70 Republican candidates but was scaled back to roughly 50 because Chris Bowers, who conceived it, thought some of the negative articles too partisan."

Poll Finds Majorities Of Arab Americans Backing Democratic Candidates. The Washington Times (10/26, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports a "new poll of Arab Americans in four battleground states shows a large shift in voter preferences that now favors Democratic candidates. If true, it represents a major shift from as recently as the 2000 presidential election, when then-Gov. George Bush won nearly 50 percent of Arab Americans' votes." The survey, "conducted by Zogby International for the Arab American Institute (AAI), of likely voters in Ohio, Florida and Pennsylvania found that Arab Americans are supporting Democrat gubernatorial and Senate candidates by close to 3-1 margins." With a "number of close races potentially shifting the control of Congress, the major shift of even a small ethnic bloc could give one side the edge."

DOJ_NMG_0086457

Woman Claims Bribe Offer Made Over Allegations Of Gibbons Assault. USA Today (10/26, Kasindorf, 2.27M) reports a Las Vegas cocktail waitress said "she was offered money to recant allegations that a Republican congressman running for Nevada governor assaulted and propositioned her." The "alleged bribery attempt that Chrissy Mazzeo, 32, described at a news conference reignited a sex-tinged controversy that Rep. Jim Gibbons says could influence his tight contest with Democratic state Sen. Dina Titus." Gibbon's lawyer, Don Campbell, "later at a news conference called Mazzeo 'an exceedingly troubled young woman' with a 'troubled past,' who was making 'wild and reckless allegations.'" Gibbons, 61, "who is married, has denied the allegations."

Late Campaign Stress Leads Candidates To Make Ill-Advised Statements. The New York Times (10/26, Hulse, 1.21M) reports, "Fighting for their jobs in an increasingly frenzied political environment, several candidates are showing signs of strain, uttering words they later wish they could take back, running last-ditch advertisements that push the envelope and taking other actions that are out of the political ordinary. The gaffes can have real consequences, coming when voters are paying the closest attention." Rep. Barbara Cubin, "facing a strong challenge in what should be a safe seat, this week told an opponent who uses a wheelchair that she would slap him were he not disabled." Rep. Christopher Shays, "normally a low-key moderate, portrayed the treatment of Iraqis at the Abu Ghraib prison as the product of a sex ring rather than of abuse." And Rep. Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, "the No. 2 Democrat in the House, accused a black Senate candidate of 'slavishly' supporting Republican policies and later apologized for a poor choice of words." GOP strategist Ed Rollins said, "It is definitely the funny season. When everybody thinks they are in jeopardy, whether they are or not, there is real panic. All these Republicans who thought they were in safe seats have seen their numbers drop dramatically. They are freaked."

Doubts About Hillary Clinton's "Authenticity" Said To Remain. The Financial Times (10/26, Luce) reports, under the headline "Hillary Clinton Wins Minds But Not Yet Hearts," that "there are reasons to believe the Republicans might be too sanguine about how easy it would be for their candidate to defeat Mrs Clinton in 2008, regardless of which party wins the mid-term congressional elections on November 7." Watching Clinton, "on the campaign trail in Long Island explains why many people who used to be hostile to her have become more open-minded." Clinton has "worked assiduously to win federal contracts and funding for communities in her state," and she "campaigns tirelessly to get better treatment for the fire and police employees who were affected by the dust at Ground Zero." But in "spite of her evident crowd-pulling abilities, doubts about her authenticity are unlikely to fade." Clinton has been "dogged by two recurring questions. Will she still be a senator six years from now when her term elapses? And how can she criticise Mr Bush for invading Iraq when she supported the congressional resolution which authorised it?" She "evades both with lawyerly consistency."

US Said To Be Facing Growing Skills Gap. The Financial Times (10/26, Guerrera, Waters, Knight) reports, "Azim Premji, chairman of Wipro, the Indian outsourcing group, has warned that the US faces a more acute skills shortage in information technology than India, blaming failings in America's education system and restrictive immigration policies." Premji, "a Stanford University graduate, said the US education system was not doing enough to attract mathematics and science teachers or to steer students towards those subjects." Microsoft's Bill Gates has also "been warning about the evaporation of interest in computer science at US universities for more than two years." And GE's Jeffrey Immelt "told a Washington audience in January that the US was on its way to becoming 'the massage capital of the world', with more students graduating in sports sciences than electrical engineering."

Brooks Says US Entering Era Of Ideological Dealignment. In his New York Times column (10/26), David Brooks says, "In some eras there is no dominant political tendency. The 1970's were such a period. That decade was marked not by a change in political winds so much as by disillusionment and a scrambling of political categories. People who once had been liberals drifted away. Voters became cynical about politics itself. The pendulum swung not only from left to right but from politics to antipolitics. Jimmy Carter promised a break from the normal methods of political life. We're about to enter another of those periods without a dominant ideology. It's clear that this election will mark the end of conservative dominance. This election is a period, not a comma in political history." Conservatives "have exhausted their agenda," are "beset by scandals, the kind of institutional decay that afflicts movements at the end of their political lives. Third, the Reagan coalition is splintering, with the factions going off in wildly different directions." Fourth, there "is no viable orthodox conservative candidate for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination."

DOJ_NMG_0086458

Liberal Radio Network Seen As Evading Campaign Contribution Limits. In a Washington Times op-ed (10/26), John R. Lott Jr., dean's visiting professor at SUNY-Binghamton, and Bradley A. Smith of Capital University Law School, says, "When is a campaign donation not a campaign donation? Apparently if you spend the money to run a radio program instead of paying for campaign ads that run on that same program. Just look at Air America. With $41 million in losses since 2004, and $9.8 million owed just to Robert Glaser, RealNetworks chairman, Democrats who bankrolled this 'company' weren't so much investors as campaign contributors. The losses are seen as simple business ineptitude, but Air America effectively, and perhaps intentionally, cleverly avoided the campaign finance limits which Democrats had worked so hard to pass." Since Air America "started, successful radio entrepreneurs — most notably Rush Limbaugh — have argued that Air America never had a business model that made sense. But perhaps it had a model that made political sense. It's hardly a coincidence that Air America debuted in time for the 2004 presidential campaign or that the bankruptcy filing was put off long enough so that creditors actions won't stop broadcasts before the Nov. 7 election. As if the willingness to lose money weren't already obvious, over a year ago the network started asking listeners to donate money to keep the programs on the air."

Bush "Assassination" Movie Faces Marketing Challenges. USA Today (10/26, Breznican, 2.27M) reports, "How do you get people to go to a movie that sounds like it's committing treason? That's the challenge facing Newmarket Films' new Death of a President, a fictional documentary about what could happen if President Bush were assassinated." Richard Abramowitz, marketing director for Newmarket, said, "The film does not promote violence on any level. It no more advocates for assassination of the president than Silence of the Lambs advocates for cannibalism." USA adds Death of a President, "from British director and co-writer Gabriel Range, has raised hackles ever since it premiered in September at the Toronto Film Festival. Some large theater chains balked at featuring it, and the film will open Friday in about 100 theaters, mostly art houses. CNN and Fox News refused to run ads for the movie."

WPost Backs DC-Beijing Flights. The Washington Post (10/26, A24, 748K) reports, "The quality of communication between the Washington area and Beijing could influence global stability. But there is no direct flight between the two capitals. Over the next couple of months, the Transportation Department will consider whether that should change. For economic reasons as well as geopolitical ones, the department should back a United Airlines proposal to launch daily service to Beijing from Dulles International Airport."

WSJournal Says Decline In Oil Prices Shows Folly Of "Windfall Profits" Tax. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (10/26, 2.03M) writes, "Exxon Mobil, Royal Dutch Shell, BP and other members of the vast energy conspiracy may have a hard time keeping their run of profit growth going now that oil prices have fallen to $60 or so a barrel from upwards of $80." The decline in oil prices is "proof of the folly of a 'windfall profits' tax or similar punitive measures against Big Oil favored by so many politicians. Only this week, however, Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi repeated her pledge to soak the oil companies if her party takes over the House next month." The Journal says, "Her policy seems to be that when oil prices decline, oil company shareholders must absorb all the market risk and the lower profits. But when oil prices rise, the companies must hand over a cut of their profits to Members of Congress to spend as they like. The only 'windfall' is for the political class."

US, European Allies At Odds Over Iran Resolution. The Washington Post (10/26, A20, Lynch, Kessler, 748K) reports, "The United States and its European allies split Wednesday over the terms of a U.N. resolution calling for a ban on Iranian trade in ballistic missiles and nuclear materials." While "the Bush administration supports the Europeans' broad aims of sanctioning Tehran for refusing to halt nuclear activities," it feels the resolution "would be too weak to constrain Iran from developing nuclear weapons." Although the resolution "requires states to 'prevent the supply, sale or transfer' of Iran's nuclear and ballistic programs and would halt Tehran's ability to secure financing and technical assistance for them" and would "ban travel and freeze the assets of individuals associated with the weapons programs," it still "exempts Russia from the trade embargo, allowing it to continue a previously approved nuclear energy agreement to support the construction of Iran's Bushehr nuclear power plant." The Europeans also rejected U.S. amendments "that characterized Iran's nuclear activities as a threat to international peace and security," saying the resolution the US wishes "may have provoked a Russian veto." The "European negotiators thought they had secured U.S. backing for the proposal to exempt Russia from the trade ban at a meeting of political directors in late September." Still, the European negotiators agreed "to include a proposal by U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton to invoke a provision known as Article 41, which obliges states to enforce U.N. sanctions."

DOJ_NMG_0086459

The Wall Street Journal (10/26, A6, King, 2.03M) adds, "The Bush administration has raised sharp but unspecified objections," as "administration officials yesterday declined to provide details on how they would like the draft resolution altered, other than to say it isn't yet stringent enough." One "U.S. official who reviewed the draft said, 'The Europeans have a fundamental difference with us on how to proceed."

The New York Times (10/26, Cooper, Shanker, 1.21M) downplays the differences between the US and Europe, writing that "the bickering of late has largely been tactical." While Ambassador John R. Bolton "demanded that the draft resolution bar Russia from continuing to build Iran's first nuclear power plant," other American officials acknowledged that a provision against all work on Bushehr was unrealistic," and European diplomats said "Mr. Bolton wanted to put it on the table as a bargaining chip to get other Russian concessions." Still, "Bush administration officials and their European counterparts have been squabbling over details of the draft resolution for the past week, and the horse-trading will probably increase now that the Russians and the Chinese have been given the draft." While "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice urged the Security Council to move rapidly to adopt the resolution, saying the authority and standing of the international community were at stake," following "five months of missed deadlines, counterproposals and diplomatic overtures on Iran, few officials from any of the six countries involved were willing to predict when a final sanctions resolution might pass the Security Council."

The Financial Times (10/26, Bozorgmeh, Dinmore) follows the New York Times' tone, reporting "Nicholas Burns, US under secretary of state, said he did not think the Bushehr issue would be a major stumbling block." Meanwhile, "Iran was reported on Wednesday to be accelerating its uranium enrichment process" as "Iran's semi-official student news agency, ISNA, quoted an unnamed Iranian official who said a second network, or cascade, of centrifuges used to produce enriched uranium was installed last week, and that injection of the gas feed would take place this week." Some experts "believe Iran's installation of the second cascade is intended to signal its defiance of sanctions that have been threatened."

Iranian Journalist Notes Comforts Enjoyed By Wealthy Disincline Them To Political Change. Farouz Farzami, the pseudonym of a journalist who is forbidden to publish in Iran, writes in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (10/26, A18, 2.03M) "the well-to-do Iranian drinks and reads and watches what he wishes. He does as he pleases behind the walls of his private mansions and villas. In return for his private comforts, the affluent Iranian is happy to sacrifice freedom of speech, most of his civil rights, and his freedom of association. The upper-middle class has been bought off by this pact, which makes a virtue of hypocrisy." As one well-off Iranian notes, "We may be forfeiting our freedoms, as you say, but when the price of avoiding the authorities is so affordable, why would we risk everything to take on the regime?" In fact, "it is only the principled intellectuals of moderate means who suffer."

WSJournal Criticizes ElBaradei's Objectivity. The Wall Street Journal (10/26, A18, 2.03M) editorializes that lately Mohamed ElBaradei has "been sounding more like the real life Jimmy Carter than" Jack Webb. He said, "I don't think sanctions work as a penalty," for North Korea "after meeting with Condoleezza Rice, and "for Iran, 'the jury is still out on whether they are developing a nuclear weapon.'" His assurances that "the IAEA can be trusted to be 'continuously objective and impartial'" now "look disingenuous," as he "is offering confident judgments, well above his pay grade, about Kim Jong Il's motives -- and cautious ones about Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's. It's even harder to believe given the selective leaks and political hits the IAEA has recently practiced against the Bush Administration and its allies in Congress." Meanwhile, if "Mr. ElBaradei been doing his real job, he might have made a more strenuous effort at pointing out publicly Iran's failures to comply with its obligations, rather than offer grand pronouncements on diplomacy and making partisan intrusions into American politics."

Argentine Prosecutor Calls For Arrest Of Former Iranian President. The Washington Post/AP (10/26, A19, Serrat) reports, "Argentine prosecutors asked a federal judge on Wednesday to order the arrest of former Iranian president Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani and seven others in the 1994 bombing of a Jewish cultural center that killed 85," saying that "the decision to attack the center 'was undertaken in 1993 by the highest authorities of the then-government of Iran'" and "was entrusted to the Lebanon-based group Hezbollah." Prosecutors "said they suspected that Hezbollah undertook activities outside Lebanon only 'under orders directly emanating from the regime in Tehran.'" They also requested the "arrest of two former commanders of Iran's Revolutionary Guards, two former Iranian diplomats and a former Hezbollah security chief," and "asked the judge to detain other former Iranian officials, including an intelligence chief, Ali Fallahijan, and a foreign minister, Ali Ar Velayati." USA Today/AP (10/26, 11A, Serrat) runs an abbreviated version of the AP story.

McClatchy Newspapers (10/26, Sanchez, Chang, Hall) adds that Prosecutor Alberto Nisman "charged that the plot involved not only top political officials, but also lower-level diplomats in the Iranian Embassy in Buenos Aires." He said it was a "well-calculated plan that was part of a 'terrorist matrix' that included assassinations in France, Germany and Switzerland." Nisman "is the first Argentine official to publicly accuse officials in Tehran of involvement in the attack," and these charges "lend credence to longstanding American claims that Iran and Hezbollah are sponsors of international terrorism."

DOJ_NMG_0086460

Rice Prods South Korea On Sanctions. The AP (10/26, Gearan) reports, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice gently prodded South Korea on Wednesday to show a strong commitment to international sanctions imposed against North Korea for its nuclear test this month," saying that while "the U.S. has no wish to tell Seoul how it should coexist with its neighbor," the North's "test of a nuclear device Oct. 9 'requires a strong response,' and said that adherence to a U.N. resolution banning the sale of weapons material, luxury goods and more to North Korea is key." She added, "North Korea's behavior poses a regional challenge and it must be addressed in a regional context," and "South Korea must be part of the solution, as should Japan and China and Russia."

South Korean Unification Minister Resigns. The Washington Times (10/26, Salmon, 88K) reports that Lee Jong-seok, South Korea's unification minister, "resigned yesterday, the highest-profile casualty yet in a battle over the government's North Korea policy after an Oct. 9 nuclear test by Pyongyang." He was "a strong advocate of engagement and reconciliation with the communist North." According to Lee, "efforts to achieve 'peace and security and inter-Korean reconciliation on the peninsula are being recklessly politicized.'"

Rice "Plays Down" Putin's Remarks That Nuclear Test Was Response To Being Cornered. The AFP (10/26) reports, "The United States brushed aside a complaint by Russian President Vladimir Putin that North Korea tested a nuclear weapon because it had been backed into a corner by its rivals." Secretary Rice "played down" Putin's comments, "In what was seen as veiled criticism of the aggressive US policy on North Korea,…that one of the reasons Pyongyang chose to set off its first nuclear explosion was that "not all participants in the (six-party) talks process could find the right tone in the talks.'"

Japan Denies Report That It Seeks Nuclear Meeting. The AP (10/26, Greimel) reports, "Japan's foreign ministry Thursday denied a news report that the government is planning a meeting with the U.S. and South Korea as early as next month to solidify a common stance on the North Korean nuclear standoff." Kyodo News agency, had, "citing unidentified government officials, said the meeting among the allies will likely be held in Seoul" as "Japan wants the trilateral meeting to reaffirm the demand that the North Korean nuclear crisis be resolved through six-party talks that include North Korea, South Korea, the United States, Japan, China and Russia."

North Korea Threatens South Over Sanctions. The AP (10/26, Chang) reports that North Korea's the Committee for the Peaceful Reunification of the Fatherland "warned South Korea against joining international sanctions, saying Wednesday that its neighbor would 'pay a high price' if it joins the U.S.-led drive to punish the reclusive communist nation for its nuclear test." However, "President Bush dismissed North Korea's threats, saying leader Kim Jong Il was probing for weaknesses in the international community." As for South Korea, "there was no immediate response to Wednesday's statement."

Former Assistant Secretary Of Defense Advocates Negotiations. Henry S. Rowen, the assistant secretary of defense from 1989-91 and currently senior fellow of the Hoover Institution and director emeritus of Stanford University's Shorenstein Asia Pacific Research Center, writes in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (10/26, A18, 2.03M), "The United Nations sanctions on North Korea are useful, but unless China and South Korea change their policies, these sanctions will not have much effect." We should "be braced for more North Korean tests," as the Chinese don't see "Pyongyang's programs as seriously damaging to its own interests." They "don't want chaos in North Korea with millions of refugees coming across the border; and they don't want American forces on their border, either. We and the South Koreans urgently need to discuss these matters with the Chinese -- along with the contingency known, colloquially, as 'loose nukes.'" After all, "a serious divergence of perceived interests" between the US and China "would not be good for either of us," and "it is distressing to contemplate the possibility of members of Congress coming to see China's help to North Korea as supporting a major security threat to the U.S." Additionally, "South Korea has been part of the problem" and "there is the potential here for a disastrous breach between Washington and Seoul."

Bush, Dominican Leader Agree To Push Trade Accord. The AP (10/26, Riechmann) reports, "President Bush and the leader of the Dominican Republic agreed on Wednesday to jump-start a delayed free trade agreement to remove barriers to commerce between the two nations." In an Oval Office meeting, Bush "told Leonel Fernandez, the president of the Caribbean nation, that the United States will implement the Central American Free Trade Agreement as soon as possible. 'To that end, I had my trade minister, Ambassador Susan Schwab here, to make sure that we both heard the message of the president -- that this was a very important piece of legislation,' Bush said."

Putin Says He Won't Run Again, But Vows To Remain Influential. The New York Times (10/26, Kramer, 1.21M) reports that Russian President Vladimir V.

DOJ_NMG_0086461

Putin "said Wednesday that he would continue to 'influence the life in our country' after his second term is up in 2008, but that he would not run for president again" and "would step down 'even though I like my work.'" While "a third consecutive term is forbidden under Russia's 1993 Constitution, his supporters have called for a referendum to do away with that ban." Despite "much speculation about his future, Mr. Putin did not elaborate." Still, the comments are "a strong hint that Mr. Putin, who has quashed most dissent here, would remain in politics in some fashion after 2008. Analysts say Mr. Putin has several options, including assuming the leadership of the party he founded, United Russia, becoming speaker of Parliament or the chairman of Gazprom." In his "town-hall-style show," Putin also "criticized North Korea for testing a nuclear device" and on Georgia "said that Russia recognized its territorial integrity but noted that two separatist regions, South Ossetia and Abkhazia, were not historically part of Georgia when that country was annexed by the Russian empire. He said Georgia's attempts to regain control would lead to 'bloodshed.'"

The Washington Post (10/26, A21, Finn, 748K) adds that Putin had "his trademark indefatigability and command of detail," and his "session reinforces the popular perception here of Putin as an open, capable and responsive leader." The Post focuses less than the New York Times on his announcement about not amending the constitution to run again. "Putin condemned the targeting of Georgians living here by Russian law enforcement agencies," saying "I cannot approve of selective actions on ethnic grounds. On the contrary, I am calling on all law enforcement bodies and administrative bodies to refrain from such actions."

The Financial Times (10/26, Buckley) notes "Vyacheslav Nikonov, a political consultant close to the Kremlin, noted on Russia Today news channel the constitution would allow Mr Putin to stand for president in 2012 after a four-year break." After the broadcast "Putin told reporters…he would name a suggested successor in due course but 'the Russian people must decide who is the strongest candidate'. Speculation centres on two deputy prime ministers – Dmitry Medvedev, who heads several multi-billion dollar social development programmes, and Sergei Ivanov, defence minister – as likely successors. But analysts believe a dark horse candidate could emerge, such as Vladimir Yakunin, head of Russian railways and a friend of the president." The Washington Times/AP (10/26, Meyer) and Los Angeles Times (10/25, Holley, 918K) run similar reports.

Contest For Latin American Security Council Seat Still Stalled. The AP (10/26, Lederer) reports, "The vote has been repeated — over and over, 41 times — and with each count, there is no winner in the diplomatic battle over Latin America's seat on the UN Security Council. The two contenders -- US-backed Guatemala and Venezuela, led by its fiercely anti-American President Hugo Chavez -- refuse to budge, though it has been clear since the early ballots that neither can gain the needed two-thirds support in the 192-nation UN General Assembly." The AP adds, "Frustrated diplomats from Latin America and the Caribbean met Wednesday, hoping to find a solution that would avoid another fruitless confrontation in the General Assembly."

The Financial Times (10/26, Webb-Vidal) says Venezuela and Guatemala "appeared ready to agree to find a consensus candidate to fill a temporary seat on the United Nations Security Council after a 40th round of voting failed to break a week-long diplomatic deadlock." Chávez "conceded on Wednesday that his government had virtually no chance of being able to win the seat, but he claimed to have captured the moral high ground in his ongoing sparring effort with Washington. 'It's going to be very difficult for us to win two-thirds of the vote,' Mr Chávez said. 'But we have achieved a great moral victory that no-one can take away from us.'"

The New York Times (10/26, Hoge, 1.21M), however, says "Venezuela has put forward Bolivia as a substitute, but Guatemala has made it clear the choice is unacceptable." In "the six rounds of balloting on Wednesday, Guatemala averaged 104 votes and Venezuela averaged 79, much the same outcome as after last week's 35 rounds of voting. A two-thirds majority of those voting and not abstaining, or roughly 124, is needed to win."

US Officials Concerned By Rights Abuses In Colombia. The Washington Post (10/26, A18, Forero, 748K) report from Colombias, "Beyond the hearty handshakes, a high-level US delegation that visited here this week raised concerns with President Álvaro Uribe's government about human rights abuses by the army and about the scandal-plagued effort to disarm paramilitary groups." R. Nicholas Burns, undersecretary of state for political affairs, "led 15 Bush administration officials from six agencies for meetings with virtually every top Colombian ministry. In reiterating support for Uribe, whose government receives more US assistance than any country outside the Middle East, Burns told the Colombians that Washington would continue providing about $600 million a year through 2008 for programs from aerial fumigation of drug crops to training of the army." But "the delegation's two-day mission, which ended Wednesday, also confronted a string of reports that Colombia's army has been embroiled in drug-related scandals and murdered dozens of peasant farmers, only to pass them off as dead guerrillas."

Nicaraguan Congress Expected To Ban All Abortions. The Los Angeles Times (10/26, Tobar, 918K)

DOJ_NMG_0086462

reports, "Nicaragua's legislature Thursday is expected to approve a law that outlaws all forms of abortion, including those procedures intended to save the life of a pregnant mother." The measure "has been supported by most major political parties, heading into the Nov. 5 presidential election, as they seek to win over voters in this overwhelmingly Catholic country. Leaders of the Roman Catholic Church helped draft the bill and have mobilized followers to support it." However, "medical associations in Nicaragua and international human-rights groups have strongly criticized the proposal." The Times adds, "Since the late 1980s,Latin America's El Salvador and Chile have adopted similar measures. At least 34 countries, mostly in Africa and the Middle East, prohibit all abortions, without exception, according to the Center for Reproductive Rights, a nonprofit advocacy group based in New York." The law "would establish prison sentences of 6 to 30 years for women who abort their pregnancies and the doctors who perform the procedure."

Brutal War Between Drug Gangs Underway In Mexico. The New York Times (10/26, McKinley, 1.21M) reports, "An underworld war between drug gangs is raging in Mexico, medieval in its barbarity, its foot soldiers operating with little fear of interference from the police, its scope and brutality unprecedented, even in a country accustomed to high levels of drug violence." In recent months "the violence has included a total of two dozen beheadings, a raid on a local police station by men with grenades and a bazooka, and daytime kidnappings of top law enforcement officials. At least 123 law enforcement officials, among them 2 judges and 3 prosecutors, have been gunned down or tortured to death. Five police officers were among those beheaded." In all, "the violence has claimed more than 1,700 civilian lives this year, and federal officials say the killings are on course to top the estimated 1,800 underworld killings last year."

South African Political Analyst Denied Entry Into US. The Washington Post (10/26, A20, Timberg, 748K) reports Adam Habib, executive director of the Democracy and Governance Research Program for South Africa's Human Sciences Research Council, "said Wednesday that US border agents had denied him entry into the United States and questioned him about his views on terrorism." He said the agents, who detained him after he arrived at John F. Kennedy International Airport in New York, "did not give him a reason. A US Embassy spokesman, Mark M. Schlachter, confirmed the incident but said he did not know why Habib had been denied entry. … The Human Sciences Research Council has asked the US Embassy in Pretoria to investigate, and Habib said he had written the US Customs and Border Protection office in Washington seeking an explanation."

Activists Urge UN Action Against Regime In Burma. Pu Chin Sian Thang and U Thein Pe, members of Burma's parliament, "which was chosen in the country's last democratic elections but has never been permitted to meet," write in today's Washington Post (10/26, A25, 748K), "Last month the UN Security Council formally discussed the situation in Burma for the first time. For Burmese people such as us, who live under the country's oppressive regime, this was a welcome development." However, "much of the world has failed to understand the gravity of the crisis in our country. It is shocking that the Security Council has taken so long to get involved. No fewer than 3,000 villages have been destroyed or dislocated by the military regime in eastern Burma in the past decade. During the regime's systematic attacks on ethnic populations, women have been raped, children conscripted as child soldiers and rice supplies burned. Recently the regime instituted a practice of using soldiers' bayonets to pierce the bottoms of rice bowls, leaving villagers unable to cook their most basic foodstuff." They add that "there is overwhelming evidence that the people of Burma want an end to the dictatorship that has been forced upon them. Without this understanding and without a Security Council resolution, the United Nations is likely to fail in Burma yet again."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Bush Insists He'll Stand By His Iraq Goals."
"Perils Among The Palms."
"Taurus Approaches The End Of Its Road."
"N.J. Justices Clear The Way For Gay Unions."
"A Right Kind Of Democrat."
"Janitor's Secret Past: A Death Squad."

USA Today:
"IRS Help Can Be Hard To Get, Audit Says."
"Sellers Sing The Blues As Price Drop Sets Record."
"Ruling On Gays May Echo At Polls."
"On The Ballot."

New York Times:
"New Jersey Court Backs Full Rights For Gay Couples."
"Conceding Missteps, Bush Urges Patience On Iraq."
"Study Sees Gain On Lung Cancer."
"In Tight Race, Ad On Black Candidate Stirs Furor."
"With Beheadings, Drug Gangs Terrorize Mexico."

DOJ_NMG_0086463

Washington Post:
"More U.S. Troops May Be Iraq-Bound."
"The GOP Leans On A Proven Strategy."
"A Sense Of Service."
"A Contentious Campaign In A Battleground State."
"DNA Testing A Mixed Bag For Immigrants."
"FBI's Fairfax Agents Packing For Pr. William."
"Failing Schools Are Fighting Back In Md."

Washington Times:
"Black Democrats Pull Punches In Maryland Race."
"Jersey Court Orders Ok Of Gay Unions."
"S. Korea Official Quits Over North Policy."
"Obesity Drives Up US Fuel Appetite."
"Bush Backs Setting 'Benchmarks' In Iraq."
"A Hard Year To Be An Ohio Republican."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Senator Criticizes Use Of CDC Jet."
"Feds Pass Up Tips On Immigrant Violators."
"'I'm Not Satisfied Either.'"
"Libertarian Candidate Makes Some Noise."

Houston Chronicle:
"New Tensions Between U.S., Iraq."
"Republican Oil Their Successful Turnout Machine."
"Caregiver Charged In Mother's Death."
"Small Signs Of Acceptance."
"Strayhorn Never Saw Hill She Couldn't Climb."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Gay Marriage; Gay Marriage Analysis; Bush& Iraq; Maliki's Response To Timetable; Tennessee Senate Race; Separate Education; Classified Documents Found; Interest Rates; CAT Scans For Smokers; Playing Tag Banned.
CBS: Bush & Iraq; Maliki's Response To Timeline; Bush & Iraq Analysis; American Voters-Iraq; Stem Cell research Debate; CBS: Cost Of Campaign 2006; Gay Marriage; Risk Of Shingles; Cancer Screening; Separate Education; Fallen Soldiers-Iraq.
NBC: Bush & Iraq; Maliki's Response To Timeline; Iraq War Analysis; Cancer Screening; Risk OF Shingles; Ohio Senate Race; Gay Marriage; Housing Market; Interest Rates; Stock Market; Madonna's Adoption; Separate Education.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Signs HR 6061, the Secure Fence Act of 2006, Roosevelt Room; attends Lamberti for Congress and Iowa Victory 2006 reception, Iowa State Fairgrounds, Des Moines, Iowa, pool for cameras; attends a Bouchard for US Senate reception, Mabry Banquet and Convention Center, Warren, Mich., pool for cameras.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: US-CHINA _ Five-day meeting of the US-China Economic and Security Review Commission. Location: Hall of the States, 444 N. Capitol St.

POLAR SATELLITES _ NOAA holds Polar Max 2006, a forum for US and global users of polar-orbiting satellite data. Highlights: 8:10 a.m. Mary Kicza, deputy assistant administrator for NOAA's Satellite and Information Service. 8:45 a.m. Col. Dan Stockton, program director, NPOESS. Location: NOAA Science Center, 1301 East West Highway, Silver Spring.

LEGAL REFORM _ 8:45 a.m. - 5 p.m. US Chamber of Commerce holds 4th annual Legal Reform Summit. Participants include Iowa Attorney General Tom Miller; Utah Attorney General Mark Shurtleff; columnist Stuart Rothenberg; others. Location: 1615 H St. NW.

ELECTIONS-VOTING SYSTEMS _ 10 a.m. - 4 p.m. National Election Assistance Commission meets to discuss Voting System Testing and the Certification Program. Panel members, representatives of the National Institute of Standards and Technology (NIST), testing laboratories, equipment manufacturers, election officials, and certification specialists will receive presentations and hear public comments. Location: EAC Offices, 1225 New York Ave. NW, Suite 150.

EYONG _ 9 a.m. Arraignment for Njock Eyong before U.S. District Judge John Bates on charges of impersonating a federal official, possession of fraudulent visa documents and fraud by wire scheme. Location: Courtroom 8, U.S. District Court, 3rd St. and Constitution Ave. NW.

GREENSPAN SPEECH _ 9 a.m. Former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan speaks to annual convention of the Commercial Finance Association at 9 a.m. APPROX. Location: Marriott Wardman Park Hotel, 2660 Woodley Road.

AFRICAN-AMERICAN VOTERS _ 10:30 a.m. Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies holds briefing on what factors will influence African-American voter turnout for the upcoming elections, and how the black vote will impact the outcome. With David Bositis, senior political analyst. Location: 1090 Vermont Avenue, NW, Suite 1100.

CLEAN ENERGY-LIST _ 11 a.m. Coalition of environmental, labor, and consumer groups unveils list of the Ten Best Opportunities for a New Energy Future. List is based on a new report by the U.S. Public Interest Research Group. Location: University of the District of Columbia, Van Ness campus between Bldg 46 West and Bldg 47.

DOJ_NMG_0086464

CIGARETTE POLL _ 11:30 a.m. Teleconference call to release Drug Policy Alliance's Zogby Poll. Survey asked 1,200 Americans if they'd support federal legislation making cigarettes illegal. Contacts: Tony Newman, 646-335-5384. Notes: Call 877-270-2156; password: Zogby.

CHAO-DISABILITIES EMPLOYMENT _ 11:45 a.m. Secretary of Labor Elaine L. Chao will host a New Freedom Initiatives Awards ceremony to mark National Disabilities Employment Awareness Month. Awards will be presented to four non-profit groups, four companies and one individual for outstanding efforts in supporting the employment of people with disabilities. Location: Washington Renaissance Hotel, 999 9th St. NW.

CRACK COCAINE-SENTENCING REPORT _ 12 p.m. ACLU issues report on discriminatory criminal justice policies to mark 20th anniversary of the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1986. Report is titled ``Cracks in the System: Twenty Years of the Unjust Federal Crack Cocaine Law'' and will be discussed in conference call briefing. Contacts: Elizabeth Rose, 202-675-2303. Notes: Dial-In Number: 800-816-4134; 69922.

IRAQ WAR VETS _ 12:30 p.m. Iraq war veterans with VoteVets.org hold conference call on new ad calling for defeat of Reps. Gutknecht, Porter, Sweeney, and Doolittle. Contacts: Eric Schmeltzer, 646-290-8586. Notes: Call 641-985-1000; access code: 451701.

REED-IRAQ _ 12:30 p.m. - 1:30 p.m. The Saban Center holds a ``Statesman's Forum: A Conversation on Iraq with Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I.'' Reed will discuss his meetings with U.S. troops, military commanders, Afghan and Iraqi officials; the resurgent Taliban in Afghanistan; sectarian violence in Iraq; current reconstruction efforts in both countries; and the options for redeploying U.S. troops from Iraq in a safe and timely manner. The session will be moderated by Martin Indyk, director of the Saban Center for Middle East Policy. Location: Brookings Institution, Falk Auditorium, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

IRAN-ISLAM _ 3 p.m. Council on Foreign Relations holds conference call on ``Hidden Iran: Paradox and Power in the Islamic Republic.'' With Ray Takeyh, senior fellow for Middle Eastern studies. Contacts: Darin Kingston, 212-434-9677. Notes: Call 800-247-5110; passcode: TAKEYH.

DEMOCRACY IN IRAN _ 3:30 p.m. Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty briefing by Mariam Memarsadeghi, senior program Manager for the Middle East & North Africa, Freedom House. Topics include democracy and human rights in Iran. Location: 1201 Connecticut Ave. NW.

BUSH-RICE _ 7 p.m. Elisabeth Bumiller, formerly of the New York Times, and Steve Weisman of the Times discuss the problems covering President Bush and Secretary of State Rice, sponsored by the National Press Club and SPJ. Location: National Press Club.

ELECTIONS-SLATE _ 8 p.m. George Washington University and Slate host panel discussion on the mid-term elections. With John Dickerson, Slate's chief political correspondentl; Mickey Kaus, Slate's ``Kausfiles''; others. Location: GWU, Morton Audit., 805 21st St. NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Thursday, October 26, 2006 8:18 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Thursday, October 26, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips061026.pdf; dojclips061026.doc

This morning's Department of Justice News Clips is attached.

Website: You can also read today's briefing, including searchable archive of past editions, at http://www.BulletinNews.com/justice.

Full-text Links: Clicking the hypertext links in our write-ups will take you to the newspapers' original full-text articles.

Interactive Table of Contents: Clicking a page number on the table of contents page will take you directly to that story.

Contractual Obligations and Copyright: This copyrighted material is for the internal use of US Department of Justice employees only and, by contract, may not be redistributed without BulletinNewsâ€™ express written consent.

Contact Information: Please contact us any time at 703-749-0040 or Justice-Editors@BulletinNews.com. Use of this email address will automatically result in your message being delivered to everyone involved with your service, including senior management. Thank you.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, OCTOBER 26, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Gonzales Criticizes Europeans For Refusing To Receive Guantanamo Detainees (AP)....4
Cheney Confirms That Detainees Were Subjected To Water-boarding (MCT)....5
U.S. Seeks To Limit Detainees' Contact (AP)....6
Sept. 11 Plotter Asks Court For Lawyer, Trial (WP)....7
Young Woman Fears Deportation, And Mutilation (NYT)....8

Homeland Response:

Intelligence, Homeland Security Agencies Sharpen Surveillance Methods (GOVEXEC)....9
New York Times Gets Two Extra Days To Disclose Confidential Sources (NYS)....10
Caution Flag For Evacuation Plans (WP)....10
Another Post-September 11 Reality (WT)....12
ID Plan Sent Back To Drawing Board (AP)....13

War News:

Bush Unsatisfied With Iraq War Progress (AP-Y)....14
Iraq Reality Check (LAT)....16
Bush's Gamble: Turning The Spotlight On The Iraq War As Republicans Try To Dim It (NYT)....16
Face The Nation: Demure Madonna And Anxious President (NYT)....18
Bush's Proposal Of 'Benchmarks' For Iraq Sounds Familiar (WP)....19
Conceding Missteps, Bush Urges Patience On Iraq (NYT)....20
Bush Is Reassuring On Iraq But Says He's 'Not Satisfied' (WP)....21
Bush Insists He'll Stand By His Iraq Goals (LAT)....23
Bush Says Iraq Strategy Is Flexible (WSJ)....25
Bush Tells US 'I'm Not Happy With Iraq' (FT)....27
Bush Backs Setting 'Benchmarks' In Iraq (WT)....27
Bush's Conviction On Iraq Exceeds His Plan's Credibility (USAT)....29
Wars Are Hard, But We'll Win (USAT)....29
War Now Works Against GOP (WP)....30
Frist To GOP Hopefuls: Don't Stress Iraq (AP-Y)....32
Defiant Iraqi PM Disavows Timetable (AP-Y)....33
Iraqi Premier Denies U.S. Assertion He Agreed To Timelines (WP)....34
Maliki Distances Himself From American Strategies In Iraq (MCT)....36
Iraq's Leader Jabs At U.S. On Timetables And Militias (NYT)37
Maliki Resists US Pressure To Take Key Decisions (FT)....39
Iraqi Leader Bristles At Idea Of Timetable (USAT)....40
Al-Maliki Hits U.S. Calls For A Timetable (WT/AP)....41
Sadr City Raid Targets Death Squad Leader (LAT)....42
What Osama Wants (NYT)....43
In Syria, Iraq's Fate Silences Rights Activists (WP)....43
Money Down The Drain In Iraq (NYT)....45
For NBC Reporter, The Job That Won't Go Away (WP)....46
An Opportunity For Shared Sacrifice (USAT)....48
A GI Bill For The 21st Century (LAT)....49

DOJ:

Alito Swears In Acosta As Miami's Top Federal Prosecutor (AP)....50
Alito Protégé Sworn In As U.S. Attorney In Miami (MH)....51

Corporate Scandals:

UPDATE: SEC Says Two Defrauded Korean Community In Calif. (DOW)....51
Judge Issues Secret Ruling About Secrets In Nacchio Case (FINDLAW/AP)....52
SEC Probes Mutual-Fund Firms After Settlement In Kickback Case (WSJ)....53
NASD Fines James River CEO $2.25M For Alleged Improper Market Timing (LAW/AP)....54
Former AOL Execs Said Lied To Auditors (FINDLAW/AP)....55
Austria Charges Nine In Probe Of Refco-Bawag Ties (WSJ).56

Criminal Law:

Pre-Vote Leaks Rankle GOP (RC) 57
Jurisdictional Issues Dog Member Probes (RC) 59
Rights Group Fires Publisher Of Foley E-Mail (NYT) 61
Hastert Aide Goes Before Ethics Panel (AP-Y) 62
Second Man Accuses Former Priest Who Abused Foley (WP/AP) 62
Washington Wire (WSJ) 63
FBI Eyes Contractor In Los Alamos Leak (WT) 67
Los Alamos Disks May Hold U.S. Secrets (WP) 68
Former Los Alamos Subcontract Worker Probed In Breach (Update1) (BLOOM) 68
Man Once Held In Wales' Death Seeks New Venue For Gun Charge (AP) 69
Family Faces New Charges In Military Secrets-to-China Case (MERCN) 70
5 In Family Charged With Military Data Conspiracy (LAT) 70
Enforcer Faces Charges In Trooper Threat (PHI) 71
Authorities Arrest Reputed Mobster On Federal Charges (NSDY/AP) 72
Gotti Says Detective Helped In Killing Of A Witness (NYS) 73
Private Eye Says He Rejected Plea Deals (MH) 73
Silicon Valley Bank Manager Sentenced For Embezzling $1.13M (SDUT/AP) 74
FORMER SJ BANK MANAGER SENTENCED FOR EMBEZZLEMENT (BCNW) 75
Man Gets 12 Years For Porn (LUFDN) 75
Killer Of 5 Florida Students Is Executed (NYT) 76
Plotting Crime, Street By Street (WP) 77
Justice Department Webcast Focuses On Hiring, Retaining New Police Officers (PADN) 78

Civil Law:

The Supreme Court's Crusade: Fairness For The Powerful (NYT) 79
Sticks And Stones May Break Bones, But Warsaw, Ind., Makes Replacements (WSJ) 80

Civil Rights:

List Errors Might Impede Voters (AP) 82
Black Groups Urge 3 To Resign From Ga. Election Board (AJC) 83
Manassas May Face 2nd Lawsuit (WP) 83
Right Hopes For Boost From N.J. Ruling (FWNS) 84
New Jersey Court Orders Equality For Gay Couples (WSJ) ... 85
Ruling On Gays May Echo At Polls (USAT) 86
N.J. Court Opens Door To Gay Marriage (AP-Y) 87
New Jersey's Justices Agree On All But The 'M' Word (NYT) 89
Gay Marriage Backers Plan Big Push To Sway Trenton Lawmakers (NYT) 90
New Jersey Court Backs Full Rights For Gay Couples (NYT) 91
New Jersey Says Gay Couples Have The Same Rights As Straight Couples (KCS) 93
NJ Court Grants Rights, Not Marriage, To Gays (LAT) 95
Jersey Court Orders OK Of Gay Unions (WT) 96
Party Lines Are No Guide To Opinions By Justices (NYT) 97
An 'I Do' From McGreevey? He Would. (NYT) 98
N.J. Supreme Court Punts Same-Sex Marriage To Legislature (LAW) 98
A Ruling For Equality In New Jersey (NYT) 99
New Jersey's Step Forward (WP) 100
Expanded DNA Collection Eroding Civil Liberties, Panel Says (AAS) 101
Abortion Ban Looms Large On S.D. Ballot (USAT) 101
New Voting Systems Face Midterm Exam (WSJ) 102
Voting Machines Had Defective Part (WP) 104
National Federation Of The Blind Files Target Lawsuit (USAT) 106
Inside The Beltway (WT) 107

Antitrust:

FCC Likely To Avoid 'net Neutrality' Debate In AT&T-BellSouth Merger Decision (SAEN) 108
FPL Group, Constellation Energy Call Off Their $12.5 Billion Deal (WSJ) 109
Plug Pulled On Md. Utility Deal (WP) 110
Yankee Candle Agrees To $1.4 Billion Buyout (WSJ) 111
Milberg, Weiss & Bush (WSJ) 112
Radio Chain Said To Weigh Selling Itself (NYT) 112
Big Law Firms From 2 Coasts Move Closer To A Merger (NYT) 113
Growing Funds Fuel Buyout Boom (WSJ) 114
NYSE To Buy Rest Of Amex Tech Stake (WSJ) 116
German Regulators Say No To Coherent Buy (AP-YBIZ) 116
German Regulator OKs Metro-Wal-Mart Deal (AP) 116

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Military Tells Panel Stryker Unit Is Vital (HSB) 117
Shell Could Face Criminal Charges In Russia (NYT) 118
Weakening The Fight For Mine Safety (NYT) 118
Tribal Police Chief, Officer Face Federal Charges (AP) 119

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

MCLU Says FBI Is Spying On Peace Activists (WCSH) 119
Peace Groups Say FBI Monitored Their E-mails (AP) 120

DOJ_NMG_0086468

Cops Arrested For Allegedly Stealing $31,000 (CHIST).....120
2 Chicago Police Officers Charged In Narcotics Case (BVND).....121
Jail Guard Charged With Accepting Bribes From Inmate (AP)122
Ring Allegedly Hid Meth In Elmo Dolls (AP).....122
Colorado Meth Ring Smuggled Drugs Inside Elmo Dolls And Other Toys, DEA Says (AP).....122
Cops Take 45 Lbs. Of Meth In Greeley (DENP) 123
Meth Arrests Put Greeley Cartel On Ice (DENP).....123
Meth Ring Broken Up (RMN).....124
Ten Arrested In Big Weld Drug Bust (GT) 125
Local Agent Tipped Off Friends, DEA Says (CA) 125
DEA Agent Indicted On Charges He Tipped Off Suspect (BRAH).....126
MPD Cop Turned DEA Agent Gets Indicted (WPTY).....127
Federal Agents Bust One Of Their Own For Helping Dealers (WMC) 127
15 Arrested In Richmond Drug Raids (SFC) 128
15 SUSPECTED GANG MEMBERS ARRESTED IN NORTH RICHMOND (BCNW) 128
Pittsford Man Charged In Federal 'club Drug' Case (RDC) .129
White Plains Pharmacist Facing Federal Drug Charge (JN)129
Trial Date Set In Drug Case (TRE).....130
Bloomberg, Daley Lead Mayors In Coalition Against Gun Violence (AP).....130
Gladewater Gun Dealer Faces 5 Years In Prison, $250,000 Fine (LONGNJ) 131
STORE OWNER ADMITS TO ILLEGAL FIREARMS SALES (TMT).....131
Old West Leaves Dodge City; Guns Remain (AP-Y).....132
Fugitive Fatally Shot Was Holding Shoe, Not Gun (AP).....133
Suspect Killed After Confrontation With U.S. Marshal (AJC).133

Immigration:

A Former Salvadoran Army Officer Convicted Of Killing Priests Is Arrested In L.A. As A Human Rights Violator (LAT).....133
Voters On Immigration: Action, Please (CSM) 135

Tax:

Survey Finds Giving By Wealthy Largely Immune To Tax Changes (WSJ).....137
IRS Help Can Be Hard To Get, Audit Says (USAT) 138

Congress-Administration:

FT Interview: Rob Portman (FT) 138
Entering The Era Of Smart Card ID (WP).....139

Other News:

Fed Leaves Rates Alone For The Third Time (USAT).....140
Fed Again Leaves Rates Unchanged (WSJ).....141
Fed Holds Key Rate Steady At 5.25% (WP) 142
Home Prices Keep Sliding; Buyers Sit Tight (WSJ).....143
Sellers Sing The Blues As Price Drop Sets Record (USAT) 145
A Record Drop In Home Prices (WP) 147
Dow Hits High After Fed Keeps Rates Steady (USAT) 148
Stocks Rise On Fed News But Crude Curbs Gains (WSJ) ...149
Amtrak Careless In Managing Outside Counsel, Report Says (WSJ).....150
Americans Expect Major Changes If Dems Win Nov. 7 (USAT) 150
Candidates Matter Some Places, But Not Everywhere (RC) 151
Democratic House Leader Under GOP Attack (FT) 153
Stakes Are High For Business Community In Nov. Elections (USAT) 153
Bush Calls Nov. 7 Referendum On Iraq, Taxes (WT) 156
Wall Street Handicaps Stocks, Sectors As Voting Nears (USAT) 157
Why Democrats Are Losing The Culture War (USAT) 158
Democrats Eyeing Upstate Races In Their Effort To Retake Congress (NYT) 159
Liberalism's Limits In Kentucky (WP).....161
A Hard Year To Be An Ohio Republican (WT) 162
In Old Textile District, The Free-Trade Issue Dominates (NYT).....164
Fed Up With Everybody (NYT).....166
Schumer Upbeat On Democrats' Senate Odds (WT) 167
In Tight Race, Ad On Black Candidate Stirs Furor (NYT) 168
Contentious Race Republicans' Hold On The South Gets Test In Tennessee (WSJ) 170
Ford Foundation (WSJ).....173
A Right Kind Of Democrat (LAT) 174
Celebrities Face Off On Stem Cell Issue In Mo. (USAT).....176
Political Pitches At The World Series (LAT).....177
Jesus' Words Used Vs. Stem-cell Initiative (WT) 178
Republicans Intensify Push In New Jersey (NYT) 179
Cardin, Steele Play Gotcha In Three-way Debate (BSUN)...180
Cardin, Steele Face Off In Contentious Debate (WP) 182
Senate Hopefuls Squabble, Call Each Other 'Handpicked' (WT) 182
Iraq, Stem Cell Research Topics At Second Senate Debate (AP).....183
Black Democrats Pull Punches In Maryland Race (WT) 184
Allen, Webb Stake Out Positions On 'No Child' (WP) 185

DOJ_NMG_0086469

Allen, Webb Tour Va.; Wilder Backs Webb (WP) 186
Virginia Mayor Endorses Senator's Opponent (NYT/AP) 187
Wilder Backs Webb In Race (WT) 188
An Ascent Shadowed By Questions On Race (WP) 189
GOP Sees Hope In Michigan Race (WT) 193
Races In Mich. Explore Economy's Electoral Impact (USAT) 193
Michigan's Messy DeVos (WSJ) 195
Connecticut Crucible For A War Debate (WP) 196
A New Campaign Tactic: Manipulating Google Data (NYT) 197
Arab Americans Trending Democratic In Swing States (WT) 198
Election May Turn On What Happened In Vegas (USAT) 199
Candidates Show Strain Of Tough Election Season (NYT) .200
Hillary Clinton Wins Minds But Not Yet Hearts (FT) 201
US Faces 'bigger Skills Gap' Than India (FT) 203
The Era Of What's Next (NYT) 203
Special Treatment For Air America (WT) 204
Kiss Of Death For 'President'? (USAT) 205
A Capital Connection (WP) 206
Not So Big Oil (WSJ) 207
Chad Says Sudan Is Arming Rebels (NYT) 207
U.S. Faults Europeans' Proposed Iran Sanctions (WSJ) 208
Draft Iran Resolution Would Restrict Students (NYT) 209
Iran Said To Be Stepping Up Nuclear Programme (FT) 210
Secretary Of State ElBaradei (WSJ) 211
Iranian Ex-Leader Sought In Argentina (WP/AP) 212
Argentina Seeks Arrest Of Former Iranian Leader (USAT/AP) 213
Argentine Prosecutor Ties Iran To Bombing Of Jewish Center (MCT) 213
Rice Presses South Korea On Sanctions (AP-Y) 215
S. Korea Official Quits Over North Policy (WT) 215
Rice Plays Down Veiled Putin Criticism Of US Handling Of NKorea Crisis (AFP-Y) 216
Tokyo Denies Report It Wants Nuke Meet (AP) 216
N. Korea Warns South Against Sanctions (AP-Y) 217
A U.S. Embassy In Pyongyang (WSJ) 218
Bush Pushes For Trade Agreement (AP-Y) 220
Putin Promises To Remain Influential (NYT) 220
Putin Says He'll Retain Influence In Russia After Term Ends In '08 (WP) 221
Putin Hints At His Political Future (FT) 222
Putin Vows Not To Seek 3rd Term (WT/AP) 223
Putin Suggests He Will Remain A Force After Leaving Office (LAT) 224
Vote For Security Council Seat Stalled (AP) 225
Venezuela Would Back Bolivia For UN Security Seat (FT) ...226
After 41 U.N. Ballots, Venezuela-Guatemala Logjam Persists (NYT) 227
Concerns Accompany U.S. Support For Uribe (WP) 228
Nicaragua To Join Nations Banning All Abortions (LAT) 229
With Beheadings, Drug Gangs Terrorize Mexico (NYT) 230
Prominent S. African Denied Entry Into U.S. (WP) 232
In Burma, A Cry For U.N. Help (WP) 233

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Gonzales Criticizes Europeans For Refusing To Receive Guantanamo Detainees (AP)

AP, October 26, 2006

BERLIN (AP) — U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said European countries should do more to take back detainees released from the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, while defending Washington's treatment of prisoners.

Gonzales is touring European capitals to discuss a recently passed U.S. law covering the prosecution of terror suspects.

Speaking in Berlin at an event organized by the German Marshall Fund, he said the United States is "not interested in serving as the world's jailer," and urged Europeans to be more willing to repatriate released prisoners, as well as to increase pressure on third countries to do so.

"Despite demands from others that Guantanamo be closed, the United States has received little help from our European allies regarding the fate of these detainees," Gonzales said.

Chancellor Angela Merkel has been among the critics of the U.S. military prison, which opened nearly five years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0086470

About 450 detainees are being held at Guantanamo on suspicion of links to al-Qaeda or Afghanistan's ousted Taliban regime.

In August, a German-born Turkish citizen was released from Guantanamo after lengthy negotiations between Berlin and Washington. Murat Kurnaz, 24, is again living in the northern German city of Bremen.

Gonzales also detailed the U.S. Military Commissions Act, a law that provides for trials of captured terrorists, saying it was proof that "just because the U.S. still believes a state of war exists, that does not mean that the rule of law has no place."

U.S. President George W. Bush signed the act into law last week. Civil libertarians and leading Democrats have decried the law as a violation of American values.

Gonzales was conciliatory toward expressions of frustration from German members of parliament who attended the discussion over what they view as insufficient respect by the United States for international law.

"We understand the anxiety and the tension this has created," Gonzales said. However, he urged German and other allies to be open for discussion, saying "we need you in the long haul as partners."

Cheney Confirms That Detainees Were Subjected To Water-boarding (MCT)

By Jonathan S. Landay

McClatchy Newspapers, October 26, 2006

WASHINGTON - Vice President Dick Cheney has confirmed that U.S. interrogators subjected captured senior al-Qaida suspects to a controversial interrogation technique called "water-boarding," which creates a sensation of drowning.

Cheney indicated that the Bush administration doesn't regard water-boarding as torture and allows the CIA to use it. "It's a no-brainer for me," Cheney said at one point in an interview.

Cheney's comments, in a White House interview on Tuesday with a conservative radio talk show host, appeared to reflect the Bush administration's view that the president has the constitutional power to do whatever he deems necessary to fight terrorism.

The U.S. Army, senior Republican lawmakers, human rights experts and many experts on the laws of war, however, consider water-boarding cruel, inhumane and degrading treatment that's banned by U.S. law and by international treaties that prohibit torture. Some intelligence professionals argue that it often provides false or misleading information because many subjects will tell their interrogators what they think they want to hear to make the water-boarding stop.

Republican Sens. John Warner of Virginia, John McCain of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina have said that a law Bush signed last month prohibits water-boarding. The three are the sponsors of the Military Commissions Act, which authorized the administration to continue its interrogations of enemy combatants.

The radio interview Tuesday was the first time that a senior Bush administration official has confirmed that U.S. interrogators used water-boarding against important al-Qaida suspects, including Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the alleged chief architect of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. Mohammad was captured in Pakistan on March 1, 2003, and turned over to the CIA.

Water-boarding means holding a person's head under water or pouring water on cloth or cellophane placed over the nose and mouth to simulate drowning until the subject agrees to talk or confess.

Lee Ann McBride, a spokeswoman for Cheney, denied that Cheney confirmed that U.S. interrogators used water-boarding or endorsed the technique.

"What the vice president was referring to was an interrogation program without torture," she said. "The vice president never goes into what may or may not be techniques or methods of questioning."

In the interview on Tuesday, Scott Hennen of WDAY Radio in Fargo, N.D., told Cheney that listeners had asked him to "let the vice president know that if it takes dunking a terrorist in water, we're all for it, if it saves American lives."

"Again, this debate seems a little silly given the threat we face, would you agree?" Hennen said.

"I do agree," Cheney replied, according to a transcript of the interview released Wednesday. "And I think the terrorist threat, for example, with respect to our ability to interrogate high-value detainees like Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, that's been a very important tool that we've had to be able to secure the nation."

DOJ_NMG_0086471

Cheney added that Mohammed had provided "enormously valuable information about how many (al-Qaida members) there are, about how they plan, what their training processes are and so forth. We've learned a lot. We need to be able to continue that."

"Would you agree that a dunk in water is a no-brainer if it can save lives?" asked Hennen.

"It's a no-brainer for me, but for a while there, I was criticized as being the vice president `for torture.' We don't torture. That's not what we're involved in," Cheney replied. "We live up to our obligations in international treaties that we're party to and so forth. But the fact is, you can have a fairly robust interrogation program without torture, and we need to be able to do that."

The interview transcript was posted on the White House Web site. Interview of the Vice President by Scott Hennen, WDAY.

CIA spokeswoman Michelle Neff said, "While we do not discuss specific interrogation methods, the techniques we use have been reviewed by the Department of Justice and are in keeping with our laws and treaty obligations. We neither conduct nor condone torture."

U.S. Seeks To Limit Detainees' Contact (AP)

By Michael Melia

AP, October 26, 2006

The U.S. government has proposed limiting contact between defense lawyers and detainees at Guantanamo Bay, according to court documents.

The government argues that it must restrict the detainees' communications, as news of world events could incite the prisoners to violence.

The U.S. proposed the rules in a filing to a federal appeals court in Washington that was examined by The Associated Press. The case deals with an Afghani detainee but the government wants them to apply to other prisoners at Guantanamo Bay Naval Base in southeast Cuba. The prison camp holds some 430 detainees.

The rules, which would apply to detainees pursuing court challenges to their designations as "enemy combatants," would tighten censorship of mail from attorneys and give the military more control over what lawyers can discuss with their clients, according to the filing.

The number of face-to-face meetings between defense attorneys and detainees would be limited to four total. There are now no restrictions on the number of times they can meet, although lawyers' access to the base is already hampered because it is so remote.

The government says current rules have allowed detainees to receive books or articles about terrorist attacks in Iraq, London and Israel, as well as details of the prisoner abuse investigation at Iraq's Abu Ghraib prison.

In the court filing, which was first reported Wednesday by The Boston Globe, a military lawyer said security at Guantanamo Bay has been threatened by the introduction of a book on Abu Ghraib, a speech given at an Amnesty International conference about the war on terror, and other materials.

"Such materials could incite detainees to violence, leading to a destabilization of the camp," wrote Navy Cmdr. Patrick M. McCarthy.

The government petition was filed in August in the case of Haji Bismullah, an Afghanistan native who is among several Guantanamo detainees represented by the New York-based Center for Constitutional Rights.

Currently, mail from lawyers is examined only for physical contraband. The proposed rules call for all of a detainee's mail to be examined for forbidden information.

Wells Dixon, an attorney at the Center for Constitutional Rights, said he suspects the proposal is aimed at controlling the information coming out of Guantanamo. Accounts from defense lawyers who have visited Guantanamo have cast doubt on government assertions that most detainees are hardened terrorists, Dixon said.

"What's happening is the government wants to hide this indisputable fact," he said "They're not happy we've been able to bring a lot of these developments to light."

DOJ_NMG_0086472

In 2004, the Supreme Court said detainees can contest the legality of their detentions. A law signed by President Bush on Oct. 17 bars detainees from protesting their detentions in court, but they still have a right to challenge their designations as "enemy combatants." The new rules would restrict legal representation for those challenges.

Sept. 11 Plotter Asks Court For Lawyer, Trial (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig And Julie Tate

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

Ramzi Binalshibh, an admitted al-Qaeda planner of the Sept. 11 attacks, tried four times to join the terrorist hijackers who flew planes into the World Trade Center and the Pentagon in 2001 and has acknowledged his goal of killing as many Americans as possible.

Now the Yemeni man is seeking the help of the U.S. court system to address his complaint that he has been wrongfully imprisoned and treated unfairly by the U.S. government. He filed a legal challenge in federal court in Washington on Oct. 10, asserting his rights to contest his detention and requesting that a court-appointed lawyer represent him free of charge.

In so doing, Binalshibh brought to life the two arguments at the heart of the recent, furious debate over stripping such habeas corpus rights from so-called enemy combatants: the administration's position that alleged terrorists like him do not deserve access to U.S. courts, and his opponents' assertion that the American justice system is a model for the world precisely because it accords such basic rights to all.

One of the most bitterly fought provisions of the legislation President Bush signed Oct. 17 to establish a system of military trials, or "commissions," for accused enemy combatants eliminated those rights for the captives at the U.S. prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Suspending habeas rights is a step that has been taken only four times previously in U.S. history, and its legality this time will almost certainly be decided by the Supreme Court.

Because of Binalshibh's alleged admission that he was a key player in the Hamburg cell that carried out the attacks, his legal suit may provide the starkest test yet of America's justice system, legal experts said.

"It is how our system treats the worst of the worst, the most reviled of the reviled, that shows how true we are to our principles, " said David H. Remes, who has represented 17 detainees, mostly from Yemen, and coordinated defense arguments to the Supreme Court in the successful Hamdan case.

Binalshibh may never get the hearing he is seeking. His is one of hundreds of cases the government asked the courts to dismiss immediately after Bush signed the new law. For his part, Binalshibh did little more than assert his habeas rights and ask for a lawyer.

Binalshibh is part of a select group of detainees that even defense lawyers acknowledge may be guilty -- 14 suspected terrorists the government deemed "high-value detainees," some of whom have allegedly admitted high-level roles in the al-Qaeda attacks. President Bush cited the 14 men, selected from more than 100 terrorist suspects who had been held for years in secret CIA-run prisons, when he successfully lobbied for the military commission law.

Bush sought Congress's approval after the Supreme Court ruled in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld in June that the administration lacked the authority to establish the military trials on its own. He pressed for the legislation as the government transferred the 14 men to a unit of the military prison in Guantanamo Bay and singled out Binalshibh -- along with Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Sheik Mohammed.

Binalshibh's family's decision to seek help in a U.S. court also highlights a growing tension within the defense bar about the ethical and practical dilemmas of representing detainees who likely played a role in slaughtering thousands of Americans.

Binalshibh's brother filed a petition on his behalf and asked the federal court to appoint a public defender to represent him. The Center for Constitutional Rights, a civil liberties group that sued last year to represent the remaining detainees in Guantanamo Bay who lack representation, is not currently representing him. A group official said he could not comment on the reason because of potential attorney-client privilege.

Tina Foster, a civil liberties lawyer who previously helped coordinate the work of dozens of law firms representing hundreds of Guantanamo detainees, said it would be a "challenge" to find a pro bono lawyer for Binalshibh because he has been virtually convicted in media reports as a Sept. 11 plotter. Remes said there is an "understandable reluctance" among large commercial law firms to champion Binalshibh's cause.

DOJ_NMG_0086473

"You wouldn't be rushing to file a habeas claim for Ramzi Binalshibh," Foster said. "Most of the folks down there are "no-value" detainees -- they shouldn't even be there -- and those are the ones you'd want to push in the court."

Binalshibh was captured by the United States in Pakistan in 2002 and taken to secret detention facilities. According to the Sept. 11 commission, he told interrogators that he was supposed to pilot another hijacked airliner on the day of the attacks but was repeatedly refused a visa to enter the United States.

His transformation to a terrorist began in 1997 when he became friends with future hijackers Mohamed Atta, Marwan al-Shehhi and Ziad Jarrah while living in Germany on a student visa. He later pledged allegiance to Osama bin Laden while training with his friends in Afghanistan in 1999.

Instead of participating in the attack, Binalshibh relayed messages between the hijackers and Mohammed, met with Atta for briefings on attack planning and allegedly helped transfer money to the hijackers.

Young Woman Fears Deportation, And Mutilation (NYT)

By Nina Bernstein

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

Adama Bah's schoolmates were jubilant when she returned to 10th grade at Heritage High School in Manhattan in May 2005 after six weeks in a distant juvenile detention center. Her release put to rest the federal government's unexplained assertion that Adama, a popular 16-year-old who wore jeans under her Islamic garb, was a potential suicide bomber.

But a year and a half later, with many of her friends planning proms and applying to college, Ms. Bah, now 18, was still wearing an electronic ankle bracelet and tethered to a 10 p.m. government curfew, restrictions that were conditions of her release. And she was still facing deportation to Guinea, where she has not lived since she was 2.

Today, at a closed hearing in Manhattan's federal building, she will plead for political asylum from Guinea's entrenched practice of female genital mutilation, which has marked all the women in her extended family, including her mother. An immigration judge could decide her fate on the spot.

"I'm worried about being sent back," Ms. Bah said on Tuesday in her first extended interview about the lasting consequences of a case that briefly became a cause célèbre in the debate over government vigilance and the protection of individual liberties. "I'm worried about being separated from my family. This is all I have left now — what hasn't been taken."

Officially, she and a 16-year-old Bangladeshi girl arrested in Queens the same day were detained solely because their childhood visas were no longer valid. That remains the only reason Ms. Bah is in deportation proceedings, and the sole legal basis for an order last year that released the other girl, Tashnuba Hayder, on the condition that she leave the country immediately.

Even now, Ms. Bah says she has no idea whether her slight acquaintance with Ms. Hayder was what caused agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation to hold her for questioning. Though a document provided by a federal agent at the time said the F.B.I. considered the girls "an imminent threat" to national security, it provided no evidence, and officials refused to discuss the matter.

"Why me?" she asked, before her volunteer lawyers warned that a judicial order limits what she can say about the experience. "Nobody answers, why me?"

She has had little time to dwell on the question, however, because she has been struggling to replace her father as the family's primary breadwinner. Her father, a cabdriver who was arrested along with her and held on immigration violations, stayed in detention until his deportation last month. Her mother, illiterate and speaking little English, soon lost the family business, a trinket stand.

But under the strictures of the government's curfew, Ms. Bah found she could not continue her education and at the same time earn enough to feed her four younger siblings, all American citizens. Last year, she dropped out of Heritage High, where teachers had praised her intellectual curiosity and generous spirit, and took up office work at Bellevue Hospital Center for $6.75 an hour.

DOJ_NMG_0086474

Her income fell far short of needs. And though a few community agencies tried to help with diapers for the youngest and trips to a food pantry, she said, the financial crisis deepened. In the end, it was an Islamic political activist in Maryland who came through, taking three of Ms. Bah's siblings into his home for the summer, and paying $500 a month toward household expenses so she could attend summer school and re-enroll in Heritage this fall.

"We were looking for other options, but nothing was working out," Ms. Bah said. She added that she knew little about the politics of the activist, Mauri Saalakhan, 53, whom she met for the first time last fall when she and her mother stopped to pray at a downtown mosque after a session with lawyers at Hughes, Hubbard & Reed, which is handling her asylum case without fee.

Her family's association with Mr. Saalakhan raised eyebrows this spring when he invited her to join spectators at the trial of a Pakistani immigrant accused — and eventually convicted — of plotting to blow up the Herald Square subway station in 2004. Ms. Bah, who was recognized by some reporters in the courtroom, said later that she went out of curiosity because people told her that the young man's case was like hers. It was not, she said, and when she realized that, she did not go back.

Mainstream Islamic groups have looked askance at her family's link to Mr. Saalakhan, an African-American who often accuses such groups of timidity, and whose criticism of government policies dates to a youthful stint with the Black Panthers. But, she said, "He's somebody who stepped up and helped" when others seemed afraid or only offered services like counseling instead of money to pay the rent.

For his part, Mr. Saalakhan says he is "a provocateur for truth and justice," who loves America and has police officers in his family. He was happy to have Ms. Bah's siblings Mohamed, 14, Mariama, 12, and Abdoul, 8, join him, his wife and teenage daughter for the summer near Washington, where he directs the Peace and Justice Foundation, "a grass-roots human rights organization."

"What our government has put this family through is unconscionable," he said.

But the volunteer lawyers who took over Ms. Bah's asylum case last fall are leery of any effort to make her emblematic of larger issues, when government lawyers are raising no national security questions.

"Right now all we have is a straightforward asylum claim," said Bryan Lonegan, a lawyer with the Legal Aid Society's immigration unit who is advising Hughes, Hubbard lawyers on the case. "This is a life and death situation for her."

The petition draws a grim picture of what she would face in Guinea as a young woman with intact genitalia who opposes the painful and dangerous practice of female genital mutilation.

In Guinea, "If a girl's genitals are not mutilated, she is considered dirty, repulsive, unfit for marriage and motherhood, and devoid of morals and monetary value," an expert, Hanny Lightfoot-Klein, wrote in an affidavit. Male relatives consider themselves dishonored, and will beat her until she submits, the affidavit added. "Elder women perform the procedure on dimly lit floors, with dull kitchen knives, glass shards, scissors or razor blades," the affidavit said.

Ms. Bah's mother, Aissatou Dalanda Bah, who has separately applied for asylum, had her clitoris excised by her grandmother with a kitchen knife when she was about 10, the court papers said. Later, she watched helplessly as one of Adama's cousins bled to death from the procedure.

For Ms. Bah, who grew up absorbing American values and believing she was a legal immigrant, the prospect is terrifying and unreal. Genital mutilation "has nothing to do with my religion," she said. "You can't just circumcise a woman against her will, to take away her pleasure. That's my right as a woman." Her fear has become one more part of a day-to-day struggle to hold the family together, she said, as she repeatedly interrupted the interview to respond to her youngest brother, Saeed, 2.

"It's hard to concentrate in school," she said, explaining that she has missed many days this fall tending to the needs of her siblings, who now get public aid.

"In front of people," she added, "you have to be this happy person, even though inside, it hurts." At night, alone, she said, she allows herself to cry when she thinks about her family's collapse, and about her judge: "Somebody who's meeting me once, and making a decision for my lifetime."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Intelligence, Homeland Security Agencies Sharpen Surveillance Methods (GOVEXEC)

By Jonathan Marino

Government Executive, October 26, 2006

A senior Coast Guard official on Tuesday praised homeland security and intelligence agencies' efforts to develop new surveillance tools and bolster information sharing.

Guy Thomas, the Coast Guard's science and technology adviser, said improved surveillance techniques would help provide better protection against the possibility of attacks launched from boats offshore.

A 60- to 70-foot boat loaded with ordinary explosives and a biological or chemical weapon could deliver and spread a deadly substance - five pounds of anthrax, for example - to coastal areas with thousands of people, Thomas said. "I don't think I want to live in Los Angeles anymore," he told guests of the Border Management Summit, which was organized by the Institute for Defense and Government Advancement.

Protecting the coastal waters requires improved sensory techniques, an official with a company that provides security solutions said. He said his company has been working on multiple projects aimed at identifying incoming ships from farther away to detect suspicious ones. Recent advances mean that even the material from which a ship is built -- whether it is wood, plastic or metal -- can be determined from a distance, he said.

As part of more general efforts to improve surveillance, technology capable of recording biometric identifiers such as leg or facial muscle movement without alerting the subject is being refined. Gait recognition, for instance, is part of the "long-range surveillance" that the FBI may start using to help track suspects, said Duane Blackburn, the bureau's representative to the National Science and Technology Council. It remains in the research phase, and is being tested at universities, Blackburn said.

Other techniques in development include keystroke analyses of typing rhythms, and the production of video and photographic images clear enough to display biometric patterns.

Like gait surveillance, these remain in the early research stages. "Video is a real challenge," said Christopher Miles, senior program manager of the Justice Department's National Institute of Justice.

When intelligence is gathered, more needs to be done to ensure it is shared among intelligence and homeland security officials, Thomas said. "Ninety-five percent of [information and intelligence] needs to stay [unclassified]," he said.

New York Times Gets Two Extra Days To Disclose Confidential Sources (NYS)

By Josh Gerstein, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, October 26, 2006

A federal judge gave the New York Times a brief reprieve from an order forcing it to identify confidential sources for columns about the 2001 anthrax attacks, but the paper could still face the possibility of being held in contempt of court as soon as tomorrow.

Judge Claude Hilton of Alexandria, Va., issued a two-day stay of a magistrate's order that would have required the Times to name the sources by yesterday. The order came in a libel suit filed by a former Army scientist, Steven Hatfill, who claims he was defamed by five columns written by Nicholas Kristof in 2002.

According to a lawyer involved in the dispute, Judge Hilton said yesterday that he was still reviewing whether the Times should be compelled to identify the sources. He told attorneys that he planned to rule on the issue by Friday.

But the Times suffered a setback yesterday when Judge Hilton upheld a magistrate's ruling denying its request to suspend action on the libel suit until the government completes its investigation into the anthrax mailings, which killed at least five people. While investigators searched a home and storage locker belonging to Mr. Hatfill, no criminal charges were brought.

The newspaper wanted to defend against the libel suit by gaining access to the records of the government probe, but the Justice Department has refused to cooperate. The magistrate assigned to the suit, Liam O'Grady, declined to force the disclosure of details of the investigation, which the FBI contends is ongoing.

Caution Flag For Evacuation Plans (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

Worried about evacuating your city in an emergency?

DOJ_NMG_0086476

Move to Kansas City.

Making a familiar case for more roads and using the newer argument of homeland security, a trade association for highway builders and the automotive industry recently gave most of the nation's biggest metropolitan areas failing grades for how well they would evacuate their populations in a disaster.

Twenty of 37 urban areas received an F from the American Highways Users Alliance. The list included usual suspects such as New York City, Los Angeles, Chicago, Philadelphia and Washington.

Only Kansas City got an A.

The Bush administration and Congress have emphasized mass-evacuation planning since Hurricane Katrina and the destruction of much of New Orleans. The Department of Homeland Security this summer found such plans inadequate in about 90 percent of the nation's top 75 cities and "an area of profound concern." Pushed by Congress, DHS will award $1.3 billion in homeland security grants next year, partly on the basis of fixing them.

Washington area governments recently gave a million-dollar contract to a private firm to coordinate regional evacuation plans, joining many urban areas nationwide, and Congress has ordered Pennsylvania and West Virginia to take part in planning for an exodus of the capital region.

But many state and local officials warn that Washington is focusing too much on a replay of a Katrina-like disaster instead of drawing broader lessons about preparedness. Some recall a similar pattern after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, when attention shifted to terrorism at the expense of preparation for a natural disaster.

"I think it's a classic example of generals planning for the last war," said Richard A. Andrews, former head of California's emergency management office and a former member of the president's Homeland Security Advisory Council. "Because this happened with Katrina, now every city needs to have evacuation plans so they're not the city of New Orleans?"

The alliance's grades were based on three factors: each city's internal congestion, percentage of automobile ownership and percentage of vehicles that local highways could move in 12 hours. It recommended national standards, better planning and more roads and car ownership.

The federal government is pushing coastal states to do some of that. The Transportation Department reviewed evacuation plans for five Gulf Coast states. DHS prepared to move 141,000 people by bus, train or plane from New Orleans if necessary, while arguing with Louisiana about sheltering 150,000 others, setting collection points and identifying vulnerable groups such as the sick and elderly.

Outside hurricane country and high-threat cities such as New York and Washington, however, experts are hard-pressed to envision scenarios in which officials would want to evacuate an entire metropolitan area in 12 hours.

The best response to a radiological "dirty" bomb or chemical release might be to take cover or at most to evacuate people from a specific plume area. In a doomsday scenario involving a nuclear bomb, planners say, it cannot be assumed that local authorities would have credible warning, time to act and confidence that they would not be sending people into harm's way before an event -- or that they would be able to respond effectively afterward.

Andrews recalled the Federal Emergency Management Agency's bad experience with an aborted $4.2 billion Crisis Relocation Planning program in the early 1980s, which called for plans to evacuate 400 U.S. cities before a nuclear attack.

"It became very clear it just wasn't in the cards. You just can't do it," Andrews said. "What was then the Civil Defense program lost a lot of credibility, because it just didn't make sense. There are an awful lot of things we could be better spending our time on than evacuation plans."

For instance, Milwaukee has an international port on Lake Michigan and is home to 12 Fortune 500 companies, so it takes a catastrophic threat seriously. But it faces bigger risks from tornadoes and ice storms, said the city's emergency coordinator, Daniel Alexander, and more urgent needs such as improving radio systems so first responders and nearby cities can talk in a disaster.

"There is an inordinate amount of attention paid to one threat or vulnerability that is not applicable to all areas of the country," Alexander said. "The money, time and energy that's being devoted to regional evacuation planning, while important in some parts of the country, there are other more pressing issues. One of them is interoperable communications."

DOJ_NMG_0086477

David Riggleman, spokesman for Las Vegas, agreed. "We are not quite sure what the scenario would be," he said. "We're in the middle of the Mojave Desert. For us to evacuate 1.8 million people, where are we going to evacuate them to?"

Daniel Burns, southern Nevada emergency manager for the state Department of Public Safety, added: "I guess if there's a volcano, but you really have to stretch to get to cause a full evacuation in 12 hours." A bigger concern is receiving an exodus of Southern Californians in case of a large earthquake 300 miles away.

George W. Foresman, DHS undersecretary for preparedness, agreed that the "one-size-fits-all" approach does not work for different populations, transportation networks and risks in each city. But he said the highway users study is a bit of a straw man, because evacuation plans encompass preparations that would be useful in all kinds of emergencies, such as providing shelter and housing, improving communications, distributing medicine and health care, or setting up public alert and warning systems.

"We are not doing it at the expense of scenarios that have a higher probability of occurring," Foresman said. "We are not talking about the ability to evacuate every metro area to where it's a ghost town. . . . There is a different level of focus to what each area is putting into evacuation planning."

In any case, Foresman said, Congress has said it wants another survey of preparedness nationwide about this time next year.

Another Post-September 11 Reality (WT)

By Kevin M. Lynch

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

In the wake of the September 11 attacks, many people asked with great urgency: Why didn't someone connect the dots? Why didn't we see the attacks coming? And, how do we prevent other attacks?

The response was a classic example of protecting against the last threat and not "thinking outside the box" about that next threat. We have flung ourselves headlong into creating a safer air traffic system and so far it has been working. Another threat, which has reared its ugly and deadly head in Madrid, London, Chechnya and India, is the threat to the railroads.

We received threats against our railroads, and the major commuter railroads and subway systems were blanketed by police. Nothing happened, and that is a good thing. However, the bigger threat to our nation's railroads comes not from the potential to repeat those attacks on passenger rail around the world, but upon railroad infrastructure itself, which is primarily freight railroad in the United States.

Except along the Northeast Corridor from Boston to Washington, Amtrak runs on the tracks of the various freight railroads, as do most commuter railroads. A network of nearly 200,000 miles of railroad stretches across America with thousands upon thousands of switches, turnouts, crossovers, bridges, trestles, tunnels and hundreds of railroad yards and thousands upon thousands of railcars and locomotives.

All are vulnerable to attack and sabotage and given al Qaeda's penchant for multiple, simultaneous attacks, any such attacks against the freight railroad infrastructure or the targeting of hazardous commodities in transit could spell disastrous consequences for local communities across the nation and could deliver a crippling blow to our economy. In addition, such attacks are easy and cheap to carry out.

Are we prepared to defend against such attacks? Sadly, the answer is a resounding "no." While the British Transport Police in Great Britain fields more than 3,500 officers to protect the rail system in that country, there are fewer than 1,400 railroad police officers in the United States, down from more than 4,000 20 years ago. Even since September 11, the freight railroads have continued to trim their police departments. Instead of fielding uniformed officers 24/7 across their systems, the freight railroads rely on "special agents" who are assigned 200 to 700 miles of railroad to protect. There are only a handful of marked railroad police cars across the United States.

Each year in the United States about 500 persons are killed while trespassing on railroad property and another 500 or so are injured. That is indicative of just how open and vulnerable our railroads are. Most of the 200,000 miles of railroad are not fenced either. For the most part, railroads operate on the honor system. That could be virtually stopped by vastly increasing the number of railroad police officers, making them much more visible and available to prevent trespassing and to protect railroad property. By eliminating casual trespassers, those intent upon doing harm will be stopped. Additionally, good, specially designed fences would go a great way in keeping trespassers off railroad property and prevent them from being killed or injured and protect railroad property from theft, vandalism and sabotage.

DOJ_NMG_0086478

Major railroad accidents where hazardous materials have spilled have killed people in communities along the railroads and have led to a number of major evacuations of those who live near the railroads. What is the current railroad response to these threats? Simply this: Eventually compensate those dislocated and injured and the families of those killed. The assumption one can make is that paying claims must be cheaper than paying for cops, fences and other protective measures. That is unacceptable.

The only real answer is to stop giving lip service to protection and prevention and to fence strategic railroad property and drastically increase the number of sworn railroad police officers across the nation.

The railroads, through Operation Lifesaver, acknowledge that the three "E's," engineering, education and enforcement, are essential in protecting railroad property, the passengers and freight they carry and the communities through which they travel. But they have failed to acknowledge the fourth "E," enabling -- that is, actually putting their money where their mouths are and making protection of our nation's railroads a reality.

In this post-September 11 world we must connect the dots. Nothing less is acceptable. Our lives depend upon it.

Kevin M. Lynch of New York is a former captain of police for the Conrail Police Department and a consultant on railroad police practices. He also is an expert witness in railroad injury and death cases.

ID Plan Sent Back To Drawing Board (AP)

By Leslie Miller

The AP, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Two anti-terrorism ID programs have been sent back to the drawing board and a third is being farmed out to private companies after costing hundreds of millions of dollars.

Begun after the Sept. 11, 2001, hijackings, the programs were supposed to help prevent catastrophic terrorist attacks on the U.S. transportation system by checking airline passenger names against watch lists and providing special identification cards to every worker with access to airports, railroads, seaports or trucks.

So far, the Transportation Security Administration _ which has been overseeing development of the three programs_ has not gone beyond testing, has issued no IDs and has screened no passengers against terrorist lists.

TSA chief Kip Hawley defended the agency's efforts this week, saying the projects by their very nature use expensive and unreliable advanced technology.

All three are back on track, Hawley said. "Massive changes have happened here," he said. "We have a good acquisitions team and a good process."

According to documents obtained by The Associated Press, the agency has spent more than $200 million on the Transportation Worker Identity Credential, Secure Flight and Registered Traveler programs.

On all three, the TSA and contractors hired by the agency have spent more than anticipated, missed deadlines and raised questions about their ability to protect the public's privacy and the private sector's commercial interests.

Congressional investigators have warned repeatedly that the agency is mismanaging the programs.

"Five years after 9/11, the Bush Administration and TSA are stuck in neutral on critical security measures," said Massachusetts Rep. Ed Markey, a senior Democrat on the Homeland Security Committee.

"The lack of oversight by this Republican Congress on this program and countless others is just another reason Americans are ready to head in a new direction in November," Markey said.

Hawley called Secure Flight the most important of the three projects. It is envisioned as a computer-based program to check all airline passengers' names against terrorist watch lists before they board an airplane.

Airlines already check names against the lists and alert TSA officials when a passenger's name appears similar to one on a watch list. The system has led to thousands of false identifications. More than 30,000 people who are not terrorists have asked TSA to remove their names from the lists since Sept. 11, 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0086479

The TSA for four years tried to develop a technology system to take over the task of checking names against watch lists. The major contractors on the project were IBM, Lockheed Martin and Eagle Force Associates. Also involved in testing were Acxiom Corp., HNC Software, Infoglide Software, and Ascent Technology.

In February, the Government Accountability Office found security vulnerabilities with Secure Flight and it was suspended for retooling _ after $110 million had been spent.

Hawley said the project stalled because of debate about whether it should try to identify unknown terrorists _ which raises civil liberties concerns _ or simply match names against watch lists.

"That debate was played out," he said. "Congress said this is simply going to be watch-list matching."

The Transportation Workers Identity Credential, or TWIC, is an ID card to be issued to about 6 million longshoremen, mechanics, airport workers, locomotive engineers and truck drivers _ if they pass government background checks. The card will use a biometric identifier _ fingerprint or eye scan, for example.

Bearing Point, a Virginia consulting firm, did the bulk of TWIC development so far.

But years after the first cards were supposed to be issued, a contractor hasn't been chosen, a technical standard hasn't been issued for the card reader and regulations haven't been written to describe who will be required to get the card.

On Friday, the GAO reported that TSA must test the program to make sure the technology can work in harsh outdoor environments and that it won't delay the movement of goods.

"That is moving along and it is going to work," said Hawley, adding that TSA is pursuing a card that can be read without making physical contact with a machine. "This is cutting-edge technology," he said.

Registered Traveler is supposed to be a smart card program for frequent flyers in which they pay for a background check and a biometric ID card so they can wait in shorter security lines.

The government tested Registered Traveler in five airports and let a private company _ Verified Identity Pass Inc. _ test it in Orlando, Fla. Contractors for the pilot project were Unisys and EDS.

Frequent flyers who enrolled in the test said they liked Registered Traveler. The TSA found it didn't compromise security. The test, though, was staged in so few airports that its benefits were limited.

The TSA pulled the plug on the government tests in September 2005 because that year's funding ran out. Two months later TSA said Registered Traveler would be up and running in June 2006. It would be turned over to a consortium of private companies to develop and operate.

On Monday, Hawley said the TSA had decided Registered Traveler was a low priority but that it would be ready by the end of November.

Some security experts say Congress never should have ordered the TSA to undertake such complex information technology projects because they're far more expensive than anyone imagined, and probably will not work as envisioned.

"I blame Congress," said James Carafano, homeland security fellow at the Heritage Foundation, a Washington think tank.

Congress dictates deadlines for untested projects without ever analyzing if it is a good requirement or whether it can be accomplished, Carafano said.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Unsatisfied With Iraq War Progress (AP-Y)

By Terence Hunt

AP, October 26, 2006

Acknowledging painful losses in Iraq, President Bush said Wednesday he is not satisfied with the progress of the long and unpopular war, but he still insisted the United States was winning and should not think about withdrawing.

Thirteen days before elections in which Republicans fear Iraq could cost them control of the House or Senate, Bush expressed unwavering confidence in Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, the U.S. generals running the war and Iraq's prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, despite new strains between Baghdad and Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0086480

"The ultimate accountability rests with me," Bush said of Iraq. "If people are unhappy about it, look right to the president." He spoke in the East Room at an hour-long news conference dominated by Iraq questions.

Despite polls suggesting a Democratic takeover of at least the House, Bush said he was confident Republicans would prevail. Dismissing Democrats' hopes, Bush said, "We've got some people dancing in the end zone here in Washington, D.C. ... measuring their drapes."

Now in its fourth year, the war is the top campaign issue. A majority of Americans are opposed to Bush's handling of Iraq, and increasing numbers of Republican candidates have signaled impatience with the president's policies as U.S. deaths have climbed above 2,800. Bush indicated he shared the public's frustration even as he pushed back against calls for troop withdrawals.

"I know many Americans are not satisfied with the situation in Iraq," he said in a lengthy statement before taking questions. "I'm not satisfied either." October has been the deadliest month this year for American forces, and the war soon will have lasted longer than U.S. involvement in World War II.

"The events of the past month have been a serious concern to me and a serious concern to the American people," the president said.

Bush said the United States was changing tactics to deal with circumstances in Iraq but shouldn't change the overall direction of the war.

"Absolutely we're winning," the president asserted.

Bush voiced confidence in al-Maliki, calling him "the right man" for Iraq now.

In Baghdad, the Iraqi leader took a hard slap at the United States for a raid by U.S. and Iraqi forces on the stronghold of a Shiite militia led by a radical anti-American cleric on whom Al-Maliki relies for political support. Al-Maliki said the raid "will not be repeated."

Al-Maliki also criticized the top U.S. military and diplomatic representatives in Iraq for saying his government needed to set a timetable to curb violence in the country. "I affirm that this government represents the will of the people and no one has the right to impose a timetable on it," he said.

Bush said he had asked for a transcript of al-Maliki's remarks before coming into the East Room. Al-Maliki was correct in saying mandates could not be imposed on Iraq, Bush said. He suggested there had been a miscommunication between U.S. and Iraqi officials.

Despite criticism that al-Maliki has failed to stop sectarian violence, Bush said, "We'll push him, but we're not going to push him to the point where he can't achieve the objective." At the same time, Bush said Iraq's government "must respect the fact that we've got patience, but not unlimited patience."

Democrats said Bush's appearance was evidence that the war had shaken voters and the administration needed to salvage its reputation on national security. Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., called the news conference an election-season "performance" to "convince Americans he has a plan for Iraq. But the president can't sell what he doesn't have."

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., accused Bush of changing his tune. "One day, our senior military leaders indicate more troops may be needed, the next day the president discounts that option. One day, it's stay the course, the next day it's change the course."

Bush rejected Democratic calls for a timetable for troop withdrawals. Currently there are 144,000 U.S. forces in Iraq.

"We cannot allow our dissatisfaction to turn into disillusionment about our purpose in this war," the president said.

He said a fixed timetable for withdrawal "means defeat. You can't leave until the job is done." Bush said he would send more troops if Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Baghdad, said more were needed to win. A day earlier, Casey said he might need an increase in U.S. forces in Baghdad to stop the rising bloodshed.

"We're winning and we will win, unless we leave before the job is done," Bush said. He said Rumsfeld — whose resignation has been urged by some Democrats and Republicans — had done everything asked of him. "He is a smart, tough, capable administrator," the president said.

DOJ_NMG_0086481

Bush said he looked forward to a report after the election from a blue-ribbon commission exploring U.S. options in Iraq. Bush said he would consider any option but cautioned, "The road to victory will not be easy. We should not expect a simple solution."

On other subjects, Bush said:

_He has not given up on trying to win immigration, Social Security and tax reform legislation. He said there was a better chance of getting them through a Republican Congress rather than a Democratic Congress — although it hasn't worked out that way yet.

_North Korea was trying to test the will of five countries that are aligned in negotiations to pressure Pyongyang to abandon its nuclear weapons. Earlier, North Korea warned South Korea it would "pay a high price" if it joins the U.S.-led drive to punish North Korea for its nuclear test. "The leader of North Korea likes to threaten," Bush said.

Iraq Reality Check (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 26, 2006

IF THERE WAS GOOD NEWS from President Bush's news conference Wednesday, it's that the president is not adopting a bunker mentality and is addressing the deteriorating conditions in Iraq. The bad news is that the more he talks, the more apparent it becomes that there is no easy way to reverse them.

That is a painful admission for an administration two weeks before a midterm election, so any sense of despair was wrapped in more purposeful language. Washington is issuing benchmarks — don't call them timetables — to Baghdad. The administration routinely changes course in pursuit of its goals. Progress is being made. And so on.

The president at one point said Americans will "support the war as long as they see a path to victory." It is a curious formulation. If Bush believes the war in Iraq is central to the war on terror, why is support for it dependent on how winnable it is? Perhaps the formulation is unavoidable during election season. It would be unrealistic to expect Bush to say that because the U.S. has no choice but to "win," he is doubling the number of American troops in Iraq.

So the next round of Washington's ongoing battle of semantics may entail defining "victory" downward. If the war was initially supposed to bequeath the Middle East a proverbial shining city on a hill — an Arab middle-class democracy that would transform the region — the goal now seems to be to leave Iraq intact, if bloodied. Or to prevent the country from becoming a broken state that is a haven to terrorists. Victory, in the end, may simply be a matter of avoiding a worst-case scenario.

To be fair to Bush, U.S. woes are partly a function of the degree to which the administration has ceded sovereignty to the Iraqi people. There is an awkward tension now between Iraqi self-determination and U.S. responsibility for what transpires in the country. If Iraq's majority Shiite leaders want to use their democratically acquired power to settle scores with a long-dominant minority and engage in ethnic cleansing, what is the proper response of the United States? Reassert control of the country, or walk away?

Such blunt questions may be premature. But they underlie the tension between Washington and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, who held his own news conference Wednesday to criticize U.S. forces for conducting a raid in Sadr City, apparently without Iraqi government approval.

Bush is walking a tightrope, trying to browbeat Maliki, the head of a sovereign state, into cracking down on one of his political allies, the radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr. Sadr controls 30 seats in parliament and two ministries. He despises the West. Without appearing to dictate to his Iraqi counterpart, Bush has to make Maliki realize that he can't allow his supporters to run death squads that prey on Sunnis.

That won't be easy. Nothing in Iraq is, and it gets more difficult with each passing day. Here's hoping that it won't get much worse in the next two weeks, and that Bush will be more candid about his plans on Nov. 8.

Bush's Gamble: Turning The Spotlight On The Iraq War As Republicans Try To Dim It (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0086482

WASHINGTON, Oct. 25 — With a shift in tone and the suggestion of flexibility on tactics in Iraq, President Bush gambled Wednesday that he could rescue Republican candidates who are having a hard time defending the war and an even harder time running away from it.

With less than two weeks until Election Day, Mr. Bush's decision to address the war and its problems so prominently carries the risk that he will strengthen the Democrats' case that the midterm election is primarily a referendum on his own handling of the war.

Republican candidates around the country have been trying for months to de-emphasize the war as an issue, and to distance themselves from Mr. Bush more generally. In an interview with The Concord Monitor in New Hampshire on Tuesday, the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist, said his party's challenge "is to get Americans to focus on pocketbook issues, and not on the Iraq and terror issue."

If his party's candidates want to change the subject, Mr. Bush surely did not help them on Wednesday. While the deteriorating situation in Iraq and the tumult over the war has already thrust the issue to the center of the political stage, Mr. Bush spent more than an hour discussing Iraq with reporters at the White House, acknowledging the overriding importance of the issue and stating flatly that he should ultimately be held accountable.

What came across was a president more candid than in the past about the military and political problems in Iraq and more willing to admit misjudgments about America's enemies and allies there. He said that in many cases Iraqi troops were not up to the job of defending their own country and that he was not satisfied with progress toward a resolution of the political and sectarian conflicts raging across the country.

But Mr. Bush, like other wartime presidents before him, remained grimly determined to press on in the face of mounting casualties and growing domestic discontent.

"The fact that the fighting is tough does not mean our efforts in Iraq are not worth it," the president said. "To the contrary; the consequences in Iraq will have a decisive impact on the security of our country, because defeating the terrorists in Iraq is essential to turning back the cause of extremism in the Middle East."

Some beleaguered Republican candidates welcomed the president's new realism and the flexibility he sought to project in how he would try to achieve victory.

"We are on the verge of chaos, and the current approach is clearly not working," said Jill Hazelbaker, spokeswoman for Thomas H. Kean Jr., the Republican candidate for the United States Senate in New Jersey. "We've seen an enormous amount of violence in Iraq, and Kean thinks it's a responsibility of the U.S. to determine: are there other strategies we can pursue? So, in that sense, yes, we welcome tactical changes."

But other Republicans were skeptical. Tony Fabrizio, a pollster working for several Republican candidates, said the president did his party more harm than good by highlighting a troublesome issue and seeming to change course so close to Election Day.

"It makes it look like they have a confused policy," he said. "Now the question will be, every day, what are the parameters of flexibility?"

Senior Democrats in Congress said the president presented little more than an old policy in new garb.

Senator Carl Levin, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, said Mr. Bush gave little ground on Wednesday and was unlikely to reap any political benefit.

"I don't see any reason to believe the president is any more realistic," Mr. Levin said. "What he said was an effort to get himself past the election by telling the American people that he's changing course while telling the Iraqis he's not changing course."

It is too early to say whether this is a major turning point in the president's thinking about the conduct of the war. But he said he was willing to consider altering his policy when he received the recommendations of a bipartisan panel led by James A. Baker III, the Republican former secretary of state, and Lee H. Hamilton, a former Democratic representative from Indiana, later this year.

The moment is reminiscent of early 1968, when President Lyndon B. Johnson convened a panel of wise men to advise him on the Vietnam War, which by then was killing hundreds of Americans a month with little military progress to show for it. Mr.

DOJ_NMG_0086483

Johnson insisted that American credibility was at stake and believed that a leader in wartime had to show resolve in the face of an implacable enemy and loud domestic criticism.

That spring, he capitulated, announcing plans to begin to de-escalate the war and declaring that he would not seek re-election. It took seven more years for Presidents Nixon and Ford to extricate the United States fully from Vietnam.

Mr. Bush may be facing a similar moment of truth, when the steadiness applauded by the American public after Sept. 11, 2001, begins to look like stubbornness and a refusal to recognize reality, according to Bruce W. Jentleson, professor of public policy at Duke University.

"This rush to make all these changes on the eve of the election isn't going to help that much," said Mr. Jentleson, who has advised Democratic candidates but is not affiliated with any campaign this fall. "The question is, what does he do after he gets this electoral outcome? Is he willing to change course and find a solution that avoids total disaster in Iraq?"

George C. Edwards III, a presidential scholar at Texas A&M University, said the president's appearance on Wednesday was both an act of political desperation and a possible turning point in the war. He cautioned, however, that little in Mr. Bush's record indicated he was capable of a radical change of direction.

"Many factors have come together to force him to re-evaluate," Professor Edwards said. "But we also have a long history of him being obdurate, while we don't have a long history of his being a particularly insightful decision maker about these things. We still should have some skepticism."

Face The Nation: Demure Madonna And Anxious President (NYT)

By Alessandra Stanley

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

Both are famous people famously under fire for a ruckus overseas. Both are famous for never bending to public opprobrium and for pushing their agendas with single-minded assurance.

The president and the pop star went on television yesterday looking more like victims of circumstances beyond their control than visionaries.

Madonna went on "The Oprah Winfrey Show" to assure a skeptical public that she didn't snatch an African baby on a fashionably philanthropic whim. President Bush held a news conference to assure a skeptical public that he is inflexible in his willingness to be flexible in managing the Iraq war.

"Our goals are unchanging," Mr. Bush said. "We are flexible in our methods to achieving those goals."

Both showed viewers an unfamiliar side of themselves. The president, whose political identity is founded on an image of unwavering cowboy resolve, looked uncertain and chastened behind the lectern, at one moment staring downward and gnawing his lip in a rare tableau of weary anxiety.

The singer known for saucy aplomb was as prim and cautious as a politician, even if her clipped duty-free British diction undercut some of the poignancy of her appeal.

"I'm disappointed because it discourages other people from doing the same thing," Madonna told Ms. Winfrey via satellite from London. "I feel the media is doing a great disservice to all the orphans of Africa, period, not just the orphans of Malawi."

She said she learned that she was at the center of a global scandal only when she returned home. "I don't read newspapers or watch television, but all of my friends have let me know what everybody's talking about and what's going on in the news," Madonna said. "So it really didn't hit me until I got back to England. It's pretty shocking."

Madonna's fracas began earlier this month, when she started adoption procedures for a 13-month-old boy, David, from an orphanage in Malawi, in southeast Africa, and reporters learned that the child's father is still alive but said he was too poor to feed and rear his child. After the news broke, tabloid newspapers quoted the father, Yohane Banda, as saying he felt duped by the superstar. Madonna came off as a Lady Bountiful-come-lately, trying to compete with Bono in the world of philanthropy in Africa and with Angelina Jolie in the arena of celebrity mothers without borders.

Her explanation to Ms. Winfrey was plausible: she said she was told by officials in Malawi that the baby had been in the orphanage since he was 2 weeks old, and survived TB and malaria without any visits or show of concern from family members.

"From my perspective," she said, wearing a blue print outfit, "there was no one looking after David's welfare."

DOJ_NMG_0086484

She had a point. Her description of a stampeding herd of tabloid hyenas hounding and confusing the boy's father, an unsophisticated African subsistence farmer — leading to front-page headlines like "She Stole My Baby" in The New York Post — certainly rang true.

But it was interesting to see the entertainer who made her name by courting and provoking the press now blaming reporters for her publicity woes.

The president, on the other hand, has often taken reporters to task for focusing on bad news in Iraq. But yesterday he avoided placing blame on the news media while skirting a direct admission that his overall strategy in Iraq needs a course correction. "This is a tough war in Iraq," Mr. Bush told White House reporters. "I mean, it's a hard fight, no question about it. All you've got to do is turn on your TV. But I believe that the military strategy we have is going to work."

He added: "We've made changes throughout the war, we'll continue to make changes throughout the war. But the important thing is whether or not we have the right strategy and the tactics necessary to achieve that goal. And I believe we do."

Mr. Bush, who prides himself on independence from his father's foreign policy, yesterday promised Americans that he would henceforth be guided on Iraq by his father's consigliere, James A. Baker III. "My administration will carefully consider any proposal that will help us achieve victory," the president said. The man who campaigned on a "humble" foreign policy tried to convey a new humility about his statesmanship. Madonna, who built a career on hubris, humbly thanked Ms. Winfrey for giving her a chance to tell her side of the story. The woman famous for never respecting boundaries wanted to work her way back into the confines of respectability.

Bush's Proposal Of 'Benchmarks' For Iraq Sounds Familiar (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

The text of President Bush's news conference yesterday ran to nearly 10,000 words, but what may have been more significant were the things he did not say.

The president talked repeatedly about "benchmarks" for progress in Iraq, using that word 13 times. But he did not discuss the consequences of the Iraqi government missing those targets. Such a question, he said, was "hypothetical."

That response left unclear how the benchmarks would be different from previous times when the United States has set out intentions, only to back down. For example, the original war plan envisioned the U.S. troop presence in Iraq being cut to 30,000 by the fall of 2003. Last year, some top U.S. commanders thought they would be able to significantly cut the U.S. troop level in Iraq this year -- a hope now officially abandoned. More recently, the U.S. military all but withdrew from Baghdad, only to have to have to reenter the capital as security evaporated from its streets and Iraqi forces proved unable to restore calm by themselves.

President Bush also spoke several times yesterday about his flexibility, apparently as a way of countering critics calling for a major change in his approach to Iraq. But he made it clear that he was talking about tactical adjustments, rather than the kind of sweeping strategic revision being mulled by the Iraq Study Group led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee H. Hamilton, and also being urged by a host of members of Congress and political pundits.

More briefly, he touched upon establishing Iraqi security forces. But he did not use his old favorite phrase about U.S. troops "standing down as they stand up." He mentioned the goal of training about 325,000 Iraqi soldiers and police officers, but he did not address the paradox that as that goal is neared, violence has intensified and the insurgency appears as robust as ever. Nor did he note that after U.S. forces stood down in Baghdad, they had to stand back up again. Instead, without offering much explanation, he said that "we are refining our training strategy for the Iraqi security forces."

At the same time, the president's tone has changed markedly. Gone was the talk of past Bush administration news conferences about "steady progress" in Iraq and all the good news that the media was said to be ignoring there. Instead he began yesterday's session with a straightforward and even grim account of the events of the past month in Iraq. He noted the deaths of 93 U.S. soldiers over the past 25 days. "I know many Americans are not satisfied with the situation in Iraq," he said. "I'm not satisfied either." So, he said, the American effort in Iraq is "constantly adjusting our tactics."

Yet under his sober mien and a newfound insistence on adaptability, he appeared to be quietly digging in his heels. "Our goals are unchanging," he emphasized in his opening remarks. "We are flexible in our methods to achieving those goals."

DOJ_NMG_0086485

His bottom line was that "we'll work as fast as we can get the job done." That open-ended commitment to an unchanging goal doesn't seem different from the answer being given by Bush administration officials three years and 2,802 U.S. military deaths ago -- that the U.S. effort in Iraq would last "as long as it takes."

Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), the ranking minority member on the Armed Services Committee and a member of the intelligence committee, said Bush "has dropped the rhetoric, but the policies are the same."

Kurt Campbell, a Clinton-era Pentagon official and co-author of a new book on defense politics, interpreted the president's comments as an effort to patch up differences within the Republican Party over Iraq and to aid candidates facing close elections in two weeks. "It was meant to appeal to both the 'stay the course' crowd and the 'we need a responsible change' crowd," he said. But Campbell said he expected a major strategic revision on Iraq soon after that vote, predicting that "the political dynamics are going to change radically after the election."

Vin Weber, a lobbyist and former Republican member of Congress with ties to the White House, said he thought the president more broadly was trying to appeal to the American public as it loses faith in his Iraq policy. "Basically, the bottom has fallen out," he said. "The public is on the verge of throwing up its hands over Iraq." He agreed with Campbell that the domestic politics of the Iraq situation are going to alter in a few weeks, perhaps in unpredictable ways that will be shaped by the outcome of the midterm elections.

But former New York governor Mario M. Cuomo (D) said he thought that the president actually was laying the groundwork for disengaging from Iraq. "I think the war is virtually over," he said. By emphasizing benchmarks, Cuomo said, "what he is saying is, 'We are going to leave it to the Iraqis.' "

Under a barrage of sharp questions from reporters, pointing again and again to contradictions and problems in his stance on Iraq, President Bush clung to his most basic line of defense -- his own faith and confidence in his approach. He used the word "believe" 21 times in the course of the hour-long news conference.

"I believe that the military strategy we have is going to work, that's what I believe," he said to one reporter.

Conceding Missteps, Bush Urges Patience On Iraq (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 25 — Facing public dismay over the war in Iraq, President Bush on Wednesday somberly acknowledged the broad scope of American setbacks and missteps there. But he urged Americans to look beyond the violence on their TV screens and avoid disillusionment over a war he said was being won.

Mr. Bush's comments, in a news conference at the White House, were a stark indication of concern within the West Wing over eroding support for the war. The violence in Iraq has reached near-record peaks just as voters are considering their final choices for Congress in midterm elections less than two weeks from now, a contest that Mr. Bush has cast in part as a national referendum on the conflict.

While most Republican candidates have sought to turn voters' attention away from the war, Mr. Bush chose to address it head-on, adopting a subdued tone, a new emphasis on tactical flexibility, and directly acknowledging the public's reservations. [News analysis, Page A10.]

"I know many Americans are not satisfied with the situation in Iraq; I'm not satisfied, either," Mr. Bush said. "That is why we're taking new steps to help secure Baghdad, and constantly adjusting our tactics across the country to meet the changing threat."

Mr. Bush expressed general support for Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq, even as Mr. Maliki used his own news conference to distance himself from the United States. Speaking in Baghdad, Mr. Maliki said he had not endorsed an American notion of a time line for stabilizing Iraq, and he criticized a raid carried out by American forces. [Page A11.]

With Mr. Bush and Mr. Maliki clearly focused on their domestic political audiences, the political tumult in both countries carries the potential to drive them further apart.

Mr. Bush's comments were the latest iteration in a recent rhetorical evolution that has seen him move from vowing to "stay the course" in Iraq to promising flexibility. But Mr. Bush also said, "We cannot allow our dissatisfaction to turn into disillusionment about our purpose in this war." He said eight separate times, in various formulations, that he was committed to getting the job done.

DOJ_NMG_0086486

When asked whether the United States was winning in Iraq, Mr. Bush said, "Absolutely, we're winning" — a declaration that prompted a volley of statements from Democratic leaders, who accused Mr. Bush of being "in denial" about Iraqi violence.

Mr. Bush indicated no major changes in his overall strategy in Iraq, saying he continued to support Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and the generals overseeing the war. But he also spoke in terms of a conflict that would be long, hard and bloody. Asked whether the United States would seek permanent military bases in Iraq, Mr. Bush said that would be up to the Iraqi government, adding, "Frankly, it's not in much of a position to be thinking about what the world is going to look like 5 or 10 years from now."

It was the second time this month that Mr. Bush had held a news conference at which he took pains to explain his war plan, which has come under increasing criticism even from fellow Republicans. Many of them fear that the administration's failure to squelch the violence in Iraq is seriously harming the party's prospects for retaining control of Congress. Mr. Bush on Wednesday emphasized that he was well aware of the graphic images Americans were seeing nightly, as well as the many unfulfilled promises and predictions made by his administration over the course of the conflict.

"We overestimated the capability of the civil service in Iraq to continue to provide essential services to the Iraqi people," Mr. Bush said. "We did not expect the Iraqi Army, including the Republican Guard, to melt away in the way that it did in the face of advancing coalition forces."

Mr. Bush said that as of last spring, he had expected that he would be able to reduce the American troop commitment by early next year. There are currently more than 140,000 troops in Iraq. He portrayed the decision against reducing troops by early next year as an example of his willingness to alter his approach.

Before taking questions from reporters, Mr. Bush offered an opening statement that amounted to a kind of scorecard for Iraq, in which he acknowledged disappointments as well as successes. Among successes, he listed the capture of Saddam Hussein, free elections, and economic progress for farms and small businesses. Among the developments he called "not encouraging," he listed "the bombing of the U.N. headquarters in Baghdad, the fact that we did not find stockpiles of weapons of mass destruction, and the continued loss of some of America's finest sons and daughters."

Mr. Bush alluded to a theory embraced by White House aides that the public would support a conflict in which it could see a clear path to victory. "It's my responsibility to provide the American people with a candid assessment on the way forward. There is tough fighting ahead," Mr. Bush said, adding, "The fact that the fighting is tough does not mean our efforts in Iraq are not worth it."

Campaigning in Cincinnati on Wednesday, Vice President Dick Cheney echoed the president's remarks. "We'll be flexible," he said. "We'll do all we can to adapt to conditions on the ground. We'll make every change that is necessary to do the job, to finish the job, and to bring the troops home with the honor they've earned."

Aides to Mr. Bush have acknowledged that the rising violence in Iraq was depressing support for the war. And the bad news was being amplified in Democratic campaign ads declaring the war a failure. In all, Democrats have had 220 ads mentioning Iraq, running them 46,402 times at a cost of at least $41.6 million since January, according to an analysis by the Campaign Media Analysis Group. Republicans have run 48 ads on the Iraq campaign 11,677 times, costing at least $8.5 million.

Asked about debate among Republicans over whether the president was helping by calling attention to Iraq, the White House spokesman, Tony Snow, said that Mr. Bush was obliged to do so. "Everybody's talking about it, everybody's writing about it, all of his critics are on television talking about it," he said. "It's important for the president's voice to be heard in his own words."

While Mr. Bush has said repeatedly that the two parties' approaches to Iraq should be a major issue in November, he acknowledged Wednesday that ultimately one person should be held responsible for progress in the war. "The ultimate accountability," Mr. Bush said, "rests with me."

Bush Is Reassuring On Iraq But Says He's 'Not Satisfied' (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0086487

President Bush declared yesterday that the United States is winning the war in Iraq despite the deadliest month for U.S. troops in a year, but he added that he is not satisfied with the situation and vowed to press Iraqi leaders to do more to stabilize their country on their own.

Trying to walk a careful line between optimism and pessimism less than two weeks before midterm elections, Bush lamented the "unspeakable violence" raging in Iraq while trying to reassure American voters that he is adapting his approach to address it. He vowed to "carefully consider any proposal that will help us achieve victory" as long as it does not involve withdrawing troops prematurely.

"Absolutely, we're winning," Bush said when pressed at an East Room news conference. At the same time, he said, "I know many Americans are not satisfied with the situation in Iraq. I'm not satisfied either. And that is why we're taking new steps to help secure Baghdad and constantly adjusting our tactics across the country to meet the changing threat." He said that he is pushing Iraqi leaders "to take bold measures to save their country" and emphasized that his patience "is not unlimited."

Bush's appearance, made hours after a news conference by Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, exposed rising tensions between Washington and Baghdad as the fighting worsens. Maliki upbraided U.S. officials a day after they announced benchmarks for the Iraqi government to meet over the next 12 to 18 months, dismissing the plan as "the result of elections taking place right now that do not involve us."

The dueling messages come as U.S. casualties mount in Iraq and the Bush administration faces the prospect of Democrats taking over one or both houses of Congress in the Nov. 7 elections on the back of public disillusionment with the war. At least 93 U.S. troops have been killed in October, and commanders in Iraq have conceded that their latest effort to stem the violence in Baghdad has not succeeded.

Democrats quickly seized on Bush's comments and called them an act of political desperation. "This is a struggle on the part of the administration to look as though they're really trying to change course without saying they're changing course," Sen. Carl M. Levin (Mich.), the ranking Democrat on the Armed Services Committee, said in a conference call with reporters. The congressional elections, he added, "will be a referendum on Iraq policy to a significant degree in many of our states and districts."

Rep. Ike Skelton (Mo.), Levin's counterpart in the House, said Bush needs to define his benchmarks for progress. He said he proposed goals to Bush a year ago. "I recommended that for every three Iraqi brigades that were fully capable, that we'd redeploy one American brigade." In response, Skelton said, the president wrote back that his recommendation "was too rigid."

Bush made the unusual move of calling a second news conference in as many weeks to address the public concern, and then opened the event with a 16-minute speech, knowing television networks would carry it live. He said that he had hoped this spring to bring many U.S. troops home this year but that events made doing so impossible. Although he maintained that there has been "very important progress," he acknowledged that Iraq is "in the midst of an incredibly violent period."

The president tried to balance a variety of competing ideas. He insisted on keeping U.S. troops in Iraq "until the job is done" but also talked about changing course to meet an adapting enemy. He promoted benchmarks for Iraqi leaders to meet in terms of taking over security of their country while distinguishing that from Democratic-proposed timetables for withdrawal of U.S. troops. He said he is pushing Maliki to do more but expressed confidence in the Iraqi leader as "the right man to achieve the goal."

Most important, he tried to reassure the public that he knows what to do to win because, as he said, "if the people think we don't have a plan for victory, they're not going to support the effort." At the same time, he tried to identify with public frustration over the direction of the war by expressing his own "dissatisfaction."

Asked by a reporter whether the United States is winning the war, Bush offered a discussion of the nation's role in the broader struggle against Islamic extremists.

The reporter pressed for a direct answer. "Are we winning?"

"Absolutely, we're winning," Bush said. "Al-Qaeda is on the run. As a matter of fact, the mastermind, or the people who they think is the mastermind of the September the 11th attacks, is in our custody." He then circled back and seemed to make clear that he meant the United States is winning in Iraq specifically. "We're winning, and we will win unless we leave before the job is done. And the crucial battle right now is Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0086488

Asked afterward whether Bush meant that the United States is winning in Iraq specifically or in the fight against terrorism, White House press secretary Tony Snow said: "In Iraq."

Bush repeatedly said this summer that the United States was winning in Iraq. "You're winning this war," he told troops at Fort Bragg, N.C., on July 4. Three days later, at a fundraiser in Chicago, he said: "Americans are wondering whether or not we can win. And to those Americans, I say: Not only can we win, we are winning."

But in nearly four months since then, he has avoided repeating that assertion as violence has escalated to new heights, saying instead that the United States is winning the battle against terrorism or that he is confident that the nation will eventually win in Iraq. Asked at an Oct. 16 briefing whether the United States is winning in Iraq, Snow said: "I don't know. How do you define winning? . . . Let me put it this way: The president's made it obvious we're going to win."

Bush, who has adamantly resisted calls for timetables in Iraq, said that the benchmarks his team announced in Baghdad on Tuesday are not the same thing. "That is substantially different . . . from people saying, 'We want a time certain to get out of Iraq,' " he said. "As a matter of fact, the benchmarks will make it more likely we win. Withdrawing on an artificial timetable means we lose."

Bush declined to rule out seeking permanent bases in Iraq, an especially sensitive point among Iraqis and Arabs who accuse the United States of waging the war to establish a military foothold in the region. "Any decisions about permanency in Iraq will be made by the Iraqi government," he said.

Although Bush agreed that the war has not gone as he had hoped and that he was "not satisfied," he defended his decision not to fire Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld or any other member of his national security team.

"I've asked him to do some difficult tasks as the secretary of defense -- one, wage war in two different theaters of this war on terror, Afghanistan and Iraq, and at the same time, asked him to transform our military posture around the world and our military readiness here at home," Bush said. "I'm satisfied of how he's done all his jobs. He is a smart, tough, capable administrator."

As for whether anyone else should be held responsible for the missteps in Iraq, Bush said, "The ultimate accountability . . . rests with me. It's what the 2004 campaign was about. If people want to -- if people are unhappy about it, look right to the president."

He acknowledged that voters may do so in 12 days, agreeing that the congressional elections are shaping up as a referendum on his national security and economic policies. But he said Democrats were declaring victory prematurely.

"We've got some people dancing in the end zone here in Washington, D.C.," he said. "They've got them measuring their drapes. They're going over to the Capitol and saying, 'My new office looks beautiful, I think I'm going to have this size drape there, or this color.' But the American people are going to decide, and they're going to decide this race based upon who best to protect the American people and who best to keep the taxes low."

Staff writer Walter Pincus and research director Lucy Shackelford contributed to this report.

Bush Insists He'll Stand By His Iraq Goals (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 26, 2006

The president acknowledges setbacks in battle.

President Bush, seeking to shore up sagging preelection support for the Iraq war, acknowledged three years of setbacks Wednesday and expressed dissatisfaction over a frustrating and deadly month. But he insisted that he would stand by his goal of helping foster a government that can "sustain itself, govern itself and defend itself."

With the U.S. congressional election on Nov. 7 appearing increasingly to be a referendum on the war he started in March 2003, the president sought to clarify his Iraq policy at a time when violence has been escalating, U.S. casualties increasing, and political breakthroughs in Baghdad proving elusive.

"The events of the past month have been a serious concern to me, and a serious concern to the American people," Bush said at a White House news conference 13 days before the midterm U.S. balloting. "We've got patience, but not unlimited patience."

DOJ_NMG_0086489

Bush, who in recent days has altered his disciplined "stay-the-course" message, endorsed a schedule of benchmarks for political progress and greater Iraqi control, while condemning those who called for timetables for troop withdrawals.

Meanwhile, in Baghdad, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki said he would not accept any timelines imposed by the Americans. He also criticized a new U.S. military effort to disrupt Shiite Muslim militant groups in the Baghdad slum of Sadr City, a stronghold of one of his allies, anti-American cleric Muqtada Sadr.

Speaking at a news conference before Bush spoke in Washington, Maliki declared that "the Americans have the right to review their policies, but we do not believe in a timetable, and no one will impose one on us."

Bush is under pressure to begin pulling troops out of Iraq in the face of unrelenting sectarian violence between Sunni Arab and Shiite Muslims and continuing attacks on U.S. forces. Americans, he said, "have no intention of taking sides in a sectarian struggle or standing in the crossfire between rival factions."

At the same time, he defended U.S. attempts to calm Baghdad, where one-third of the more than 90 U.S. deaths this month took place.

October has been the deadliest month for American troops this year.

Despite his unusually sober assessment, Bush also said that U.S. goals for a stable, democratic and prosperous Iraq were "unchanging," and he declared, "Absolutely, we're winning."

A deadline for withdrawing troops, Bush said, "means defeat."

Calling for patience, he declared in the White House East Room: "We cannot allow our dissatisfaction to turn into disillusionment about our purpose in this war. We must not look at every success of the enemy as a mistake on our part, cause for an investigation, or a reason to call for our troops to come home."

For one hour — one-fourth of it taken up by his opening statement — Bush spelled out what he sees as the stakes in Iraq and the stakes in the election, in which Democrats are widely believed to have their best chance for gaining a majority since Republicans took control of the House in 1994.

He sought to convince a doubting public that he is pursuing a necessary course, and is ready to adjust tactics to meet new challenges. But he also emphasized that he would not give up his overarching goal after more than three years of war, the deaths of nearly 3,000 U.S. troops and many thousands of Iraqis.

Even as he avoided saying that he would "stay the course," he presented a plan that did not yield to demands that he set a specific timetable for withdrawal, or even that he set the United States on a specific course to a reduced presence in Iraq.

"I know we're not going to succeed, however, if we set artificial timetables for withdrawal, or we get out of there, or we say to the enemy: 'Just keep fighting. We'll leave soon,' " he said.

"I know many Americans are not satisfied with the situation in Iraq," he said. "I'm not satisfied, either."

With Democrats hammering Republican incumbents for their support of the war in congressional districts throughout much of the country, Bush sought to throw a cloak of presidential protection over his allies.

"The ultimate accountability," he said, rests not with the generals or Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld — whom Bush again endorsed, calling him "a smart, tough, capable administrator."

Rather, the president said, accountability "rests right here."

"If people are unhappy about it, look right to the president," he said.

Bush's austere assessment of the war came as polls have found that Americans are growing gloomier about the outlook in Iraq.

A USA Today/Gallup Poll released Wednesday found that Americans are as pessimistic about the war as they were in April 2004, during an insurgent uprising in Fallouja that saw the bodies of civilian U.S. workers dragged through the streets.

Fifty-eight percent said the war was "a mistake," more than six in 10 Americans said things were going badly in Iraq, and a majority said the situation was "out of control."

For the first time, as many Americans said the insurgents were winning the war as said the United States and its allies were winning.

DOJ_NMG_0086490

Assessing problems and obstacles in Iraq, Bush cited multiple mistakes and setbacks, some of which he has acknowledged before: the failure to find unconventional weapons, the 2003 insurgent bombing of the U.N. headquarters in Baghdad, the inability of some Iraqi units to perform as expected and the continued loss of American lives.

Bush repeated several times that the United States was shifting its tactics in Iraq, noting the dispatch of additional troops to Baghdad to counter sectarian violence.

"My point to the American people is … that we're constantly adjusting our tactics to achieve victory," Bush said.

He said that regardless of the devastation and obstacles, Americans must recognize that their security "depends on ensuring that Iraq is an ally in the war on terror and does not become a terrorist haven, like Afghanistan under the Taliban."

The extent to which Iraq has come to dominate the public face of the Bush presidency and the election was demonstrated by the amount of time devoted to it at the news conference. All but two of the questions dealt to one degree or another with Iraq, much as the war took up nearly all of his news conference two weeks ago.

On the issue of North Korea, the president said that despite signs of reluctance by China and South Korea to enforce U.N. Security Council sanctions against the government in Pyongyang in response to its announcement of a nuclear test, "the coalition remains firm."

At the heart of the latest shift in U.S. policy in Iraq is the plan to use "benchmarks" to demonstrate progress toward the president's broader goal of a stable and democratic Iraq. The plan was announced Tuesday in a news conference by Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr. and the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad. No Iraqi officials were present.

Maliki's objections Wednesday complicated the notion.

Bush, at his news conference, insisted that there was a difference between benchmarks and a timetable for withdrawal.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said later that the new turn reflected a policy "in complete disarray."

"One day the administration calls for a timetable," and the Iraqi prime minister objects, Reid said in a written statement. "One day, our senior military leaders indicate more troops may be needed, the next day the president discounts that option. One day it's stay the course, the next day it's change the course."

"It is increasingly clear that the president does not know what to do to stop the escalating violence in Iraq and that his so-called 'National Strategy for Victory in Iraq' has failed," Reid said.

*

james.gerstenzang@latimes.com

Times staff writers Paul Richter and Julian E. Barnes contributed to this report.

Bush Says Iraq Strategy Is Flexible (WSJ)

By Henry J. Pulizzi

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush acknowledged Wednesday the heavy bloodshed in Iraq this month, but sought to give assurances that the U.S. is continually refining its tactics to help the country's nascent government bolster its security forces and stop the violence.

"The events of the past month have been a serious concern to me and a serious concern to the American people," Mr. Bush said at a press conference in the East Room of the White House. (Text of the speech1)

The president departed starkly from a practice of not talking about specific deaths in Iraq, acknowledging that this month has been the bloodiest in Iraq since October 2005. "There has been heavy fighting, many enemy fighters have been killed or captured and we've suffered casualties of our own," he said. "This month we've lost 93 American service members in Iraq. During roughly the same period, more than 300 Iraqi security personnel have given their lives in battle. Iraqi civilians have suffered unspeakable violence at the hands of the terrorists, insurgents, illegal militias, armed groups and criminals."

With the debate over the strategy in Iraq heating up two weeks ahead of the mid-term Congressional elections, Wednesday's press conference was billed as a chance for Mr. Bush to give the public an update on the war. In recent days, the administration has emphasized that its methods on the ground are changing to address continuing violence. Under pressure to shift strategy, the White House has stopped using the term "stay the course" to describe its stance.

DOJ_NMG_0086491

"Our goals are unchanging," Mr. Bush said Wednesday. "We are flexible in our methods to achieving those goals." He said U.S. commanders are refining their training strategy for Iraqi security forces and increasing the number of coalition advisers in the Iraqi ministries of Defense and Interior, among other things.

Mr. Bush said that as those killing Americans and Iraqi troops change tactics, so, too, will the U.S. military. "Americans have no intention of taking sides in a sectarian struggle or standing in the crossfire between rival factions," Mr. Bush said.

The top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., said Tuesday that he may ask for more forces to be sent to Baghdad, potentially by boosting the overall presence in Iraq rather than shifting troops into the capital from other parts of the country. Gen. Casey, who briefed reporters in Baghdad with U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, said Iraqi forces won't be ready to assume security responsibility until late next year or early 2008.

Mr. Bush said the U.S. is pushing Iraq's leaders to make bold moves. "We're making it clear that America's patience is not unlimited," he said. "Yet we also understand the difficult challenges Iraq's leader's face and we will not put more pressure on the Iraqi government than it can bear. The way to succeed in Iraq is to help Iraq's government grow in strength and assume more control over its country as quickly as possible."

Mr. Bush mentioned neither troop additions nor withdrawals at Wednesday's briefing, but conceded he'd boost troop levels if Gen. Casey made such a request. "That's the way I've been running this war," Mr. Bush said.

The White House said this week that it's working with the Iraqi government on a long-running to-do list of security, economic and political benchmarks, but denied it has imposed any ultimatums on Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. Mr. Bush said there's a "significant difference" between deadlines and benchmarks.

Mr. Bush's focus on Iraq comes as polls suggest the war will damage Republican candidates in the Nov. 7 election, possibly swinging control of Congress away from the GOP. The Democrats need to win 15 seats in the House and six in the Senate to win control.

With Iraq on voters' minds, Mr. Bush has sought to assure the public that the administration has adopted a flexible strategy, but remains resolute. Democrats complain Bush's changes on Iraq have been mainly rhetorical and are demanding a more dramatic shift. Sen. John Kerry, (D., Mass.), has called for a one-year deadline for Iraq to meet certain goals before U.S. forces are withdrawn.

Polls suggest Mr. Bush is having little luck convincing voters the war effort is on the right track. According to the latest Wall Street Journal-NBC News poll, one-third of voters approve of Mr. Bush's handling of the war, while 63% disapprove. An even worse omen for the GOP is that 39% say Democrats could better deal with Iraq, compared with 31% who side with Republicans.

Mr. Bush noted that an independent panel led by former Secretary of State James Baker and former Congressman Lee Hamilton will make recommendations on Iraq in an upcoming report. "I welcome these efforts," the president said. "My administration will carefully consider any proposal that will help us achieve victory."

Mr. Bush, who said he owed "an explanation to the American people" of his war strategy, expressed confidence about Iraq and the broader war on terror, but admitted that the fight will be long and difficult. "I'm confident we'll succeed in Iraq. And the reason I'm confident we'll succeed in Iraq is because the Iraqis want to succeed in Iraq," Mr. Bush said.

Asked specifically if the U.S. is winning, Mr. Bush said: "Absolutely we're winning." Nonetheless, Mr. Bush said he's "not satisfied" with the situation in Iraq.

He gave Mr. Maliki an endorsement, saying he's the right man for a difficult job. "He's got a hard job," Mr. Bush said. "Look, he's got to deal with sectarian violence, he's got to deal with criminals, he's got to deal with al Qaeda; all of whom are lethal. These are people that will kill. And he wants to achieve the same objective I want to achieve. And he's making tough decisions."

Donald Rumsfeld won a similar endorsement. Mr. Bush praised his defense secretary for waging two wars and transforming the military. "And I'm satisfied of how he's done all his jobs. He is a smart, tough, capable administrator," Mr. Bush said, rejecting calls for Mr. Rumsfeld to be fired.

For all his fervor about the importance of the military mission in Iraq, Mr. Bush sidestepped when asked whether the elections should be viewed as a referendum on the war. "The election is a referendum on which party has a plan to make the economy grow, and which party has a plan to make the American people safe," he said. "If we succeed in Iraq, the country (the United States) is more secure. If we don't succeed in Iraq, the country is less secure."

DOJ_NMG_0086492

On the looming elections, Mr. Bush again said he thinks Republicans will retain control of Congress, and indicated he hasn't given up on three of his top domestic priorities -- Social Security reform, an overhaul of the tax code and comprehensive immigration reform.

"I firmly believe it is more likely to achieve those three objectives with a Republican-controlled Congress and a Republican-controlled Senate," Mr. Bush said. "And I believe I will be working with a Republican-controlled Congress and a Republican-controlled Senate."

He accused some in Washington of dancing in the end zone before they've scored a touchdown.

The economy, which Mr. Bush says along with national security will be a top issue in the election, is another area where the White House has gotten little traction. Despite buoyant stock markets, falling gasoline prices and steady economic growth, most Americans aren't happy with Mr. Bush's stewardship of the economy, according to polls. "The two issues I see in the campaign can be boiled down to who best to protect this country and who best to keep taxes low," Mr. Bush said.

Bush Tells US 'I'm Not Happy With Iraq' (FT)

By Caroline Daniel In Washington

Financial Times, October 26, 2006

President George W. Bush on Wednesday sought to align himself with US public opinion when he said he was "not satisfied either" with rising violence in Iraq. But he warned that US troops were needed to "prevent a full-scale civil war".

Although Mr Bush said he had no intention of "standing in the crossfire between rival factions in Iraq", officials and analysts in the Middle East – and some Republican loyalists – are saying US troops already face that direct challenge.

In a sombre press conference on Wednesday, the president spent nearly 15 minutes in an opening statement trying to knit together often-contradictory arguments.

He moved from expressing "serious concern" about Iraq, while emphasising progress was being made, to being resolute about the ultimate outcome in the country but flexible about military tactics to attain that end.

He stressed his role as commander-in-chief – "the ultimate accountability rests with me" – even as he deferred to the commanders on the ground to dictate troop levels.

The Bush administration has consistently rejected timetables for withdrawal, accusing proponents of being defeatists. However, on Tuesday US officials said the Iraqis should take full control of security within 18 months. The Iraqis had "committed themselves to a timetable for making some of those decisions", said -Zalmay Khalizad, US ambassador to Iraq.

Although Mr Bush for the first time embraced the idea of "benchmarks", saying they would make victory more likely, he continued to assert he did not support a fixed timetable. There were "significant differences between benchmarks for a government to achieve and a timetable for withdrawal", he said.

The press conference marked Mr Bush's latest attempt to control the debate about Iraq, amid mounting criticism even from Republican loyalists. The administration has struggled to redefine both the terms and goals of its engagement in Iraq. On Monday, officials said they would stop using the phrase "stay the course".

The concept of victory in Iraq has been scaled back, to an Iraq that can "defend, govern and sustain itself". Mr Bush acknowledged the US's most immediate goal was "to prevent a full-scale civil war from happening in the first place".

That is some way from the definitions set out in November in the Victory in Iraq document. It said the short-term view of victory was an "Iraq that is making steady progress in fighting terrorists, meeting political milestones, building democratic institutions, and standing up security forces". The medium-term goal was to have a "fully constitutional government in place".

Mr Bush said he would consider any "proposal that will help us achieve victory" but declined to say whether he would directly engage with Iran and Syria to resolve tensions.

"Iran and Syria understand full well that the world expects them to help Iraq," he said.

Mr Bush offered his -support to two embattled figures. He said Nouri al-Maliki, prime minister, was "the right man to achieve the goal in Iraq", and called Donald Rumsfeld, secretary of defence, "a smart, tough, capable administrator".

Bush Backs Setting 'Benchmarks' In Iraq (WT)

By Joseph Curl

DOJ_NMG_0086493

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

President Bush yesterday firmly supported setting "benchmarks" in Iraq to move toward stability and security in the war-torn country, and warned Iraqi leaders that the United States has "got patience, but not unlimited patience."

Making frank admissions of overestimations, underperformance and flat-out errors, the president used a hastily called press conference to try to assuage angry voters, who by most election strategists' accounts plan to vote Republicans out of control of Congress in just two weeks.

"We overestimated the capability of the civil service in Iraq to continue to provide essential services to the Iraqi people. We did not expect the Iraqi army, including the Republican Guard, to melt away in the way that it did in the face of advancing coalition forces," Mr. Bush said.

Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, said Tuesday that Iraqi forces should be able to take control of security in 12 to 18 months with "some level" of U.S. support. Top U.S. military commanders laid out a series of "benchmarks" for the fledgling Iraqi government.

But Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki took umbrage yesterday at the new talk of "benchmarks" for his government to reach.

"I affirm that this government represents the will of the people and no one has the right to impose a timetable on it," Mr. al-Maliki said at a Baghdad press conference, where he dismissed U.S. talk of timelines as driven by the upcoming midterm elections.

"I am positive that this is not the official policy of the American government but rather a result of the ongoing election campaign. And that does not concern us much," he said.

Asked yesterday for the first time since the "benchmarks" were laid out, the president -- who has steadfastly opposed setting a "timetable" for the withdrawal of U.S. troops -- endorsed the 12- to 18-month concept, with a few caveats such as objecting to a reporter's question that used "benchmarks" and "timetable" interchangeably.

"There is a significant difference between benchmarks for a government to achieve and a timetable for withdrawal. ... We're working with the Iraqi government to have certain benchmarks to meet as a way to determine whether or not they're making the hard decisions necessary to achieve peace. I believe that's what you're referring to. And we're working with the Iraqi government to come up with benchmarks."

But the president, who was combative and defensive at times in the hourlong press conference in the White House East Room, said "Americans have no intention of taking sides in a sectarian struggle or standing in the crossfire between rival factions."

In supporting the idea of "benchmarks" for the new Iraqi government to reach as it takes over security operations, Mr. Bush warned Mr. al-Maliki that the United States must see action on a number of fronts.

"We'll respect the fact that the Iraq government is sovereign, and they must respect the fact that we've got patience, but not unlimited patience," he said.

Democrats on Capitol Hill immediately took aim at Mr. Bush. "President Bush's Iraq policy has been a dismal failure. The president has abandoned his 'stay the course' slogan; it is long past time he abandon his 'stay the course' policy," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said.

Added Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid: "The Bush administration's Iraq policy, like Iraq itself, is in complete disarray. One day, the administration calls for a timetable, the next day, Iraqi Prime Minister Maliki objects to it. ... One day, it's stay the course, the next day, it's change the course."

But Mr. Bush said benchmarks will help show the American people that Iraqis are moving forward.

"It's a condition, a base estimate. And that's important for the American people to know. This notion about, you know, fixed timetable of withdrawal, in my judgment, is a -- means defeat. You can't leave until the job is done. Our mission is to get the job done as quickly as possible," he said.

In his 15-minute opening statement, Mr. Bush said the time has come for the Iraqi government to begin moving quickly toward responsibility for its own fate.

DOJ_NMG_0086494

"We're pressing Iraq's leaders to take bold measures to save their country. We're making it clear that America's patience is not unlimited. Yet we also understand the difficult challenges Iraq's leaders face, and we will not put more pressure on the Iraqi government than it can bear," he said.

Bush's Conviction On Iraq Exceeds His Plan's Credibility (USAT)

USA Today, October 26, 2006

There is little doubting the sincerity of President Bush's commitment to the mission in Iraq. On Wednesday, amid sinking public approval less than two weeks before congressional elections, Bush set out yet another course for a victory he optimistically predicted was achievable.

The president's conviction is obvious. But whether it's supported by facts — and whether there's a real path to victory as he defines it — is dubious.

There continues to be a yawning gap between his rhetoric and reality:

•"Absolutely we're winning," Bush said. But only 19% of Americans in last weekend's USA TODAY/Gallup Poll agree. And just 14% of Iraqis surveyed recently say the U.S. impact on their country is mostly positive.

•The United States has "no intention of … standing in the crossfire between rival factions," the president said. But that's exactly where American troops in Baghdad now find themselves.

•Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki is "the right man," he said, though shortly before Bush's news conference the Iraqi leader denounced a U.S. raid on one of the many militias drawing Iraq deeper into civil war.

For all of Bush's claims to consistency in his policy, the definition of "victory" has also shifted. At first, he thought invasion alone would light the fires of democracy. Then it became a longer-term fight to suppress terrorists and spread freedom in the Arab Middle East. Now, political rhetoric aside, it is simply to get out while leaving a functioning, U.S.-allied government behind.

The battle to secure Baghdad, billed as make-or-break, has been going poorly. October has been the deadliest month for U.S. forces in two years. Bush has abandoned a well-worn "stay the course" mantra for talk of U.S. tactical flexibility.

The United States will now ask the Iraqi government to meet benchmarks, such as getting a grip on the militias. What will happen if they're not achieved is left unsaid, but few would argue that they'll be easily attained. It's possible that the administration is laying a path for a U.S. withdrawal that would blame the Iraqis for failing to meet the benchmarks. Bush pointedly said Wednesday that U.S. patience is "not unlimited."

Policymakers grasping at straws have focused on an Iraq report, due after the November elections, from a bipartisan group co-chaired by Bush family friend and former secretary of State James Baker. There's an irrational sense that it can deliver some kind of magic salvation. Bush played to those hopes by saying he's ready to listen.

No doubt the group will back sensible ideas that should have been tried years ago — such as engaging neighbors Iran and Syria (Bush refuses to talk directly to either) and some kind of muscular international involvement. Those, however, are long shots.

Whatever happens next, the Iraq mess won't be resolved by new slogans, speeches, news conferences or Power Point presentations. After 3½ years, nearly the same length as U.S. involvement in World War II, the only meaningful progress in Iraq is clear and convincing success on the ground.

Wars Are Hard, But We'll Win (USAT)

By Tony Snow

USA Today, October 26, 2006

It seems odd to be defending the commanding general and the U.S. ambassador to Iraq from charges that they don't understand the situation in the country in which they work, especially when the complaining sages live thousands of miles from the battlefront.

The business of war requires constant vigilance, enterprise and determination. Our goal and a key to our security at home: to help Iraq sustain, govern and defend itself, and emerge as a key ally in the war on terror.

We have pursued that aim according to the challenges on the ground and have adjusted to shifting realities — from the early resistance by Saddam Hussein's armies, to early battles in such places as Fallujah totoday's Iraq, where 14 of 18 provinces live in relative peace. Gen. George Casey noted earlier this week that 90% of the violence in Iraq now occurs within a 30-mile radius of Baghdad. Coalition forces have been assisting Iraqi army and police in taking on the perpetrators of that violence, and they have adopted the tactic of trying to clear, hold and rebuild neighborhoods wracked by terror.

DOJ_NMG_0086495

The combined Iraqi-U.S. forces will win that fight, as they have every other engagement of the war. But peace in Iraq will require more than superiority of arms. Iraqis need some other basics for good and free lives — a political system that will guarantee rights and representation for all, and an economy that can provide jobs.

President Bush and Prime Minister al-Maliki have been working on those objectives since the prime minister's accession to power. In the past month, al-Maliki has pursued national reconciliation. The Iraqi parliament is streamlining the legislative process, refining the constitution, considering key issues of federalism, and passing a “hydrocarbons law” that would provide for the general distribution of oil and natural gas revenues.

The Iraqi economy continues to grow, electricity production continues to rise, businesses are springing to life, and the nation's standard of living has grown.

But the reality is that wars are hard. Our enemies are determined and utterly contemptuous of innocent human life. And just because the enemy appears to make some progress, that doesn't mean we should leave — quite the opposite.

When they adjust tactics, we must adjust ours, taking the fight to them. That is what we have done and what we will continue to do. And we will win.

War Now Works Against GOP (WP)

By Peter Slevin And Michael Powell

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

DOYLESTOWN, Pa. -- A visitor to Rep. Michael G. Fitzpatrick's campaign Web site will immediately hear a 20-second audio clip of a contentious television interview about Iraq with his Democratic challenger, Patrick Murphy. The clip ends: "Tough times demand honest answers, not Pat Murphy."

Fitzpatrick, a freshman Republican, hoped to throttle Murphy on an issue critical to the 2004 victories of President Bush and the Republican Congress. But Murphy, a 33-year-old West Point graduate and a veteran of the war, has battled his way into contention by directly attacking Fitzpatrick and Bush on their party's handling of Iraq itself.

"When we went there in 2003, we had a mission to get rid of Saddam Hussein and weapons of mass destruction. We're still in Iraq 3 1/2 years later and the mission isn't clear," Murphy told an audience here last week. "Together we can change it. We can change what we're doing in Iraq."

Just three months ago, Republican strategists believed that doubts about Iraq could be contained -- or even turned into an electoral advantage -- if the battle was framed as a vital front in the war against terrorism. Voters would be invited to choose: Stand firm or capitulate.

But the issue is not playing out that way. In both parties, a consensus now exists -- buttressed by polls -- that disaffection with a war grown costly and difficult to manage is the gravest threat to continued Republican rule.

Iraq is not only a potent issue in its own right, but is also a resonant metaphor for doubts about the competence and accountability of the Republican Party.

In the most competitive races, Iraq echoes in varying ways, but almost always for Republicans it is a problem to be navigated and for Democrats a stick to be brandished. In Ohio, it helped put incumbent Sen. Mike DeWine (R) on the defensive. In House races in Pennsylvania and Illinois, it gave three Democratic war veterans and novice politicians an opening.

"We are telling our candidates not to be afraid to talk about it," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. "Who would have thought two years ago the Democrats would be affirmatively putting ads on television about Iraq and Republicans would be avoiding it?"

Showing how the tables have turned, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) told interviewers in New Hampshire this week that Republican candidates should steer away from the war.

"The challenge," Frist said, "is to get Americans to focus on pocketbook issues, and not on the Iraq and terror issue."

DOJ_NMG_0086496

In Connecticut and Ohio, in Pennsylvania and New Mexico, critical swaths of voters tell pollsters they are using the war as a lens to assess -- and in many cases punish -- the party in control of the White House and both houses of Congress. This appears particularly true of independents, who are considered most likely to determine whether the House and Senate change hands.

A Pew Research Center poll this month found that 50 percent of independents listed Iraq among their top two national concerns, compared with 36 percent of Republicans and 68 percent of Democrats. Overall, 58 percent of respondents said the war is not going well and only 38 percent said the battle for Iraq is helping the war on terrorism.

Voter dissatisfaction with Iraq has taken years to build, not least because few Americans fear a draft, unlike the Vietnam era. But the war is intruding on the public conversation.

"Iraq is at the top of the agenda, and it's largely among those people who say they are largely voting Democratic," said Andrew Kohut, the Pew Research Center's president. "It's not the only issue, but it's the one that has most given people a sense of unease about the state of the nation."

Independents, said Kohut, "are going to decide this election."

Recent Washington Post-ABC News polls, including one released this week, found that growing skepticism about the administration's performance since Sept. 11, 2001, has put the two parties at parity on combating terrorism -- formerly a winning Republican issue by a large margin.

Less than two weeks before Election Day, the figures represent a severe challenge to the GOP strategy of painting Democrats as weak on national security. They also help explain the boldness of Democratic candidates in challenging Republicans on the war.

"I'm getting less and less happy with way Bush is handling things," fifth-grade teacher Denise Hall said in Doylestown on a crystalline autumn morning. Iraq is "definitely a factor" as she considers backing Democrats this year after twice voting for Bush. "Things seem to keep getting worse."

Hall said she is troubled not only by the war deaths -- 93 Americans killed this month, the highest total in a year -- but also by what the Bush administration's approach to Iraq tells her about its ability to manage other crises. "My real concern is North Korea," she said. "That scares the heck out of me. Would we go in somewhere else and think we could straighten it out?"

In Connecticut's 5th District, Republican Rep. Nancy L. Johnson volunteers information on pretty much everything except the war. Her campaign Web site lists her positions on 12 "key issues," none of which includes Iraq. She talks of her "social moderation" and discusses her stances on the environment, health care and jobs.

Johnson believes the war echoes especially strongly in her race because of the battle for the Senate seat held by Joseph I. Lieberman, who was defeated by antiwar candidate Ned Lamont in the Democratic primary and is running as an independent. She contends that most candidates, Republican or Democrat, are not far apart in believing the Iraq war is off track.

Nearby, Democrat Diane Farrell is hammering repeatedly at Rep. Christopher Shays (R) for his support of the war. Recent polls show her with a narrow lead over Shays, who has visited Iraq 13 times and contends that victory remains possible.

"Christopher is such an ardent defender of the war and he holds himself out as an expert," Farrell said. "It makes it easier to hit on this issue."

It became clear in late summer that Iraq was working against Republican candidates, despite the well-telegraphed strategy of Bush and presidential adviser Karl Rove to link criticism of the war to weakness on national security. On Aug. 28, Vice President Cheney warned darkly of "self-defeating pessimism," but he found that some critics were solid Republicans.

GOP candidates are often keeping a distance from Bush, trying to define themselves as "independent." Ed Patru, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, said this is not a year to enforce party discipline.

"We encourage and expect every candidate to do the things they need to do to connect with the electorate," Patru said. One common GOP approach is to acknowledge that the war is not going well and to challenge voters to distinguish among the candidates' solutions.

"At least it becomes a wash," Patru said.

The NRCC has spent $8.5 million defending three Republican members of Congress near Philadelphia and $3.3 million on three competitive Connecticut races. Other candidates for the House and Senate are buying their own time on the issue.

DOJ_NMG_0086497

In South Florida, a newspaper advertisement for Democrat Ron Klein challenges Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr. (R) for not doing more on Iraq.

"Clay Shaw refuses to hold the Bush administration accountable when it comes to the war on Iraq," the ad proclaims. "Whether it's a plan to win the peace, bring our troops home or account for a dime of the $300 billion we have spent, Shaw will not stand up to Bush or ask tough questions on Iraq. That's not leadership."

In Tennessee, Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. (D) is running an ad in his Senate campaign against Republican Bob Corker that declares: "I support our troops and I voted for the war, but we shouldn't stay the course, as Mr. Corker wants."

Connecticut is home to what may be the most intently watched war debate, in the race between Lamont and Lieberman. Lamont, a millionaire from Greenwich, won the primary and national attention by pounding almost exclusively on Lieberman's backing of the Bush administration on the war. Yet recent polls show Lamont's candidacy tumbling.

Farrell, stopping in western Connecticut, said in a voice grown raspy by campaigning that the war alone will not carry a candidacy. She believes her quest to defeat Shays has been fueled by a "double shot" of public desire to send a message on Iraq and dethrone the Republican leadership in Congress.

"They are both Democrats -- voters don't have to reject Joe to get a Democratic Senate," she said. "The difference in my district is that it's about the war and control of the majority of the House of Representatives. You need both -- the war and control of Congress -- to work together for voters."

Mark Matthews, a political independent and school custodian, has a newspaper under his arm as he walks into a Fast Stop Food Shop in Norwalk. For him, at least, frustration with the war is enough to steer him to Lamont and Farrell.

"All these young kids, our boys, are dying over there," Matthews said. "For what? It's ridiculous. We've lost focus and I've had enough."

Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) has donated $1 million to the campaigns of 18 military veterans. That includes $220,000 to Tammy Duckworth, seeking the suburban Chicago seat vacated by Rep. Henry J. Hyde (R), and $130,000 each to Murphy and to Joseph A. Sestak Jr., who is challenging Rep. Curt Weldon (R) in suburban Philadelphia.

After campaigning for Michigan Gov. Jennifer Granholm and Sen. Debbie Stabenow in Flint last week, Kerry maintained that the Iraq war has become a national proxy for other worries about GOP leadership.

"I believe there is a continuum of incompetence and outright misleading that characterizes this administration on everything," Kerry said. "There is no disagreement that it's been mishandled and mismanaged and that we need a change. It runs very, very deep."

To emphasize the war, Kerry will attend with Murphy a Thursday rally among veterans. Murphy has made his military training and the war the centerpiece of his campaign against Fitzpatrick, 43, the GOP incumbent, who spent 10 years on the Bucks County Commission.

"It's forward-thinking: You anticipate what your enemy might do next. It's leadership," Murphy, a lawyer who served with the Army's 82nd Airborne Division, said in an unsubtle slap at Republicans. Yet in an MSNBC television interview as he launched his candidacy, he repeatedly refused to say how he would have voted on the 2002 Iraq war resolution -- an awkward moment he calls "a lesson learned."

Murphy now calls for all U.S. troops to be withdrawn within 12 months, with a strike force of 30,000 left in remote Iraq or Kuwait. He said 8,000 to 10,000 troops should be redeployed to Afghanistan. Fitzpatrick opposes setting a timetable.

At a recent debate, each candidate was permitted to ask the other a final question.

Fitzpatrick asked: "Pat, how many school districts are there in Bucks County and what are their names?"

Murphy asked: "Congressman Fitzpatrick, when are you going to give the American public the straight story on where you are with the war in Iraq?"

Powell reported from Connecticut. Staff writers Kari Lydersen in Chicago and Robin Shulman in New York and political researcher Zachary A. Goldfarb in Washington contributed to this report.

Frist To GOP Hopefuls: Don't Stress Iraq (AP-Y)

AP, October 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0086498

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist says if Republican candidates want to succeed on Election Day, they should turn their focus away from the Iraq war.

"The challenge is to get Americans to focus on pocketbook issues, and not on the Iraq and terror issue," Frist said in an interview with the Concord Monitor on Tuesday.

Frist suggested that Republicans remind voters of subjects like tax cuts and lower gas prices, the result, he said, of the energy bill passed by Congress last year.

"These are all things the media has not covered," Frist said. "People don't say, 'This Congress passed tax cuts.' But that means something to every American."

Frist, a possible candidate for the presidency in 2008, visited New Hampshire on Tuesday to help local Republicans running for office and to accompany his wife, Karyn, on a promotional tour for her new book.

Frist, who is retiring from the Senate when his term expires at the end of this year, said he has been campaigning for candidates in his native Tennessee, Missouri, Iowa and New Hampshire. He said those trips have shown him a "worried, discontented and confused" electorate, with voters fed up with the politics of Washington.

Frist suggested two issues that Republicans should use to highlight their differences with Democrats: homeland security and taxes. He criticized Democratic opposition to renewing the Patriot Act as "not equipping the government and military with the best tools to defeat terrorists." He also said proposals by Democrats to repeal tax cuts for the wealthiest Americans would be a drain on all taxpayers.

Defiant Iraqi PM Disavows Timetable (AP-Y)

By Christopher Bodeen, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 26, 2006

An angry Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki disavowed a joint U.S.-Iraqi raid in the capital's Sadr City slum Wednesday, and criticized the top U.S. military and diplomatic representatives in Iraq for saying his government needs to set a timetable to curb violence in the country.

Al-Maliki spoke at a news conference a day after U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said Iraqi leaders had agreed to set deadlines by year's end for achieving specific political and security goals laid out by the United States, including reining in militia groups.

"I affirm that this government represents the will of the people and no one has the right to impose a timetable on it," the prime minister said.

The prime minister dismissed U.S. talk of timelines as driven by the coming midterm elections in the United States. "I am positive that this is not the official policy of the American government but rather a result of the ongoing election campaign. And that does not concern us much," he said.

Al-Maliki complained that he was not consulted beforehand about the Sadr City offensive. The raid was conducted by Iraqi special forces backed by U.S. advisers and was aimed at capturing a top militia commander wanted for running a Shiite death squad.

"We will ask for clarification to what has happened," al-Maliki said. "We will review this issue with the Multinational Forces so that it will not be repeated."

Mouwafak al-Rubaie, his national security adviser, later told The Associated Press that al-Maliki's anger grew out of a misunderstanding that had since been cleared up with Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq.

While the U.S. military said the raid had been cleared in advance with al-Maliki's government, President Bush acknowledged that al-Maliki himself may not have been consulted.

"We need coordinate with him. That makes sense to me. And there's a lot of operations taking place which means sometimes communications are not as good as they should be. And we'll continue to work very closely with the government to make sure communications are solid," Bush said at his own news conference.

Military action in Sadr City is especially sensitive for the prime minister.

DOJ_NMG_0086499

Until Wednesday, U.S. and Iraqi forces had largely avoided the densely populated slum, a grid of rutted streets and tumble-down housing that is home to 2.5 million Shiites and under the control of anti-American cleric Muqtada's al-Sadr's Mahdi Army.

Reining in the Mahdi Army and the other major militia, the Badr Brigades, remains one of the thorniest problems facing al-Maliki. His fragile Shiite-dominated government derives much of its power from the al-Sadr's faction and from the Supreme Council for the Revolution in Iraq, or SCIRI, which operates the Badr Brigades.

The U.S. military said Mahdi Army militiamen fought back in the Sadr City raid and that the Americans called in an air strike and cordoned the sprawling east Baghdad region.

Late Wednesday the military said it had killed 10 suspected militia fighters and wounded two in the battle. It did not identify the wanted militia leader or say whether he was still at large. Earlier, police and hospital officials said four people were killed and at least 18 wounded.

The military also said it had raided a mosque in Sadr City looking for a missing U.S. soldier and his kidnappers. The soldier was not found but three suspects were detained.

Residents living near Sadr City said gunfire and air strikes began about 11 p.m. Tuesday and continued for hours. The neighborhood was sealed to outsiders before dawn.

Groups of young men in black fatigues favored by the Mahdi Army were seen driving toward the area to join the fight. Explosions and automatic weapons fire were heard above the noise of U.S. helicopters circling overhead firing flares.

Crowds of Shiite men, some carrying pistols and others hoisting giant posters of al-Sadr, swarmed onto the district's streets Wednesday morning, chanting, "America has insulted us."

Throughout the day and into the night, U.S. F-16 jet fighters growled across the Baghdad sky, and at one point the report of tank cannon fire echoed across the city five times in quick succession.

Streets were empty and shops closed, although the district still had electricity from the national power grid.

Well after nightfall, residents said all roads into the slum remained blocked by U.S. and Iraqi forces. U.S. soldiers were searching all cars.

A frustrated motorist waiting at one checkpoint jumped out of his car and called for al-Maliki to resign.

"Where is al-Maliki? It would be more honorable for him to resign. Why is he letting the Americans do this to us," the driver could be heard to scream.

Falah Hassan Shanshal, a lawmaker from al-Sadr's political bloc, said women and children had been killed, although videotape pictures of the bodies from the neighborhood taken at the local morgue showed only male victims.

"If there was an arrest operation, it should have been carried out by the Iraqi authorities, and not like this where air cover is used as if we were in a war zone," Shanshal said in an interview with the government's al-Iraqiya television station.

Iraqi Premier Denies U.S. Assertion He Agreed To Timelines (WP)

By John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 25 -- Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki lashed out at the United States on Wednesday, saying his popularly elected government would not bend to U.S.-imposed benchmarks and timelines and criticizing a U.S.-Iraqi military operation in a Shiite slum in Baghdad that left at least five people dead and 20 wounded.

Maliki's comments came a day after U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said the prime minister had agreed to timelines for accomplishing several critical goals, including developing plans to deal with militias, amend the constitution and equitably distribute Iraq's oil revenue.

"I affirm that this government represents the will of the people, and no one has the right to impose a timetable on it," Maliki said at a nationally televised news conference Wednesday. "The Americans have the right to review their policies, but we do not believe in a timetable."

With less than two weeks to go before critical midterm elections in the United States, Maliki accused U.S. officials of election-year grandstanding, saying that deadlines were not logical and were "the result of elections taking place right now that do not involve us."

DOJ_NMG_0086500

In a conference call with reporters, two senior Democratic members of the Senate Armed Services Committee focused on Maliki's statements on the Bush administration benchmarks.

Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), ranking member of the panel, said, "I think the page we are on differs and is rewritten day to day to try to get past the elections here."

Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.), a West Point graduate who just returned from Iraq, said Maliki's comment "deliberately repudiates what the president's saying." He called it "disheartening" but said it "might be a function of politics of Iraq as much as a function of politics of the United States. But it does not appear they're even at the level of how to talk about the problem."

Maliki's comments followed a deadly early-morning military raid in Sadr City, a teeming Shiite slum in eastern Baghdad with more than 2 million residents loyal to the charismatic anti-U.S. cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. The aim of the operation was to capture the leader of a Shiite death squad, according to a U.S. military statement. It was unclear whether the target was among the casualties.

Sadr heads a large Shiite political party that is a key member of Maliki's government. He also heads a powerful militia, the Mahdi Army, that has fought several prolonged battles against American troops. U.S. officials, Sunni Arabs and independent observers say that the Mahdi Army is a driving force behind death squads that have slaughtered thousands of Sunnis and that Maliki's government has done little to halt the attacks or disarm the group.

Although a U.S. military statement on the operation did not mention the Mahdi Army or Sadr by name, the implication that the target was a member of the militia was unmistakable.

Iraqi army special forces, supported by U.S. advisers, "conducted a raid authorized by the Government of Iraq . . . to capture a top illegal armed group commander directing widespread death-squad activity throughout eastern Baghdad," the statement said. It also said Iraqi forces came under fire during the raid and "requested support from Coalition aircraft, which used precision gunfire only to eliminate the enemy threat."

At his news conference, Maliki distanced himself from the raid, saying his government would "ask for clarification about what has happened in Sadr City" and "review the issue with the multinational forces so that it will not be repeated."

Sahib al-Amiry, a top aide to Sadr, denied that any of the casualties were members of a death squad, saying they were simple people trying to scratch out a living. Speaking in Najaf, where Sadr has his headquarters, Amiry accused the United States of trying to provoke a bigger clash with Sadr's forces, but he said the cleric had ordered his followers not to rise to the bait.

Sadr "gave an order to calm down and be patient, because the occupation forces want to drag the Mahdi Army into an internal fight, especially in Baghdad," Amiry said. He said Sadr "is calling for calm, but the occupation forces are insisting on escalating the situation."

Meanwhile, the office of Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top U.S. military official in Iraq, issued a statement Wednesday clarifying that he has not asked for more U.S. troops to be sent to Iraq. The statement said reports of Casey's comments at the joint news conference with Khalilzad on Tuesday "inferred" that Casey said more troops might be needed to quell violence in Iraq. "Quite frankly, that is the wrong impression," the statement said.

"There is no intent to bring more U.S. troops into Iraq at this time," the statement said. "The General was merely saying, as he has said consistently since taking command of the Multi-National Force Iraq, that all options are on the table. He will ask for what is needed. He has made no such request to date."

In his remarks Tuesday, Casey said he did not want to go into specifics about how better security and services would be brought to Baghdad, adding: "Now, do we need more troops to do that? Maybe. And as I've said all along, if we do, I will ask for the troops I need, both coalition and Iraqis."

Casey elaborated later, saying that if he needed more troops, he could draw them from Iraqi forces, U.S. forces already in Iraq or U.S. forces outside the theater.

Despite Maliki's tough reaction to suggestions that his government would bow to benchmarks and timelines to rein in militias, the prime minister reiterated at his news conference Wednesday, for the second time in as many days, the government's intention to crack down on illegal armed groups.

"The state is the only one that has the right to carry weapons," he said. "We will deal with anybody who is outside the law. Everyone now realizes that the existence of armed groups and militias harms the stability and unity of the state."

DOJ_NMG_0086501

He also appealed to Iraq's neighbors to stop meddling in his country's affairs, and he blamed foreign fighters and supporters of ousted president Saddam Hussein for fomenting the current violence.

"I would like to state here that the root of the battle we are fighting in Iraq and the root of the bloody cycle that we are undergoing is the presence of terror organizations that have arrived in the country," Maliki said.

Maliki Distances Himself From American Strategies In Iraq (MCT)

By Nancy A. Youssef

McClatchy Newspapers, October 26, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - U.S. officials and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki are increasingly at odds over strategy and goals, a division that American officials in Iraq say is making it harder to pursue their objectives in Iraq.

On Wednesday, Maliki denounced an American bombing mission in the Baghdad neighborhood of Sadr City that the U.S. said had killed a notorious Shiite Muslim death-squad member. He also rejected a call Tuesday by the two top American officials in Iraq for a timetable for his government to tackle the nation's most intractable problems.

"This government is one of popular will and national unity, and it is nobody's right to put timetables before it," Maliki said.

It was at least the third time in recent weeks that Maliki had publicly contradicted American positions, and it underscored that he draws much of his support from the very militia groups that the U.S. is pressing him to dismantle.

The differences with the Bush administration were also evident during President Bush's news conference in Washington on Wednesday.

"I know many Americans are not satisfied with the situation in Iraq," Bush said in an opening statement. "I'm not satisfied, either."

He said the U.S. was pressing Maliki to move more quickly and warned that "America's patience is not unlimited."

But Bush also said the administration wouldn't press too hard. "Look, we'll push him," he said, "but we're not going to push him to the point where he can't achieve the objective."

With less than two weeks before congressional elections, a clamor has been growing among Democrats and some Republicans for a timetable that would require the Iraqi government to resolve certain issues or face a possible withdrawal of U.S. troops. Polls indicate that Republicans could lose control of the House of Representatives and possibly the Senate, largely over dissatisfaction with developments in Iraq.

Bush acknowledged that the war has become a top-tier issue with voters, and noted that 93 American soldiers have been killed so far this month, a rare mention by the president of the war's death toll.

But he said it was Maliki's responsibility to find a solution to the violence and that the United States wouldn't be drawn into supporting one side over the other in a civil war.

"Americans have no intention of taking sides in a sectarian struggle or standing in the crossfire between rival factions," he said. "Our mission is to help the elected government in Iraq defeat common enemies, bring peace and stability to Iraq and to make our nation more secure."

Identifying the common enemies has proved to be one of the most difficult tasks for American officials, however.

U.S. military officers and civilian officials have warned for months that Shiite militias are responsible for most of the civilian deaths in Iraq, and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad in May called them the biggest threat to Iraq's security.

But the militias, notably the Mahdi Army, led by fiery cleric Muqtada al Sadr, are also key to Maliki's support, and the prime minister has objected on several occasions to U.S. efforts to rein them in.

On Wednesday, Maliki said American officials didn't get his approval before they conducted the bombing raid in Sadr City, where his core supporters and many members of Sadr's Mahdi Army live.

"In fact, we will ask for a clarification of what happened, and this is an issue we will review with the multinational forces so it won't happen again," Maliki said.

U.S. military officials here disputed Maliki's claim, saying they never enter Sadr City without coordinating with his government.

DOJ_NMG_0086502

According to a U.S. statement, Iraqi soldiers were conducting the raid in Sadr City when they came under fire and requested support from American aircraft. The aircraft "used precision gunfire only to eliminate the enemy threat," the statement said.

Still, U.S. officials said they weren't surprised by Maliki's comments.

"We were expecting it," said one top American military aide who asked to go nameless because of the sensitivity of the subject.

Last week, Maliki ordered the United States to release a Mahdi Army member it had seized in a raid for death-squad involvement. In August, Maliki publicly berated the Americans for a raid on Sadr City.

The tension between Maliki and U.S. officials also was evident Tuesday during a news conference in Baghdad by Ambassador Khalilzad and Gen. William Casey, the top American military commander in Iraq.

Khalilzad and Casey said they'd won approval from the Iraqi government for a timetable to consider some of Iraq's pressing issues, including disarming the militias, revamping the constitution and setting a date for parliamentary elections.

In elaborating on that agreement, Khalilzad said the commitment came from President Jalal Talabani. He didn't mention Maliki except to say that he took the prime minister at his word when he promised to negotiate with Sadr.

Talabani, an ethnic Kurd, is a strong U.S. ally, but it's unclear whether he has the authority to agree to a timetable on behalf of the government. Iraq's Constitution is vague about the responsibilities of the president and prime minister, although it appears that the prime minister - not the president - must approve agreements with other nations.

For many Iraqis, there's no surprise that American officials and Maliki don't see eye to eye. Before his appointment as prime minister, Maliki had a reputation as a staunch advocate for his fellow Shiites.

In the weeks-long battle earlier this year over who'd be prime minister, Maliki drew key backing from Sadr supporters, who hold more seats than any other group in parliament. He's since appointed Sadr supporters to government ministries such as health and education.

Some experts think that Maliki would be forced from power if he adhered to U.S. insistence that he move against Sadr.

"I'm not sure Maliki can do anything to improve Bush's position," said Judith Yaphe, a Persian Gulf expert at Washington's National Defense University.

The prime minister, she noted, sits atop a central government that was designed to be weak because Shiites and Kurds wanted it that way.

Maliki is in "an extraordinarily weak position," Yaphe said. "He doesn't give the impression of being the person who's in charge."

The latest divisions between Maliki and the U.S. left the Bush administration open to Democratic attack.

Citing the differences over a timetable, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., issued a statement Wednesday that said, "The Bush administration's Iraq policy, like Iraq itself, is in complete disarray."

"It is increasingly clear that the president does not know what to do to stop the escalating violence in Iraq and that his so-called `National Strategy for Victory' in Iraq has failed," the statement said.

"It's disheartening," said Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I., a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee. "This might be a function of the politics of Iraq as much as the politics of the United States, but it does not appear - even at the level of how to talk about this thing - that there's a meeting of the minds."

McClatchy correspondents William Douglas and Margaret Talev contributed to this report from Washington.

Iraq's Leader Jabs At U.S. On Timetables And Militias (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 25 — Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki put himself at odds on Wednesday with the American government that backs him, distancing himself from the American notion of a timetable for stabilizing Iraq and criticizing an American-backed raid on a Shiite militia enclave.

DOJ_NMG_0086503

Speaking in Baghdad just hours before President Bush held a news conference in Washington, Mr. Maliki tailored his remarks to a domestic audience, reassuring the millions of Shiites who form his power base that he would not bend to pressure by the American government over how to conduct internal Iraqi affairs.

His comments stood in stark contrast to the message given Tuesday by the top two United States officials in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr. and Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, who said the timetable for political measures had been accepted by the Iraqi government.

"I want to stress that this is a government of the people's will, and no one has the right to set a timetable for it," Mr. Maliki said at a news conference broadcast on national television.

"This is an elected government, and only the people who elected the government have the right to make time limitations or amendments," he said, stabbing the air with his hand.

The remarks pointed to a widening schism between the Shiite-led Iraqi government and the Americans who support it.

As the violence here increases and midterm elections in the United States approach, Mr. Maliki has come under pressure from the Bush administration to step up efforts to control the violence. But the very forces that elevated him to power and whose support he must retain — religious Shiite parties with their own militias — are complicit in the violence.

That tension was on display in his remarks on Wednesday. While acknowledging the problems presented by militias and death squads — groups of men with guns that American military officials say are some of the primary culprits in the new phase of bloodletting here — Mr. Maliki said pointedly that the main factor driving the violence was insurgents and militant fighters, largely Sunni, who have been killing Shiites for more than three years.

"Saddamists and terrorist groups are responsible for what is going on this country and the reactions," he said, in a reference to retaliatory killing by Shiite militias that began after the February bombing of a shrine sacred to Shiites. "We should contain the reactions."

Mr. Maliki's stance differs sharply from views presented by American officials, who speak of Shiite death squads as an evil equal to that of the Sunni insurgents. But it fits snugly inside the circle of hardening Shiite sentiment that the American military, in keeping full control of security, has not given the Iraqi government full power to intervene when Sunni militias or insurgents carry out sectarian cleansing.

"Most of the officials feel like their hands are tied," said one Shiite politician, who insisted on anonymity. "They can't take critical decisions at critical times."

The politician cited the example of Saab al Bour, a largely Shiite town with Sunni outskirts northwest of Baghdad, from which hundreds of Shiite families have fled in the past month after attacks by Sunni insurgents. Shiites were "crying for help," he said, but the government could not come to their aid because of confusion over which country's troops were responsible for the area.

Americans have held onto control over security partly because they do not believe that the Iraqi forces are up to the job. They also fear selective enforcement by the government in favor of Shiites, who form a large part of Iraq's security forces, particularly the police, whose ranks are infiltrated by militias.

Mr. Maliki is stuck in the middle, forced to navigate between the rising tide of frustration among Shiites who form his base and the American government that wields the power.

Evidence of that increasing discomfort showed in Mr. Maliki's reaction to an American raid on a suspected Shiite death squad leader early Wednesday morning.

The raid took place at dawn in Sadr City, a vast district of cinderblock houses that is the stronghold of the Mahdi Army, a large Shiite militia that fought two battles against the American military under the command of a radical Shiite cleric, Moktada al-Sadr.

Iraqi forces and American advisers entered the far northern tip of the district, the domain of a Shiite guerilla leader known by his Iraqi nickname, Abu Dera, and immediately came under fire. The military called in air support, and aircraft fired high-caliber guns at militiamen on the ground, a military official said.

DOJ_NMG_0086504

The American military reported that 10 militiamen were killed and two were wounded in the fight, which residents said lasted several hours. The Iraqi authorities put the total wounded at 20. Soldiers continued to a nearby mosque, where the military suspected that the kidnappers of a missing American soldier were located, and detained three suspects.

"We will ask for a clarification on that from the multinational forces," Mr. Maliki said. "This is an issue we will review together so that it will not happen again. The Iraqi government should know about and have a role in these military operations."

It was not clear whether Mr. Maliki was posturing publicly to play to his Shiite base, or whether he had genuinely been taken by surprise. The raid was carried out by Iraqi forces and backed by Americans. But in nearly all cases, Americans initiate secret raids.

"The Iraqi government is a prisoner in the Green Zone, it's helpless," said Jaleel al-Nuri, an aide to Mr. Sadr. "They are like puppets moved by the coalition forces."

The American military, for its part, said the Iraqi government had approved the raid, which was directed at "a top illegal armed group commander directing widespread death squad activities." It said 10 suspects were detained but did not say whether the target was among them.

Residents said Abu Dera, whose real name is Ismail al-Zerjawi, was not among those captured, though his son was wounded and his cousin killed. Once loyal to Mr. Sadr, he broke away in 2004 and now runs his own influential crime ring. He is popular among hard-line Shiites, who put his image on cellphones and call him the Zarqawi of the Shiites, a reference to Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the former Qaeda leader who urged Sunnis to kill Shiites.

Mr. Maliki has acted before to assert Shiite influence over American military decision-making. In a similar raid last week, an aide to Mr. Sadr was arrested, and released a day later at the request of Mr. Maliki, who was about to visit Mr. Sadr.

General Casey said Tuesday that he personally allowed the release. Perhaps the most vivid illustration of just how uncomfortable Shiites have become with full American control is a new push to amend the terms of the United Nations agreement that extends the mandate of the multinational forces in Iraq, essentially providing the legal basis for the United States and other countries to have their militaries here.

Mowaffak al-Rubaie, Iraq's national security adviser, said the government would like to speed up the process of handing over Iraqi troops to Iraqi control. Two provinces are controlled by Iraqis, and Iraqis are in full charge of 2 of 10 Iraqi Army divisions.

Mr. Maliki said Wednesday that the government would draw up a new agreement to allow the government to move Iraqi Army units and run security operations in "Sadr City or any other tense area."

"We don't want to give the coalition forces the absolute authority to take the security responsibility all over the country," Mr. Rubaie said. "We think we can do things better and it's the time now."

"We need to be given the opportunity to make mistakes."

The push by the Iraqi authorities for more control over their own security comes as American military officials have scaled back estimates of the readiness of Iraqi troops. General Casey said Tuesday that it would be another 12 to 18 months before Iraqi troops would take control, longer than originally predicted.

Maliki Resists US Pressure To Take Key Decisions (FT)

By Steve Negus, Iraq Correspondent

Financial Times, October 26, 2006

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki on Wednesday dismissed Washington's claim that Iraqi politicians had agreed a timetable to reach key compromises and lashed out at a US-supervised raid on a militia target in the Shia slum of Sadr City.

His statements were a challenge to US officials who say that progress depends on Iraqi politicians swiftly taking decisions on issues that have divided Sunni and Shia and fed sectarian tensions.

The comments suggest that Mr Maliki either believes that Washington has no option but to continue backing his government, or feels that he cannot afford to alienate other members of his Shia-led coalition by authorising operations against Shia militias as the Americans would like.

Mr Maliki spoke at a press conference following a US-Iraqi raid on the massive Shia slum of Sadr City, the support base of the radical Shia Mahdi Army militia, in which residents said at least four people were killed by airstrikes and gunfire.

DOJ_NMG_0086505

According to a US military statement, Iraqi special forces backed by US advisers conducted a raid "authorised by the government of Iraq... to capture a top illegal armed group commander directing widespread death-squad activity".

The prime minister however, who in an interview last week said he would block large-scale US operations in the crowded district, denied that he had been informed of the raid. "We will ask for clarification about what has happened in Sadr City. We will review this issue with the multinational forces so that it will not be repeated," he said.

Mr Maliki also disavowed a statement on Tuesday by US ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad that Iraqi politicians had set a timetable to reach agreement on divisive issues. "I affirm that this government represents the will of the people and no one has the right to impose a timetable on it," Mr Maliki said.

He said that talk of timelines was probably driven by the November 7 US elections, and that "we are not much concerned by it".

Mr Khalilzad had said that Iraqi leaders would take decisions on how to share Iraq's oil revenues, on amending the constitution, on changing the committee charged with purging former members of the ruling Ba'ath party into an "accountability and reconciliation programme", on implementing a plan to address militias and death squads, and on other issues.

Most of these are of particular importance to Sunni leaders, who want to change the constitution to prevent their oil-poor heartland in central Iraq from being denied oil revenue. Mr Maliki has come under US pressure to reach out to the Sunni community.

He reiterated his government's pledge to crack down on militias deemed responsible for sectarian killings. There is no place for militias alongside the state. The existence of militias harms the state and I've given instructions to our armed forces that they be firm with them," he said.

Iraqi Leader Bristles At Idea Of Timetable (USAT)

By David Jackson And Rick Jervis

USA Today, October 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — Bush administration efforts to pressure Iraq's government by establishing a timeline to disarm militias and stand on its own have run into resistance from Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

In a news conference Wednesday, Bush vowed to push Iraqi leaders to accept more responsibility to govern their divided nation. In Iraq, al-Maliki rejected U.S. calls made 24 hours earlier for Iraq to set a timetable to quell sectarian violence.

Al-Maliki dismissed comments by Gen. George Casey, the chief U.S. commander in Iraq, and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad as driven by Bush administration concerns about the elections Nov. 7.

"I affirm that this government represents the will of the people, and no one has the right to impose a timetable on it," al-Maliki said in Baghdad. "I am sure this is not the official policy of the U.S. government, but it is a result of the election campaign."

Al-Maliki also denied prior knowledge of a raid by U.S. and Iraqi forces Wednesday in Sadr City, the stronghold of a Shiite militia led by militant cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. Al-Maliki said he had not been consulted and such an action "will not be repeated."

Al-Maliki's tough talk against U.S. initiatives is a public effort to appeal to the power base in his tenuous coalition government — mainly al-Sadr's movement and the rival Shiite faction, the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or SCIRI, said Chris Toensing, director of the Washington-based Middle East Research and Information Project. "By disavowing any role in the raid, he's talking to the Sadrists, and by dismissing timetables, he's talking to SCIRI and (al-Maliki's own party) Dawa," Toensing said. "It's a pretty narrow tightrope to walk."

In a statement, the U.S. military said Iraqi special forces with coalition advisers conducted two raids in Sadr City. The raids were aimed at capturing a death squad leader and suspects in the kidnapping of a U.S. soldier.

Bush, speaking to reporters at the White House, agreed with al-Maliki that conditions could not be forced upon Iraq's sovereign government. He made clear, however, that U.S. patience with al-Maliki is not infinite. "I speak to him quite frequently, and I remind him we're with him so long as he continues to make tough decisions. That's what we expect," Bush said. "We'll push him, but we're not going to push him to the point where he can't achieve the objective" of a stable Iraq.

The United States wants al-Maliki to reach an agreement with militias to lay down their arms. Al-Maliki has repeatedly pledged to deal with the militias but has resisted issuing firm ultimatums.

DOJ_NMG_0086506

Bush acknowledged Wednesday that U.S. forces are taking heavy casualties in Iraq and that many Americans "are not satisfied with the situation."

"I'm not satisfied either," he said.

He continued to dismiss Democratic calls to set a fixed timetable to begin withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq. He repeated his contention that victory in Iraq is essential to the larger battle against terrorism. "We're winning and we will win, unless we leave before the job is done," he said.

Bush said last spring he had thought he might be able to "reduce our troop presence" early next year but conditions in Iraq now would not permit it. A premature withdrawal, Bush said, risks turning Iraq into a terrorist state, an echo of Afghanistan under the Taliban — only with oil revenue to spend.

Bush cited successes in Iraq such as the capture of Saddam Hussein in December 2003 and successful elections. He also listed failures, including loss of American lives and not finding weapons of mass destruction. "The ultimate accountability," Bush said, "rests with me."

Leading Democrats, who believe voter concern about the war could fuel Republican losses in the congressional elections, said the apparent disconnect between Bush and al-Maliki reflected White House confusion about Iraq.

"The Bush administration's Iraq policy, like Iraq itself, is in complete disarray," Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said in a statement. "One day, the administration calls for a timetable, the next day Iraqi Prime Minister Maliki objects to it."

The most recent USA TODAY/Gallup Poll, taken Friday-Sunday, found voters are more focused on national issues than in any previous congressional election and are pessimistic about the war in Iraq. Nineteen percent of those surveyed said the United States is winning in Iraq, an all-time low.

At his news conference Wednesday, Al-Maliki appealed to neighboring states to cease meddling in Iraq's domestic affairs. The United States has accused Iran and Syria of aiding Sunni and Shiite armed groups. Al-Maliki blamed foreign fighters in groups such as al-Qaeda in Iraq and loyalists of Saddam's Baath Party for driving the violence.

Al-Maliki Hits U.S. Calls For A Timetable (WT/AP)

By Sameer N. Yacoub

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

BAGHDAD -- A defiant Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki yesterday slammed the top U.S. military and diplomatic representatives in Iraq for saying his government needed to set a timetable to curb violence ravaging the country.

"I affirm that this government represents the will of the people, and no one has the right to impose a timetable on it," Mr. al-Maliki said at a press conference.

On Tuesday, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said Mr. al-Maliki had agreed to a timeline.

Mr. al-Maliki also disavowed a joint raid by U.S. and Iraqi forces at the Baghdad stronghold of a Shi'ite militia led by radical anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr in search of a death-squad leader.

Mr. al-Maliki, who relies on political support from the cleric, said the strike against a figure in Sheik al-Sadr's Mahdi's Army militia in Sadr City "will not be repeated."

The prime minister dismissed U.S. talk of timelines as driven by the upcoming midterm elections in the United States.

"I am positive that this is not the official policy of the American government, but rather a result of the ongoing election campaign. And that does not concern us much," he said.

Mr. al-Maliki's comments followed remarks Tuesday by Gen. George Casey, the top American commander in Iraq, and Mr. Khalilzad, who said Iraqi leaders had agreed to a timeline for achieving key political and security goals, including reining in such groups.

Mr. Khalilzad revealed neither specific deadlines for achieving those goals nor penalties for their failure to do so, and Mr. al-Maliki said no deadlines had been put to his government.

"I would like to assert that everyone knows my government is a government that came to power through the will of the people. And it is no one's business to give it timelines," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0086507

Mr. Khalilzad said Mr. al-Maliki had agreed to the timeline concept, which calls for specific deadlines to be set by year's end. Gen Casey said the Iraqi forces could be in a position to take over operations in all the country's provinces within 18 months "with some level of support" from coalition forces.

In Washington, President Bush sought to delineate a middle ground in terms of pressing the Iraqis to accept more of the responsibility for their own fate.

"We are making it clear that America's patience is not unlimited," he said at a press conference yesterday. "We will not put more pressure on the Iraqi government than it can bear."

Tank cannons boomed out over the city five times in rapid succession yesterday afternoon, and U.S. F-16 jet fighters screamed low overhead as the conflict in Sadr City continued into the day.

Four persons were killed and 18 wounded in overnight fighting in the overwhelmingly Shi'ite eastern district, according to police and hospital officials.

The U.S. military said Iraqi army special forces, backed up by U.S. advisers, carried out a raid to capture a "top illegal armed group commander directing widespread death-squad activity throughout eastern Baghdad," the military said.

Mr. al-Maliki, who is commander in chief of Iraq's army, firmly denied that he knew anything about the raid.

"We will ask for clarification about what has happened in Sadr City. We will review this issue with the multinational forces so that it will not be repeated," he said. "The Iraqi government should be aware and part of any military operation. Coordination is needed between Iraqi government and multinational forces."

Sadr City Raid Targets Death Squad Leader (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, October 26, 2006

BAGHDAD — American-led forces battled gunmen in Sadr City today during a rare foray into the capital's vast Shiite Muslim slum. Troops searching for an alleged death squad leader called in airstrikes when they came under attack, killing four people, according to Iraqi authorities.

While the U.S. military said in a statement that the raid had been authorized by the Iraqi government, Prime Minister Nouri Maliki quickly renounced the operation. He told reporters at a news conference that the raid was an example of the continued lack of coordination between Iraqi and American officials.

"We are going to request some explanations from the multinational forces to prevent a similar incident and to ensure coordination with the Iraqi security forces," the Iraqi leader said.

Maliki distanced himself further from the U.S. by refuting American talk of a timetable by which the Iraqi government needs to solve some of the country's most intractable issues, including disarming the militias.

"This government is one of popular will and national unity and it is nobody's right to put timetables before it," Maliki said, suggesting that statements by U.S. officials here had less to do with Iraq and more to do with U.S. electoral politics.

On Tuesday, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad told reporters that the Iraqi government had agreed to a series of "benchmarks" by which to resolve major domestic problems. The remarks came during a rare joint news conference with the top U.S. military commander in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr.

Maliki also went out of his way to praise the anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr for seemingly rejecting violence against other Muslims. Sadr has not renounced killing U.S. troops. American commanders believe that his militia, the Al Mahdi army, is behind most of the attacks against their troops.

October has been the bloodiest month of the year for U.S. forces, with at least 91 American troops killed this month.

While Maliki has been under pressure from the U.S. to rein in Shiite militias, notably the Mahdi army, the prime minister relies on the young cleric for political support. In addition to controlling the largest Shiite militia in Iraq, Sadr controls 30 seats in parliament.

In today's raid on Sadr City, troops set out to capture a "top illegal armed group commander directing widespread death squad activity throughout eastern Baghdad," the U.S. military said in a statement. It was unclear whether they caught the cell leader.

DOJ_NMG_0086508

What Osama Wants (NYT)

By Peter Bergen

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

Washington

THE French saying, often attributed to Talleyrand, that "this is worse than a crime, it's a blunder," could easily describe America's invasion of Iraq. But for the United States to pull entirely out of that country right now, as is being demanded by a growing chorus of critics, would be to snatch an unqualified disaster from the jaws of an enormous blunder.

To understand why, look to history. Vietnam often looms large in the debate over Iraq, but the better analogy is what happened in Afghanistan since the Soviet invasion. During the 1980's, Washington poured billions of dollars into the Afghan resistance. Around the time of Moscow's withdrawal in 1989, however, the United States shut its embassy in Kabul and largely ignored the ensuing civil war and the rise of the Taliban and its Qaeda allies. We can't make the same mistake again in Iraq.

A total withdrawal from Iraq would play into the hands of the jihadist terrorists. As Osama bin Laden's deputy, Ayman al-Zawahri, made clear shortly after 9/11 in his book "Knights Under the Prophet's Banner," Al Qaeda's most important short-term strategic goal is to seize control of a state, or part of a state, somewhere in the Muslim world. "Confronting the enemies of Islam and launching jihad against them require a Muslim authority, established on a Muslim land," he wrote. "Without achieving this goal our actions will mean nothing." Such a jihadist state would be the ideal launching pad for future attacks on the West.

And there is no riper spot than the Sunni-majority areas of central and western Iraq. Abu Musab al-Zarqawi — the most feared insurgent commander in Iraq — was issuing an invitation to Mr. bin Laden when he named his group Al Qaeda in Iraq. When Mr. Zarqawi was killed this year, his successor, Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, also swore allegiance to Al Qaeda's chief.

Another problem with a total American withdrawal is that it would fit all too neatly into Osama bin Laden's master narrative about American foreign policy. His theme is that America is a paper tiger that cannot tolerate body bags coming home; to back it up, he cites President Ronald Reagan's 1984 withdrawal of United States troops from Lebanon and President Bill Clinton's decision nearly a decade later to pull troops from Somalia. A unilateral pullout from Iraq would only confirm this analysis of American weakness among his jihadist allies.

Indeed, in 2005 Mr. Zawahri sent Mr. Zarqawi a letter, which was intercepted by the United States military, exhorting him to start preparing for the impending American withdrawal similar to that of Vietnam 30 years ago. "The aftermath of the collapse of American power in Vietnam — and how they ran and left their agents — is noteworthy," Mr. Zawahri said. "Because of that, we must be ready starting now, before events overtake us, and before we are surprised by the conspiracies of the Americans and the United Nations and their plans to fill the void behind them."

Yes, there is little doubt that the botched American occupation of Iraq was the critical factor that fueled the Iraqi insurgency. But for the United States to wash its hands of the country now would give Al Qaeda's leaders what they want.

This does not mean simply holding course. America should abandon its pretensions that it can make Iraq a functioning democracy and halt the civil war. Instead, we should focus on a minimalist definition of our interests in Iraq, which is to prevent a militant Sunni jihadist mini-state from emerging and allowing Al Qaeda to regroup.

While withdrawing a substantial number of American troops from Iraq would probably tamp down the insurgency and should be done as soon as is possible, a significant force must remain in Iraq for many years to destroy Al Qaeda in Iraq.

That can be accomplished by making the American presence less visible; withdrawing American troops to bases in central and western Iraq; and relying on contingents of Special Forces to hunt militants. To do otherwise would be to ignore the lessons of history, lessons that Al Qaeda's leaders certainly haven't forgotten.

In Syria, Iraq's Fate Silences Rights Activists (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

DAMASCUS, Syria -- Horror at the bloodshed accompanying the U.S. effort to bring democracy to Iraq has accomplished what human rights activists, analysts and others say Syrian President Bashar al-Assad had been unable to do by himself: silence public demands for democratic reforms here.

DOJ_NMG_0086509

The idea of the government as a bulwark of stability and security has long been the watchword of Syrian bureaucrats and village elders. But since Iraq's descent into sectarian and ethnic war -- and after Israel's war with Hezbollah in Lebanon, on the other side of Syria -- even Syrian activists concede that the country's feeble rights movement is moribund.

Advocates of democracy are equated now with supporters of America, even "traitors," said Maan Abdul Salam, 36, a Damascus publisher who has coordinated conferences on women's rights and similar topics.

"Now, talking about democracy and freedom has become very difficult and sensitive," Salam said. "The people are not believing these thoughts anymore. When the U.S. came to Iraq, it came in the name of democracy and freedom. But all we see are bodies, bodies, bodies."

Ordinary people in Syria are hunkering down, and probably rightly so, said Omar Amiralay, a well-known Syrian filmmaker whose documentaries are quietly critical of Assad's one-family rule.

"If democracy brings such chaos in the region, and especially the destruction of society, as it did in Iraq and in Lebanon, it's absolutely normal, and I think it's absolutely a wise position from the people to be afraid to imagine how it would be in Syria," Amiralay said. "I think that people at the end said, 'Well, it is better to keep this government. We know them, and we don't want to go to this civil war, and to live this apocalyptic image of change, with civil war and sectarianism and blood.' "

In 2003, a few people in Damascus were bold enough to raise their glasses in cafes to toast the American tanks then rolling into Baghdad to overthrow Saddam Hussein. They were dreaming of the changes that might happen next here, in the only remaining government led by the Baath Party, a prominent writer in the capital said, speaking on condition of anonymity for fear of being jailed a second time.

"The Americans came to Iraq to make it an example to the other countries to ask for change," the writer said. "But what happened was the opposite. Now everyone is saying we do not want to be like Iraq."

Yet while Assad's government has fulfilled its pledge of stability, it has put off acting on any of its promises on democratic reform. In fact, as the U.S. effort in Iraq goes increasingly awry, Syria has cracked down even harder, activists said.

In May, the government jailed at least 12 people for signing a petition calling for better relations with Lebanon, according to Human Rights Watch. In July, Syrian courts sentenced three bloggers to up to four years in prison for writing too freely. The jail terms led Reporters Without Borders to declare Syria "the Middle East's biggest jail for cyber-dissidents."

Also in July, security and intelligence services imposed a foreign travel ban on scores of Syrian artists, rights workers and others. Activists learned of the ban one by one, when they showed up at the border or the airport with passport and suitcase, only to be refused permission to leave the country. Some democracy groups and forums have been shut down since last year.

Amiralay, 62, was stopped at the Syrian border in September as he headed to Jordan for a workshop on filmmaking. Middle East satellite television networks had recently broadcast his latest work, an understated documentary showing Baath Party rule across the generations in a Syrian village.

Syrian officials clapped the noted filmmaker in handcuffs and brought him back to Damascus. Security officers screened his latest work frame by frame, demanding his explanation of any shot that suggested untoward symbolism, he said. Reports of his detention on Arabic-language television helped win his quick release.

Amiralay's prominence has helped him cope. Another critic, the once-outspoken writer, said he has opted to watch his words more carefully. And Salam, the publisher and conference organizer, voted with his feet, moving to Canada just after his interview in Damascus.

Before he left, Salam spoke darkly of the prospects for the Middle East. Iraq was in ruins, he said. Lebanon was in peril of civil war. In Syria, Assad would either stay in power or destroy the country first if he was forced out.

In Egypt, Yemen and Libya, strongmen were preparing their sons to succeed them, while the United States and other avowed promoters of democracy in the Middle East looked the other way. "I don't see the situation getting better," Salam said. "Young people are trying to leave Syria -- to Canada, to Europe, to any place."

Internationally, as well, the erosion of U.S. stature over Iraq and Lebanon has put Syria in position to try to improve its regional and world standing without giving in to the reform demands of the United States, diplomats and analysts said.

The United States and the European Union have officially isolated Syria since the February 2005 bombing that killed former Lebanese prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri in Beirut. The United States and others suspected Syrian involvement.

DOJ_NMG_0086510

But Spain, Italy and Germany have renewed contacts since the war in Lebanon this summer, calling Syria's help vital to averting further conflict there. Britain, a staunch U.S. ally, continues to observe diplomatic silence with regard to Syria, but even its ambassador, Peter Ford, said in an interview here that the bid to shut out Syria had not accomplished its aims and may no longer be the best move. Former U.S. secretary of state James A. Baker III, co-chairman of a bipartisan panel seeking alternative strategies for Iraq, has suggested he may recommend U.S. talks with both Syria and Iran.

In Damascus, Baath Party legislator Georges Jabbour laughed when asked about the success of the U.S. policy toward Syria. Interviewed by telephone, he pointed to the two-day state visit to Damascus then being undertaken by Spanish Foreign Minister Miguel Ã•ngel Moratinos. A year ago, Spain was still bowing to U.S. pressure to isolate Syria, and the Spanish foreign minister limited a Damascus visit to an unnecessary refueling stop for furtive meetings with Syrian officials, Jabbour said.

Meanwhile, Syria's people remain spectators of their government's maneuvering, free to watch it but not to speak.

They enjoy the small freedoms that their neighbors in dangerous Iraq no longer do -- such as the ability to go out after dark. This month, after breaking the daily Ramadan fast, families chugged in their cars up the steep roads of Mount Cassion to stroll, sip colas and fruit drinks and take in the view of Damascus spread out below.

Seated on a plastic chair on the road with a friend, real estate salesman Mohammed Yousif gestured toward the city. Green lights of mosques glowed among the white lights of a capital fully powered and at peace. Speaking to a foreign journalist, the 42-year-old salesman measured his words carefully, answering questions with the blandness often seen in Iraq before Hussein was toppled.

"We are talking and enjoying ourselves," Yousif said, waving the nozzle of the traditional water pipe he and his friend were using to smoke flavored tobacco. "This is our democracy. This is our freedom."

Money Down The Drain In Iraq (NYT)

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

When the full encyclopedia of Bush administration misfeasance in Iraq is compiled, it will have to include a lengthy section on the contracting fiascos that wasted billions of taxpayer dollars in the name of rebuilding the country. It isn't only money that was lost. Washington's disgraceful failure to deliver on its promises to restore electricity, water and oil distribution, and to rebuild education and health facilities, turned millions of once sympathetic Iraqis against the American presence.

Their discovery that the world's richest, most technologically advanced country could not restore basic services to minimal prewar levels left an impression of American weakness and, worse, of indifference to the well-being of ordinary Iraqis. That further poisoned a situation already soured by White House intelligence breakdowns, military misjudgments and political blunders.

The latest contracting revelations came in a report issued Tuesday by the office of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction. The office reviewed records covering $1.3 billion out of the $18.4 billion that Congress voted for Iraq reconstruction two years ago. Reported overhead costs ran from a low of 11 percent for several contracts awarded to Lucent to a high of 55 percent for, you guessed it, the Halliburton subsidiary, KBR Inc.

On similar projects in the United States, overhead is typically just a few percent. Given the difficult security environment in Iraq, overhead was expected to run closer to 10 percent. But in many of the contracts examined, it ran much, much higher, in some cases consuming over half the allocated funds. And the report may have actually underestimated total overhead because the government agencies that were supposed to be supervising these reconstruction projects sometimes failed to systematically track overhead expenses.

The main explanation for these excessive overhead rates turned out to be not special security costs but simply the costly down time that resulted from sending workers and equipment to Iraq months before there was any actual work for them to do. That is yet another example of the shoddy contract writing, lax oversight and absent supervision that has consistently characterized Washington's approach to Iraq reconstruction from the start.

Bush administration incompetence, not corporate greed, is the chief culprit. Still, these charges are one more example of how the favored American companies lucky enough to be awarded reconstruction contracts made large sums of money while the Iraqis failed to get most of the promised benefits.

DOJ_NMG_0086511

As Americans now look for explanations of how things went so horribly wrong in Iraq, they should not overlook the shameful breakdowns in reconstruction contracting. They need to insist that Congress impose tough new rules on the Pentagon to ensure more competitive bidding, tighter contract writing and more rigorous supervision. That is the best way to ensure that such a costly and damaging failure never happens again.

For NBC Reporter, The Job That Won't Go Away (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

NEW YORK -- After struggling for years to make it as a Middle East journalist, Richard Engel was living in Cairo, married to his college girlfriend and itching for a new adventure.

As the Bush administration geared up to invade Iraq, Engel decided he had to be there and bought an illegal visa. Once in Iraq, he became so absorbed in the conflict that his marriage became a casualty of war.

"There is no personal life," he says. "This is what I do all the time. It's not a solitary existence like I'm riding a camel in the desert, but you just don't have any personal space."

At 33, the baby-faced Engel has logged more time in Iraq than any other television correspondent, chronicling 3 1/2 years of carnage for NBC and shrugging off several close calls. As nearly all television correspondents rotate in and out of Iraq, Engel has stayed .

"In an era of instant media criticism, he calls balls and strikes in the middle of a war zone," says NBC anchor Brian Williams. "He is completely unbothered by any Web site that may have problems with his reporting while he's over in Iraq dodging bullets. . . . He is the most agenda-less person I've met in our business, I think, in the past 20 years."

On a rare visit home, Engel looks slighter than he does in flak-jacketed appearances from Baghdad, as if he doesn't quite fill out his suit. He speaks with an air of resignation about the worst that human beings can do to each other.

Earlier this month he interviewed a woman whose 13-year-old son was kidnapped. After she paid the $12,000 ransom, the boy was tortured and killed anyway.

"It's horrible," Engel says. "I've seen hundreds of dead bodies -- rotting bodies, bodies buried in shallow graves. One time I watched a dog carry a severed human head in its mouth. You're smelling bodies, you're seeing people who are so angry and insanely distraught. The people who are being killed are too old, too stupid, too poor, too young or too weak, socially or otherwise, to leave."

Engel frequently hits the punching bag as a form of therapy. "There are images that I would rather not have in my head," he says. "You can't let your guard down. . . . You have to go out every day assuming you're being hunted, that people want to take you for ransom."

Among the small circle of journalists who risk their lives in the region, Engel commands considerable respect.

"I admire Richard because he's passionate about the story, and he cares," Lara Logan, CBS's chief foreign correspondent, says from Iraq. "When he was a freelancer with no real support, he wasn't afraid to stay on his own in Baghdad for 'shock and awe.' He's also a really decent guy."

Why does he stay? When NBC made Engel its Middle East bureau chief over the summer, he agreed to a new contract and moved to the relative calm of Beirut. Days later he found himself covering a fierce war between Israel and Hezbollah -- and was suddenly reenergized. This, for better or worse, is what he does.

Not that Engel necessarily approves of military conflict.

"I think war should be illegal," he says. "I'm basically a pacifist."

* * *

Engel was taping a standup last week on Haifa Street, in one of Baghdad's most dangerous neighborhoods, where he was traveling with the 172nd Stryker Brigade.

Suddenly shots rang out. The unit was under sniper fire. "Let's go, go, go, go, go, go!" one soldier shouted. Engel scrambled for cover, but completed his report a few minutes later.

DOJ_NMG_0086512

He has little patience for the notion that the media are suffering from Iraq fatigue because the story -- day after day of death and destruction -- has gotten so repetitive.

"Whether you agree with the war or not, I have a very soft spot for the guys who are out there. These guys have saved my life on more than one occasion, and they are dying at the rate of two a day, and they deserve to be talked about."

Danger lurks everywhere for Western correspondents in Iraq. Engel has survived two kidnapping attempts, one of which occurred when a pair of cars surrounded his vehicle, forcing his driver to make an evasive maneuver at 90 miles per hour with a third car in hot pursuit. And journalists' hotels are a periodic target. Engel's hotel room has been blown up three times in insurgent attacks, once collapsing the ceiling and another time blowing off the door as shrapnel filled the room.

"There's a fine line between fearless and crazy," Williams says. "Richard is not crazy. He has distilled risk to a science."

Few would have predicted that Engel would become an intrepid war correspondent when he was growing up on Manhattan's East 86th Street. He suffered from dyslexia and struggled in school.

"He was down in the mouth and low on self-confidence," says his mother, Nina Engel. "He lived in the shadow of his older brother, Mr. Perfect," who is now a cardiologist. In fact, she had only "a very faint hope" that he would be able to go to college.

When he was 13, Engel asked his parents to send him to a wilderness survival program in Wyoming. Frustrated by his learning disabilities, he was eager to escape the comforts of Upper East Side life and try a tougher environment.

He says he was "scared to death," especially when given a gun to hunt small game. Nina Engel remembers getting a letter from her son: "I just returned from my survival hike. I clubbed a bird to death and ate it." When the teenager returned, he told his mother: "I learned a lot about myself."

Engel says the experience began a transformation that largely enabled him to overcome his dyslexia and school problems. Despite his learning difficulties, he showed early promise in other ways.

"He was a great writer," says Ross Peet, who was a classmate at Riverdale Country School in the Bronx. "But he struggled with anything that had a number on it."

At 16, Engel spent a year as an exchange student in Sicily. After graduating from Stanford in 1996 with a degree in international relations, Engel says, he decided that "the Middle East would be the story of my generation." He announced to his parents that he was moving to Cairo, where the family had once taken a trip.

"Are you insane?" Nina Engel recalls asking him. "Do you remember what a hellhole it was?" When her son said he was also considering Damascus, she allowed as how Cairo was not really that bad.

The aspiring reporter took his $2,000 in savings, moved to Cairo, enrolled in Arabic classes and found an apartment in a neighborhood where donkeys and dogs roamed the dirt roads.

Engel did some local freelancing and caught an early break when he was asked to take over the English-language Middle East Times after the staff walked out in the wake of the editor's firing. He wrote all the articles -- making plenty of mistakes in the process -- and took the proofs each week to a printing press in Athens, as a way to avoid Egyptian censorship laws.

Engel ran into trouble anyway as he began reporting on the group that would become al-Qaeda. He says Egyptian authorities started following him and bugging his phone. Once, after a weekend trip, an official called to ask how he had liked staying in Room 17 of a hotel in Alexandria. Engel reported the surveillance to the U.S. embassy, to no avail.

"The embassy was useless," he says. "It was my first lesson that you cannot rely on anyone else. No one is coming to help you."

In 1999, Agence France-Presse hired Engel to go to Jerusalem and cover the Palestinians. As the intifada protests against Israel turned violent, he says, "I spent the next three years on my stomach, getting tear-gassed and shot at with rubber bullets."

Most people might consider that a miserable existence. But Engel brightens at the thought: "I was lucky enough to be on the fault line as history shifts and moves."

Friends were not surprised at his constant need for an adrenaline fix. "He has no interest in a 9-to-5 job," Peet says. "He's very much into living on the edge. I don't think he has much interest in having a normal life."

By late 2002, as war with Iraq loomed, ABC News and the BBC had hired Engel as a freelancer. But even though he spoke Arabic, Engel wasn't on anyone's list to get an Iraqi visa. The networks were concentrating their efforts on their bigger stars.

DOJ_NMG_0086513

Undeterred, Engel took $20,000, went to Jordan and bought a human shield visa, meaning that he was pledging to chain himself to an Iraqi facility as a deterrent against U.S. bombing. Engel got the visa from an Iraqi official who knew full well he was a journalist but was swayed by a few hundred dollars and some baby clothing that Engel had bought for extra persuasion.

Once in Iraq, Engel bought a generator and some crowbars, souped up two Volkswagens so he could move fast without being conspicuous, and hired an off-duty police officer. On the eve of the Western invasion, most of the networks pulled out their correspondents for safety reasons, a decision that Engel could not fathom.

"You knew it was going to be horrible -- that's why you're there," he says.

As other journalists either withdrew, were expelled or clamored to get in, Engel was for a brief time the only American television reporter in Iraq. He found himself much in demand by ABC, which still identified him as a freelancer. He did the videotaping himself with a small camcorder. Once Saddam Hussein was toppled, ABC and NBC both offered to hire Engel. He retained a top New York agent and decided he would prefer a fresh start with NBC, "coming in the front door as opposed to climbing up the fire escape and breaking in the back door."

In the invasion's aftermath, Engel would drive each week to such cities as Najaf and Fallujah, poking around to find stories. But that gradually changed as the security situation deteriorated. Now, unless he is embedded with a military unit, Engel usually finds himself confined to the safer precincts of Baghdad, an experience he describes as "a noose tightening around us." He increasingly relies on Iraqi staffers who are from certain neighborhoods or members of the same ethnic group as a given area's residents. But even that can be problematic. "I've gotten rid of the ones who I think cannot be trusted," Engel says.

Not everything he covers involves bombs and bullets. Engel did a piece earlier this year on the plight of children at a Baghdad orphanage, which drew so much public reaction that "NBC Nightly News" aired it a second time.

"I don't look for good-news stories or bad-news stories. I don't have an abacus," he says.

But bad news has a way of finding journalists in Iraq. On Memorial Day, Engel heard a nearby explosion. He soon learned that CBS correspondent Kimberly Dozier had been badly wounded and her two crew members, Paul Douglas and James Brolan, killed by the blast.

His mother sent him an e-mail: "YOU ARE UNDER HOUSE ARREST UNTIL YOU CAN BOOK A FLIGHT OUT OF THERE . . . Mom's orders."

She writes him every day, but he has not followed her evacuation instructions. Still, there are psychological effects. Riding in an Army Humvee, Engel looked down at his legs and thought how fragile they looked. What if he lost them?

"You worry about how many lives you have and how many I've already used up," Engel says. "I don't think I'm invincible."

An Opportunity For Shared Sacrifice (USAT)

By Hodding Carter And Ronald Goldfarb

USA Today, October 26, 2006

As with so many Americans of our generation, we went into military service because that was what you were expected to do. We may have groused at the time, but we are proud of having served our country. It carved a few years out of our lives in the 1950s and '60s, but strengthened our understanding of the country we served and the people with whom we served.

Of course, while public service now seems self-evident to us, it does not to most of our children's generation. It is not that they turn away from duty to the civil society. Millions have chosen the military, of course. Many serve in the government and voluntary service organizations, working among the urban poor and rural landless. A large number tell pollsters they believe in volunteerism. But the idea of public service as a universal duty is another story.

On the campaign trail these days, there are few fresh ideas, and in the wake of the fifth 9/11 anniversary, there are still not enough calls for public sacrifice beyond that made by our troops. National service isn't a new idea. It arises from one of the oldest themes of U.S. history. What does the citizen owe the state? Answer: mandated public service without exemptions.

Mandatory national service could appeal to Americans' natural inclination toward patriotism and provide an antidote to the cynical public attitude that characterizes recent politics. It would bring out the best in young Americans and rekindle a sense of shared national purpose. And it isn't right or left, Democratic or Republican.

DOJ_NMG_0086514

The death of the military draft was hailed in the Vietnam War era by liberals and conservatives alike, not necessarily for shared reasons but with shared acclaim. With today's professionalized military, the many are protected; the relative few fight and die in the name of the whole.

The best approach to mandatory national service would be to require every 18-year-old man and woman, and every young immigrant seeking citizenship, to spend 18 months to two years in public service. Their service could be in the military or in the Homeland Security Department, or be in programs similar to President Franklin Roosevelt's Civilian Conservation Corps, Sargent Shriver's Peace Corps or President Clinton's AmeriCorps — any work experience that is in the public interest.

According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, there are about 4 million 18-year-olds who might fill our proposed first class. Some 2.7 million youths graduated from high school from 2004 through 2005. Just under 60,000 are in the military. Others hold jobs, are in school or are in jail. About 17% are unemployed.

There are great costs attributable to this class, economic and others. The cost of public service would be a wise investment. After completing national service, these young people would enter their next phase in life more mature and more knowledgeable about the rich variety of America's peoples and the breadth of the nation's unfinished business.

National service is not a partisan concept. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., has praised Clinton's AmeriCorps program. It also need not be the exclusive province of government. Private-public interest organizations, including churches and other faith-based groups, could qualify as sponsors and providers of public service. Diversity, rather than bureaucratic uniformity, would be encouraged.

But the bottom line would be the reinstitution of a notion as old as the nation. Just as all share in the benefits of freedom, all should share in shoring it up.

Hodding Carter is a professor and former journalist; he served in the Marines and State Department. Ronald Goldfarb is an attorney and author; he served in the Air Force and Justice Department.

A GI Bill For The 21st Century (LAT)

By Edward Humes

The Los Angeles Times, October 26, 2006

IMAGINE TELLING the members of an entire generation they could receive a free college education at any school that accepted them — Cal State, Harvard, the Sorbonne — courtesy of Uncle Sam. Throw in a monthly stipend and textbooks. After graduation, there are government-backed home loans, no money down — buy a house cheaper than renting. Throw in subsidized business loans, farm loans, job training, medical care and up to a year's worth of unemployment checks.

What insane politician would ever propose such a costly boondoggle, such outright social engineering? It would be the most enormous, far-reaching, life-changing government program in the history of the world.

And so it was. We know it today as the original GI Bill.

Today's unthinkable was yesterday's matter of course. FDR and Congress adopted the humbly named Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944 with bipartisan fervor. The stated goal was simple: to help 16 million veterans and their families resume their lives after the scourge of World War II.

But this investment in the nation's future powered far more than a return to the status quo. It transformed the nation and the very nature of the American dream, opening up the colleges, raising suburbs out of bean fields, creating a new middle class and providing the medical, engineering and scientific prowess that conquered long-feared diseases, ushered in the Information Age and helped win the Cold War.

There was never anything like the GI Bill. There's nothing like it on the horizon. And that's a problem.

Today's veterans are getting shortchanged. Instead of a full ride to any college, the modern GI Bill's education support tops out at $36,000 for a four-year degree — barely enough to cover the average state university and well short of UCLA's $19,500 annual tuition, room and board. Forget about the private colleges once covered by the GI Bill — $36,000 would pay for only a year at many of them.

Reservists and National Guard troops in Iraq receive even less — only 27% of the education benefits that regular troops receive. President Bush has opposed closing this gap, considering it a budget buster. Indeed, in a quest to minimize projected war costs, the administration used prewar statistics to craft its budget for another pillar of the GI Bill — healthcare. Now veterans hospitals caring for the wounded of Iraq and Afghanistan are $3 billion short.

DOJ_NMG_0086515

But this is not simply a story of slighted veterans, scandalous as that may be. This is a story of a United States no longer investing it its future. The GI Bill was an engine of opportunity for all of us. It powered U.S. prosperity after World War II, turning a nation of renters into a nation of homeowners, transforming college from an elite bastion into almost an entitlement and making a tiny middle class into America's leading demographic.

The "greatest generation" endured depression and war, but its members also ended up our most privileged generation, gifted with more government largesse than any group in history. More than 7 million veterans took advantage of the education benefits alone for college or trade schools. This proved a costly but sound investment: For every dollar paid out under the original GI Bill, there was a $7 return to the economy in terms of increased earnings, consumer spending and tax revenue, according to a 1988 congressional study.

Three presidents — George H.W. Bush, Gerald Ford and Jimmy Carter — dozens of congressmen, 14 Nobel Prize winners, giants of literature, Broadway and Hollywood and hundreds of thousands of teachers, doctors, nurses and businessmen got their starts with the help of the GI Bill. "Biggest piece of legislation the country ever passed," says former Sen. Bob Dole, a war hero and GI Bill beneficiary. "Maybe we need something like it again."

Which begs the question: What happened to the Washington that created something so magnificent? Why do we no longer expect — or demand — greatness from Americans' joint enterprise, our government? In the 1960s, before Watergate and Vietnam, most Americans believed that their government usually did the right thing. Now we've accepted Ronald Reagan's old formulation about the nine most dangerous words in the English language: "I'm from the government and I'm here to help." How ironic that a member of the GI Bill generation would sell his countrymen on that idea. But it's not a truism; it's self-fulfilling prophecy. We expect our government to fail, and it meets our expectations.

The original GI Bill was powerful because it touched a whole generation, and the ripple effects washed over the entire nation, not just veterans. Today's GI Bill reaches less than 1% of the population. It is no longer an engine for greatness, and Americans desperately need such an engine. We have always been the nation where the children can expect a better life than the parents; we no longer believe this is likely.

Before he died, FDR offered a solution that did not require a world war and a military draft. He proposed a program of national service, in which young people earned education, medical, housing and pension benefits. Not just veterans but all young people. It was, in essence, a peacetime civilian GI Bill — an investment in the future and in civic service. Polls suggested a receptive public, but the idea died with Roosevelt. President Clinton tried a modest resurrection with his AmeriCorps project. Much more is needed.

Would such a program be expensive? Absolutely — about what we've spent so far on the war in Iraq. But spending hundreds of billions at home to generate opportunities for future doctors, scientists, teachers, leaders and productive, healthy citizens would be a far sounder investment, with a proven rate of return. Where would you rather spend your tax dollars?

In an era in which college is a skyrocketing financial burden for many families, when homeownership is less affordable than ever, when the nation is losing its competitive edge in advanced degrees and when the American dream so generously nurtured after World War II is under siege, it is time to expect greatness from our government once again. Our children deserve it.

DOJ:

Alito Swears In Acosta As Miami's Top Federal Prosecutor (AP)

By Curt Anderson, The Associated Press

AP, October 26, 2006

MIAMI - R. Alexander Acosta was formally sworn in Wednesday as South Florida's top federal prosecutor by Supreme Court Justice Samuel Alito Jr., for whom Acosta clerked shortly after graduating from Harvard Law School.

DOJ_NMG_0086516

Alito recalled that during his clerkship in 1994 at the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, Acosta appeared to exercise good judgment and common sense at a young age and that "and it has developed since then." Alito, who is a big baseball fan, compared Acosta to players adept at all phases of the game.

"He reminds me of one of those baseball players who can do everything," Alito said.

Acosta, 37, a Miami native of Cuban ancestry, was confirmed by the U.S. Senate for the Southern District of Florida post on June 9. Before returning to Florida, he was assistant attorney general for civil rights at the U.S. Justice Department in Washington and prior to that was a member of the National Labor Relations Board.

The Miami job is one of the most prominent and busiest in the country, covering a district that is home to some 6 million people in nine counties. Its major recent cases range from alleged al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff to the Colombian brothers who ran the Cali cocaine cartel.

Acosta was joined at the ceremony by the district's federal judges, prosecutors and dozens of defense lawyers as well as his wife, Jan, mother and other well-wishers. In brief remarks, he said cases that have "quality and impact" would be the focus of his office.

"Our job is, and must be, to bring high-impact cases," he said. "I appreciate and am deeply honored by the opportunity to serve the citizens of South Florida."

Alito Protégé Sworn In As U.S. Attorney In Miami (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, October 26, 2006

Samuel A. Alito, the U.S. Supreme Court's newest justice, praised one of his protégés, R. Alexander Acosta, on Wednesday as he swore him in as the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of Florida.

But Alito said that for all his formidable legal talent, Acosta betrayed one "weakness" when he served as a law clerk in 1994 for the then-federal appellate judge.

"Alex's knowledge of sports was a little bit lacking," Alito deadpanned before a standing-room-only gathering of judges, prosecutors and defense lawyers in the historic central courtroom of the Miami federal courthouse.

Alito, a self-professed baseball fan, joked that Acosta probably didn't know the difference between the Florida Marlins and the Miami Dolphins.

All joking aside, Acosta's star has risen quickly in Republican circles. He served on the National Labor Relations Board and then became the first Hispanic to lead the Justice Department's civil rights office.

He temporarily replaced outgoing U.S. Attorney Marcos Jimenez in June 2005 and was nominated for the job by President Bush earlier this year at age 37. The Senate confirmed Acosta in August, making him one of the nation's youngest top prosecutors.

Acosta -- now officially in charge of a 220-lawyer office that extends from Fort Pierce to Key West -- singled out the extraordinary role of South Florida's law enforcement community in some of the nation's biggest prosecutions.

He cited the recent convictions of Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff in the SunCruz Casinos fraud case and of Cali Cartel founders Gilberto and Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela. He also said his office is prosecuting a major terror suspect, Jose Padilla.

Acosta, flanked by his wife, Jan, thanked his Cuban exile parents for sacrificing to put him through Gulliver Preparatory School and Harvard University, where he earned his undergraduate and law degrees.

Acosta seemed in awe of the legal elite gathered in the courtroom, saying his own story was not that unusual: ``The fact that there are so many stories in this room is a testament to the nation's freedom and opportunities."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

UPDATE: SEC Says Two Defrauded Korean Community In Calif. (DOW)

By Siobhan Hughes, Of DOW JONES NEWSWIRES

Dow Jones, October 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0086517

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- The Securities and Exchange Commission has filed civil-fraud charges against two men who allegedly took at least $3 million from Korean speakers in Southern California from 2003 through August 2005 through two firms that they portrayed as legitimate securities firms.

The SEC on Wednesday announced the charges against Kangsan Kim, the owner of money-manager Unus Capital Management Inc., and Hyun Soo Jang, the owner of PeopleN Investment Corp., the brokerage firm that was supposed to execute trades for Unus. The two men face civil penalties and orders to return the money to investors.

"This case provides an unfortunate example of the dangers presented by those seeking to exploit the trust of members of their own community," said Randall Lee, director of the SEC's office in Los Angeles. "Such schemes are reprehensible, and the SEC is committed to vigorously prosecuting those who betray that trust for their own profit."

Kim was arrested in July on federal mail-fraud and wire-fraud charges, according to a Justice Department press release. He doesn't have a lawyer, according to the SEC, and he couldn't be located. The SEC said it believes Jang is in South Korea.

Unus attracted investors from the Korean community by sponsoring daily morning stock reports on Korean-language radio broadcasts in Los Angeles, the SEC said. The firm asked clients to enter agreements under which Unus managed their accounts and executed trades through PeopleN, the SEC said.

Instead of investing the $4.5 million raised from investors, Jang misappropriated more than $3 million, the SEC said, and gave $500,000 of that amount to Kim and Unus. The SEC said that Unus withdrew its investment advisor registration in 2004, and that PeopleN wasn't registered to do business as a brokerage firm, even though both firms told investors that they were regulated businesses.

Judge Issues Secret Ruling About Secrets In Nacchio Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Sandy Shore, Ap Business Writer

AP, October 26, 2006

(AP) - DENVER-A federal judge has issued a secret ruling about the relevance of classified government documents that former Qwest Chief Executive Officer Joe Nacchio wants to use in his defense against insider trading charges.

In his memorandum and order, which were filed with the court late Tuesday, U.S. District Judge Edward Nottingham said he explained his decision regarding the documents but the bulk of it, 25 pages, was sealed under the Classified Information Procedures Act.

Nottingham's ruling came about two weeks after he met behind closed doors with prosecutors and Nacchio's attorneys to discuss the classified information.

A spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office declined comment Wednesday. Nacchio's attorneys have said they will not comment on the case outside the courtroom.

Nacchio is charged with 42 counts of insider trading, accused of selling stock in 2001 based on inside knowledge that Qwest Communications International Inc. would be unable to meet revenue targets.

Each count against Nacchio carries a penalty of up to 10 years in prison and a $1 million (â,¬800,000) fine. The trial is set for March 19 and is expected to last about 30 days.

At issue is whether the classified information will help explain what Nacchio might have known at the time the trades occurred.

The defense has said Nacchio was aware of classified government contracts awarded to Qwest and of plans for future government business dealings with the Denver-based company.

Qwest, the primary phone service provider in 14 mostly Western states, reported total revenue of $19.6 billion in 2001, the year of the trades in question. Of that, $322 million was attributed to federal contracts, and less than half of that came from classified contracts, according to court filings.

Nacchio also is one of several former Qwest executives accused by the Securities and Exchange Commission in a civil case alleging they orchestrated a financial fraud that forced the company to restate billions of dollars in revenue.

The Classified Information Procedures Act was enacted several decades ago to counter a strategy used by defendants charged with spying who would threaten to expose national secrets unless the charges were dropped.

It allows the attorneys and judges to review such information behind closed doors to determine if it is significant enough to be included at trial.

SEC Probes Mutual-Fund Firms After Settlement In Kickback Case (WSJ)

By Tom Lauricella

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission has launched an investigation of 27 mutual-fund companies that the agency says have accepted kickbacks totaling hundreds of millions of dollars in recent years.

The investigation centers on alleged arrangements in which independent contractors agreed to pay rebates to mutual-fund companies in order to win lucrative contracts for jobs like producing shareholder reports and prospectuses. The probe stems from a $21.4 million settlement the SEC reached last month with Bisys Fund Services Inc., an administrative-services provider owned by Bisys Group Inc.

Regulators say Bisys, which is based in Roseland, N.J., paid a total of $230 million in kickbacks between July 1999 and June 2004 as part of an effort to win work from mutual funds. Bisys settled the civil charges without admitting or denying wrongdoing.

While the alleged kickbacks would have taken only a tiny toll on individual investors, perhaps shaving a few hundredths of a percent a year off their fund accounts and returns, the latest investigation comes as the fund industry is struggling to rebuild its reputation after a series of trading scandals that triggered regulatory crackdowns and fines totaling more than $1 billion.

Critics have long complained about fund companies using shareholder money for their own benefit. For example, funds are allowed to use trading commissions, which are deducted from shareholder funds, to pay for research that may not benefit individual fund investors. They can also levy fees on their investors for marketing, although attracting more investors benefits the fund company and not necessarily its existing shareholders. Both these practices are highly regulated to prevent abuses. Nonetheless, regulators and other observers say the latest scandal is part of a distressing pattern of fund companies misusing shareholder money.

"This is far worse conduct" than previous fund-trading scandals, said Mercer Bullard, a law professor at the University of Mississippi who specializes in mutual-fund matters. "Receiving a kickback that comes indirectly out of the pockets of shareholders is the functional equivalent of embezzlement."

In part based on information from Bisys, the SEC has sent letters to some of the 27 fund companies asking them to provide details about their ties to Bisys, according to people familiar with the probe. They didn't identify any of the companies. However, the investigation is unlikely to include many of the very largest fund companies, which tend to have in-house units that handle administrative functions.

Most of Bisys's clients were bank-run funds, many of which tended to be smaller firms with several billion of dollars under management. A handful of banks, however, do rank among the larger fund managers.

The SEC says the alleged kickbacks involving Bisys and other service providers worked with the help of secret side agreements. The service providers charged shareholder accounts for administrative services but, unbeknownst to the funds' investors or independent board members, the providers agreed to rebate part of that money to fund advisers, who would then use it to cover their marketing expenses. In exchange for the kickbacks, the advisers would recommend to their funds' boards that the service providers' contracts be renewed.

At issue in the probe is whether fund companies misused their investors' money and misled their boards about why they were hiring certain service providers, according to people familiar with the probe. "These matters raise questions about whether there was a breach of duty to shareholders," said Philip Khinda, an attorney who represents a number of fund boards that have been investigating their funds' arrangements with Bisys.

In its complaint against Bisys, the SEC described the actions of one fund company, which it referred to as "Adviser A," that allegedly demanded millions of dollars in kickbacks in return for recommending that Bisys's contract be renewed. Another 26 fund families had similar deals -- some written, and some only oral -- with the firm, the SEC said.

DOJ_NMG_0086519

The agency didn't identify any of the fund companies in the complaint but, according to people familiar with the investigation, "Adviser A" is AmSouth Funds, which was then a unit of AmSouth Bancorp of Birmingham, Ala.

AmSouth Bancorp declined to comment on whether or not it is the company referred to as "Adviser A," but it said it is cooperating with the SEC.

In 2005, after the alleged arrangement with Bisys had ended, the AmSouth Funds, which then totaled $5.5 billion in assets, were sold to Pioneer Investments. A spokesman for Pioneer declined to comment.

The SEC's Bisys complaint says a senior executive at "Adviser A" told Bisys in 1999 that if it didn't agree to a kickback arrangement, one of its competitors would. Indeed, the SEC alleged in its complaint that "other administrators" besides Bisys cut such deals.

Bisys's main competitor is SEI Investments Co. A spokesman for SEI, which is based in Oaks, Pa., said that as a matter of policy the company wouldn't comment on whether it had received inquiries from the SEC nor on whether it had similar rebate agreements with fund companies.

Bisys accepted the deal with "Adviser A," and over the next five years, funds totaling $17.3 million were deducted from shareholder accounts at the fund company, according to the SEC. The money was used by "Adviser A" mainly to cover marketing costs that would normally come out of its own pocket. The adviser also used some of the money to pay the initiation fee and monthly dues at a country club, the SEC's complaint says.

In the arrangement with "Adviser A," Bisys would be paid 0.20% of fund's assets, the SEC said. However, Bisys kept only roughly one-quarter of that amount. About one-third was paid to "Adviser A" in an above-board contract, the SEC says, while the remainder was kicked back to the adviser through a "marketing budget."

In its settlement with the SEC, Bisys agreed to terminate such agreements and change its policies. It disciplined or fired a number of employees.

Last summer, AmSouth gave its own version of its dealings with Bisys. At the time, it disclosed that the SEC had informed the bank it intended to bring civil charges against it related to the service provider. It said that the probe related to "past arrangements under which Bisys used a portion of the fees paid to it by the fund family to pay for marketing and other expenses."

The mutual-fund industry has been dogged by scandals in recent years. In 2003, it came under fire after revelations that a number of big companies let favored clients conduct short-term trading, earning profits at the expense of ordinary shareholders. The following year, regulators cracked down on fund companies that used stock-trading commissions, which are deducted from shareholder accounts, to pay for marketing activities the companies would otherwise have had to cover themselves.

Write to Tom Lauricella at tom.lauricella@wsj.com1

NASD Fines James River CEO $2.25M For Alleged Improper Market Timing (LAW/AP)

By Marcy Gordon, The Associated Press

AP, October 26, 2006

Securities regulators have imposed a record $2.25 million fine on the chairman and CEO of hedge fund James River Capital Corp. for allegedly using deceptive practices in trading in the long-term investments known as variable annuities.

The National Association of Securities Dealers, the brokerage industry's self-policing organization, on Wednesday announced the civil penalty against Paul Saunders, a broker who is the chairman, CEO and majority owner of Richmond, Va.-based James River. Saunders neither admitted nor denied the NASD's allegations in agreeing to the settlement, under which he also will be suspended for 60 days from working as a broker.

The NASD said the $2.25 million penalty was the largest fine it has ever imposed on an individual for alleged improper market timing -- frequent "in-and-out" trading. It includes restitution of some $750,000 in illicit profits that Saunders allegedly personally made.

In June 2004, the organization fined the brokerage Davenport & Co. $450,000 and ordered it to pay some $288,000 in restitution for allegedly allowing James River and another hedge fund, TFS Capital, to engage in improper market timing in variable annuities. That was the first case against a brokerage for allowing clients to improperly engage in market timing of variable annuities, often described as mutual funds wrapped in an insurance policy. Federal and state securities regulators have brought a number of cases for improper market timing of mutual funds in recent years.

DOJ_NMG_0086520

Market timing is not illegal but is widely restricted because it tends to skim profits from other shareholders.

James River is general partner and trading manager of the Jazzman Fund, a hedge fund set up specifically to engage in market timing, according to the NASD. After personally investing in Jazzman, Saunders through James River created 19 partnerships under Jazzman to better enable the hedge fund to engage in market timing of variable annuities, the NASD said.

While each Jazzman partnership appeared to be a separate entity, they all had common owners -- a fact that Saunders failed to disclose to the insurance companies that sold the variable annuities, the NASD said. The insurance companies place investors' money in special accounts that invest in mutual funds.

The NASD said that from October 2001 through September 2003, Saunders used the Jazzman partnerships to evade the insurers' attempts to block or restrict his market timing in those accounts. Saunders' deceptive techniques were said to have included opening 20 different accounts for the Jazzman partnerships at one brokerage firm and market timing in variable annuities accounts, sometimes simultaneously buying contracts and trading in the same annuity through several partnerships.

In recent years, the NASD has taken scores of disciplinary actions against brokers and investment firms for alleged abuses in sales of variable annuities, which are tax-deferred and a popular way to save for retirement. They are contracts between an investor and the company selling it in which the company agrees to make periodic payments to the investor, beginning immediately or at some future date. The payments to the annuity holder vary and are determined by the performance of the underlying investments.

Former AOL Execs Said Lied To Auditors (FINDLAW/AP)

By Brian Westley, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 26, 2006

(AP) - ALEXANDRIA, Va.-Two former America Online executives and top officials at a defunct Las Vegas software maker lied to auditors as part of a scheme to boost both companies' revenue as the dot-com boom fizzled in 2001, government lawyers argued Tuesday.

Kent Wakeford, former executive director at AOL's business affairs unit, and John Tuli, a former vice president in AOL's NetBusiness unit, are among the four defendants on trial at U.S. District Court in Alexandria.

The men, along with two former executives at PurchasePro, are charged with securities fraud, making false statements to auditors and wire fraud. The defendants deny wrongdoing.

In opening statements Tuesday, prosecutors alleged that PurchasePro gave AOL a stake in its company in 2000. In exchange, AOL helped sell PurchasePro's core product, a "marketplace license," which is software designed to facilitate business-to-business transactions.

But the licenses were a tough sell for AOL. The Dulles-based company was only able to convince companies to make a purchase by cutting secret side deals, including free online advertisements, Assistant U.S. Attorney Charles Connolly told jurors.

The executives engaged in various forms of deception to make it appear the licenses had been sold in the first quarter of 2001 so PurchasePro could meet its quarterly revenue goals and create the illusion of success to its shareholders, Connolly said.

"In short, it is a case about lies and cover-ups," Connolly said. "Much of the revenue was bogus because the products were given away for free."

In one instance, prosecutors claim a fax machine was tampered with so that deals made in April would appear with an earlier date.

"They were trying to stop the clock from ticking and the pages of the calendar from turning," Connolly said.

At the time the fraud is alleged to have occurred, PurchasePro's stock was in free fall, dropping from a high of about $160 a share in March 2000 to about $10 by April 2001, prosecutors said.

AOL, which was to earn a 50 percent commission for each license it sold, also felt pressure to sell more licenses to meet revenue goals.

DOJ_NMG_0086521

The PurchasePro executives charged are Charles "Junior" Johnson, the company's former CEO; and Christopher Benyo, a former senior vice president of marketing.

The trial is expected to involve hundreds of intricate financial transactions and could last up to two months. Six other former PurchasePro executives, including the co-founder, have previously pleaded guilty and could testify during the trial.

One by one Tuesday, defense attorneys for the former executives delivered their opening statements, refuting the government's charges.

"There is so much to disagree with, I don't even know where to begin," said Tuli's lawyer, Mark Hulkower. He said that the deals in question are complicated and cannot always be easily judged by outsiders.

Johnson's attorney, Preston Burton, said his client was being made a scapegoat by others within PurchasePro, who resented Johnson because he would not permit them to sell their stock after the company went public in 1999, resulting in the loss of millions of dollars.

"He rode the Internet bubble all the way up ... and he rode it all the way down," Burton said of Johnson, a high-profile businessman who counts casino mogul Steve Wynn among his friends.

Wakeford's lawyer, Henry Asbill, said prosecutors also were making his client a fall guy for decisions that were made by high-level executives.

Asbill said that more than 80 people with a title of manager or higher at AOL worked on the PurchasePro deal, and that Wakeford spent less than 5 percent of his working time on it.

"He was a junior executive," Asbill said of Wakeford. "Ask yourself why the real AOL insiders are not here."

Jurors also heard testimony Tuesday from the government's first witness, Bigstep.com founder Andrew Beebe, who said AOL persuaded him to buy a PurchasePro license for $1.1 million in early 2001 - even though AOL had already given Bigstep a license for free.

Beebe said he agreed to buy the license only because AOL and PurchasePro agreed to provide $2.8 million in reciprocal deals.

"We had no interest at all in a second license," Beebe said. "we were still waiting for someone to tell us what to do with the first one."

Associated Press Writer Matthew Barakat contributed to this story.

Austria Charges Nine In Probe Of Refco-Bawag Ties (WSJ)

By David Crawford And Carrick Mollenkamp

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

Prosecutors in Vienna have charged nine men, including the former chief executive officer of Bawag PSK, on charges ranging from embezzlement to fraud amid an Austrian probe into ties between U.S. commodity brokerage Refco Inc. and the Vienna bank.

Among those charged was the former CEO of Bawag, Helmut Elsner, and Wolfgang Flöttl, who traded on behalf of Bawag from New York and is the son of another former Bawag CEO, Walter Flöttl. Robert Reiter, a former auditor at KPMG Alpen-Treuhand GmbH, which oversaw Bawag's books, also was charged. In the indictment, which was made public yesterday in Vienna, prosecutors allege the nine men "intentionally abused their positions of trust at Bawag" and engaged in transactions that cost the bank €1.44 billion ($1.81 billion).

The charges come a year after Refco, a large New York broker of commodities and other securities that catered to corporations, government agencies and hedge funds, disclosed that then-CEO Phillip R. Bennett had used a scheme to hide bad debt from Refco investors. Refco investors and U.S. prosecutors allege the scheme included Bawag, which sought to hide its own bad debt that largely was a result of Wolfgang Flöttl's trading losses.

Mr. Bennett has been charged1 with conspiracy, securities fraud, wire fraud and making false filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission. He pleaded not guilty to the charges yesterday in a U.S. district court in Manhattan. His lawyer, David Frankel, declined comment on the charges in Austria and said Mr. Bennett continues to deny any wrongdoing.

After the October 2005 disclosure, Refco fell into bankruptcy proceedings and investigators in the U.S. and Austria launched investigations. Refco's former chief financial officer, Robert Trosten, yesterday pleaded not guilty in New York for his role in the alleged scheme. Mr. Trosten was charged with conspiracy, securities fraud and two counts of wire fraud.

In Vienna, prosecutors allege that Mr. Elsner hired Wolfgang Flöttl to trade in currency markets. Initially, the trading was successful but ultimately led to massive losses. Wolfgang Flöttl handled much of the trading in the New York area, while at the same time establishing himself as a benefactor of New York arts and charities.

Austrian prosecutors allege that Mr. Elsner then used a complex coverup with the assistance of Wolfgang Flöttl, senior Bawag officials, the chairman of the Bawag supervisory board and a former senior KPMG auditor, Mr. Reiter. Mr. Elsner is charged with embezzlement and fraud, according to the indictment. Wolfgang Flöttl, Mr. Reiter and the other Bawag officials are charged with embezzlement, according to the indictment.

Vienna prosecution spokesman Gerhard Jarosch said the charges have been filed with an investigatory magistrate, who may approve the indictment for presentation to the accused, under Austrian legal procedure. Lawyers for the defendants will then have 14 days to accept the charges leading to a trial, to ask for an amendment of the charges, or to contest the charges in their entirety. An appeal of the charges could postpone a trial for an additional four weeks to six weeks, the prosecution spokesman said.

If convicted, the accused could be sentenced to between one year and 10 years in prison.

Wolfgang Schubert, a lawyer for Mr. Elsner, said his client is innocent. Mr. Elsner, who has been in France for the past several months, earlier had been told by Austrian authorities to return to Austria to face questions in the probe. His lawyer is fighting that request.

A lawyer for Wolfgang Flöttl declined to comment and a person in Mr. Flöttl's office said he wasn't available for comment.

A Bawag spokesman said the bank is cooperating with investigators.

A spokeswoman for KPMG Austria GmbH, the parent of the unit where Mr. Reiter worked, said Mr. Reiter, the former auditor, has left the firm and KPMG is cooperating with investigators. Mr. Reiter said he hadn't yet seen the indictment and declined to comment.

Martin Wagner, a senior partner at KPMG Austria GmbH, said KPMG believes Mr. Reiter is innocent.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Pre-Vote Leaks Rankle GOP (RC)

By John Bresnahan, Roll Call Staff

Roll Call, October 26, 2006

For House Republicans, it seems that every week brings a new report about a GOP lawmaker under investigation by the Justice Department for alleged corruption. And with the elections just 12 days away, Republicans are crying foul, complaining bitterly that the negative press spurred by the public disclosure of those criminal probes could help cost them their House majority.

Within just the past two weeks, Reps. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.) and Rick Renzi (R-Ariz.) have faced unwanted headlines blaring the fact that they are under scrutiny by federal prosecutors and the FBI. Both lawmakers have publicly denied any wrongdoing, but Weldon, who was already mired in a tough re-election campaign, has had to deal with the added problem of FBI raids on his daughter's home, as well as the office of a longtime political ally. Federal agents also searched the Florida offices of a Russian energy company that did business with Karen Weldon's lobbying firm.

Renzi is being probed by the U.S. attorney's office in Phoenix for involvement in an Oct. 2005 land sale that helped net his former business partner more than $4 million, according to The Associated Press. The New York Times also reported that DOJ officials are looking into a 2003 bill Renzi introduced that indirectly benefited the company where his father worked.

While a Justice Department run by Republican appointees who were nominated by a conservative Republican president would normally get the benefit of the doubt from GOP lawmakers and staffers, some party insiders are privately wondering whether "rogue elements" within the department — and more specifically the Public Integrity Unit, where corruption cases are handled — are trying to tip the election to Democrats by leaking news of these investigations so late in the cycle.

DOJ_NMG_0086523

"It would seem that the Public Integrity Unit of the Justice Department is running wild," maintained a top Republican political operative, who would only speak on the condition of anonymity. "They're trying to have some effect" on the midterm elections.

A House GOP leadership aide suggested that "rogue elements" within DOJ's bureaucracy are "working for a Democratic victory" on Nov. 7.

"Of course, we all want to root out corruption at all levels of government," said the aide, who said he was "afraid to speak publicly" since it may spur more leaks about Republican lawmakers. "At the same time, when word of Congressional investigations are continually thrown out in the media late in the cycle, then it smacks of a campaign against Republicans."

Another senior GOP staffer speculated that it was "residual anger" from Speaker Dennis Hastert's (R-Ill.) public criticism of the June 20 FBI raid on Rep. William Jefferson's (D-La.) office that is feeding the "campaign" against House Republicans.

"I think there are people within the Justice Department who are angry with Hastert and the [GOP] leadership" over the Congressional response to the Jefferson raid. "This is all payback, that's all."

This source also pointed to the fact that "someone in the Justice Department or FBI" leaked a story to ABC News shortly after Hastert criticized the Jefferson search suggesting that Hastert himself was under investigation by the Justice Department. DOJ officials quickly released a statement calling the ABC story wrong.

Democrats have not escaped unscathed from the recent Justice Department revelations, although the political fallout for the minority party has been much less severe, at least so far.

In addition to Jefferson's situation, Time magazine reported this week that Rep. Jane Harman (D-Calif.), ranking member of the House Intelligence Committee, urged officials from the American Israel Public Affairs Committee to lobby House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) last year to allow Harman to retain the top Democratic spot on the panel. The FBI began an investigation into whether Harman promised AIPAC she would help the group deal with its own Justice Department investigation. Both Harman and AIPAC deny the allegation and the investigation appears to have stalled out months ago.

But with the revelations seeming to hit a new Republican target almost weekly, senior Justice Department officials suddenly have found themselves barraged with questions about the leaks, although they strongly deny any suggestion that the department is meddling in political contests.

"What I can say with great confidence is that the men and women in the Department of Justice and all of its investigative agencies do not take political considerations into play when it comes to discharging their duty," said Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty at a news conference last week.

"And that's the way we run this department and the way we always will run the department. But beyond that, I'm not going to talk about the timing of anything happening."

Bryan Sierra, a spokesman for the Justice Department, declined to comment about any of the specific cases related to recent developments with Weldon, Harman or Renzi, but noted that traditionally the department and investigative agents are supposed to halt overt, public actions when an election is approaching.

"Particularly close to an election, of course there's a concern about leaks," Sierra said.

When a competitive campaign involves a potential target close to Election Day, Sierra said, "It is unlikely that you will see a flurry of public activity related to a criminal investigation."

"We specifically do not want to give the appearance of getting involved in the political process," Sierra added.

Sierra also cautioned that sometimes leaks or revelations about probes aren't accurate, and that many times they don't mean any new path or direction has taken hold among DOJ officials, but merely that some ongoing, previously unknown investigation has broken into the public domain.

"The fact that they're happening close to an election doesn't necessarily alter the criminal investigation," Sierra said.

But even Republicans who have served in the Justice Department under President Bush admit that the spate of recent news stories regarding federal corruption probes of sitting GOP lawmakers disturbs them, particularly this close to an election.

"It's a huge problem for the department because it casts an unsavory light on all the investigations," said Mark Corallo, who served as public affairs director at Justice from 2002 to 2005. "I have heard lots of complaints from Republicans about what is going on. It's natural for people to be suspicious."

Combating the allegations of widespread corruption within the party also is costing the GOP gobs of money needed elsewhere to defend its majority.

As of this week, the National Republican Congressional Committee had spent more than $16 million to defend nine seats either now held, or recently held, by GOP incumbents faced with legal or ethical problems, according to a Roll Call survey of the committee's independent expenditures. These include Weldon's race, as well as the special election won by now-Rep. Brian Bilbray (R-Calif.) for the seat held by former Rep. Duke Cunningham (R), who went to jail earlier this year after pleading guilty to bribery, fraud and tax evasion charges.

The corruption charges are appearing at a particularly bad juncture for Hastert and other GOP leaders, as they have been battered by allegations that they covered up or deliberately ignored warnings that former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) was acting inappropriately in his dealings with male Congressional pages. Foley resigned from Congress on Sept. 29, and Hastert, Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), and National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.) all testified before the House ethics committee on the scandal this week, bringing more negative news coverage.

Weldon, for his part, initially blamed a "liberal conspiracy," pointing in particular to the watchdog group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, with somehow being behind the Justice Department investigation. CREW dismissed Weldon's allegation as ridiculous.

The Pennsylvania Republican is now trumpeting a column written by conservative activist Paul Weyrich. Weyrich argued that Weldon has angered "the Establishment" by publicly pushing the theory that the Pentagon could have stopped the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, but failed to do so, a claim that has been vehemently denied by Defense Department officials. Weldon's campaign posted Weyrich's article on its Web site on Wednesday.

"I think certain forces do not want to see Weldon as Chairman or Ranking Minority Member of the [House Armed Services] Committee," Weyrich wrote. Weyrich acknowledged in the article that he did not know whether Weldon had broken any laws in his dealings with his daughter's firm but added "I do not believe in most conspiracy theories.

However, perhaps we have a conspiracy here."

Renzi and his attorney, former Arizona Attorney General Grant Woods, have denied any knowledge of a federal investigation of the lawmaker while also asserting that he did nothing improper or unethical.

Paul Kane and Lauren W. Whittington contributed to this report.

Jurisdictional Issues Dog Member Probes (RC)

By Paul Kane And John Bresnahan, Roll Call Staff

Roll Call, October 26, 2006

The Justice Department has employed a sprawling lineup of investigators and prosecutors to conduct its ever-expanding roster of Congressional investigations, and in the process created a patchwork of probes across the nation.

With at least 17 Members of the 109th Congress coming under federal investigation, Justice has used a pair of offices in its Washington, D.C., headquarters to conduct probes while at the same time coordinating with the offices of at least seven U.S. attorneys and roughly as many FBI offices to serve as ground troops for the inquiries.

Aides at Justice, along with other experts and former prosecutors, said the process of sorting out which offices lead investigations and prosecutions can be a sometimes messy division of labor that focuses on questions of jurisdiction and resources.

"There's no cookie-cutter approach to it," said Bryan Sierra, spokesman for the Justice Department.

"There is not any one protocol on who does what — it was designed to be handled on a case-by-case basis," said Dick Thornburgh, who served as attorney general from 1988 to 1991.

DOJ_NMG_0086525

That case-by-case process has led to at least a quartet of Members being investigated the past two years by Justice's Public Integrity Unit, while another half-dozen Members have come under the prosecutorial glare of U.S. attorneys, almost always their local federal prosecutor.

While the Congressional corruption cases are some of the most sensitive for any prosecutor, they also bring with them the kind of big headlines that can make a prosecutor's career. And some U.S. attorneys have been known to employ sharp elbows when competing with other federal prosecutors to lead a probe, initially flooding a case with their agents to demonstrate they've done the most work and stake claim to a case.

Sierra said jurisdiction is the most important aspect in determining which office will initially handle a case, leading to U.S. attorneys taking the lead when it involves circumstances such as a Member and a local contributor or contractor seeking favors. That was the case with ex-Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.), now serving a 100-month prison term for orchestrating the largest bribery scheme ever perpetrated by a single Member of Congress.

The Cunningham case was led by the U.S. attorney's office for Southern California, based in San Diego, a natural base of operations since the main portion of his more than $2.4 million in bribes involved the sale of one home and the purchase of another in the San Diego area, orchestrated by a defense contractor and his co-conspirators.

An offshoot of the Cunningham investigation has been the probe into House Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.) and his ties to defense contractors and municipalities in and around his district to the north of Cunningham's former seat, which is now being led the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles. While the probe is examining Lewis' ties to lobbyist and former Rep. Bill Lowery and earmarks from Defense spending bills, the money has predominantly flowed into the suburban Los Angeles area near Lewis' district.

These are cases of U.S. attorneys taking the lead because the prosecutors and local FBI agents are closest to "where the crime took place," Sierra said.

But sometimes officials in Washington will have to step in because of conflicts of interest regarding a U.S. attorney's office and the Member of Congress under the microscope.

Recently, for example, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) has come under investigation for appropriations earmarks he steered to municipalities and entities which were clients of a lobbyist whose spouse, Vicki Siegel, was a top appropriations staffer for Specter. Some of those clients of Siegel's husband are in Philadelphia, but the investigation has so far not involved U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan, the top federal prosecutor in the city of Brotherly Love.

Meehan was a longtime counsel on Specter's Senate staff and won his spot as a U.S. attorney in 2001 largely because of Specter's patronage.

Instead, the review of Specter's appropriations work has been handled by the FBI's Washington Field Office, agents who actually work in a Falls Church, Va., office.

Public Integrity — a unit based in Justice's Washington headquarters with less than 30 attorneys — is running an investigation in Alaska into Veco, an energy services company that paid more than $250,000 to state Sen. Ben Stevens (R) for consulting services in recent years. The son of powerful Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), Ben Stevens had his legislative offices raided Aug. 31 as part of the Veco probe.

Nelson Cohen, the new U.S. attorney for Alaska, has been recused from that case along with many other prosecutors in that office. Instead, Sierra said, a few prosecutors there are working with local FBI agents and Public Integrity prosecutors handling the case. Sierra declined to explain why Cohen was recused.

Unlike other U.S. attorneys, who often rely on home-state Senators for their appointments, Cohen was appointed top federal prosecutor in Alaska in late August over the objections of Ted Stevens, who had been publicly pleading for an Alaska native to get the post. Cohen came to the job from being assistant U.S. attorney in Western Pennsylvania.

Recusals, for whatever reason, aren't always limited to political corruption cases. In the Enron investigation, the entire U.S. attorney's office in Houston was walled off from the case because so many prosecutors had ties to the energy giant, whether through their past employment at firms that represented Enron or through family members working for the company.

Joe Whitley, who oversaw the Criminal Division at Justice during the late 1980s, said sometimes the level of experience and resources in U.S. attorneys' offices can lead to cases being centralized in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0086526

"You are looking at the experience level of the offices involved," Whitely said, especially whether prosecutors in a particular U.S. attorney's office have ever successfully tried a corruption case involving a high-profile politician.

Public Integrity also has run the most prominent Congressional corruption investigation in recent years, the ongoing probe of felon-lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Sierra acknowledged that Public Integrity is in charge of that case because a large portion of the alleged crimes — including the giving of bribes in the form of meals and drinks at Abramoff's restaurants, tickets in his suites to sporting events, private jets to exotic vacations and legislative provisions in return — occurred in Washington.

Some investigations are based out of Washington, D.C., simply because that's where the cases originate, according to officials. Recently, Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.) was confirmed to be under federal investigation for his daughter's role in lobbying and consulting for Eastern European companies, which was immediately followed by a public raid on her suburban Philadelphia home and office.

All indications are that the Weldon probe was hatched by Justice and is being run by Public Integrity, not Meehan's prosecutors in Philadelphia.

Other corruption cases are run by federal prosecutors whose roles simply aren't clear. Such is the case with Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.), whose home and Congressional offices have been raided at various points by FBI officials conducting a long-running investigation into his ties with companies looking to do business in Africa.

The Jefferson probe has been overseen by the U.S. attorney's office in Eastern Virginia, based in Alexandria, not by Public Integrity or by local federal prosecutors in Jefferson's hometown of New Orleans. Some of the alleged crimes in the Jefferson probe have occurred in Virginia, such as the FBI raid on his Virginia home uncovering $90,000 in alleged bribe money in his freezer.

Sierra declined to say why prosecutors in Alexandria — long considered a more hospitable climate for jury trials involving federal officials than the District — are running this probe, saying to explain that rationale might reveal some of the investigation's details.

"The Congressman has not been charged yet," Sierra said. "Not all of the facts of that investigation are publicly known."

Rights Group Fires Publisher Of Foley E-Mail (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 25 — A liberal gay rights group said Wednesday that one of its employees, acting anonymously, had created the Web site that first published copies of unusually solicitous e-mail messages to teenagers from former Representative Mark Foley, which led to his resignation.

A spokesman for the group, the Human Rights Campaign, said it first learned of its employee's role this week and immediately fired him for misusing the group's resources. The scandal surrounding Mr. Foley, a Florida Republican, has been a burdensome distraction for members of his party in the month before the midterm elections, and some Republicans have speculated that the e-mail messages were planted by a Democrat.

The rights campaign's spokesman, David Smith, said the employee, whose name he declined to disclose, was a junior staff member hired last month to help mobilize the organization's members in Michigan. "The minute we learned about it we took decisive action," Mr. Smith said.

The Miami Herald and other news organizations have acknowledged obtaining copies of the same e-mail messages months ago but declining to publish them because of their potentially ambiguous contents.

After the messages appeared on the Web, at stopsexpredators.blogspot.com, the Web site of ABC News followed with its own independent report. The ABC News report resulted in the disclosure of more sexually explicit electronic messages that Mr. Foley sent to other former Congressional pages.

In the aftermath of the scandal, the creator of the sex predators Web site declined requests sent by e-mail to identify himself. Instead, he posted a message urging the news media to ask questions about "when the Republican leadership knew about it, what they did, how they were connected, what favors took place, etc."

The posting continued: "The true hero here is the page who reported the e-mails in the first place."

DOJ_NMG_0086527

Hastert Aide Goes Before Ethics Panel (AP-Y)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, October 26, 2006

An aide to House Speaker Dennis Hastert on Wednesday went before ethics investigators in private to explain how the office handled complaints about former Rep. Mark Foley's behavior toward former pages.

Ted Van Der Meid, who oversaw the page program for Hastert, R-Ill., appears to be one of the last witnesses. The House ethics panel is investigating whether lawmakers and staff aides acted properly when learning of Foley's too-friendly messages to ex-pages and other possible inappropriate behavior.

The panel is in its third week of hearing testimony and seems unlikely to complete its probe before the Nov. 7 elections.

Van Der Meid was a central figure in the handling of a complaint last fall from a former page from Louisiana. Hastert's office was alerted to the "over friendly" e-mails and dispatched then-Clerk of the House Jeff Trandahl and Rep. John Shimkus, R-Ill., to confront Foley, R-Fla.

Former top Foley aide Kirk Fordham has told the committee that Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, knew of earlier incidents involving Foley.

Foley abruptly resigned Sept. 29 after being confronted with sexually explicit e-mails sent in 2003 to a former page from Oklahoma.

No lawmaker has acknowledged knowing of sexually graphic e-mails. They surfaced only after news broke that Foley last fall had sent a too-friendly message to the former Louisiana page. But a small group of lawmakers and top GOP staff aides have known for years of inappropriate messages and rumors of bad behavior by Foley toward pages.

Rather than investigating Foley, the four-member investigative panel is trying to determine who knew about his behavior toward pages and whether more should have been done to stop it.

Trandahl was appointed to the clerk's post — with responsibility over the page program a prominent responsibility — and was in frequent contact with Hastert's office.

A key question for investigators is who else knew about Foley. Fordham's account has been disputed by Palmer, but Trandahl reportedly has backed up Fordham's story.

The panel may want to know what Van Der Meid knew about earlier incidents regarding Foley.

For example, the panel has been asked to look into rumors that several years ago Foley tried to enter the page dorm while drunk, an incident that Fordham has testified about.

Trandahl and Rep. Jim Kolbe, R-Ariz., learned in 2001 or 2002 of an episode in which Foley sent an ex-page inappropriate e-mails.

In those instances, Foley's inappropriate behavior with former pages have been handled by a few staff aides and lawmakers, rather than being investigated more fully. Foley's misbehavior did not cease.

The panel heard Tuesday from Hastert, who urged it to wrap up its investigation quickly. He said he answered questions to the best of his ability, but his recollection differs from other GOP leaders.

Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, and House GOP campaign chairman Tom Reynolds of New York have said they discussed with Hastert the "over friendly" e-mails from Foley to the Louisiana teen; the speaker says he does not recall the conversations.

Separately, Foley's attorney's revealed Wednesday that he is being treated for alcoholism at a facility in Tucson, Ariz. Foley has been in a 30-day treatment program at the Sierra Tucson treatment center since Oct. 1.

Second Man Accuses Former Priest Who Abused Foley (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

MIAMI, Oct. 25 -- Another former altar boy says he was sexually abused in the 1970s by the same retired Catholic priest who acknowledged fondling former congressman Mark Foley when Foley was a teenager, the man's attorney said Wednesday.

The new allegations against Anthony Mercieca were made by a man who lived in North Miami and was an altar boy at St. James Catholic Church, where Mercieca worked, attorney Jeffrey Herman said.

Herman said he plans to file a lawsuit against the Archdiocese of Miami. His client, now 40 and identified in the lawsuit only as John Doe No. 26, says Mercieca abused him when he was about 12 years old.

"He had been thinking about it before Foley came forward, and then when Foley came out and the church encouraged other victims to come forward, he decided to come forward," Herman said.

The man said "all of my nightmares came back" when Mercieca's picture appeared on the news last week amid Foley's allegations that the priest had molested him.

Foley (R-Fla.) resigned amid accusations that he sent sexually explicit electronic messages to teenage boys who had worked as pages on Capitol Hill.

Mercieca, 69, now lives on the Maltese island of Gozo in the Mediterranean. No one answered the phone at his home.

Archdiocese spokeswoman Mary Ross Agosta said: "Any of this type of behavior by Father Mercieca was unknown to the archdiocese and we had absolutely no information to indicate that the father did or would engage in any type of inappropriate or abusive behavior."

Washington Wire (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

Taxpayer-subsidized Amtrak — which faces calls to sharply reduce its long-distance train service — has been careless in managing law firms that have billed it millions in legal fees, according to a report released Wednesday by federal investigators.

The report, issued jointly by Amtrak's Office of Inspector General and the U.S. Department of Transportation Inspector General, said that the law department of the passenger railroad, for example, failed consistently to request and manage budgets for legal work. Also, law firms engaged in "block billing," in which firms lump tasks under one entry of an invoice rather than showing the costs of each task. The practice is prohibited by Amtrak's billing guidelines, the report says. "About 30% of the billings were block billed, which is actually not allowed," says U.S. Rep. John Mica (R., Fla.), a member of the House Committee on Transportation and Infrastructure who requested the probe.

From 2002 to 2005, according to the report, Amtrak paid more than $100 million in legal fees — $40 million of which went to 10 firms, which are listed in the report. In response, the chairman of Amtrak's board, David Laney, said Amtrak reduced annual legal fees by 26%, or $8 million, since 2003, and in the past five years, working with outside law firms, recovered $79 million in cash from legal settlements. Read the full article, download the report or see the full list of lawyers at Law Blog. – Nathan Koppel and Ashby Jones

Read more: Global, Domestic Policy

Permalink | Comments | Trackbacks

October 25, 2006, 6:58 pm Police Chiefs Push for Federal Money

Facing a rise in murders, drug shootings and armed robberies, more than a dozen police chiefs met senior White House officials on Wednesday to argue that there's a national epidemic of violent crime and they need federal money to fight it.

The 15 police chiefs said that during the 90-minute meeting with Rob Portman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, and several members of President Bush's domestic policy team, they stressed that they needed flexibility in funding to fight both terrorists and criminals, and that each community faced different risks.

"We didn't want them to think so much about homeland security that they forget about hometown security," said Atlanta Chief Richard J. Pennington. "I think they got the message."

The meeting comes two weeks ahead of the midterm elections, and the police chiefs said the rise in crime was becoming a political issue in some communities.

White House officials say they are well aware of a spike in violent crime statistics over the last year and are already been considering programs to fight the trade in methamphetamine, which is fueling the crime rise in some cities like Las Vegas. But the violence varies from city to city: Chicago and Miami haven't had increases; in Boston, homicides have hit a 10-year high and in Cincinnati a 20-year high, according to local crime statistics analyzed by the Police Executive Research Forum, or PERF, a think tank and police lobby group.

DOJ_NMG_0086529

"We discussed crime rates, the counter-intuitive fact that as federal funding has declined so have crime rates, and the current situation of historically low crime rates combined with spikes of violent crimes in selected cities. It's the kind of discussion that is valuable to have with those whose job is to put policy into action," said OMB spokesman Scott Milburn.

The White House said it would continue the discussions and would work with PERF to look for ways to address police concerns.

"We left the meeting hopeful that number they recognize the problems and number two they want to do something about it," said Chuck Wexler, the executive director of the group. – Robert Block

Read more: Global, Budget, Spending and Taxes, Domestic Policy

Permalink | Comments | Trackbacks

October 25, 2006, 6:53 pm VoteVets Makes Ad Buys

Democratic-leaning special interest group VoteVets, which was behind a dramatic body armor ad used to some effect in several Senate races, has now made ad buys in four House districts to complain that the Republican incumbents haven't done enough for Iraq war veterans.

The new ad features Tomas Young, an Iraq war veteran and anti-war activist who was paralyzed from the waist down in Baghdad. Young has been an outspoken activist, particularly for veterans rights, and in this ad, he takes lawmakers, including Minnesota Republican Rep. Gil Gutknecht, to task for voting a pay raise for themselves but not increasing health-care benefits for veterans.

According to Daily Kos, a similar version of the ad will also run until Election Day in the districts of Republican congressmen John Doolittle in California, Jon Porter of Nevada and John Sweeney in New York. The ad hasn't shown up yet on the group's Web site yet. –Amy Schatz

Read more: Global, Campaign 2006, Congress, Foreign Policy

Permalink | Comments | Trackbacks

October 25, 2006, 4:56 pm Oh, That Editorial

The Early Bird, the Pentagon's clipping service of all news military, carried an odd item today: A letter to the New York Times (which the newspaper hasn't published) about a Times editorial Tuesday that called for Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's firing.

Unlike the unpublished letter, the Early Bird chose not to carry the published editorial in its clippings. The letter, signed by Dorrance Smith, assistant secretary of defense for public affairs, gives the drift: "Today's editorial claims: 'There have never been enough troops, the result of Mr. Rumsfeld's negligent decision to use Iraq as a proving ground for his pet military theories, rather than listen to his generals.' Whether or not the Times believes there were enough troops in Iraq, the claim that any troop level in Iraq is the result of Secretary Rumsfeld 'not listening to his generals' is demonstrably untrue." It goes on to list what a number of generals have had to say on the matter.

That got us pondering the Early Bird's mission statement: "… daily compilations of published articles and commentary concerning significant defense and defense-related national security issues. The publications aim to represent how the public, Congress and the press see military and defense programs and issues. They are internal management tools intended to serve the informational needs of senior DoD officials in the continuing assessment of defense policies, programs and actions…" –Greg Jaffe

Read more: Foreign Policy, Iraq, White House

Permalink | Comments | Trackbacks

October 25, 2006, 4:39 pm Adjusting, Flexible, Changing, Dynamic Iraq Tactics

Eager to show that he's not simply staying the course on Iraq, President Bush used some variant of "flexible" five times, "adjust" six times, and "change" no fewer than 18 times in his hour-long news conference in the ceremonial East Room this morning. "This war, and other wars, they're not static. They're dynamic events," Bush said. "And we must adjust to meet those events, and we are." He also insisted that the U.S. and its allies are winning on a number of scores.

Bush

DOJ_NMG_0086530

Democrats quickly rebutted his claims. "The White House may be changing its rhetoric about staying the course…but the policies are the same," said Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, in a conference call with reporters. Although the White House has been trying to avoid the phrase "stay the course" for months, Democrats in recent days have sought to pin the label on the administration, as a way of reinforcing voter impressions of a quagmire in Iraq. The advocacy group Americans United announced it will run a TV ad campaign entitled "Change the Course," aimed at three Republican incumbents.

Bush's news conference was aimed at easing voter dissatisfaction with the war less than two weeks before the Nov. 7 election. It came a day after U.S. officials in Iraq laid out timetables for political progress and predicted that Iraqi troops would be able to take over most of the war effort in a year to 18 months. Wednesday's event also gave Bush a chance to repeat in blunt terms what he views as the rising stakes in the Middle East if the U.S. abandons oil-rich Iraq to its enemies. "It's a serious business," he said.

At other times, he playfully chided pundits who've awarded the election to Democrats, and suggested that Democrats themselves are "dancing in the end zone" and "measuring their drapes" in Capitol offices prematurely.

"See you on the campaign trail," he said as he finished up. –John D. McKinnon

Video: Bush press conference | Transcript

Read more: Global, Foreign Policy, White House

Permalink | Comments (1) | Trackbacks

October 25, 2006, 4:26 pm How Should We Put This?

The Federal Reserve's meeting this week was a two-day affair, lengthened from the originally planned one day so that the 18 members of the Federal Open Market Committee (one seat is vacant) could discuss how to improve their communications with the outside world. Carl Tannenbaum, chief economist at LaSalle Bank, cracked that if the policy statement released after the meeting – which was almost identical to September's - is any indication, the early signs are not encouraging. "After a half day to talk about communications, we got a statement that inserted one clause and removed another. This evolution in communications is definitely a slow process."

In truth, the Fed is unlikely to announce a shift in communications strategy in its policy statement. Minutes to the meeting, to be released Nov. 15, should shed more light on what was discussed this week. But it appears Fed officials are months away from announcing any substantive change to current practices. –Greg Ip

Parsing the Fed: How the October, September Fed statements differed

Fed Keeps Interest Rates Unchanged

Read more: Economy

Permalink | Comments (1) | Trackbacks

October 25, 2006, 2:07 pm Eligibility at Issue in Md. Attorney General Race

The candidates for attorney general in Maryland are practicing their legal moves.

A lawsuit filed last week by a state resident, who is represented by none other than Republican candidate Scott Rolle's campaign manager, challenges Democrat Doug Gansler's qualifications to appear on the ballot. The lawsuit argues that Gansler, the Montgomery County state's attorney, hasn't practiced law in Maryland for the required 10 years. In Anne Arundel County Circuit Court today, a morning hearing on the case was still in progress in the middle of the afternoon.

In an article in the Baltimore Sun about a Gansler-Rolle debate on Maryland Public Television last night, Gansler was quoted calling the lawsuit a "frivolous, silly, desperate" complaint lodged because Rolle "is 30 points behind in the polls." The Sun reported that after the debate, Rolle was asked whether he supports the lawsuit. "I am not condoning it," he said, then quickly added, "It is a legitimate issue."

The same issue doomed the attorney general aspirations of Democrat Thomas Perez in the September primary. –Mary Lu Carnevale

Read more: Campaign 2006

Permalink | Comments | Trackbacks

October 25, 2006, 12:08 pm A Ways to Go

Just how long might the U.S. be in Iraq?

DOJ_NMG_0086531

President Bush, at today's news conference, wouldn't answer directly. "You can't leave until the job is done," he said. "Our mission is to get the job done as quickly as possible."

But his response to a question about whether the U.S. wants to maintain permanent bases in Iraq indicated it could be years.

"Any decisions about permanency in Iraq will be made by the Iraqi government," Bush began. "And, frankly, it's not in much of a position to be thinking about what the world's going to look like five or 10 years from now. They are working to make sure that we succeed in the short term. And they need our help. And that's where our focus is.

"But remember, when you're talking about bases and troops, we're dealing with a sovereign government. Now, we entered into an agreement with the Karzai government [in Afghanistan]. They weren't called permanent bases, but they were called arrangements that will help this government understand that there will be a U.S. presence so long as they want them there. And at the appropriate time, I'm confident we'll be willing to sit down and discuss, you know, the long-term security of Iraq. But right now we're discussing how to bring security to Baghdad and what do we do in al-Anbar Province, where al Qaeda still uses violent methods to achieve political objectives." –Mary Lu Carnevale

Video: Bush press conference | Transcript

Read more: Global, White House

Permalink | Comments (34) | Trackbacks

October 25, 2006, 11:08 am Get Ready, Catholic Church Tells Immigrants

The Catholic Church is advising illegal immigrants to get ready for the day they're allowed to file for legal residency. "It may take a long time" for any legalization proposal to pass into law, notes the Catholic Legal Immigration Network Inc., a project of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops. But illegal immigrants should nevertheless start assembling the documentation they'll need to support their petition for legal status, it adds.

Among other things, the church's online posting at www.cliniclegal.org, advises illegal immigrants to get involved in their children's schools and in community and volunteer organizations, to enlist with their draft board and to pay income taxes. Those moves "can prove good moral character," a possible requirement of a legalization process, it says.

It also advises illegal immigrants to assemble documents that prove when and how they arrived in the U.S.—important evidence if Congress decides to legalize only those immigrants who arrived before a certain date. The church suggests collecting pay stubs, apartment leases, medical records, auto registrations, utility bills and postmarked letters addressed to them since their arrival.

It advises against being too bold about seeking official government identification, though. An illegal immigrant faces the risk of deportation "if s/he comes to the attention of the U.S. government," it says.

The House and Senate passed starkly different immigration bills this year, but neither bill one has any likelihood of passing into law this year. That means that both houses will have to introduce new bills when a new Congress is seated in January.

The House and Senate passed starkly different immigration bills this year, but neither bill one has any likelihood of passing into law this year. That means that both houses will have to introduce new bills when a new Congress is seated in January. Although President Bush has promoted pro-immigrant legislation, a bill would face better chances of passage if electoral gains next month give Democrats control of the House, where Republicans now lead a vocal anti-immigrant caucus. –June Kronholz

Read more: Global

Permalink | Comments | Trackbacks

October 25, 2006, 8:31 am Politicians Grow Wary of Survey

Project Vote Smart is being undermined by the same negative forces it's trying to combat. Working out of a former dude ranch in Montana, Vote Smart runs a Web site and a toll-free number that tracks more than 10,000 candidates running for federal and state offices. Along with gathering voluminous data on voting records, speeches and endorsements, the nonprofit conducts an exhaustive survey of the candidates' positions on issues ranging from abortion to welfare.

For years, the survey was catching on with incumbents and challengers alike. But lately, the number of candidates taking the survey has dropped dramatically. The reason: Many are afraid their opponents will use the information against them in attack ads. “We tell our candidates not to do it,” says Rep. Anne Gannon, the Democratic leader pro tempore of the Florida House of Representatives. “It sets them up for a hit piece.” Read the full article. – Peter Grant

DOJ_NMG_0086532

Read more: Global, Campaign 2006

Permalink | Comments (1) | Trackbacks (1)

October 25, 2006, 8:30 am Danger Signals From Voters Amid Prosperity

There’s something unnerving about watching an anti-incumbent tidal wave roll in at a time when the economy, by most macro measures, is cruising. The big economic bugaboos of earlier this year — rising interest rates and soaring oil prices — have both eased off. Even the Dow Jones Industrial Average is hitting historic highs. Yet a majority of voters who responded to last week’s Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll say they disapprove of President Bush’s handling of the economy.

Still, the economic backdrop for election 2006 should raise a warning flag about the future. Large numbers of Americans seem to have lost their belief in John F. Kennedy’s famous aphorism that a rising tide lifts all boats. “They know the economy is white hot,” says political analyst Charlie Cook, “but they also know they aren’t in it….There’s a feeling that some people are getting theirs, but we aren’t getting ours.” Read the full column. – Alan Murray

Video: Alan Murray says that it’s extraordinary for polls to reflect strong disatisfaction with the goverment’s economic leadership, given that economy is actually doing quite well.

FBI Eyes Contractor In Los Alamos Leak (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

The FBI is focusing on a subcontractor at the Los Alamos National Laboratory as the possible source of classified information from the nuclear-weapons facility discovered during the arrest of a New Mexico man on drug charges.

Federal authorities said yesterday that the subcontractor, Jessica Quintana, was questioned after Los Alamos police discovered the classified data during a search for evidence of a drug business after the arrest of Justin Stone, 20, Friday.

Miss Quintana, who authorities said shared the mobile home with Mr. Stone, has not been charged in the case.

"This appears to be a new low: Even drug dealers can get classified information out of Los Alamos," said Danielle Brian, executive director of the Project On Government Oversight, a watchdog that has exposed seven incidents involving the mishandling or loss of classified information at nuclear-weapons facilities since 2002.

Authorities said the Los Alamos information was located on a computer flash drive, a portable flash memory card that plugs into a computer's Universal Serial Bus, or USB, port and functions as a hard drive. Flash drives have been banned from the Los Alamos laboratory for the past two years.

Linton F. Brooks, chief of the National Nuclear Security Administration, said yesterday that "extraordinary efforts" have been made in the past three years to put strong security procedures in place at Los Alamos and other national laboratories to ensure that sensitive information is not compromised.

"Our job now is to assess what happened at Los Alamos, to determine whether procedures have been diligently observed, and to decide whether additional steps need to be taken," he said, adding that the agency's chief of defense nuclear security will "personally investigate the facts at Los Alamos."

Los Alamos Police Department Sgt. Chuck Ney said the classified information was located Friday at a trailer park in the city after officers responded to a domestic disturbance call. Police also found hazardous methamphetamine lab components.

Police then notified the FBI, and federal authorities began a separate investigation.

FBI Special Agent Bill Elwell in Albuquerque said a now-sealed search warrant was served in the case by agents, but he declined to discuss details of the ongoing investigation. He said the U.S. attorney's office in Albuquerque is "evaluating the information."

Los Alamos has a long history of security breaches. In December 1999, Wen Ho Lee, a Taiwanese-American scientist who worked at the laboratory, was accused of stealing secrets on the U.S. nuclear arsenal for China. After investigators dropped a 59-count complaint, Mr. Lee pleaded guilty to improper handling of restricted data.

DOJ_NMG_0086533

In June, the government and five news organizations -- The Washington Post, Los Angeles Times, New York Times, ABC News and the Associated Press -- announced a $1.6 million settlement with Mr. Lee over accusations that government leaks violated his privacy.

In 2004, Los Alamos was shut down after an inventory found that two computer disks with nuclear secrets were missing. A year later, the lab concluded the disks never existed.

Los Alamos Disks May Hold U.S. Secrets (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

The contract employee at the center of a possible security breach at Los Alamos National Laboratory had a high-level clearance that may have given her special access to intelligence intercepts and other closely held national secrets, sources familiar with the case said yesterday.

The FBI is examining at least three computer disks that police in Los Alamos, N.M., discovered last week during a search of a suspected drug dealer's trailer home, according to the FBI and other agencies. A woman who was living at the home and worked for a Los Alamos subcontractor has been linked to the disks by investigators, officials said.

Authorities said the disks appear to contain classified material. An FBI search warrant filed in connection with the case has been sealed.

The investigation -- which was revealed publicly on Tuesday -- is the latest potential embarrassment for the Los Alamos lab, which is under new management and undergoing changes designed to improve security. The lab is one of the nation's three nuclear-weapons-research facilities.

Los Alamos Director Michael Anastasio confirmed the potential breach of security in a statement yesterday. He said that the lab is cooperating with the FBI and is implementing extra security measures.

"This is a serious matter, and we are taking immediate steps to address it," Anastasio said, adding that "we intend to do everything possible to guard against any criminal activity, particularly where a breach of security may be involved."

The National Nuclear Security Administration, which oversees Los Alamos, said it has begun its own investigation and has sent a "cyber security team" to New Mexico to review procedures.

The case began after the Los Alamos Police Department responded to an Oct. 17 domestic dispute complaint at the home. Officers found drug paraphernalia and other evidence of methamphetamine trafficking, officials said. A search through records in the home revealed the computer disks, and the FBI was notified.

FBI spokesman Bill Elwell in Albuquerque said no charges have been filed.

"We are at the stage of going through the evidence and assessing its importance," he said.

Former Los Alamos Subcontract Worker Probed In Breach (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt

Bloomberg, October 26, 2006

Oct. 25 (Bloomberg) -- The FBI is investigating a possible security breach at Los Alamos National Laboratory in New Mexico after people familiar with the matter said local police found what may be classified information while searching a residence for drugs.

The potential security breach involves a former employee of a subcontractor at the nuclear-weapons laboratory, lab director Michael Anastasio said in a statement. He didn't identify the ex- employee or give further details. U.S. Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman told reporters in Washington the former employee was a woman and had worked as an archivist.

``We take this matter very seriously," Bodman said. ``It is on my priority list." He said the former employee had worked on ``archiving data from past history and making that available in electronic form so that it could be stored and accessed."

Special Agent Bill Elwell of the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Albuquerque office said local police called the bureau after finding ``evidence they thought would be of interest to us" while searching for methamphetamines at a private residence. The officers went to the home Oct. 17 in response to a call about a domestic dispute, and the FBI conducted a search Oct. 20, Elwell said.

Two law-enforcement officials who asked not to be identified said the evidence appeared to be classified information, stored in a computer file, from the Los Alamos lab.

Storage Devices

According to Los Alamos Police Department records, officers searching the home in a trailer park confiscated drug paraphernalia as well as three portable computer storage devices that allow users to transfer and carry data. Justin Stone, 20, was arrested on a warrant for a probation violation, police records said.

Anastasio's statement said the lab is ``fully cooperating with the FBI on this matter and we intend to do everything possible to guard against any criminal activity, particularly where a breach of security may be involved."

The Los Alamos facility has had security issues in the past. In 2004, work at the lab was halted when two computer disks with classified information were reported missing. It was later learned the disks never existed.

The laboratory also fired scientist Wen Ho Lee in 1999 after he was accused of passing nuclear secrets to China. Lee, who spent nine months in solitary confinement, was never charged with espionage and later pleaded guilty to one count of mishandling classified information. A federal judge apologized to Lee for the government's conduct in the case.

Man Once Held In Wales' Death Seeks New Venue For Gun Charge (AP)

AP, October 26, 2006

SEATTLE - A gun collector once jailed as a material witness in the assassination of a federal prosecutor is seeking a change of venue for an unrelated weapons charge.

Albert K. Kwan, of suburban Bellevue, says he cannot get a fair trial on the charge - possession of an unregistered machine gun - because in the public's mind, his case "is inseparably intertwined with that of the murder investigation of Assistant United States Attorney Thomas C. Wales," his lawyers wrote in a court filing this week.

Wales, an 18-year veteran of the U.S. attorney's office in Seattle and the president of the gun-control group Washington CeaseFire, was shot as he worked in the basement of his home in Seattle's Queen Anne Hill neighborhood on Oct. 11, 2001. The murder weapon was a Makarov pistol outfitted with a replacement barrel.

A nationwide search for the gun led the FBI to Kwan, who, agents say, purchased two of the barrels from a Minnesota company but has only turned over one of them. Kwan says he doesn't recall ever purchasing a second barrel.

In searching Kwan's home in January 2005, agents found what they say was an illegal, unregistered M-14. Kwan was charged with the gun count last month, although his attorneys say the weapon didn't meet the definition of a machine gun because parts had been welded to prevent it from firing automatically. They also insist the government brought the charge to "squeeze" him and ensure his cooperation with the grand jury investigating the Wales crime.

Last week, Kwan's lawyers filed court papers saying he would fully cooperate with the grand jury and take a lie-detector test.

Kwan's lead attorney, Joe Conte, said Wednesday he did not expect U.S. District Judge Thomas Zilly to move Kwan's trial on the weapons charge out of the Western District of Washington.

"It's very hard to win a venue change," he said.

Kwan was held for three weeks in January 2005 as a material witness in the Wales case. Conte said in the court filing that because of the news coverage, potential jurors are likely to "equate defendant's prosecution with the first killing of a federal prosecutor in our nation's history."

Conte has said his client was not involved in Wales' death.

The U.S. attorney's office did not have any immediate response to the request, said spokeswoman Emily Langlie.

An attachment to a separate filing by Kwan's lawyers sheds light on the FBI's search for Makarov replacement barrels.

The attachment, a letter from special prosecutor Steven Clymer to Assistant U.S. Attorney Bill Redkey in Seattle, says that the two barrels Kwan is alleged to have purchased were among 69 shipped by the Minnesota company, Federal Arms Corp., to addresses within a 50-mile radius of Wales' home. As of January 2005, when Kwan's house was searched, the FBI had yet to locate 30 of them.

The FBI said this month it has located and test-fired about half of the 3,600 Makarov barrels that Federal Arms sold nationwide prior to the killing.

DOJ_NMG_0086535

Family Faces New Charges In Military Secrets-to-China Case (MERCN)

By Gillian Flaccus

The San Jose Mercury News, October 26, 2006

SANTA ANA, Calif. - Five members of a family accused of scheming to send sensitive information about Navy warships to China were indicted Wednesday on new conspiracy charges, prosecutors said.

The indictment, handed down by a federal grand jury, added counts of conspiracy to export U.S. defense articles to China; possession of property in aid of a foreign government and making false statements to federal investigators.

Named in the supplemental indictment were Chi Mak, a U.S. citizen who worked for Anaheim defense contractor Power Paragon; his wife, Rebecca Laiwah Chiu; his brother, Tai Mak; Tai Mak's wife, Fuk Heung Li; and their son, Billy Yui Mak.

Li, 49, and her 26-year-old son already faced charges of making false statements and acting as agents of a foreign government, namely China, without prior notification to the U.S. attorney general.

Chi Mak, 66, Tai Wang Mak, 57, and Rebecca Laiwah Chiu, 62, were previously charged with one count of failing to register as a foreign agent.

The government claims that Chi Mak passed information about U.S. naval technology from his employer to his brother and that his nephew, Billy Mak, then helped encrypt the files onto CD-ROM computer disk. That disk was found hidden the luggage of Tai Mak and his wife after they were arrested in October 2005 at Los Angeles International Airport as they prepared to travel to Hong Kong and Guangzhou, China, authorities said.

Attorneys for the Maks said they were not aware of the new indictment until contacted by The Associated Press.

Ronald Kaye, an attorney for Chi Mak, said his client worked with sensitive information as part of his daily job, but never misused it or stole intelligence.

"My client is involved in an area of technology that is not classified - is not even prohibited from distribution," Kaye said. "It's a strong sign that they are desperately trying to find whatever counts can stick. They've overcharged this case consistently."

Stanley Greenberg, an attorney for Rebecca Chiu, also said his client was innocent.

"It really doesn't matter how they keep changing the format of the charges. The evidence will eventually show she's not guilty, because it all grows out of the same facts," Greenberg said.

John Early, an attorney for Tai Mak, said he had not seen the indictment and couldn't comment. Attorneys for Fuk Li and Billy Mak and the Mak family attorney didn't immediately return calls left after business hours Wednesday.

According to the FBI, Chi Mak told investigators his brother was giving the information to a researcher at the a Chinese university center that conducts operations research for and receives funding from the People's Liberation Army.

Prosecutors have said previously that authorities recovered from the disk restricted documents on the DDX Destroyer, an advanced technology warship. They also allege that they found two tasking lists in Chinese asking Mak to get documents about submarine torpedo technology, electromagnetic artillery systems, weapon standardization, early warning technology used to detect incoming missiles, and defenses used against nuclear attack.

The FBI originally arrested Chi Mak and his wife for investigation of conspiracy to steal U.S. government documents. That allegation was never charged, and no one has been charged with espionage in the case.

The new indictment includes three counts of actual and attempted unlawful export of defense articles for Chi Mak; one count of possession of property in aid of a foreign government for Tai Mak; one count each against Chi Mak, Tai Mak and Rebecca Chiu for making false statements; and one count against all five family members for conpsiracy to export defense articles.

Chi Mak is in custody pending a March 20 trial. The other four are scheduled for trial on May 15. Tai Mak and Billy Mak are in custody; Fuk Li and Rebecca Chiu are free on bail.

A hearing on several defense motions is scheduled for Nov. 17.

5 In Family Charged With Military Data Conspiracy (LAT)

By H.g. Reza, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0086536

One was an engineer on a submarine propulsion project. Defense lawyers say the government is straining to make a case.

Five family members already facing charges for allegedly failing to register as agents of the Chinese government faced new charges Wednesday after a federal grand jury indicted them on charges of conspiring to export sensitive military information.

The 15-count indictment unsealed in Santa Ana includes allegations raised last year against lead defendant Chi Mak and three of his relatives but never pursued by the government until now. Instead, Mak, his wife, Rebecca Laiwah Chiu, and his brother, Tai Wang Mak, were charged Nov. 15, 2005, with failing to register as agents of a foreign government.

The new indictment accuses them of conspiring to export technical data regarding sensitive submarine and warship technology to China, and possessing military-related articles aimed at aiding that country. They are also accused of lying to federal investigators.

Also named in the indictment are Tai Mak's wife, Fuk Heung Li, and their son, Yui Mak. The five family members live in Downey and Alhambra.

Prosecutors did not return telephone calls Wednesday but previously had said Chi Mak received requests for specific military information from unnamed Chinese officials. In the conspiracy alleged by the government, Chi Mak and his wife copied the material onto CD-ROM disks and gave them to Tai Mak. Yui Mak encrypted the data and his parents allegedly tried to take them to China in October 2005.

Chi Mak, 66 and a naturalized U.S. citizen, was the lead project engineer on a contract to develop a quiet electric-drive propulsion system for U.S. Navy submarines at Paragon Power in Anaheim.

Authorities said he had security clearance that gave him access to sensitive technical information.

His wife, Chiu, 63, is also a naturalized citizen. Both are originally from China, as are the other defendants.

Federal prosecutors acknowledged last year that the information Chi Mak and the others gathered was not classified. In fact, much of it can be found on the Internet.

Wednesday's indictment, however, says the president has the authority "to control the import and export of defense articles" by placing them on the United States Munitions List, apparently even if they are readily accessible to the public. Articles placed on the list can be exported only by agents of a foreign government registered with the Defense Department, according to the indictment.

The court document does not say whether the articles the defendants allegedly conspired to export to China were on the government's munitions list, or when they might have been placed there.

Attorney Ron Kaye, who represents Chi Mak, said none of the information in his client's possession was restricted.

"The government has a history of overstating this case," he said. "They said he stole government property and retracted the charge. They said he was engaged in espionage and they retracted the charge. They're throwing everything at him, hoping something will stick."

Early in the case, prosecutors also alleged that Chi Mak had obtained plans for a nuclear power plant in New York. Later, however, they said it was merely directions from the airport to the plant that he had downloaded. According to Kaye, Chi Mak's company had a contract with the facility.

John Early, who represents Tai Mak, said the government was "having a hard time picking a charge."

"If it took them a year to figure out that the information was on a restricted list, I'll be interested to see the government's evidence to support the charges," Early said.

Chi Mak, Tai Mak, 57, and Yui Mak, 26, are being held without bail.

hgreza@latimes.com

Enforcer Faces Charges In Trooper Threat (PHI)

By George Anastasia

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 26, 2006

Bodybuilder and mob enforcer Vincent "Big Vincent" Filipelli was ordered held without bail yesterday for allegedly threatening an undercover New Jersey State Police trooper involved in an organized-crime gambling investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0086537

Authorities said Filipelli, 53, made the threat at a South Philadelphia "gentleman's club" where a meeting had been set up to discuss a gambling debt he was attempting to collect.

The onetime competitive weight-lifter was unaware that the two men he was meeting with were both undercover state troopers and that one of them was wearing a body wire.

The meeting occurred in May at the Crazy Horse Too, an upscale go-go bar and restaurant on South Columbus Boulevard, according to a document made public during a federal court hearing in Camden yesterday.

Filipelli allegedly told the undercover investigator who owed the money that he would be hurt if he did not pay up.

"Filipelli [said] that he would track him down and put him in the hospital for a year," according to an affidavit filed by FBI agent James A. Titcombe, who worked the case with the state police.

Later, as he was driving back to Cherry Hill with one of the undercover officials, Filipelli boasted that he was a "made" member of the Philadelphia mob, according to the document.

"He was rather brazen," said state police detective Salvatore DeGirolamo.

DeGirolamo, assigned to the casino unit of the State Police Organized Crime Control Bureau South, declined to comment further about the investigation, which began in August 2005 and targeted a mob-run gambling ring. The FBI joined the probe in February, according to court documents.

Filipelli was taking bets and making collections for a South Philadelphia-based mob bookmaker, according to one source familiar with the probe. He and the bookmaker unwittingly began taking bets from the undercover trooper as part of a sting operation.

No one else has been charged in the case, which is built around secretly recorded conversations and extensive surveillance. Authorities emphasized yesterday that the investigation was continuing. More arrests are expected.

Filipelli, who spent Tuesday night in the Camden County Jail, appeared yesterday before U.S. Magistrate Judge Anne Marie Donio. The judge set a bail hearing for Monday and ruled that Filipelli would remain in federal custody until then.

Filipelli was charged with gambling, extortion and traveling interstate - from Cherry Hill to Philadelphia for the meeting at the Crazy Horse Too - to commit a crime of violence.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Jacqueline Carle, in seeking to have Filipelli held without bail, argued that he was a danger to the community. The tape in which he threatened the undercover trooper may be played at Monday's hearing to support that argument.

Donald Manno, Filipelli's attorney, argued that his client was not a threat. He pointed out that the alleged incident had occurred in May and that authorities had left Filipelli on the streets until his arrest Tuesday.

Filipelli also faces additional gambling, loan-sharking and money-laundering charges lodged by the state police. Authorities are expected to expand those charges to include weapons and drug offenses.

Detectives found a stun gun and what appeared to be vials containing steroids during a search of Filipelli's home in the 500 block of New York Avenue in Cherry Hill on Tuesday, according to the state police.

Manno said he suspected the federal charges were "part of something bigger." He said his client had rejected an offer to cooperate.

"He's not cooperating and he's not likely to cooperate," Manno said. "It just isn't in him."

Filipelli served more than four years in prison after pleading guilty to federal and state extortion charges in 1995.

At a sentencing hearing in 1996, a federal prosecutor described him as an "international-class athlete [who] basically became a thug" for the mob.

Authorities Arrest Reputed Mobster On Federal Charges (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, October 26, 2006

CAMDEN, N.J. (AP) _ Authorities have arrested a reputed organized crime family member on charges stemming from an investigation into illegal sports gambling, state police said Wednesday.

State police, working with the FBI's Philadelphia office, arrested Vincent Filipelli, 53, at his Cherry Hill home on Tuesday. They seized anabolic steroids and drug paraphernalia valued at $10,000, two stun guns, gambling records and cash, according to state police.

Filipelli faces state and federal charges related to a sports betting operation and the distribution of illegal drugs, specifically anabolic steroids, said state police Sgt. Stephen Jones.

He was being held without bail Wednesday at the Camden County jail, pending a federal hearing.

According to state police, Filipelli was a former bodyguard for John Stanfa, boss of the Philadelphia La Cosa Nostra organized crime family.

During an undercover investigation that included two state police detectives, Filipelli threatened one of the undercover detectives, whom he believed owed him a debt, telling him he would put him in the hospital for a year, according to state police.

Gotti Says Detective Helped In Killing Of A Witness (NYS)

By Jerry Capeci

New York Sun, October 26, 2006

At a secret session with the feds last year, John "Junior" Gotti fingered a former NYPD detective as a money-hungry rogue who gave up confidential information about a 1983 barroom murder — information that Gambino wiseguys used to kill a witness whose death has been officially ruled a suicide for more than two decades, Gang Land has learned.

Law enforcement sources said Gotti attributed his stunning account about the death by hanging of Vinny Cennamo to what he was told several years after the fact by mobster Angelo Ruggiero, a close ally of Gotti's late father who died of cancer in 1989.

Police reports state that Cennamo, a friend of the murder victim, fingered Mark Caputo, a burly 6-foot-2-inch, 300-pound "bodyguard" whom the elder John Gotti had assigned to watch over his son, as the killer and said he left the bar with Junior.

According to what Junior told the feds, Ruggiero said that he and two other cronies of the elder Gotti used crucial background information supplied by the detective to whack Cennamo and make it appear to be a suicide, the sources said.

At the time of the conversation, Junior told the feds, Ruggiero was on the outs with the Dapper Don, who was boss of the crime family by then and had placed Ruggiero "on the shelf," a designation that essentially stripped him of all his rights and responsibilities as a wiseguy.

In 1983,though, Ruggiero was a close cohort and fierce ally of the elder Gotti, and a man whom 19-year-old Junior often referred to as his "uncle." It was to Uncle Angelo's house that Junior went in the early hours of March 12, 1983, immediately after the fatal 2 a.m. stabbing of Danny Silva at the Silver Fox Bar in Ozone Park.

A day or two later, Junior told the feds, he drove Ruggiero to a meeting at the Sherwood Diner in Lawrence, L.I., where he saw Ruggiero give detective John Daly a $25,000 bribe as "insurance" that Junior, who had been at the bar but was not implicated in the slaying by any witnesses, would not become a focus of the murder probe, the sources said.

According to the sources, Junior said he watched from his car as Ruggiero gave Mr. Daly a brown paper bag that contained $25,000 during a brief meeting behind the diner. When the meeting broke up, Mr. Daly, who had interviewed Gotti about the brawl, acknowledged Gotti as he walked past the car and left the area.

Private Eye Says He Rejected Plea Deals (MH)

By Greg Risling

The Miami Herald, October 26, 2006

LOS ANGELES - Imprisoned private investigator Anthony Pellicano said Wednesday he rejected numerous attempts by federal prosecutors to negotiate a plea bargain in his Hollywood wiretap case because he didn't want to break the trust of celebrities, lawyers and other former clients.

"At least 10 times in this case I've been offered a plea bargain. It's not going to happen," Pellicano told The Associated Press in a phone interview from federal prison.

Pellicano said he intended to remain silent, even though he said Hollywood is infested with "great white sharks" who don't play by the rules and constantly lie to get what they want.

Pellicano, 62, has pleaded not guilty to racketeering and wiretapping charges and is scheduled for trial next year.

DOJ_NMG_0086539

He is the accused ringleader of a wiretapping scheme used to get dirt to aid clients in legal disputes. Prosecutors said Pellicano enlisted the aid of law enforcement and phone company employees by bribing them to collect information.

Scant details of the operation have been released. But prosecutors contend Pellicano illegally wiretapped Sylvester Stallone and had police officers run the names of more than 60 people, including comedians Garry Shandling and Kevin Nealon, through government databases.

Federal prosecutors said months ago that at least one more indictment was coming. But no new defendants have been named since "Die Hard" director John McTiernan was charged in early April. He has pleaded guilty to making false statements to an FBI agent and is awaiting sentencing.

Pellicano claimed the 112-count indictment brought against him and six other defendants was the work of an "overzealous" prosecutor.

"I don't think the government wants me badly, it's the prosecutor," Pellicano said. "Perhaps this prosecutor thought this would be a stepping stone to make him popular, get a feather in his cap."

The prosecutor, Assistant U.S. Attorney Dan Saunders, declined to comment.

Pellicano said encrypted audio files taken from his office during FBI raids won't lead to charges against any Hollywood power players.

The tapes "will do nobody any good to learn about my family life and my client life," he said.

Fourteen people have been charged in the case, with six pleading guilty to a variety of charges, including conspiracy and wire fraud. Charges are still pending against Pellicano and six others. One former SBC employee was acquitted by a jury last month.

Federal authorities also have questioned prominent entertainment attorney Bert Fields and studio bosses Brad Grey of Paramount Pictures and Ron Meyer of Universal Studios about their connections to Pellicano. All three denied wrongdoing.

Pellicano built his career by working for a galaxy of Hollywood stars. He found the remains of Elizabeth Taylor's third husband after they were stolen from a cemetery in a case that brought him widespread acclaim. He also worked for Michael Jackson when the pop singer was first accused of molesting a boy in 1993.

The federal government once relied on his expertise as an audio forensics specialist in several major trials, including the 1963 killing of four black girls in the bombing of a Baptist church in Birmingham, Ala.

Pellicano called that case the "shining moment" in his career.

He said people often accept plea bargains to save themselves.

"I won't be a rat for anyone no matter what the consequence is to me," Pellicano said. "If I spend the rest of my life in prison, so be it."

Silicon Valley Bank Manager Sentenced For Embezzling $1.13M (SDUT/AP)

Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, October 26, 2006

SAN JOSE – A former manager of a Silicon Valley bank was sentenced Wednesday to nearly a year and a half in federal prison for embezzling $1.13 million from her employer over a decade.

U.S. District Court Judge Jeremy Fogel ordered Rose Magpantay Valdez, 44, to serve 33 months, followed by three years of supervised release, and also to pay back all of the money she stole.

Valdez pleaded guilty to embezzlement in July, after an investigation by the FBI.

The San Jose resident worked for the Silicon Valley Bank from 1984 until 2005, serving as a department manager in the Santa Clara branch from 1995 until 2005. Valdez told investigators she began stealing money in 1995, moving funds from one general ledger account to another.

In her plea, Valdez acknowledged filling out debit and credit slips with barely legible, fictitious names. She'd initial the slips and submit them to another authorized employee to approve and initial. When the employee would return the slips, Valdez would replace the deposit slips with her own slips in the same dollar amount into her personal SVB account.

DOJ_NMG_0086540

Valdez continued depositing them in her personal SVB account for the next 10 years, with a brief hiatus in 1997, prosecutors said.

FORMER SJ BANK MANAGER SENTENCED FOR EMBEZZLEMENT (BCNW)

Bay City News Wire, October 26, 2006

SAN JOSE (BCN) -- A former longtime bank manager was sentenced in federal court in San Jose today to two years and nine months in prison and ordered to pay $1.1 million in restitution for embezzlement from her employer.

Rose Valdez, 44, of San Jose, worked for Silicon Valley Bank from 1984 to 2005. From 1995 to 2005, she was manager of the structured finance department at the bank's office on Tasman Drive in Santa Clara.

She pleaded guilty in July to one count of bank embezzlement.

U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said Valdez admitted in her guilty plea to stealing funds and placing them in her own account at the bank by taking advantage of a weakness in the security systems then in place.

As a manager, Valdez had the authority to move funds from one from general ledger account to another, with the approval of one of several other authorized bank employees.

Ryan said Valdez admitted to scribbling illegible names on credit and debit slips, getting other employees to initial the slips, and then substituting deposit slips for her own account for the phony slips.

The sentence was pronounced by U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel, who also ordered Valdez to serve three years on supervised release after completing her prison term.

The investigation in the case was carried out by the FBI together with the bank's security personnel.

Man Gets 12 Years For Porn (LUFDN)

By Jessica Savage, The Lufkin Daily News

Lufkin Daily News, October 26, 2006

Former church employee had more than 2,100 images of children on his work computer

A former Lufkin church employee was sentenced to more than 12 years in federal prison Wednesday for viewing child pornography on the job, according to a federal court document.

Troy Matthew Phillips, 32, who had worked at First Assembly of God, 2021 S. John Redditt Drive, was handed a 151-month prison sentence by a U.S. District judge after he was convicted of possessing more than 2,100 images of child porn on a work computer, court documents stated.

"This hefty sentence speaks volumes as to the seriousness of this crime," U.S. Attorney Matthew D. Orwig said in a press release announcing the sentence. "These crimes are not victimless. The exploitation of children makes it a tragic case for everyone involved."

In December 2005, a church employee noticed Phillips "acting very strange" at work while intently looking his computer screen, according to a court document. She suspected he was viewing porn on the screen, the document stated.

After senior church officials learned of the incident, they logged onto Phillips' password-protected computer after hours and found some images of nude children, including a photo of a nude child sitting in the lap of a nude male adult, the document stated.

Senior church officials confronted Phillips, who admitted he was addicted to porn, the document stated. A day later, his employment was terminated and church officials turned over the computer to FBI investigators.

Investigators found "numerous images" of children under age 12, including about 20 that were of infants or toddlers, the document stated. Approximately 80 images were considered sadistic in nature, the document stated.

There was also some evidence that Phillips had shared the porn on his computer with other people with use of the Internet, the document stated.

The Lufkin Daily News was unable to contact anyone at First Assembly of God late Wednesday for comment on Phillips' sentence.

As of 5 p.m. Wednesday, Phillips was being held in the Angelina County Jail awaiting transport to a federal prison.

DOJ_NMG_0086541

Killer Of 5 Florida Students Is Executed (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

GAINESVILLE, Fla., Oct. 25 — The serial killer who gruesomely murdered five college students here in 1990 was put to death on Wednesday by lethal injection, and relatives of his victims said afterward that they could finally feel the beginnings of relief.

Danny H. Rolling, 52, was pronounced dead at 6:13 p.m. at Florida State Prison in Starke, about 30 miles northeast of Gainesville. Witnesses said he stared toward them and sang a hymn-type song just before the drugs were administered.

"Maybe now that we don't have this on us," said Dianna Hoyt, the stepmother of one victim, "we can try and relax and live with the memories we have of our children and be at peace."

Mr. Rolling was 36 when he arrived in Gainesville shortly before the fall semester began at the University of Florida, a drifter with a criminal past who pitched a tent in some woods near campus. He followed two freshman roommates, Sonja Larson, 18, and Christina Powell, 17, to their off-campus apartment, raped Miss Powell, repeatedly stabbed both women with a hunting knife and mutilated their bodies.

The police discovered them on Aug. 26, after Miss Powell's parents reported that their daughter was not answering her door or phone. Later that night, the police found Christa Hoyt, 18, dead in her off-campus duplex. Mr. Rolling had raped and stabbed her, severed her head and placed it on a shelf.

The next day, Tracy Paules and Manuel Taboada, both 23, were discovered stabbed to death in their apartment, not far from where the other killings took place. Mr. Rolling attacked Mr. Taboada, a former high school football player, as he slept, then killed Miss Paules. All of the victims were University of Florida students except for Miss Hoyt, who was attending a nearby community college.

Gainesville, a small city of pretty homes and live oaks, was crippled with dread. The campus shut down for a week and many of the 34,000 students scrambled home, some never to return. Others bought baseball bats and Mace, put triple locks on their doors or slept in shifts.

Helicopters with searchlights soared over the city by night. Sorority houses hired full-time security guards, gun sales soared and some townspeople never left their doors unlocked again.

"There aren't words to explain the fear," said Jane Hamby of Pomona Park, Fla., whose son was attending the university at the time and who traveled to the prison for the execution, standing in a field across the road. "We didn't know what his next move would be, but the ones of us who could get to our children got them out of Gainesville."

A long investigation ensued, with 6,500 leads and 1,500 pieces of evidence. At first, the police focused on a mentally ill student who had been evicted from the apartment complex where Miss Paules and Mr. Taboada lived.

But in January 1991, the police discovered Mr. Rolling in a county jail south of Gainesville, awaiting trial in a supermarket robbery. He initially denied committing the murders, but DNA tests ultimately showed he was responsible. He pleaded guilty on the eve of his trial in 1994, telling the judge, "There are some things that you just can't run from."

Mr. Rolling was also believed guilty of three slayings in his hometown, Shreveport, La., but was never tried for those crimes. He attributed his behavior to abuse by his father, a police officer, and to an evil alter ego.

In prison, he drew disturbing pictures and wrote a graphic book, "The Making of a Serial Killer," with a woman who was his fiancée for a time. For his last meal, he asked for lobster tail and butterfly shrimp, prison officials said.

Across the road from the prison, dozens of onlookers gathered into groups for and against the death penalty. It was perhaps the largest turnout for an execution here since that of Ted Bundy, who was put to death at Florida State Prison in 1989 after being suspected of murdering more than 30 young women across the nation.

Two University of Florida students who had driven up from Gainesville said they were generally against the death penalty, but not in Mr. Rolling's case. They were only 6 when the murders happened, they said, but read all about them on the Internet after enrolling at the university.

"We feel connected to these murders," said Allison Kirkpatrick, 22, a senior. "It was a random year, it was random people, but it could have been our year, it could have been us."

DOJ_NMG_0086542

A wall near campus is painted with the names of the victims, hearts and “Remember 1990.”

Mr. Rolling was the third death row inmate executed here in recent weeks, and like the others he had filed a late appeal claiming that the lethal injection procedure was so painful as to be unconstitutional.

But Bill Cervone, the state attorney for the Eighth Judicial Circuit and a witness to the execution, said Mr. Rolling’s death did not seem punishing enough.

“To watch his death in such an antiseptic and clinical environment convinces me that the punishment does not fit that crime,” Mr. Cervone said. “We are, however, a society of laws, and the law governed what we carried out this evening.”

Laurie Lahey, the sister of Tracy Paules, said she had been reluctant to witness Mr. Rolling’s death but felt exhilarated afterward.

“Once everything quiets down, I’ll think about Tracy and I’ll be sad,” she said. “But right now, he’s gone. He’s gone.”

Plotting Crime, Street By Street (WP)

By Allison Klein

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

D.C. police have launched a new crime-mapping tool on the department's Web site, allowing anyone to create a map of a sliver of the city and immediately see what crimes have happened there this year.

Cartoonish icons are used to pinpoint crimes. If you map your neighborhood, you do not want the Zorro-like mask to pop up -- it indicates an armed holdup. Or worse, the red figure of a person lying in the street, which denotes a homicide. The site also features goblin-looking masks for muggings, money sacks for thefts, gas cans for arsons and cracked houses for burglaries.

But it's the easy access to the information, not the symbols, that authorities believe will draw people to http://crimemap.dc.gov . For example, it takes only a few clicks to discover that during the past six months there have been 15 robberies, 72 thefts and 18 vehicles stolen within 1,000 feet of Chinatown's Verizon Center.

Most police departments make crime numbers available to residents, and many have Web sites that allow people to search for the number of crimes in specific areas. But few can match the District's new site, with its searchable fields that include museums, stadiums, gas stations and check-cashing locations. The site's level of detail rivals or surpasses those of departments in Baltimore, Chicago and Los Angeles.

"Some people may think that if you tell people about crime in their neighborhood, they will be scared off," said D.C. police spokesman Kevin Morison. "We think if we give people information, they will be prepared."

Police Chief Charles H. Ramsey said he believes increasing the level of crime awareness will make neighborhoods safer. The information gets residents involved, he said, "so they can be even stronger partners in community policing."

When Long & Foster Real Estate agent Michael Dillon learned of the online maps yesterday, he joked that he might prefer to stay in the dark about crime. "It's kind of scary," he said. "Maybe I don't want to know."

But Dillon quickly noted that it will be useful for him to direct home buyers to the Web site when they ask the inevitable question: "Is it safe to live here?"

"We can't answer that. They have to look for themselves," Dillon said. "Everybody has a different threshold for crime."

Like most law enforcement agencies, D.C. police have been mapping crimes internally for years. They have used the information to look for trends and to help with officer deployment. Additionally, D.C. police have shared the data with residents at community meetings. But the department just started making the information available to the public on a widespread basis, largely in response to demand.

"They really wanted to handle inquiries about crime data," said Barney Krucoff, director of geographic information systems for the District and one of the creators of the online maps. "The benefit to them is they don't need to handle those in e-mail and paper."

Most crime information is updated daily, but homicides can take up to a week to appear. Most major crimes are included in the search using the department's preliminary data. Crimes such as drug dealing, prostitution, disorderly conduct and vandalism are not included.

DOJ_NMG_0086543

Krucoff said he thinks he has a good "first version" of the technology but is working on updating the program to include more information, such as arrests. The program took about four months to develop and was made by the city's technology department without specified grant or funding, Krucoff said.

Other cities that have crime mapping technology generally use colored dots to differentiate among crimes. Krucoff said his team decided to use the icons, which look like they are straight out of a 1980s video game, simply because they could.

"Maybe we're more creative than the other cities," he said. "We're a little prettier."

Police said they have not gotten any complaints yet about the symbols being too flippant for the serious subject matter.

The crime maps, which are not accessible using some browsers, are mostly tailored to home in on a neighborhood and will only show crimes in chunks of the city, rather than citywide. The largest area that can be queried online is a police district, and data can be searched as far back as two years.

And there are other limitations. The system will not map an area if a search draws more than 500 crimes, meaning that it is impossible to map a month of crime in the entire 3rd Police District, because there were 607 reported crimes there in the past 30 days. Instead, clicking on that district, which includes neighborhoods north of downtown such as Adams Morgan, Dupont Circle and the U Street corridor, will turn up a list of crimes broken down by offense.

Some police departments in the region want to add technology similar to that used in the District.

In Montgomery County, police spokeswoman Melanie Hadley said that the department is gearing up to provide crime data on online maps, but the system will not be available until the agency fully transitions to a new crime reporting system.

D.C. police said they have gotten positive feedback since the maps went online, and the suggestions they have gotten mostly have had the same theme.

"People want more data, presented in more sophisticated ways," Morison said.

Staff writers Ruben Castaneda, Tom Jackman, Ernesto LondoÃ±o and Theresa Vargas contributed to this report.

Justice Department Webcast Focuses On Hiring, Retaining New Police Officers (PADN)

By Brian Babcock

Palo Alto (CA) Daily News, October 26, 2006

Police departments struggling to hire and retain qualified police officers participated in a U.S. Department of Justice webcast Tuesday to discuss strategies for addressing the problem.

While there was a time when departments had the flexibility to reject would-be recruits, a new generation of qualified potential officers isn't interested in the profession, which many regard as short on pay and benefits.

"Most of us have been in this profession for a while," said East Palo Alto Police Chief Ron Davis, who took part in the hour-and-a-half webcast. "Not to date ourselves, but we come from a different era. ... The job became your life and I think, probably for good reasons, this generation looks at a more balanced and tempered approach."

About 25,000 people logged on to watch mayors and police chiefs from San Diego to Hattiesburg, Miss., discuss ways to grab and keep the attention of potential police officers.

As the panel jumped from topic to topic, a major theme of the webcast was the new generation's wants and needs. The panel discussed ideas such as speeding up the hiring process, which can take up to nine months, and using different techniques and technologies, such as the Internet, to recruit new officers.

"This is a generation that's used to instant results," said Maj. Jim Previtera of the Hillsborough, Fla., County Sheriff's Department. He said police departments have been too slow in utilizing tools the private sector uses to recruit new employees.

Previtera said his department reached out to the marketing firm that does the Outback Steakhouse commercials to help with its recruiting.

Davis said police departments need to ask themselves if the qualifications they ask recruits to have are unreasonable. Davis gave the example of denying a potential recruit because they'd tried marijuana once when they were in their teens.

"Our process is so unrealistic that we are encouraging our candidates to lie," he said. "Then we have a polygraph test to catch them lying and then ask them why they lied."

DOJ_NMG_0086544

Davis said he doesn't want to lower the standards for officers but wants to re-examine the hiring process. He also said departments might need to relax standards for facial hair and body piercings.

"We need to accept that they're different," Davis said. "They're not bad or worse."

The East Palo Alto Police Department is suffering from a high attrition rate. Within the last couple of months, the department has lost about six officers for various reasons and has hired two San Mateo County Sheriff's Department deputies. Davis has said he expects to hire as many as 12 officers within the next 12 months to flesh out the force.

Ed Daley, city manager of Winchester, Va., said in a taped feature that he doesn't believe there is a best practice for recruiting new officers. He said this generation has different priorities and police departments and city officials need to identify those needs.

"If we're going to be competitive ... then I think you either flex, change, adapt or perish," Davis said. "I think it's that simple."

E-mail Brian Babcock at bbabcock@dailynewsgroup.com.

CIVIL LAW:

The Supreme Court's Crusade: Fairness For The Powerful (NYT)

By Adam Cohen

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

When Jesse Williams died of lung cancer, his widow sued Philip Morris, claiming it misled him about the danger of smoking. A jury agreed, awarding her $79.5 million in punitive damages. The Oregon Supreme Court affirmed the award, calling Philip Morris's decades of deception "extraordinarily reprehensible."

The United States Supreme Court is hearing arguments in the case next week, and the broader business community has joined Philip Morris in asking the court to sharply reduce the damages. They are relying on a controversial line of recent cases in which the court struck down punitive damages awards that it deemed "excessive."

The Philip Morris case will tell us a lot about the John Roberts court, which may be the most pro-business court in decades. It is a test of whether the court will abandon its conservative principles to be activist and "rights-making" when the party that needs help is a large corporation. It will also reveal whether the court will continue on its current disturbing path of giving corporations more protection from excessive punishment than it gives to people.

The court began its punitive damages crusade in 1996, in the case of a man who sued BMW for failing to tell him that the new car he bought had been damaged and repainted. The man won $4,000 in compensatory damages and $2 million in punitive damages. The Supreme Court set aside the punitive damages award as so "grossly excessive" that it violated due process, but the court declined to lay out any clear standards for when an award was too high.

In 2003, in a fraud case against State Farm Insurance by a policyholder, the court struck down $145 million in punitive damages. It held that the award was excessive since compensatory damages were only $1 million. That 145-to-1 ratio was unacceptable. Due process generally required, the court held, a "single-digit ratio" between punitive and compensatory damages.

These rulings are remarkably "activist" by all the traditional measures. They take a vaguely worded constitutional guarantee — that no one shall be deprived of property without "due process of law" — and translate it into a right that is not at all apparent from the words' plain meaning. They attempt to turn the guarantee into a precise mathematical formula. And they substitute the judges' worldview for that of elected officials. If Oregonians believe punitive damages are too high, their legislature can impose a legal cap.

These activist decisions, which give corporations valuable constitutional privileges, relied on the votes of conservative justices, who are supposedly skeptical of "judge-made" rights. Justices Sandra Day O'Connor and Anthony Kennedy provided key votes for BMW. Justice Kennedy wrote the State Farm "single-digit ratio" opinion, and Justice O'Connor and former Chief Justice William Rehnquist joined it.

The contrast with the court's decisions on punishment of human wrongdoers is stark. In 2003, the court considered the sad case of Leandro Andrade, a father of three who was given a minimum of 50 years in prison under California's tough "three strikes" sentencing law, for shoplifting $153.53 worth of videotapes from Kmart. He argued that his prison term violated the Eighth Amendment. The Supreme Court — in a majority joined by Justices O'Connor and Kennedy and Chief Justice Rehnquist — could find nothing excessive in the punishment.

DOJ_NMG_0086545

Based on the Constitution's words, Mr. Andrade certainly had a stronger case than BMW or State Farm. The Eighth Amendment expressly bars "cruel and unusual punishments," which might reasonably be interpreted to cover imprisoning a man from age 37 to 87 for stealing $153.53. The companies claimed only that the punitive damages awards violated their "due process" rights, a far greater textual stretch.

On the issue of what is "excessive" punishment, Mr. Andrade's claim is also stronger. It is hard to see how it is excessive to make Philip Morris, whose market capitalization is $166 billion, pay a mere $79.5 million for "extraordinarily reprehensive" and lethal conduct, but not excessive to make Mr. Andrade spend what is likely to be the entire second half of his life in prison for a petty theft.

The question of whether there should be constitutional limits on punitive damages has proved difficult to resolve, and it has caused divisions in both the court's liberal and conservative blocs. (It is one of the very few issues in which John Paul Stevens votes with corporations and Antonin Scalia votes against them.) Whatever the court decides, it should develop a constitutional theory of excessive punishment that covers human and corporate wrongdoers equally, as the Duke Law School Professor Erwin Chemerinsky and others have urged.

The current doctrines make no sense, least of all by the standards of conservative constitutional interpretation. Conservatives like to talk about the "framers' intent." The framers were deeply concerned about excessive punishment, and set forth their views on it in the Eighth Amendment. They would be perplexed that the high court they created believes their Constitution permits a father to remain in jail for 50 years for petty theft, but does not tolerate taking a fraction of the wealth from a company that kills people.

Sticks And Stones May Break Bones, But Warsaw, Ind., Makes Replacements (WSJ)

By Timothy Aeppel

Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

WARSAW, Ind. -- When Don Running and his two partners decided to start up a company specializing in orthopedic plates and screws to mend broken wrists two years ago, it was a given that they would set up shop here.

Silicon Valley has computers. Detroit has cars. But in orthopedic devices, the undisputed world capital is Warsaw, a city of 12,500 with a silver-domed 19th-century courthouse and pickups angled into the curb on Main Street.

Part of a replacement knee from Zimmer Holdings, the largest orthopedics employer in the industry capital, Warsaw, Ind.

Three of the world's five largest makers of artificial joints and related surgical tools have their headquarters here amid the lakes and fields of northeastern Indiana. The local industry has grown so much that it's now a regional force, with orthopedics companies popping up in nearby farm towns and the suburbs of Fort Wayne, about 50 miles to the east.

"How many orthopedic-implant engineers do you find walking around most places?" asks Mr. Running. "Well around here, you bump into them in the supermarket."

Memphis, Tenn., and northern New Jersey are other industry hotspots, but none rivals Warsaw for sheer concentration. And while major orthopedics companies are looking overseas for cheaper places to produce items such as basic bone screws and metal plates, the U.S. retains a firm grip on the industry.

A big reason is that the U.S., with its population of fast-aging baby boomers, injury-prone weekend athletes and overweight people, is by far the world's biggest market for artificial hips and knees. The U.S. represents an estimated $14 billion of the annual spending in a global market of $22.9 billion, according to Knowledge Enterprises Inc., a Chagrin Falls, Ohio, market research firm.

The U.S. also effectively protects manufacturers in the sector with strict regulations for devices that go inside the human body. Rather than risk problems -- and crippling lawsuits -- U.S. health-care providers buy their artificial joints from companies they know, which generally means buying American.

DOJ_NMG_0086546

Profits are so good in the orthopedics industry that there isn't much pressure on suppliers to shave costs by going to low-cost countries. "The reason this business is in Warsaw and not Mexico is because margins are 70% or better," says Ron Clark, an orthopedic surgeon who founded his own company in Fort Wayne, which is on the other side of the state from his home in Valparaiso, in part so he could be closer to Warsaw. Dr. Clark says savings from going abroad just aren't worth it.

A worker (top) at Zimmer; surgeons (bottom) practice joint replacements there.

To be sure, the industry's dynamics may be starting to change. Health-care providers are starting to push back against the industry's steady price increases, raising concerns among investors about whether profits for Warsaw companies and others can keep up the brisk growth.

There are other shadows over Warsaw's future. The U.S. Justice Department has opened two probes of orthopedics makers in the past two years, including an antitrust investigation in which Smith & Nephew PLC, of the U.K., has confirmed that one of its independent sales representatives tried to initiate an industry-pricing strategy in response to a U.S. hospital's bid request. Other producers, including those in Warsaw, have said they didn't respond to the suggestion.

The big implant makers also received a separate batch of subpoenas in early 2005 regarding an investigation of any financial ties between them and surgeons who recommend their products. Doctors work closely with device makers to develop and refine artificial joints, and the companies have long paid surgeons as consultants and designers.

At least for now, though, Warsaw's orthopedics businesses continue to hum. The industry got its start here over a century ago, when a Canadian pharmacist, Revra DePuy, came up with the idea of making flexible splints to replace the wooden barrel staves then used to set broken bones.

The company he created thrived and exists today as DePuy Inc., a unit of Johnson & Johnson. It eventually spawned other companies, as people left to start competing operations. Indeed, Warsaw's largest employer is Zimmer Holdings Inc., founded by a DePuy salesman who broke out on his own in the 1920s. Today, about 60% of the workers who live within seven miles of Warsaw are directly or indirectly engaged in orthopedics manufacturing, says Joy McCarthy-Sessing, president of the local chamber of commerce.

Such a concentration of one industry in such a small town is unusual, but the larger phenomenon isn't unusual at all. Many of the strongest U.S. manufacturers set up production far away from urban centers, with their high taxes, labor, and utility costs, and instead look for locations in small towns, close to major highways and railways. Proximity to transportation hubs allows for smooth logistics in an age of just-in-time deliveries. Warsaw, for instance, sits astride a highway, U.S. 30, connecting Fort Wayne and Chicago.

Economists have long known that businesses thrive when they congregate in one place. Think of Hollywood movie studios, or the Route 128 technology ring around Boston. The same holds true in manufacturing. "Companies that operate in clusters have greater access to talent," explains Jeffrey Grogan, partner at the Monitor Group, a Boston strategy consulting firm. They also serve as fertile ground for start-ups.

Mr. Running's company, Deo Volente Orthopaedics LLC, is a prime example. Mr. Running first met his partners, Rod Mayer and Jeff Ondrla, when the three were working together at DePuy in the early 1990s. Mr. Running and Mr. Ondrla are engineers and inventors, and Mr. Mayer's background is in sales.

Mr. Mayer got the idea for the company after seeing that the market for "extremity" devices, such as plates and screws for fixing broken wrists, wasn't then as developed as it was for major joints, such as hips and knees. The three were eager to get away from big-company bureaucracy.

And as often happens in the close confines of Warsaw, the partners' connections stretch into their personal lives: They were attending the same evangelical church in 2004 when they launched the company. Deo Volente means "God willing" in Latin.

The three men agree it is a hefty advantage to have so much of what they need at their fingertips. "It's a lot easier to drive across town and visit a supplier then it is to pick up the phone and try to talk through some complicated issue," says Mr. Ondrla.

Warsaw is dotted with small support businesses, from packaging firms that specialize in super-clean processes to machine shops. There are even multiple manufacturers of the plastic trays and cases needed to pack orthopedic kits. A total hip replacement, for instance, can require up to 22 cases of equipment and each case and tray is specially designed.

DOJ_NMG_0086547

The region surrounding Warsaw has long been home to the U.S. automotive and machinery industries, churning out a stream of skilled machinists, toolmakers and industrial engineers. Orthopedics makers opening up shop in Warsaw found a ready supply of skilled workers, particularly in recent years as the more-traditional sectors have slumped.

Whole companies in the region have switched over to serving the orthopedics industry in recent years, including the small factory contracted to do most of the production for Deo Volente: Three years ago, Micropulse Inc., of nearby Columbia City, Ind., stopped doing any work for the automotive and other old-line industries -- which once accounted for over half of its business -- to focus on orthopedics.

"Half of our customers were closing, so we divorced them all," says Brian Emerick, president of Micropulse. His company is now growing 25% a year, he says.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

List Errors Might Impede Voters (AP)

By Deborah Hastings

AP, October 26, 2006

Between every registered voter and the voting booth is The List. And if you're not on it, you might not be able to cast a ballot.

One of the biggest changes wrought by the Help America Vote Act is the mandate that every state must have a voter registration database up and working by the Nov. 7 general election. But a dozen states missed the Jan. 1 deadline for finishing their databases, which produce lists of registered voters for every precinct. And four states have been sued by the Justice Department.

That leaves a confusing array of systems that may or may not work come Election Day, voting rights groups say. And it creates a growing anxiety that registered voters with every right to cast a ballot will be turned away because their names are not on the list for a variety of reasons, including something as innocuous as a typo.

"No issue is more important on Election Day than the quality of the list," said Doug Chapin of the nonpartisan reform group electionline.org. "Those databases are the final say on whether a person gets to vote."

The regulation was designed to assure that each state would have a central, independent repository for all registered voters - created by cross-checking voter registrations with existing state records to make sure dead people, incarcerated felons and others not eligible to cast a ballot were removed from the rolls. It was also supposed to make it easier to vote by having a single list instead of scores of county-based rolls.

Using driver license data and Social Security numbers, state officials were supposed to match that data to voter registration cards. It didn't take long for unforeseen problems to pop up. Someone may use a middle initial on his/her voter registration card, but not on his/her driver license. Married women may change their names, but not on every form of identification. Data entry errors can, and often do, occur.

"In theory, it looks like a really good idea," said Chapin. "But it's not as easy to match information on databases as they originally thought."

In September 2004, New York City decided to do a trial run. The board of elections sent 15,000 registration records to the Department of Motor Vehicles to match license numbers on the voter cards to those in the DMV. The results? Nearly 20 percent couldn't be matched because of typos made by city employees.

Earlier this year, the Department of Justice sued New York, Alabama, New Jersey and Maine for failing to implement statewide lists. The states have reached agreements with the Justice Department, most in the form of interim databases.

In March, the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University released a nationwide survey of voter registration databases. "Making the List" concluded the new list requirement could result "in millions of eligible voters being denied access to the polls."

Sometimes it's not the database that's the problem. Sometimes it's the technology for looking at the database.

DOJ_NMG_0086548

In Maryland's September primary, some precincts couldn't access the state database because of computer software glitches, and there were no printouts to consult. Some machines mysteriously rebooted without warning. Both caused voting delays. Officials said those problems will be rectified by Nov. 7.

But in some small counties, in states with smaller populations, databases are no trouble at all.

"We already know everybody here, so it's not a problem," said election official Bill Conway, who oversees the voting of about 7,000 people in Arkansas' Desha County. "I know everybody in the county, and they know me. We do our own database. We already know everybody who's going to vote."

See: www.electionline.org www.brennancenter.org

Black Groups Urge 3 To Resign From Ga. Election Board (AJC)

By Ernie Suggs, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 26, 2006

Key leaders of two of Georgia's strongest black organizations are calling for the resignations of three members of the State Election Board for mailing letters to voters that suggested photo ID would be required to cast a ballot Nov. 7.

At a news conference on the steps of the state Capitol, officials from the Georgia State Conference of the NAACP and the Coalition for the People's Agenda urged Republican-appointed members Tex McIver, Randy Evans and Jeff Israel to resign from the election board for their part in sending out about 300,000 letters that they say were designed to suppress minority turnout on election day.

David Worley, a Democratic appointment to the five-member board, and Secretary of State Cathy Cox, who is also a Democrat and serves as the board's chair, were not asked to resign.

"We believe this was a deliberate attempt to confuse the voters. A deliberate attempt to further disenfranchise voters," said NAACP President Edward O. DuBose. "The damage has already been done and we are asking those board members to resign."

McIver, vice chairman of the board who headed up the letter campaign, said he intends to stay in office until his term expires in 2008.

"I was voted in by the Georgia state Senate. Everyone in that room, including Democrats, voted for me," McIver said. "And I intend to serve until my term is up. I very much regret that politics continue to creep into the good works of the SEB. We are trying to get people to the polls as best we can. That is our mission."

Calls to Evans and Israel were not immediately returned.

Twice this fall, the board sent letters to 300,000 potential voters believed to not have a valid driver's licence or state-issued ID. The first letter, mailed in September, explained how to get a free photo ID, and suggested one was required to vote Nov. 7. About 200,000 of the first batch of letters were sent after a judge voided the state's new photo ID voting requirement Sept. 19.

The election board, under threat of a civil suit filed by former Gov. Roy Barnes, voted this month to mail a second letter clarifying that photo ID is not required to vote in Georgia.

For many, that is not enough. Rep. John Lewis (D-Atlanta) has asked U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales for a federal investigation into the mailings, and the Rev. Jesse Jackson is pushing the issue at a conference he is conducting this week in Atlanta.

When the original 300,000 letters were being prepared to be sent out — before the judge's ruling — the election board unanimously approved the initial mailing. But after the judge's decision, nearly 200,000 of the letters went out under the direction of McIver. Evans drafted the letter. Worley has said the mailing should have been stopped after the judge declared the law unconstitutional.

"Politics have mussed up the election process," said Helen Butler, executive director of the Coalition for the Peoples' Agenda, an alliance of more than 20 civic organizations and churches. "The board has violated the trust of the citizens of Georgia."

Manassas May Face 2nd Lawsuit (WP)

By Nick Miroff, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0086549

Discrimination Alleged Over Rejected Permit

The Manassas City Council's decision this week to reject the home business permit application of a part-time massage therapist has raised the possibility the city could face another lawsuit alleging discrimination.

West Street homeowner Howard Daniel, who is gay, says that a climate of homophobia pervaded the council's consideration of his application. The 4 to 3 vote Monday to deny his application has prompted him to consider legal action against the city, he said.

"There's little doubt that we're going to pursue this," said Daniel, who attended the meeting accompanied by a lawyer. "It's not over."

The threat of civil litigation hangs heavily over Manassas with the city already under investigation by the Justice Department for allegedly discriminating against Hispanic residents in violation of the Fair Housing Act. Some council members said they were frustrated that the decision on Daniel's application was being construed as discriminatory, saying that the matter was strictly a zoning issue.

"Most of the people who protested against him made it clear they like him as a neighbor," said Jackson H. Miller (R), who voted against Daniel's application. "What they don't want is a home-based business in their neighborhood."

Daniel, 44, is a licensed massage therapist who treats patients on a part-time basis in their homes and at Prince William Hospital. He applied to the city in July for a special-use permit that would allow him to see clients in the home he shares with his partner, Richard Devine, three blocks from the commercial district of Manassas's Old Town.

Since the City Council had approved permits for both of the other massage therapy home business requests it had received in the past, and Daniel's proposed client load was smaller, Daniel said he was encouraged to apply by the city planning office, which later recommended approval by the City Council. Daniel's immediate neighbors then signed a petition supporting his application.

But when the city had a public hearing Sept. 18, nearly two dozen city residents spoke against Daniel's request, expressing concerns about increased traffic, children's safety and the presence of "unknown" people in the neighborhood. Many were members of a local church, All Saints Catholic Church, who do not live in the neighborhood. An anti-gay message was later written on the car of one of Daniel's supporters, further escalating tensions.

Daniel has maintained that all of his opponents' concerns are addressed in his business plan, which limits his part-time practice to one patient every 1 1/2 hours, and specifies that clients will park in his driveway. But as council member Miller announced just before Monday's vote, the council had received another petition earlier in the day with the signatures of 20 additional West Street residents opposed to Daniel's request.

That wasn't the only last-minute issue. The council also received a letter from the American Civil Liberties Union of Virginia warning its members not to deny Daniel a permit on the basis of his sexual orientation because that would violate the Equal Protection Clause of the Constitution. Virginia ACLU legal director Rebecca K. Glenberg said the letter wasn't a threat to sue, but "people are free to construe it that way."

"It's unfortunate to see this business permit denied based on what appear to be discriminatory reasons and arising on the heels of Manassas's problems of housing discrimination against Latino Americans," Glenberg said.

During the meeting, Mayor Douglas S. Waldron (R) warned council members to be "very careful" about what they said, given the legal and media scrutiny brought by the case and the allegations.

"We all struggled with this vote and have gotten e-mails from all over the country," council member Steven S. Smith (R) said just before the vote. "And here we are."

Council members Andrew L. Harrover (R), Harry J. Parrish (R) and J. Steven Randolph (I) voted for Daniel's permit. Voting against it were Miller, Marc T. Aveni (R), Smith and Waldron, who cast the tiebreaking vote.

Right Hopes For Boost From N.J. Ruling (FWNS)

By David Crary

The Fort Wayne News-Sentinel, October 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0086550

The New Jersey Supreme Court ruling Wednesday that ordered equal rights for same-sex couples was instantly hailed by gay-rights leaders, but it also energized their conservative adversaries, who predicted a backlash in their favor in the Nov. 7 election.

"This is a wake-up call for people who believe that marriage doesn't need constitutional protection," said Glen Lavy, senior counsel for the Alliance Defense Fund, which has opposed same-sex marriage in numerous court cases nationwide.

Bill Donohue, president of the Catholic League, called the ruling "a plus" on the premise it would stir up resentment of "arrogant judges" and boost conservative election prospects.

Eight states - Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin - will be voting Nov. 7 on constitutional amendments that would ban same-sex marriages and, in most cases, civil unions as well.

To conservative activists, the logic is that right-of-center voters who may have felt alienated by events such as the House page scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley will now be motivated to go to the polls. And those voters will be more inclined to pull the lever for Republican candidates in key races such as that of GOP Sen. George Allen in Virginia.

Gay rights leaders disagree, saying gay marriage is not as volatile an issue as it was in the 2004 election, which took place only months after the nation's first legal gay marriages in Massachusetts.

Joe Solmonese, president of the Human Rights Campaign, noted that the New Jersey high court had given the state legislature 180 days to decide whether to offer same-sex couples marriage or some other form of partnership such as civil unions.

"The ability of the radical right to whip their base into a frenzy is limited," Solmonese said. "Voters are angry - they're looking for their leaders to talk about issues like the war in Iraq, and aren't having any part of throwing a group of Americans out there as a wedge issue."

Evan Wolfson, a gay-rights lawyer who heads Freedom to Marry, said the eight anti-gay marriage amendments likely would have passed even without the New Jersey ruling.

"It's always been an uphill fight to defeat any of these attack measures," he said. "I don't think today's ruling will make much difference. If we see margins of defeat smaller than before, that will be sign of progress."

Twenty states have previously passed constitutional amendments aimed at blocking gay marriage, mostly by large margins. But gay-rights activists have nurtured hopes of breaking that streak in one or more of the eight states with marriage ballot measures this year.

Hopes for an upset victory have been particularly high in Wisconsin, where a broad coalition of unions, church leaders, students and others has been opposing the proposed ban.

Mike Tate, campaign leader for the anti-ban group Fair Wisconsin, was hopeful that voters would not overreact to the New Jersey ruling.

"I don't think this decision is going to help the other side mobilize its base," he said. "They will try, but I don't think today changes one iota and one vote in Wisconsin."

However, Julaine Appling, head of the campaign advocating the marriage ban, said the court ruling only helped what she already considered a winning cause.

"At the expense of the people of New Jersey, this is the very best example of what our amendment is trying to prevent," she said. "This is a court redefining marriage without any input directly or indirectly from the people."

Matt Daniels, who as head of the Alliance for Marriage has been seeking a federal constitutional ban on gay marriage, said the New Jersey ruling would re-energize his cause - even if Democrats gain seats in Congress and thus diminish the prospects for such an amendment.

"We're not going to fold up our tents and go home," Daniels said. "This is going to be settled at the national level, one way or the other. We can't have a cohesive society if it's left to the option of the states."

New Jersey Court Orders Equality For Gay Couples (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin And Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0086551

New Jersey's Supreme Court ordered legal equality for same-sex couples, in a politically charged ruling that the state constitution gives them the same rights as married heterosexuals. But the court left it to the Legislature to decide whether to formally recognize such unions as marriage.

In an opinion seeking to balance a sexual minority's rights with the social mores of the majority, Justice Barry Albin distinguished between the "right to marry" and the "rights of marriage," ruling that New Jersey's constitution guarantees same-sex couples the substantive elements of the latter, but not the symbolic meaning of the former.

THE COURT'S DECISION

1

Read the court's statement (pdf file)2 issued with its decision in Lewis v. Harris, by arrangement with FindLaw3.

"Although we cannot find that a fundamental right to same-sex marriage exists in this state, the unequal dispensation of rights and benefits to committed same-sex partners can no longer be tolerated," Justice Albin wrote for the majority in the 4-3 decision. New Jersey had adopted several laws codifying gay rights, including a 2004 law giving same-sex couples many of the rights of married couples.

The three dissenters contended that the majority didn't go far enough, arguing that gays were entitled to the label as well as the rights of marriage.

Coming less than two weeks before midterm elections, the ruling quickly entered the political fray, with Republicans hoping it would energize their base of social conservative voters.

New Jersey Sen. Robert Menendez, a Democrat, is seen as his party's most vulnerable incumbent. In a statement, Mr. Menendez backed the court decision. "I have always believed marriage is between a man and a woman," he said, but gay couples "with a lifetime commitment to each other" should enjoy full legal rights.

The Republican challenger for the U.S. Senate, state Sen. Tom Kean Jr., opposed New Jersey's 2004 Domestic Partnership Act and said the state constitution should be amended to overturn the court ruling, according to a spokeswoman.

Republicans hope yesterday's decision will draw attention to ballot initiatives in eight states -- Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin -- that would ban same-sex marriage. Twenty states already have adopted such constitutional provisions; an Ohio initiative is credited with giving President Bush a critical edge in the 2004 presidential race.

But the New Jersey decision gives Republicans little ammunition to argue their judicial nominees will hold the line on gay rights. All three dissenters, who found that the state constitution requires full gay marriage, were appointed by a Republican governor, Christine Todd Whitman. One Whitman appointee joined the more-conservative majority, along with three appointees of former Gov. James McGreevey, a Democrat who resigned in 2004 after acknowledging his own homosexuality.

The New Jersey ruling modified a 2005 lower-court decision that likewise found no right to gay marriage, but stopped short of ordering the Legislature to equalize the rights of same-sex couples with heterosexuals. The 2005 opinion suggested gay couples could challenge specific laws that denied them the same rights as married couples.

The decision gives the Legislature 180 days to include gays within the definition of marriage or grant them equal rights under some other name. It follows the lead set by Vermont and Connecticut, which provide gay civil unions equality with marriage. Massachusetts, under a ruling of its highest court, is the only state to permit gay marriage.

The New Jersey court said it recognized "the cultural clash over same-sex marriage" and that the term "marriage" holds "an evocative and important meaning to both parties." In granting homosexuals the substance but not the symbolism of marriage, Justice Albin wrote, "We do not have to take...[an] all or nothing approach."

Prof. Frank Askin, at Rutgers Law School in Newark, N.J., said the ruling could cost employers who likely would be required to treat gay couples equally with married couples. "If benefits are provided to spouses, I think they will have to be provided to homosexual couples as well," he said.

Ruling On Gays May Echo At Polls (USAT)

By Charisse Jones And Andrea Stone

USA Today, October 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0086552

Same-sex couples in New Jersey must be given all the benefits and rights enjoyed by married men and women, but state lawmakers will have to decide whether they can officially wed, the state's highest court ruled Wednesday.

The ruling leaves open the possibility that state lawmakers will follow the lead of Vermont and Connecticut and allow "civil unions." Such unions afford same-sex couples the same state rights as marriage but not the title. New Jersey lawmakers have 180 days to respond to the court's mandate. Massachusetts, which authorized same-sex marriage in 2003, remains the only state that allows gays to legally wed.

The New Jersey ruling comes less than two weeks before the Nov. 7 elections in which Republicans are battling to retain control of Congress.

Tony Perkins of the conservative Family Research Council predicted that the ruling would "give momentum" to efforts in eight states to pass constitutional amendments outlawing same-sex marriages.

Conservative activist Gary Bauer, head of the group American Values, said the ruling could swell the turnout of conservative Republicans in general.

"We're already noticing that those voters are getting more engaged, so there could be a surprise on Election Day," Bauer said. "This decision, particularly because it's a court decision, reminds voters that who controls the Senate makes a difference."

Sherry Bebitch Jeffe, a political scientist at the University of Southern California, said the ruling "will remind people in those eight states that the question is alive" but doubted it will energize conservative voters elsewhere.

Forty-five states have laws or constitutional amendments barring gay marriage. New Jersey has neither.

The case the New Jersey court ruled on Wednesday was filed on behalf of seven gay couples who argued that being denied the right to marry violated equal-protection guarantees in the state's constitution. "Although we cannot find that a fundamental right to same-sex marriage exists in this state, the unequal dispensation of rights and benefits to committed same-sex partners can no longer be tolerated under our state constitution," Associate Justice Barry Albin wrote in the decision by the court.

"This is very much a victory for same-sex couples in New Jersey because the court has sent a clear message that they deserve the same protections as all the long-term, committed heterosexual couples in that state," said Joe Solmonese, president of the Human Rights Campaign, a national gay civil rights group.

The ruling throws another issue into the close race between Sen. Robert Menendez, D-N.J., and his Republican challenger, state Sen. Tom Kean. The race is critical to which party controls the Senate.

It forces them to "talk about an issue they would prefer not to, a complex value issue on which reasonable people disagree," said David Rebovich of the Rider Institute for New Jersey Politics.

Menendez and Kean said they believe marriage is between a man and a woman. "I would support an amendment to the state constitution reaffirming that," Kean said. Menendez said he supports civil unions.

N.J. Court Opens Door To Gay Marriage (AP-Y)

By Geoff Mulvihill

AP, October 26, 2006

New Jersey's highest court opened the door Wednesday to making the state the second in the nation to allow gay marriage, ruling that lawmakers must offer same-sex couples either marriage or something like it, such as civil unions.

In a ruling that fell short of what either side wanted or most feared, the state Supreme Court declared that gay couples are entitled to the same rights as heterosexual ones. The justices gave lawmakers 180 days to rewrite the laws.

The ruling is similar to the 1999 high-court ruling in Vermont that led the state to create civil unions, which confer all of the rights and benefits available to married couples under state law.

"Although we cannot find that a fundamental right to same-sex marriage exists in this state, the unequal dispensation of rights and benefits to committed same-sex partners can no longer be tolerated under our state Constitution," Justice Barry T. Albin wrote for the four-member majority.

The court said the Legislature "must either amend the marriage statutes to include same-sex couples or create a parallel statutory structure" that gives gays all the privileges and obligations married couples have.

DOJ_NMG_0086553

The vote was 4-3, with the three dissenting justices arguing that the majority did not go far enough. They asserted that gay couples should have the "right to the title of marriage" as well as its benefits.

Gay rights activists had seen New Jersey as a promising place because it is a largely Democratic state in the Northeast. The only state to allow gay marriage is Massachusetts. The only states allowing civil unions are Vermont and Connecticut. New Jersey is also one of just five states that have no law or constitutional amendment expressly banning gay marriage.

If the court had legalized gay marriage outright, the effect could have been more far-reaching, and New Jersey could have become more of a magnet for gay couples than Massachusetts, which has a law barring out-of-state couples from marrying there if their marriages would not be recognized in their home states. New Jersey has no such law.

A clear-cut ruling legalizing gay marriage this close to Election Day could also have been a political bombshell, galvanizing Republicans and the religious right. Eight states have gay marriage bans on their ballots in November.

New Jersey Republicans, who are in the minority in the Legislature, said they would work to ban same-sex unions by enacting a constitutional amendment.

For gay rights advocates, there was debate over whether the ruling was a victory.

Lara Schwartz, legal director of Human Rights Campaign, said if legislators have to choose between civil unions and marriage, it is a no-lose situation for gay couples. "They get to decide whether it's chocolate or double-chocolate chip," Schwartz said.

Steven Goldstein, executive director of Garden State Equality, New Jersey's main gay rights group, said his organization wants nothing short of marriage. "We get to go from the back of the bus to the middle of the bus," he complained.

The New Jersey high court castigated the treatment same-sex couples receive under the law.

"The seeming ordinariness of plaintiffs' lives is belied by the social indignities and economic difficulties that they daily face due to the inferior legal standing of their relationships compared to that of married couples," the court said.

Outside the court, news of the ruling caused confusion, with many of the roughly 100 gay marriage supporters outside asking each other what it meant.

"I'm definitely encouraged," said Chris Lodewyks, one of the plaintiffs who gathered at a Newark law office. But he added, "I'm not sure what this exactly means in terms of marriage."

Another plaintiff, Saundra Toby-Heath, was more effusive: "I feel they were listening and paying attention to us as human beings who wanted to have the same rights."

Garden State Equality, New Jersey's main gay political organization, quickly announced that three lawmakers would introduce a bill in the Legislature to give full marriage rights to gay couples.

"New Jersey is a progressive state and has a tradition of tolerance," said one of the lawmakers, Democratic Assemblyman Reed Gusciora.

GOP Assemblyman Richard Merkt said he would seek to have all seven justices impeached. "Neither the framers of New Jersey's 1947 constitution, nor the voters who ratified it, ever remotely contemplated the possibility of same-sex marriage," Merkt said.

Gay couples in New Jersey can already apply for domestic partnerships under a law passed in 2004. Among other things, domestic partnerships give couples the right to inherit possessions if there is no will and health care coverage for partners of state employees.

Democratic Gov. Jon S. Corzine supports domestic partnerships, but not gay marriage.

Former Gov. James E. McGreevey, who resigned in 2004 after announcing that he was gay and had an affair with a male staff member, praised the court's decision. "I applaud the court's courage," McGreevey said. "I regret not having had the fortitude to embrace this right during my tenure as governor."

Supporters pushing for full gay marriage have had a two-year losing streak in state courts, including those in New York, Washington state, and both Nebraska and Georgia, where voter-approved bans on gay marriage were reinstated.

They also have suffered at the ballot boxes in 20 states where constitutions have been amended to ban same-sex unions.

Cases similar to the one ruled on Wednesday, which was filed by seven gay New Jersey couples, are pending in California, Connecticut, Iowa and Maryland.

DOJ_NMG_0086554

New Jersey's Justices Agree On All But The 'M' Word (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

It was a 4-to-3 decision, but all that divided the two sides in yesterday's New Jersey Supreme Court ruling on how the state should treat gay couples was a single word: marriage.

"What's in a name?" Justice Barry T. Albin mused in the majority decision.

The answer, it seems, is a lot.

All seven justices were in vehement agreement that gay and lesbian unions must be guaranteed all of the rights and benefits that come with heterosexual marriages. And all agreed that it was the court's role, in interpreting the State Constitution, to ensure that gay partnerships were in every legal particular equal in status to marriage.

But the vocabulary, the majority continued, must be committed to politics. "If the age-old definition of marriage is to be discarded," Justice Albin wrote in the decision, "such change must come from the crucible of the democratic process."

The court gave the State Legislature 180 days to come up with legislation guaranteeing gay people a legal mechanism to have their unions recognized in identical practical terms as those afforded to heterosexual marriages. It left for another day the question of whether the contours of and, more important, the label attached to that mechanism would satisfy the State Constitution.

The three dissenting justices would have gone further and faster, insisting that gay people are entitled not only to the particulars of marriage but also to the symbolism that surrounds it. "We must not underestimate the power of language," Chief Justice Deborah T. Poritz wrote for the dissenters.

The majority opinion, legal experts said, has found a political sweet spot.

"This makes sense as statesmanship," said Andrew Koppelman, a law professor at Northwestern University and the author of "Same Sex, Different States." "The word 'marriage' seems to push people's buttons in a major way."

The high court in Massachusetts, the only state that allows gay marriage, ruled that civil unions were not an adequate substitute. In a 2004 decision, one of its justices boiled the dispute down to a single letter. "We have a pitched battle over who gets to use the 'm' word," Justice Martha B. Sosman wrote in a dissent.

Though the seven gay couples who sued for the right to marry in New Jersey had insisted that nothing less would suffice and that marriage by another name was stigmatizing and discriminatory, their lawyers expressed satisfaction with yesterday's result on a practical level.

"It's a win," said Susan L. Sommer, a lawyer with the Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund, which represents the couples. "We would have liked marriage tomorrow, but this is great progress."

Opponents of gay marriage said they were troubled by what the court left open. "I sort of think this is a temporary reprieve," said Maggie Gallagher, the president of the Institute for Marriage and Public Policy. "The Legislature could do civil unions, but the court has reserved the right to rule two or five years down the road that that's not good enough."

As they looked forward, though, the two sides were focused on symbols as much as on legal rights.

The meaning of marriage is special, said Evan Wolfson, the executive director of Freedom to Marry, a nonpartisan gay rights group.

"You wear it on your hand," he said. "Language matters. Symbols matter. One of the main protections that comes with marriage is the vocabulary that everyone understands."

Ms. Gallagher used similar phrases to reach an opposite conclusion. "Ideas matter," she said. "Marriage as a legal structure is not nearly as important as it is as an instrument of civil society."

The major shortcoming in the majority decision, she added, was its failure to engage some of the possible values and social implications of marriage. "The court really refused to consider the idea that marriage has anything to do with procreation and paternity," she said.

High courts in New York and Washington relied on those interests to justify bans on gay marriage in their states, but the New Jersey attorney general's office, to the dismay of many opponents of gay marriage, did not press those arguments.

DOJ_NMG_0086555

Should the State Legislature ultimately give gay unions a name other than marriage, Mr. Wolfson said, it would amount to discrimination. "I don't think there is an American in the country," he said, "who would cash in their marriage in exchange for a civil union."

Mr. Wolfson said that the New Jersey Legislature should "end discrimination in marriage, not repackage it."

In their dueling opinions yesterday, the two sets of justices agreed on at least this much: the meaning of a single word is now a crucial battleground in the culture wars.

What they disagreed about is who should decide what it means. The majority said it was the Legislature; the dissenters said the courts.

In an aside, though, Justice Albin noted that in any event, "same-sex couples will be free to call their relationship by the name they choose."

The dissenting justices suggested the court's failure to require gay marriage as such was tantamount to the endorsement of pernicious discrimination.

"Labels set people apart as surely as physical separation on a bus or in school facilities," Chief Justice Poritz wrote.

Justice Albin responded that courts can do only so much. "Plaintiffs seek not just legal standing," he wrote, "but also social acceptance."

Gay Marriage Backers Plan Big Push To Sway Trenton Lawmakers (NYT)

By David Kocieniewski

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

TRENTON, Oct. 25 — The New Jersey Supreme Court may have conferred the rights of married couples to same-sex partners in a long-awaited decision on Wednesday, but it also made it clear that the fight for gay marriage did not end with its decision.

The next appeal for gay rights advocates, the court emphasized, "must be to their fellow citizens whose voices are heard through their popularly elected representatives."

The issue revolves around a single word — whether to call this newly constructed relationship, which has all the rights and obligations of marriage — a marriage.

But it will be far from simple when the issue lands a few blocks away at the State House, where the governor and the Legislature have 180 days, according to the court, to come up with an answer.

Gay rights advocates say they will press hard to call this new legal relationship a marriage and not something else, such as a civil union. Many conservatives, meanwhile, have promised to push for a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage — just as some lawmakers are doing now in Massachusetts, where that state's Supreme Judicial Court validated a right to gay marriage in 2003.

And one Republican lawmaker in New Jersey has promised to seek the impeachment of all seven justices — an unlikely quest in the Democratic-controlled Legislature.

Gov. Jon S. Corzine and top legislative leaders — all Democrats — are on record as opposing gay marriage and saying they view marriage as a union between a man and a woman.

Two years ago, New Jersey Democrats managed to sidestep the gay marriage issue when they passed a domestic partnership law that offered same-sex couples some — but not all — of the rights that married couples have.

Now the issue is back, and there appears to be no getting around it. And for lawmakers, it comes as all 120 members of the Legislature face re-election in 2007.

Governor Corzine said he welcomed the court's conclusions, adding, "I look forward to the legislative process implementing the court's decision."

But in a joint statement, Richard J. Codey, the Senate president, and Joseph J. Roberts Jr., the Assembly speaker, indicated that Democrats would not go the extra step of defining the new legal partnership as a marriage.

DOJ_NMG_0086556

Another top Democrat, Senator Raymond J. Lesniak of Union County, echoed that point. He said that he and other members of the party's caucus had discussed a compromise, which would extend the marriage rights to gay couples but classify their relationships as "civil unions."

"Marriage has been a religious institution adopted by the government and a lot of religions have defined it in a way that that excludes gays," Mr. Lesniak said. "That's not what the government does, and the court clearly demands that we offer gay couples the same rights and obligations that heterosexual couples have under our marriage laws. But we can do it in a way that respects people's religious beliefs."

A similar approach was used by Vermont legislators after that state's high court struck down gay marriage law according to William N. Eskridge Jr., a Yale Law School professor who has written extensively on the issue.

But partisans of both sides of the gay marriage divide say they would not be satisfied with that approach. Garden State Equality, which has lobbied for gay marriage rights, began airing a television commercial asking for "marriage equality."

Republicans, meanwhile, indicated that they will be wary about attempts to alter New Jersey's current domestic partnership law. State Senator Leonard Lance, the minority leader, said he thought the court was overstepping its bounds by ordering legislators to rewrite the law.

Although the battlefront has shifted to the State Legislature, the ruling nonetheless had some spillover into New Jersey's tight race for the United States Senate.

Both Senator Robert Menendez, a Democrat, and State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr., his Republican challenger, oppose gay marriage, so it has not been an issue in their campaigns. But Mr. Kean responded to Wednesday's court decision by saying that he would favor a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage. Mr. Menendez said that he supported civil unions and would oppose any constitutional amendment that would take away people's legal rights.

But the immediate response to the court's decision, he said, "is now up to the Legislature to decide."

New Jersey Court Backs Full Rights For Gay Couples (NYT)

By David W. Chen

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

TRENTON, Oct. 25 — New Jersey's highest court ruled on Wednesday that gay couples are entitled to the same legal rights and financial benefits as heterosexual couples, but ordered the Legislature to decide whether their unions must be called marriage or could be known by another name.

In a decision filled with bold and sweeping pronouncements about equality, the New Jersey Supreme Court gave the Democratic-controlled Legislature 180 days to either expand existing laws or come up with new ones to provide gay couples benefits including tuition assistance, survivors' benefits under workers' compensation laws, and spousal privilege in criminal trials.

All seven justices agreed that the state's Constitution demands full legal rights for same-sex partners. But its ruling, 4 to 3, revealed a split in how to proceed. The majority said that lawmakers, not the court, should decide whether to call those arrangements a marriage, a civil union or something else. The three dissenters went further, asserting that gay couples, like their heterosexual counterparts, must be allowed to wed.

The New Jersey court did not go as far as Massachusetts, which in 2003 became the first state to permit gay marriage. Instead, it could be considered the new Vermont, which created civil unions for gay couples in 2000, in the politically, legally and culturally charged world of same-sex marriage.

"Our decision today significantly advances the civil rights of gays and lesbians," Justice Barry T. Albin wrote for the majority. "We have decided that our State Constitution guarantees that every statutory right and benefit conferred to heterosexual couples through civil marriage must be made available to committed same-sex couples."

But the ruling passed along the thorniest question, of whether true equality demands the same name, to the Legislature, saying "such change must come from the crucible of the democratic process."

Within minutes of the court's 3 p.m. announcement, three Democratic Assemblymen, working with Garden State Equality, a gay rights organization, said they would introduce a bill demanding marriage.

DOJ_NMG_0086557

But reaction from their fellow legislators was guarded, with some saying privately that civil unions, not marriage, would be the likely result. In a joint statement, the Assembly speaker, Joseph J. Roberts Jr., and the Senate president, Richard J. Codey, both Democrats, called the 180-day deadline "unreasonable" and said, "The only remaining issues now confronting the Legislature are ones of terminology and clarification."

For people involved in the legal battle over gay marriage, the decision is an important shift from recent court rulings in New York, Washington state and California that essentially rejected gay couples' claims on marriage and the benefits it confers. And by issuing a nuanced and complicated 90-page ruling that left observers struggling to declare who won and who lost, the court may have neutralized gay marriage as an issue in the Nov. 7 elections, when eight states will consider ballot measures to ban same-sex marriage.

"The decision certainly minimizes what the radical right thought they might have had as a mobilizing tool in the last days of the election," said Joe Solmonese, president of the Human Rights Campaign, a gay advocacy organization.

Nathaniel Persily, who teaches law and political science at the University of Pennsylvania and was a co-author of a recent paper titled "Gay Marriage, Public Opinion and the Courts," praised the justices for "an incredibly smart and politically astute opinion."

"The court has placed itself exactly where a majority of the American people are," Professor Persily said. "A majority of Americans are in favor of equal rights for gays tantamount to marriage, but a majority is also against calling that relationship marriage."

At the same time, he added: "This must be seen as a win for gay rights. They did not get the name they want, but they are getting more rights than could have been imaginable just a few years ago. Who would have thought 50, 20, even 10 years ago that a unanimous state supreme court would have said that gay relationships are entitled to equal rights as heterosexual relationships?"

But conservative groups opposed to same-sex marriage blasted the ruling as an example of the justices essentially trading judicial robes for legislative pens.

"The court is holding a legal gun to the head of the State Legislature, and saying, 'Listen, there are two bullets, you get to pick the bullet: either gay marriage or civil unions,' " said Matt Daniels, president of Alliance for Marriage, an organization based in the Washington area that supports a federal Constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage. "And that is not democracy. That is court-imposed policy-making that takes this out of the hands of the people."

Until now, courts in many other states — including the Court of Appeals in New York in July — had rejected similar lawsuits by same-sex couples, with the common rationale being that only the legislative branch can define or redefine marriage. No legislature has yet done that, though several states, including New Jersey, and dozens of cities and towns have enacted domestic partnership laws to grant gay couples some benefits in recent years.

Nineteen states have adopted constitutional amendments banning same-sex marriage. Most others have statutory bans, but New Jersey and four other states do not. In addition to Massachusetts, where more than 8,000 gay couples have married in the past three years, Vermont and Connecticut authorize civil unions, which generally offer the same legal protections, if not the same societal status, as marriage.

Wednesday's ruling caps a legal journey begun in 2002, when seven couples who had been denied marriage licenses in their towns filed the lawsuit now officially known as Lewis v. Harris. Two lower courts rejected their constitutional claim, with the Appellate Division ruling in June 2005 that marriage between members of the same sex was neither a fundamental right nor one covered by the constitution's equal-protection clause.

Many gay-marriage advocates thought New Jersey's high court, which heard the case Feb 15, was their best shot at victory.

It is regarded as one of the most liberal and independent in the country, having been among the first to strike down a ban on sodomy and rule in favor of adoption rights for gay couples.

The 4-3 split on Wednesday did not break along traditional political lines: the majority included all three justices appointed by a Democratic former governor, while the three dissenters, who backed the more far-reaching solution of opening marriage to gays, were named by a Republican.

"We do not have to take that all-or-nothing approach," Justice Albin wrote of the marriage question in the majority opinion.

DOJ_NMG_0086558

"We cannot find a legitimate public need for an unequal legal scheme of benefits and privileges that disadvantages same-sex couples," he said. "We cannot find that a right to same-sex marriage is so deeply rooted in the traditions, history, and conscience of the people of this state that it ranks as a fundamental right."

The court also expounded about the importance of equal treatment to protect children, diverging from the rulings of other state courts, which had said protecting procreation was one rationale for limiting marriage to heterosexual couples.

"There is something distinctly unfair about the state recognizing the right of same-sex couples to raise natural and adopted children and placing foster children with those couples," Justice Albin said, "and yet denying those children the financial and social benefits and privileges available to children in heterosexual households."

In the dissenting opinion, Chief Justice Deborah T. Poritz argued that the semantic distinction of marriage versus civil unions was itself a meaningful one, arguing that the institution "bestows enormous private and social advantages."

Agreeing that same-sex couples deserve the same rights and benefits as heterosexual ones, she wrote that she "can find no principled basis, however, on which to distinguish those rights and benefits from the right to the title of marriage."

As the case now moves from the domain of the courts to that of the legislature, some parties are gearing up for a fight.

Several Republican legislators — including State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr., who is in a close race to unseat United States Senator Robert Menendez — said on Wednesday that they would like to see an amendment to the State Constitution banning same-sex marriage. But with the Democrats in control of both legislative chambers, and Mr. Codey and Mr. Roberts voicing opposition, such a ban seems unlikely.

At the same time, Garden State Equality, the gay rights group, began its lobbying campaign for marriage immediately after the decision, buying several weeks of television time for a new advertisement that began appearing on cable Wednesday night.

The ad features a cancer-stricken police officer, Lt. Laurel Hester, recalling her fight for death benefits for her female partner. Ms. Hester, bald and struggling to breathe, taped the commercial before she died early this year. The ad concludes with words appearing on the screen that read, "Support marriage equality. Your gay neighbors are depending on you."

New Jersey Says Gay Couples Have The Same Rights As Straight Couples (KCS)

The Kansas City Star, October 26, 2006

By Stevenson Swanson

Chicago Tribune

(MCT)

NEW YORK - In a ruling that could make New Jersey the second state to legalize gay marriage, the state supreme court said Wednesday that gay couples have the same right to the benefits of marriage as heterosexual couples.

The court, whose decision had been awaited for months by advocates on both sides of the contentious debate over same-sex unions, said the state constitution's guarantee of equal rights applied to gay and lesbian couples, but it stopped short of ordering state officials to legalize gay marriage.

Instead, it gave the legislature until April to amend the state's marriage statute to include same-sex couples or to pass a civil union law that provides those couples the same benefits as marriage.

"We do not consider whether committed same-sex couples should be allowed to marry, but only whether those couples are entitled to the same rights and benefits afforded to married heterosexual couples," Justice Barry Albin wrote for the 4-3 majority. "Cast in that light, the issue is not about the transformation of the traditional definition of marriage, but about the unequal dispensation of benefits and privileges to one of two similarly situated classes of people."

The ruling is similar to a 1999 decision by Vermont's supreme court, which resulted in a civil union law. A 2003 ruling by Massachusetts' highest court was more sweeping, making that state the first - and so far only - state with legalized gay marriage, starting in 2004.

Connecticut also allows civil unions between same-sex couples, the result of legislative action that was not prompted by a court ruling.

DOJ_NMG_0086559

The case that resulted in the latest ruling was brought by seven same-sex couples who were denied marriage licenses in New Jersey. The dissenting justices, led by Chief Justice Deborah Poritz, argued that the majority did not go far enough, saying that only marriage would allow gay couples to achieve equal benefits.

In making its ruling, the court reflected on the changes that have transformed marriage during the last 200 years, such as granting women greater rights within marriage.

"The institution of marriage reflects society's changing social mores and values," the majority said in its opinion. "Although courts can ensure equal treatment, they cannot guarantee social acceptance, which must come through the evolving ethos of a maturing society."

After setbacks earlier this year in state courts in New York, Nebraska, Washington and Georgia, gay-marriage advocates greeted Wednesday's decision with relief.

"We received a unanimous decision on one aspect, which is that all seven justices agreed that it violates the guarantee of equal protection not to give same-sex couples the same benefits as heterosexual couples," said Jon Davidson, legal director of the gay-rights advocacy group Lambda Legal, which argued the case on behalf of the plaintiffs. "So now the struggle in New Jersey moves to the legislature."

Cases similar to New Jersey's are pending in California, Connecticut, Iowa and Maryland.

Opponents of gay marriage said the New Jersey court had shown the same judicial arrogance as the Vermont and Massachusetts courts.

"It amounts to taking the future of marriage out of the hands of the people of New Jersey," said Matt Daniels, director of the Alliance for Marriage, which advocates amending the U.S. Constitution to define marriage as the union of a man and a woman. "Nationally, it will add momentum to the marriage amendments that are on the ballots across the country, and more importantly, it will add momentum to the marriage amendment in the Congress."

That amendment, which President Bush has endorsed, failed to garner support in two votes in the Republican-controlled Congress.

Political observers said the New Jersey decision, coming less than two weeks before the Nov. 7 midterm elections, could rally evangelical Christians and other conservative voters to turn out in heavier numbers than expected in the eight states where constitutional amendments defining marriage as a union between a man and woman are on the ballot.

Two of those states, Virginia and Tennessee, are seen as key battlegrounds in the struggle for control of the Senate.

But because the justices stopped short of ordering New Jersey officials to legalize gay marriage, the ruling's impact on the election could be diluted, even in the Garden State, which is in the midst of its own tight Senate race. Incumbent Sen. Bob Menendez, a Democrat, is being challenged by Republican Tom Kean Jr.

"There was a sense that this could really reshape the Senate race here," said Tim Vercellotti, of the Eagleton Institute for Public Interest Polling at Rutgers University. "But this is a much more muted effect. I think it's going to be a close race, and I don't think this ruling is going to affect that."

Reacting to the ruling, Kean called for the state legislature to pass an amendment to the New Jersey constitution defining marrriage as a heterosexual union, similar to amendments that voters in 20 states have approved already.

Menendez said he believes marriage should be reserved for a man and a woman, but added that he supports civil unions for same-sex couples.

Three New Jersey legislators said they would introduce a bill to legalize gay marriage. The state already has a domestic partnership statute, which grants some rights to same-sex couples, such as the right to make medical decisions for each other and to file joint state income-tax returns.

Gov. Jon Corzine has said he supports domestic partnerships for same-sex couples, but has also said he would not sign a bill prohibiting same-sex marriage.

A June poll by Rutgers' Eagleton Institute found that New Jersey voters are almost evenly divided on gay marriage, with 49 percent of those polled supporting it and 44 percent opposed.

Support for civil unions was far stronger, with 66 percent in favor and 29 percent opposed.

DOJ_NMG_0086560

NJ Court Grants Rights, Not Marriage, To Gays (LAT)

By Ellen Barry

The Los Angeles Times, October 26, 2006

NEWARK — New Jersey's highest court ruled today that same-sex couples deserve the same rights as married people, but stopped short of calling their partnerships "marriage," saying that decision should fall to the state Legislature.

"Raised here is the perplexing question — 'What's in a name?'" wrote Justice Barry T. Albin in the majority opinion. "We will not presume that a difference in name alone is of constitutional magnitude."

The 4-3 ruling comes as a partial victory for gay rights advocates, who had hoped New Jersey would legalize gay marriage outright, as Massachusetts' Supreme Judicial Court did in 2003. Instead, the court's decision gives New Jersey lawmakers six months to create the necessary statutes for same-sex partnerships, which may be called "marriage" or, as in Vermont, "civil unions."

Monte Stewart of the Marriage Law Foundation, which opposes gay marriage, said the ruling is further proof that the Massachusetts court was not representative.

"The courts increasingly are understanding that man-woman marriage is a vital social institution, and because meanings matter, they're not going to radically alter those meanings," he said.

In a sharply worded opinion that dissented with a portion of the majority decision, Chief Justice Deborah Poritz said the court should not sidestep the question of the word "marriage."

"Labels set people apart as surely as physical separation on a bus or in school facilities. Labels are used to perpetuate prejudice about differences that, in this case, are embedded in the law," she wrote. "Ultimately, the message is that what same-sex couples have is not as important or as significant as 'real' marriage."

In 2003, when Massachusetts' Supreme Judicial Court ruled that gay couples had the constitutional right to marry, many foresaw a legal domino effect, but since then, high courts in several states have rejected the notion.

The most recent rulings came in July, when high courts in Washington and New York upheld state laws limiting marriage to one man and one woman. In both cases, the majority opinion held that the state legislature should settle the matter rather than the courts. Majorities in each case found that there was a rational basis, based on procreation, to limiting marriage to heterosexuals.

Meanwhile, voters in 20 states sought to preempt pro-gay marriage rulings by explicitly banning the practice in their state constitutions. In November, seven more states will vote on statewide bans and seven more are considering such a move. The Legislature in Massachusetts — still the only state in the union to issue marriage licenses to gay couples -- may approve a citizen initiative against gay marriage, allowing voters to weigh in on the practice in 2008.

Still, gay rights advocates have achieved victories. In California and Maryland, judges have ruled that same-sex marriage was protected by the state constitution. Last September, California's Legislature passed a bill legalizing same-sex marriage but Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger vetoed the measure, saying a higher court should decide it.

Court challenges are pending in California, Connecticut, Iowa, Maryland, Nebraska and Oklahoma.

Many observers — on both sides of the issue — have seen New Jersey as the state most likely to follow Massachusetts' lead.

The case, Lewis vs. Harris, began in 2002, when seven same-sex couples applied for marriage licenses and were denied. The couples then sued the officials who denied them, arguing that the state Constitution guaranteed their rights.

In November 2003 — a few days before the landmark Massachusetts decision — a Superior Court judge refused to strike down the ban, reasoning that though the right to marry is fundamental, based on tradition, the right to marry someone of the same sex is not "deeply rooted in our nation's history." In June 2005, a panel of three appellate judges ruled 2-1 that only the Legislature could enact a law allowing gays to marry.

Despite those setbacks, advocates have been optimistic about a ruling by the state's Supreme Court, which has made several noteworthy rulings in favor of gay rights. The Supreme Court has ruled that the Boy Scouts could not bar gay troop leaders — a decision that was overturned by the U.S. Supreme Court. Moreover, the state has not advanced arguments against gay marriage that are based on procreation or child-rearing.

DOJ_NMG_0086561

Much suspense has surrounded the release of the decision, which took place on the day Chief Justice Poritz turned 70, mandatory retirement age, and prepares to leave the court. During oral arguments in February, Poritz asked pointed questions of defendants about the "deep-rooted tradition" argument underlying their lower court victory.

"For a long time, women were property in the marriage relationship. For a long time, women could not make a claim of rape against a husband," she said. "There've been lots of ways in which the traditional idea of marriage has changed, so why would we simply defer? It's historical. It's over."

Jersey Court Orders OK Of Gay Unions (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

The New Jersey Supreme Court yesterday said that although there was no right to same-sex "marriage" in the state constitution, homosexual couples were treated unequally by the state and that lawmakers must find a way to correct this.

"Although we cannot find that a fundamental right to same-sex marriage exists in this state, the unequal dispensation of rights and benefits to committed same-sex partners can no longer be tolerated under our state Constitution," said Justice Barry T. Albin, who wrote the 4-3 decision in Lewis v. Harris.

Justice Albin said the democratic process must decide "whether marriage or some other term" will be used to name the rights and benefits, but the high court gave state lawmakers 180 days to "amend the marriage statutes to include same-sex couples" or "create a parallel statutory structure" that will give such couples "on equal terms" the rights, benefits and obligations borne by married couples.

The long-awaited ruling was a disappointment to homosexual rights advocates, who were hoping the court would make New Jersey the second state after Massachusetts to legalize same-sex "marriage."

"Those who would view today's Supreme Court ruling as a victory for same-sex couples are dead wrong," said Steven Goldstein, head of Garden State Equality, a homosexual rights group in New Jersey.

However, he said, three state lawmakers are poised to introduce a bill to legalize same-sex "marriage" and "thousands of us will now hit the streets, the phones and the hallways to get this legislation passed."

All seven justices agreed that the current situation was unconstitutional, but the three dissenters wanted the court to directly create a marriage right for homosexuals.

Retiring Chief Justice Deborah T. Poritz led the dissenters, saying that she could "find no principled basis, however, on which to distinguish those rights and benefits from the right to the title of marriage," adding that denying the homosexual couples the symbolism surrounding the word "marriage" was to "demean" them.

David Buckel of Lambda Legal, who represented the seven homosexual couple plaintiffs, was more optimistic, saying, "The bottom line here is that the entire court said that there must be a remedy for the inequality that bars same-sex couples from marriage."

It should be easy for the legislature to pass full marriage rights for same-sex couples, given the public's widespread support for the issue, he added.

Many social and religious conservatives described yesterday's decision as another loss for homosexual "marriage," but no one called it a total victory for their side either.

"This is a wake-up call for people who believe that marriage doesn't need constitutional protection," said Glen Lavy, a lawyer with the Alliance Defense Fund.

"This is probably the best decision we could have hoped for out of New Jersey, the court that thought it could order the Boy Scouts to accept gay scoutmasters," said Maggie Gallagher, president of the Institute for Marriage and Public Policy.

The high court "pulled a Vermont," said Len Deo, president of the New Jersey Family Policy Council, referring to the Vermont Supreme Court's 1999 ruling that forced state lawmakers to either enact same-sex "marriage" or a parallel system of benefits for same-sex couples. The ruling resulted in the nation's first civil union law.

In his majority opinion, Justice Albin said there was no constitutional right to same-sex "marriage."

DOJ_NMG_0086562

"Only rights that are deeply rooted in the traditions, history and conscience of the people are deemed to be fundamental," he wrote.

The New Jersey Legislature, which has a Democratic majority in both chambers, already has enacted a domestic-partner law that gives same-sex couples hospital-visitation rights and health and pension benefits for state employees.

State lawmakers should "do the simplest, fairest and most sensible thing: include gay and lesbian couples within the existing framework of civil marriage," said Lee Swislow, executive director of Gay & Lesbian Advocates & Defenders.

However, John Tomicki, head of the New Jersey Coalition to Preserve and Protect Marriage, said his allies will work to both stop enactment of same-sex "marriage" and put a constitutional marriage amendment on the November 2007 ballot.

Party Lines Are No Guide To Opinions By Justices (NYT)

By Laura Mansnerus

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

TRENTON, Oct. 25 — It is not always easy to identify partisan fault lines in New Jersey. In the New Jersey Supreme Court, it is all but impossible, and nothing reflects that more clearly than Wednesday's 4-to-3 decision on same-sex marriage.

Three justices appointed by a Republican governor would recognize the full status of marriage for same-sex couples. And of the three justices appointed by a Democrat — a gay Democrat, at that — none would go that far, and they joined in the majority opinion.

To obscure any partisan alliances even more, each contingent included Republican and Democratic justices.

Their opinions in Lewis v. Harris, the case decided on Wednesday, showed once again that, as one former associate justice, Peter J. Verniero, put it, "the political label dissipates very quickly when someone is appointed to the Supreme Court."

New Jersey's highest court has often been described as liberal, and, what is probably more important to the other branches of state government here, assertive. In its history, the court has gone where few others have in prescribing educational programs and state aid for poor school districts, for example, and in ordering the state's 566 municipalities to accept their "fair share" of low-cost housing.

Wednesday's decision, said Laurence H. Tribe, a constitutional scholar at Harvard Law School, "is consistent with the best traditions of the New Jersey court, not simply following what some perceive as a trend, but reasoning independently."

The court's independence, some analysts say, is notable because so many of its members over the last several decades have come from the state's executive branch.

Of the seven members of the court, Chief Justice Deborah T. Poritz served for a time as Gov. Christie Whitman's attorney general, and Justice Jaynee LaVecchia was Mrs. Whitman's commissioner of banking and insurance. And two of the justices served under Gov. Brendan T. Byrne: Virginia Long, also as commissioner of banking, and James R. Zazzali as attorney general. All were appointed by Governor Whitman.

Gov. James E. McGreevey, who is gay, appointed three of the justices: Barry T. Albin, who was a criminal defense lawyer; John E. Wallace Jr., who served as a Superior Court judge; and Roberto A. Rivera-Soto, who had spent his career in private practice.

By tradition, the court is balanced between Republicans and Democrats, and appointments have generally alternated between the parties regardless of who is governor. But the court that ruled in this decision was slightly out of balance by having two Republicans, Chief Justice Poritz and Justice Rivera-Soto; one who is unaffiliated, Justice LaVecchia; and four Democrats.

The court's membership will shift slightly upon Chief Justice Poritz's retirement on Thursday, her 70th birthday. Justice Zazzali, a Democrat, is to replace her, while the newest appointee, Helen E. Hoens, a Republican, will take his seat.

But while party identifications matter in the selection of justices, Mr. Verniero said, "it's just very difficult to predict how individual members are going to decide issues."

"If you listen to arguments before the court and close your eyes," he added, "it's difficult to tell which justice asking the questions is a Republican and which is a Democrat."

DOJ_NMG_0086563

In Wednesday's decision, two McGreevey appointees and Justice LaVecchia joined the other McGreevey appointee, Justice Albin, in his majority opinion, while Chief Justice Poritz, who wrote a separate concurring and dissenting opinion, was joined by Justices Long and Zazzali.

During her 10-year tenure, Chief Justice Poritz has been generally known as a consensus builder on the court. Yet she sometimes dismayed Republican legislators, most notably when she wrote a unanimous opinion allowing the Democratic Party to replace Senator Robert G. Torricelli's name on the ballot a month before Election Day in 2002, making way for the election of Frank R. Lautenberg.

Chief Justice Poritz was also the author of a 1999 decision, later reversed by the United States Supreme Court, requiring the Boy Scouts of America to retain a gay assistant scoutmaster. And she wrote for the majority in a 2000 opinion striking down a parental notice requirement for minors seeking abortions.

An 'I Do' From McGreevey? He Would. (NYT)

By David W. Chen

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

TRENTON, Oct. 25 — Yes, he would.

That was the reaction of former Gov. James E. McGreevey when asked on Wednesday whether he would marry his partner if the New Jersey Legislature — in the aftermath of the State Supreme Court decision that same-sex couples are entitled to the same rights as heterosexuals — decides that gay marriage will be honored.

After gathering his thoughts, Mr. McGreevey said that while he had no plans to marry his partner immediately, he did feel that a ceremony would be in his future.

"Yes," said Mr. McGreevey, who now lives in Plainfield with Mark O'Donnell, an Australian businessman. "Marriage would offer the ability to bless our relationship in a committed way."

Beyond discussing his own plans, Mr. McGreevey, 49, also predicted that the ruling would have a major effect on young people struggling with social mores and sexuality, much as he did while growing up.

"What it means, personally to me, for my partner, traveling around the country, talking to gay youth, is the basic notion that when the court embraces the constitutionality of gay marriage, there's a fundamental understanding that gay relationships are quote, unquote, as good as straight relationships," he said.

Mr. McGreevey acknowledged that he was a "gay American" when he resigned as governor in 2004. And in his best-selling memoir, "The Confession," he discussed the lengths to which he went to mask the fact that he was gay for four decades.

When he was governor, Mr. McGreevey opposed same-sex marriage, although he did support domestic partnership legislation that was approved in 2004. He said he now regrets his lack of initiative then.

"I only wish I had had the fortitude to embrace this basic right when I was governor," he said.

As for marrying Mr. O'Donnell, 43, his partner since September 2005, friends said that there were certain considerations. First of all, they said, Mr. McGreevey would have to be legally divorced from Dina Matos, his second wife.

N.J. Supreme Court Punts Same-Sex Marriage To Legislature (LAW)

By Michael Booth, New Jersey Law Journal

New Jersey Law Journal, October 26, 2006

New Jersey on Wednesday stopped short of becoming the second state in the nation to legalize same-sex marriage by judicial fiat.

The state's high court, while declaring unconstitutional state laws that deny same-sex couples the financial and social benefits and privileges given to married heterosexuals, held that fixing the problem is a legislative task -- and gave lawmakers 180 days in which to do it.

"At this point, we do not consider whether committed same-sex couples should be allowed to marry, but only whether those couples are entitled to the same rights and benefits afforded to married heterosexual couples," a divided court wrote in Lewis v. Harris, A68-05.

DOJ_NMG_0086564

"Cast in that light, the issue is not about the transformation of the traditional definition of marriage, but about the unequal dispensation of benefits and privileges to one of two similarly situated classes of people."

The justices did not require the Legislature to amend the civil marriage statutes to include same-sex couples but only to come up with a statutory scheme that affords same-sex couples the same rights and benefits as those statutes.

The court offered the Legislature the option of either amending the marriage statutes to include same-sex couples or enacting a parallel statutory structure by another name.

"We will not presume that a separate statutory scheme, which uses a title other than marriage, contravenes equal protection principles, so long as the rights and benefits of civil marriage are made equally available to same-sex couples," Justice Barry Albin wrote for the 4-3 court. "The name to be given to the statutory scheme that provides full rights and benefits to same-sex couples, whether marriage or some other term, is a matter left to the democratic process."

The court warned that the state cannot make entry into a same-sex civil union any more difficult than it is for heterosexual couples to enter marriage, but said any parallel scheme can be regulated, similarly to marriage, to restrict civil unions based on age and consanguinity and to prohibit polygamous relationships.

Chief Justice Deborah Poritz, on the day of her retirement from the court, filed a partial dissent joined by two other justices. The dissenters disagreed with the majority's conclusion that there is no fundamental due process right to same-sex marriage encompassed within the concept of "liberty" guaranteed by article I, paragraph 1 of the state constitution.

The justices modified but affirmed dismissal of the suit, brought by seven same-sex couples, most of whom have children, that were denied marriage licenses by local clerks or vital-statistics registrars in 2002. The suit charged that New Jersey laws restricting marriage to male-female unions violate equal protection of law and fundamental rights.

The court found that denying marital-type rights to same-sex couples bears no substantial relationship to a legitimate governmental purpose, the standard of judicial review for encroachments on the equal protection clause of Article I, Paragraph 1, of the New Jersey Constitution.

The courts below had found no legal or historical basis for same-sex marriage nor anything to suggest that the framers of the federal or state constitutions considered it a fundamental right to be accorded special protection. Furthermore, the federal Defense of Marriage Act eschews the concept, raising the prospect that same-sex marriage decrees would not be accorded full faith and credit nationwide.

The state attorney general had argued that New Jersey's 2004 Domestic Partnership Act conveyed rights synonymous with those of married couples and thus satisfied constitutional requirements. By that statute, similar to laws in Vermont and Hawaii, New Jersey recognized civil unions among same-sex couples and some heterosexual couples.

The attorney general also argued that changing marital laws that have pre-existed the nation's founding required an act of the Legislature, and the court agreed.

To date, all but one state Supreme Court that has considered the issue -- Massachusetts -- has disagreed. Courts in Arizona, Washington, D.C., Indiana, Kentucky, Minnesota, New York, Washington state and most recently California have rejected challenges.

The Hawaii Supreme Court held in 1993 that the limitation of marriage to opposite-sex couples established a sex-based classification that required strict scrutiny under equal protection analysis. On remand, a trial court held the limitation in violation of the state constitution, but the case was halted when the electorate approved a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage.

In 2000, the Vermont Supreme Court likewise punted to the state's Legislature, holding that denial of benefits incidental to marriage to same-sex couples violated the state constitution's "common benefits" provision but that the violation could be remedied by legislation extending the benefits flowing from marriage to same-sex couples. The Vermont Legislature responded with a civil-union law in 2004.

A Ruling For Equality In New Jersey (NYT)

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0086565

The New Jersey Supreme Court brought the United States a little closer to the ideal of equality yesterday when it ruled that the state's Constitution requires that committed same-sex couples be accorded the same rights as married heterosexual couples. It stopped short, however, of ruling that same-sex couples have a right to "marry," leaving the question of what to call same-sex unions up to the State Legislature.

That omission will disappoint some gay-rights advocates, but there is no reason for lawmakers not to apply the term marriage to these committed relationships, and they should do so swiftly. Meanwhile, the court decision is an important step forward.

New Jersey already has a civil-unions law, but it gives same-sex couples fewer rights than married couples. Same-sex couples are penalized financially, in areas like employer-provided health benefits and inheritance taxes. They are also disadvantaged socially and in practical, day-to-day ways. One of the plaintiffs in the case had trouble getting her partner into a hospital emergency room with her when she was sick.

The court required the Legislature to level the playing field in every respect but one. It said lawmakers can call relationships between partners of the same sex marriage, or something else. This page supports gay marriage, but we also know it will not be recognized instantly. New Jersey's delay is unfortunate, but at least it makes it hard for anti-gay forces in the state to mobilize against the decision. The court ruling secures important rights, and paves the way for the full equality that will no doubt come.

New Jersey's Step Forward (WP)

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

IN REQUIRING that state law grant the same benefits to same-sex couples that it gives to married ones, the New Jersey Supreme Court has given the Garden State a nudge down a road it was already traveling. For those, like us, who support same-sex marriage, such steps are welcome. There is no good reason why same-sex couples in loving and committed relationships should not be granted affirmative recognition from state governments -- recognition that carries with it the rights and responsibilities of marriage. The New Jersey court unanimously pushed in a direction we would like to see all states ultimately go.

What role judges should play in that process is always a difficult question, and yesterday's decision will no doubt spark controversy. So it is worth emphasizing that the judicial impetus here is actually a gentle one. New Jersey's legal landscape -- both its case law and the statutes passed by its legislature -- was already fairly advanced. The state has a robust set of anti-discrimination protections for gay men and lesbians, and it has a domestic partnership law that confers many of the benefits of marriage on same-sex couples.

What's more, the court specifically declined to require that marriage itself be available to same-sex couples -- provoking a dissent from three justices who would have gone further and simply mandated marriage rights. Instead the judges distinguished between the right to marriage and the rights and benefits flowing from marriage. They argued that it makes no sense "on the one hand, [to give] gays and lesbians full civil rights in their status as individuals, and, on the other, [to give] them an incomplete set of rights when they . . . enter into committed same-sex relationships."

The New Jersey legislature has not -- as was the legislature in Massachusetts after its court acted in 2003 -- been denied the democratic prerogative of deciding state policy on this question. It could, if it chooses, do as little as extend the state's domestic partnership law to confer additional rights on same-sex couples. Or, it could create civil unions or extend marriage rights themselves. Like all actions by state supreme courts, the decision affects nobody outside New Jersey and is ultimately subject to the will of the people of that state, who are free to change their constitution if they dislike their court's view of it -- as many other states have done on this issue. In other words, the court has required only a modest step, one to which the people's representatives will decide how to respond.

Coming, unfortunately, only two weeks before the Nov. 7 elections, this nuanced decision risks getting lost beneath angry rhetoric about activist judges and protecting marriage. That would be unfortunate. No reasonable reading of this decision could argue for, say, changing Virginia's constitution to ban same-sex marriages that are already illegal there or for adding a noxious amendment to the federal Constitution. It argues only for letting the residents of New Jersey digest what their court has said and decide how best to make same-sex couples equal under the law.

DOJ_NMG_0086566

Expanded DNA Collection Eroding Civil Liberties, Panel Says (AAS)

By Patrice Relerford, WASHINGTON BUREAU

Austin American-Statesman, October 26, 2006

Efforts can invade privacy, put stress on already overworked crime labs.

WASHINGTON — Dramatic expansions in the collection and retention of DNA by state and local law enforcement officials threatens individual privacy rights and racial justice, a panel of legal experts concluded Wednesday.

A four-member panel of lawyers and DNA experts, including New York lawyer Barry Scheck and Helen Wallace of Genewatch UK, spoke about the subject as part of a discussion sponsored by the American Civil Liberties Union.

Experts characterized law enforcement officials' efforts to add samples to DNA databases as a slippery slope regarding privacy rights, and they criticized expansions at the state and local level of what they referred to as permanent, rogue data bases not tied into the FBI's national DNA index.

"You've got to be smart about crime, smart about using these databases and smart about protecting civil liberties," Scheck said.

Panel members, including the ACLU's science advisor, Tania Simoncelli, said expansion efforts are eroding the performance of crime labs, which already face months or years of backlogged evidence.

"If you put that stress on them they're going to cut corners," said Scheck of overworked lab workers.

Scheck also pointed to a scandal surrounding the Houston Police Department's crime lab as proof that DNA evidence is not impenetrable.

This summer, independent investigator Michael Bromwich concluded that crime lab officials in Houston failed to report the results of DNA tests that did not corroborate suspects identified by police in more than 20 cases beginning in the 1980s.

Bromwich, a former U.S. Justice Department official, was selected to investigate the crime lab in 2005. Houston's lab was closed for more than three years after errors were exposed in the lab divisions that test firearms, body fluids and controlled substances.

Scheck said two men were released from prison based on the lab's misconduct, and he praised the department's efforts to identify problems.

Last year, Gov. Rick Perry signed a law that established the Texas Forensic Science Commission to investigate the quality of forensic evidence. The move is expected to help the state qualify for federal forensic science improvement grants.

"I think the answer is putting more teeth into these types of institutions," Scheck said. "Someone should look at Texas."

Abortion Ban Looms Large On S.D. Ballot (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, October 26, 2006

IRENE, S.D. — Georgia Kaufman is against abortion. She's torn, though, about the referendum on the Nov. 7 ballot that will decide whether the USA's toughest abortion restrictions will become law or be repealed.

“I personally do not believe in abortion,” says Kaufman. “I'm very proud that South Dakota is the first state to step forward and say ‘no.’ ”

Still, she thinks it's wrong to make abortion illegal for women who have been raped or are victims of incest. The law would allow an abortion only if a woman's life is at risk. “I'm wrestling with that tremendously,” says Kaufman, 37, a waitress at the Irene Bar & Grill.

How Kaufman votes and the outcome of the referendum will reverberate outside conservative South Dakota. If voters uphold the law, which also would make it a felony for doctors to perform abortions unless the woman's life is in jeopardy, Planned Parenthood plans a lawsuit asserting the ban is unconstitutional. Supporters of the ban would use the case to challenge Roe v. Wade, the landmark 1973 Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion nationwide.

California and Oregon have ballot measures that would require parental consent for minors to have abortions, and voters here will vote on gay marriage and allowing medical use of marijuana. The abortion ban, though, has generated the most debate and passion.

DOJ_NMG_0086567

Republican Gov. Mike Rounds signed the law in March. Opponents gathered signatures to put the issue on the ballot. The latest statewide poll in July showed 47% of voters opposed the ban and 39% supported it; 14% were undecided. Both sides expect a close vote.

The latest round of ads has each side calling the other liars. The lead group supporting the law, Vote Yes for Life, is running TV and radio ads and mailing postcards that say it gives women "the option of terminating pregnancies that are the result of rape or incest."

The South Dakota Campaign for Healthy Families, which organized the repeal vote, says the law would allow rape and incest victims to use emergency contraception before a pregnancy could be detected, since they would not be able to have legal abortions.

At the Pump 'N' Stuff gas station and coffee shop in this town of 400, a half-dozen men crowd around the only table and explain their mixed feelings.

"I heard that if a woman gets cancer, she can't take chemo" under the law because it might harm the fetus, says Dale Korslund 68. "It should be a private deal, not a state or federal thing." Daryl Erickson, 50, isn't sure how he'll vote. "If the gal's raped, then (abortion) should be done," he says. "If not, no." Bill Ryken, 74, says the debate "gets to you after awhile."

National groups that support abortion rights have sent staffers to South Dakota. At the commons at the University of South Dakota in Vermillion, Kelsey Collier-Wise, 25, a law school student, was registering voters with help from Jessie Raeder of Los Angeles, who works for the Feminist Majority Foundation. Monday was the final day to register to vote in November's election. The table had stickers and flyers saying the ban "threatens women's lives." Collier-Wise says they have registered "hundreds of students" since August.

Sophomore Gina Cooper, 19, registered and left no doubt about her vote: "I believe firmly from past experiences with friends that abortion needs to be an option for women."

Ruth Herman is just as emphatic. She spends a couple hours every day helping at the headquarters of Vote Yes for Life in Sioux Falls. Herman, 56, who lives in Hartford, had an unplanned pregnancy 38 years ago and the baby was adopted. She's grateful abortion wasn't an option, because if she had one, "I would have regretted that the rest of my life. I see no reason for an abortion unless of course the mother's life is in danger, and this law will cover that."

Leslee Unruh, campaign manager of Vote Yes for Life, believes her side "has the momentum." Women who have had abortions and regret it are calling voters. Aqua-and-white yard signs reading "Vote Yes for Life" are ubiquitous even on country roads.

Most of the group's donations are from South Dakotans, she says, and she's not getting much help from national groups. Abortion opponents are "no longer looking at national leadership," she says. "They're thinking they can do it themselves in their own state."

Jan Nicolay, a former state legislator who runs South Dakotans for Healthy Families, says the group has sought donations from national abortion rights groups and their supporters. On Election Day, Planned Parenthood will test a text-messaging system that will send results to supporters across the nation.

Neither Nicolay nor Unruh will say how much they have raised or spent; campaign-finance reports are due next week. Nicolay expects a close vote. "We said from the beginning this would be challenging," she says. "It's very emotional, it's very personal."

Outside South Dakota's only abortion clinic, on the west side of Sioux Falls, protesters carry signs with photos of a dismembered fetus and take photos of everyone who enters the Planned Parenthood facility. The pictures will be posted later on a website.

Inside, about a dozen women sit in the waiting room. The clinic performs about 800 abortions a year, says Kate Looby, Planned Parenthood's state director. "While this election may have national implications," she says, "right now all that matters is that we maintain access to safe and legal abortion for the women of South Dakota."

Back in Irene, Kaufman knows the stakes are high: "I can see both sides. My decision could still go either way."

New Voting Systems Face Midterm Exam (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0086568

By June Kronholz

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

November 7 may be the most problem-free Election Day ever -- or maybe not.

Four years ago, still stinging from the "hanging chad" troubles of the 2000 presidential vote, Congress passed the Help America Vote Act. The new law gave the states $3.8 billion to replace punch-card and mechanical-lever voting machines, and to set up statewide voter lists to resolve election-day questions over who could vote and where.

States and counties bought a variety of new voting systems with the federal money, including optical scanners that read paper ballots and, in at least 34 states, touch-screen machines.

Two weeks before elections, voting-equipment makers and many election clerks say the new technology will eliminate lost or spoiled ballots and buoy voter confidence. "It gets better each time" voters use the new equipment, says Betty Ireland, West Virginia's secretary of state.

But groups that track voting laws and practices are warning of problems that could cost or lose votes. A Princeton University study has ignited additional worries that a hacker could alter results on the touch screens, although voting-machine makers -- led by Diebold Inc., the largest of a half-dozen manufacturers -- reject the possibility.

Here are some scenarios that could spell trouble on Election Day:

New equipment, elderly poll workers: Although Congress gave the states until next month to use the federal money, many either ordered or received equipment only this year. That means that 88 million potential voters will be casting ballots on unfamiliar machines, says R. Doug Lewis, director of the Election Center, an association of election officials.

That isn't likely to create problems for most voters. Touch screens lead voters through the ballot with a series of easy prompts. After Georgia installed Diebold touch screens in 2002, Diebold says the state's error rate -- the percentage of uncountable votes -- dropped to 0.4% from 3.5% in 2000.

In recent elections, though, the new equipment has sometimes baffled election workers, who are often retirees. In 2004, Carteret County, N.C., poll workers didn't notice the warning lights indicating a touch screen's memory was full, for example, and lost 4,438 votes.

Ohio, like many states, included a demand this year for paper ballots recording each vote cast on a touch screen. But in Cuyahoga County this spring, poll workers loaded the paper incorrectly, and -- because the paper ballot is the official tally in Ohio -- lost 10% of the votes.

Tarrant County, Texas, recorded 100,000 extra votes in 2004 because of software programming errors, says New York University's Brennan Center, which studies voting issues. In Florida's Palm Beach County in 2004, circuits became overloaded, backup batteries on the voting machines wore down and some votes were lost before anyone noticed, the Brennan Center says.

Larry Norden, a lawyer with the center, says the glitch that worries him most is the one "that goes undetected." In Mercer County, Ohio, this fall, votes cast for Democrats went instead to Libertarians because of a programming error. That was relatively easy to catch, he says, but a glitch that gave a few thousand Democratic votes to Republicans or vice versa might be harder to notice.

That is worrisome because many races are close, and control of Congress hinges on relatively few seats. Ohio State University's Moritz College of Law, which tracks election issues, says touch screens are being used in 22 of the 27 congressional races it estimates are the closest.

Voters who can't vote: In Montgomery County, Md., this fall, election officials neglected to equip polling stations with voter cards -- the electronic swipes that allow voters to access their ballots on a touch screen. Faced with long waits, some voters left in frustration.

Election groups warn that could happen elsewhere if equipment failures, poll-worker inexperience or new identification requirements create delays that discourage voters. The biggest bottleneck could be the statewide voter lists, which states are developing by compiling their county voter lists, matching them with Social Security and drivers-license databases, and purging the new list of voters who have moved or died.

But the job is complicated, and many state voter lists are being used for the first time. When New York tested a preliminary list in 2004, it found data-entry mistakes in 20% of the registrations, says Justin Levitt of the Brennan Center.

DOJ_NMG_0086569

Most states plan to flag the name of a voter when databases don't agree -- when birth dates don't match, for example -- and let the voter correct the discrepancy at the polls or later, at the county elections office. But public-interest law groups say they will file lawsuits if lots of voters are kept from casting ballots by mistake.

New recount delays: Wary about losing votes on their new touch screens, 27 states recently passed laws requiring a "paper trail" as part of the technology. Diebold -- typical of other manufacturers -- equipped its voting machines with a roll of banking ATM paper. After a voter casts a touch-screen ballot, it's printed for the voter to see, then spooled into the machine.

But there's no technology to machine-read the paper ballots, which instead must be unspooled and read by election workers. In Ohio, recounting 300 of the thousands of primary-elections spools took two days. Nevada election workers said they needed four hours to recount one spool of 64 ballots.

In a disputed election it could be days or weeks before a winner is declared. "That's not going to enhance voter confidence; it will diminish it," says Ohio State law professor Daniel Tokaji.

A hack attack: Bloggers have long warned that a hacker could infect touch screens with a virus that alters the vote totals. That scenario took on new seriousness last month when a Princeton University computer professor showed a congressional committee how he infected the memory on a Diebold touch screen -- causing votes to automatically switch from one candidate to another -- after opening the machine with a key he bought on the Internet.

Diebold has dismissed the Princeton demonstration, saying it was on an early model touch screen with old software and that it ignored "normal security procedures" like broken security tags that would alert election workers to a break-in. "These things are tested to the hilt" for security vulnerabilities, says Mark Radke, marketing director for Diebold's election-products unit.

But other computer scientists and security experts have criticized Diebold for denying them access to its software for testing and for dismissing the possibility of a "rogue" election worker tampering with a touch-screen's software. That warning was renewed this week when a former Maryland legislator received an anonymous package containing the reportedly stolen computer code that ran the state's 2004 poll.

Voting Machines Had Defective Part (WP)

By Cameron W. Barr

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

The maker of Maryland's electronic voting system replaced a flawed electronic component in several thousand touch-screen voting machines in 2005, state election officials acknowledged this week.

To eliminate unpredictable "screen freezes" that have occurred since the machines were first used in Maryland in 2002, Diebold Election Systems installed new system boards in about 4,700 voting machines from four Maryland counties: Allegany, Dorchester, Montgomery and Prince George's.

The screen freezes do not cause votes to be lost, officials said, but they confuse voters and election judges who sometimes wonder whether votes cast on a frozen machine will be counted.

The acknowledgment of the repairs came in response to queries from The Washington Post and sheds further light on Maryland's troubled transition to electronic voting. Critics said it raises concerns about whether the state and company officials have kept the public adequately informed about problems with a system that cost taxpayers $106 million.

State officials said this week that they learned after the November 2004 election that a flawed system board was the source of the screen-freeze problem. But documents show that Diebold had diagnosed the problem early that year.

Ross Goldstein, deputy state elections administrator, defended Diebold's handling of the problem. "They have updated all the units, and the problem has been resolved," he said.

Mike Morrill, Diebold's Maryland spokesman, said the company had not completed its research into screen freezes until early 2005, when it agreed to replace all the system boards as the only way to guarantee that the problem would not recur.

He said the flawed system boards were confined to the four counties because other counties received machines with updated system boards. Montgomery experienced screen freezes more often than the others, Morrill said.

DOJ_NMG_0086570

The screen freezes are unrelated to the problems experienced in September's primary, when Diebold's electronic voter-registration machines rebooted without warning in every Maryland precinct. The rebooting was caused by a software defect, which Diebold says has been corrected.

Even so, the two leading candidates for governor -- Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) and Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley (D) -- have called on voters to use absentee ballots in the election, citing uncertainties about the reliability of Maryland's system.Disclosure Issues

State and Diebold officials have been discreet in discussing the replacement of the system boards -- the core electronic component of the voting machines -- to address the screen freezes.

Morrill, the Diebold spokesman, said the company had "publicly disclosed" information about the problem and its solution in communications with the State Board of Elections staff, including a six-page letter from an executive to state Administrator of Elections Linda H. Lamone written in reply to her questions about the system boards.

But the minutes of the July 12, 2005, meeting of the election board said only that a "technology refresh" would be conducted to bring voting units from the four counties "up to the same specifications as the equipment in the later phases of the implementation." The minutes did not mention the replacement of thousands of system boards.

Board Chairman Gilles W. Burger and members Joan Beck and A. Susan Widerman said they do not recall being told that system boards would be replaced as part of the technology refresh.

Burger said Lamone should have brought the replacement of the system boards to the board's attention. "If she withheld this information from the body she reports to, I think she is not carrying out her duties as a public official," said Burger, who in 2004 sought with other Ehrlich appointees to oust Lamone, a move that was blocked in court.

Goldstein said board members could have learned the details of the technology refresh. "If they had asked, we would have told them," he said.

Within the company's Maryland offices, executives tried to keep confidential any discussion of the need to replace system boards, according to four former Diebold contractors interviewed in recent weeks.

On Dec. 6, 2004, Tom Feehan, Diebold's Maryland project manager, replied to a subordinate's e-mail that referred to Diebold engineers in Ohio replacing system boards in "failed units" from Montgomery. Feehan's three-sentence reply was sent to the subordinate and two other employees who had received the original message.

"All, Please delete all copies of this e-mail," said Feehan's message, a copy of which was obtained by The Post. "It should have been sent confidential. Call me for further specifics."

Morrill said Feehan was concerned that the original e-mail "portrayed a decision as if it had been a final decision when in fact it was not made yet." Morrill said that "there was no secrecy" attached to the review of the system board problem and that at the time of the e-mail, Feehan was discussing the problem with state board staff members.

Diebold's upper echelon also appeared reluctant to discuss problems, according to several Maryland legislators who met privately with company executives in February 2006.

The executives attended an off-the-record session with members of the election law subcommittee of the House of Delegates to discuss the feasibility of Maryland switching to a system that would provide a paper record of each vote in time for this year's elections.

Del. Jean B. Cryor (R-Montgomery) said she asked the Diebold executives several questions, including whether there had been hardware defects in Maryland voting machines. "They assured us that everything is fine," she said.

Del. LeRoy E. Myers Jr. (R-Washington) said that as at other sessions with executives of the company, "it was always 'no problem, no problem, no problem.' "

Morrill said Diebold executives have always made clear that "we've upgraded technology constantly on our machines, both in Maryland and in other states."A Record of Trouble

Under a 2001 contract with the state, Diebold sent nearly 4,700 electronic voting machines to the four counties in the first phase of Maryland's transition to a uniform electronic voting system.

DOJ_NMG_0086571

In Sept. 10, 2002, primary elections, the machines had their first outing in Maryland. Montgomery's Board of Elections received 59 calls from precincts to report machines out of service. In the 2002 general election, the board received 53 such calls. Many of the machines were shut down after their screens froze, county officials said.

On February 1, 2004, Diebold's Maryland office issued a document, "Weekly Update of Montgomery County Root Cause Failure Analysis," that said the screen-freeze error "has been identified as a 'hardware' failure." The memo said no definitive single cause had been isolated but added that "replacement of the system board did resolve the problem."

The memo was obtained from the State Board of Elections through a lawsuit filed by Linda Schade, an activist with a group called TrueVoteMD. The group has tried to push Maryland to adopt a system that provides a verifiable paper trail of each vote cast.

A second Diebold memo provided by the board to Schade, dated March 28, 2004, blamed a "specific batch of RAM chips used in the manufacture of a quantity of system boards." It added that "batch-level tracking" was not used in the manufacturing process, so "it is impossible to identify or predict the occurrence of [system board] failures."

The second memo said 156 system boards had been replaced to address a variety of problems. Relative to the 16,000 Diebold voting machines in Maryland at the time, the memo said the 156 replacements represent a failure rate of 0.97 percent. "This is not a case of defective production units being released for shipment," the memo said. (A 2005 Diebold letter revised the number of system boards replaced to 129.)

Maintenance records obtained by The Post show that Diebold technicians in Ohio replaced an additional 133 system boards from June to November 2004, including those in machines that had experienced screen freezes.

By the 2004 general election, the screen-freeze problem had not been solved. Montgomery reported 106 screen freezes on Election Day, meaning that 4 percent of the 2,500 machines deployed in the county were affected.

The problems prompted another "root cause failure analysis" by Diebold. In February 2005, the screen-freeze problem was again identified as a "hardware issue," according to a memo. A March memo promised that the company would "implement permanent corrective or preventive action."

National Federation Of The Blind Files Target Lawsuit (USAT)

By Laura Parker

USA Today, October 26, 2006

Bruce Sexton is blind. He would like to shop on Target's website, but says he can't "read" it. He says the site lacks certain coding — found on many other websites — that would activate software to allow blind computer users to hear audio descriptions of what is on Internet pages.

Sexton, 24, who lives in Berkeley, Calif., and the National Federation of the Blind are suing Target on behalf of the 1.3 million blind people in the USA. The suit alleges that the giant retailer discriminates against the visually impaired by violating state and federal laws that protect the disabled.

The case draws national attention because it could have implications for virtually every retailer and business in the USA that operates a website. The case also fuels a wider debate starting to play out in courtrooms: whether anti-discrimination laws apply to the Internet.

It's a key question in lawsuits across the nation. Craigslist.org, a popular advertising and networking website, is being sued in federal court in Chicago over allegations it has allowed ads for apartments and other housing that discriminate on the basis of race, sex, class, religion or familial status.

In court papers, Craigslist argues it is protected by the federal law that protects website owners from liability for content posted by the sites' users. Craigslist CEO Jim Buckmaster has said it would be impossible for the site's staff to review the 2 million free housing ads posted to the site each month. A hearing in the case is scheduled for Nov. 13.

In the Target case, the retailer contends that the federal Americans with Disabilities Act and two California laws cited by Sexton apply only to its brick-and-mortar stores and do not extend to the Internet.

Last month, a federal judge disagreed with Target and rejected its bid to dismiss the suit. The case is proceeding toward trial, but no court date has been set.

DOJ_NMG_0086572

The recent ruling was "very significant," says Brian Blair, an Orlando lawyer who specializes in defending companies accused of violating laws that protect people with disabilities.

"For any business that has a physical location and a website, (the ruling) says you need to take reasonable steps to permit accessibility for the disabled," says Blair, who is not involved in the dispute.

Blind or visually impaired people are able to use the Internet by installing "reader" software on their computers that searches for codes embedded on websites.

The codes enable text and graphics to be read or described audibly. The software also lets the blind navigate sites by using keystrokes instead of a mouse. Such functions have not been available to blind users of target.com, court papers say. Because Target's website has required the use of a mouse, blind customers have been unable to make purchases on the site.

Target.com has "thousands of access barriers that make it difficult, if not impossible, for blind customers" to use the site, the suit says.

The Americans with Disabilities Act requires stores, restaurants and other businesses to provide access to people with mental and physical disabilities. Since the Internet emerged, several lawsuits have focused on what site owners should be required to do to make their pages accessible to the disabled.

A lawsuit filed by the National Federation of the Blind against America Online in 1999 was dropped after AOL agreed to design new versions of its software to accommodate disabled users.

In 2002, Southwest Airlines fended off a similar challenge after a Miami judge found that federal disability law did not apply to the airline's website because a "virtual" ticket counter is not a physical place. Southwest's Brandy King says the airline opposed the lawsuit because it believed its website complied with federal disability law. Since then, she says, Southwest has added more coding to the site to help the blind.

Andrew Langer, manager of regulatory policy for the National Federation of Independent Business in Washington, said the cost of changing a website to accommodate disabled viewers often is not significant for large companies. He said companies often fight such lawsuits for philosophical reasons.

Businesses want to attract customers, he says, "but they want to do it on their own terms. You want to make decisions for your business without being coerced."

Langer says that as retailers get more savvy about the Internet, "more are going to be making sure their websites are readily accessible to the blind," he says.

Carolyn Brookter, a Target spokeswoman, declined to discuss the lawsuit. In an e-mailed statement, Brookter said the retailer is "making online enhancements that will benefit all our guests, including those with disabilities." She added that "one of the things the enhancements will do is further increase the usability of the website for guests with sight disabilities." She did not elaborate or say when the changes would be made.

Sexton says he visited Target's site two weeks ago to see whether it had been improved. "They've made some minor changes," he says. "But they haven't made it an easy or enjoyable experience for me."

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John Mccaslin

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

Bury the hatchet

Inside the Beltway has learned that NAACP Chairman Julian Bond, who has repeatedly denounced the Republican Party and conservative black leaders alike, will come face-to-face this evening with U.S. Court of Appeals Judge Janice Rogers Brown. Judge Brown was nominated to her position by President Bush and is frequently mentioned as a possible Supreme Court nominee.

The two are among three prominent black leaders being saluted at a reception for the White House Fellowships program, hosted by conservative commentator Armstrong Williams in his Northeast Washington home.

Renowned neurosurgeon Dr. Benjamin Carson of Johns Hopkins Hospital fame is the third honoree.

DOJ_NMG_0086573

Mr. Williams, who sits on the President's Commission on White House Fellowships, was unavailable for comment yesterday, however a spokesman in his office stressed that "there will be no gauntlet -- politics will be put to the side for this celebration of White House fellows."

To the best of his knowledge, the spokesman said this will be the first time Mr. Bond and Judge Brown have met.

Mullah rocks

That was syndicated columnist Mark Steyn -- "The man who likes to poke the world in the eye," blared one recent headline -- belting out a Rod Stewart classic while a guest on "Bill Bennett's Morning in America" radio show this week.

Discussing his gloomy new book, "America Alone: The End of the World as We Know It," Mr. Steyn was waxing on the hypocrisy of Islamism and recalled how U.S. military forces discovered vintage eight-track tapes of Mr. Stewart's music in Taliban leader Mullah Omar's compound after the liberation of Afghanistan in 2001.

Suddenly, Mr. Steyn broke into song, riffing on the Stewart hit, "Da Ya Think I'm Sexy."

Mr. Bennett's producer, Seth Leibsohn, told the Beltway: "It was a unique moment for a talk show, but not so unique for Bennett's show, where the former education secretary often breaks into song given his love of '50s rock and roll."

Audio of Mr. Steyn's spontaneous performance can be heard at bennettmornings.com.

Tacky reporting

Sheryl Stolberg, White House correspondent for the New York Times, learned the hard way this week to stick to reporting on President Bush and keep her interior-decorating critiques to herself.

"Your [reporting] pool is informed that some readers took offense to the previous pool report's description of the pool hold in Boca [Raton, Fla.], which shall not be repeated here. Upon reflection, it seems an apology is in order to those who open their homes so that we might do our jobs. Please excuse your pool's lack of graciousness. Good manners sometimes slip away after a tiring day."

What on earth did she file in her initial White House pool report about Mr. Bush's trip to Florida? Read for yourself:

"Fancy gated neighborhood called The Sanctuary, with big stucco houses. Jordan Zimmerman, founder and chairman of Zimmerman advertising, was the host. Your pool was holed up at the next door neighbor's house, where there was a verrrrrry expensive Bentley and a less expensive Mercedes in the garage. We were in the pool room. Very big, but tacky decor, in the humble view of your pool."

Place your bets

The 2008 presidential elections are still two years away, but as President Bush observed at his press conference yesterday, every possible major party candidate and then some are being weighed by all the pundits and their mothers.

Will Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, run and become the first woman president? Or might Illinois Sen. Barack Obama win his party's nomination and become the nation's first black commander in chief?

Obviously, it's anybody's guess -- including who the ultimate Republican nominee will be. Still, it's always fun to ponder, as political analysts at Intertops.com do with their updated odds on who will become the next president:

ANTITRUST:

FCC Likely To Avoid 'net Neutrality' Debate In AT&T-BellSouth Merger Decision (SAEN)

By Sanford Nowlin, Express-News Business Writer

San Antonio Express-News, October 26, 2006

As the Federal Communications Commission mulls conditions on AT&T Inc.'s $83 billion merger with BellSouth Corp., the commission faces pressure to turn the process into a fight over network neutrality, the concept that Internet service providers like AT&T should treat all traffic the same.

It's pressure, experts add, that the FCC is likely to resist.

Net neutrality proponents — consumer groups and Internet companies like Google, among them — worry San Antonio-based AT&T wants to create a two-tiered Internet where it picks which sites thrive and which flounder.

DOJ_NMG_0086574

And some now view the debate over deal conditions as their golden opportunity to make AT&T sign off on net neutrality protections before it closes the largest telecom deal in history.

"(AT&T) wants this merger to happen before the end of the year," said Gigi Sohn, president of Public Knowledge, which filed comments Tuesday asking the FCC to make AT&T treat all Internet content equally. "I think that's the biggest card we hold."

The FCC originally was set to rule on the merger Oct. 12, but pushed back its vote to Nov. 3 after commissioners reached an impasse over what conditions, if any, to impose on the deal. Republican FCC Chairman Kevin Martin proposed approving the merger without conditions, but the two Democrats commissioners said they wanted to see consumer-friendly safeguards.

In response, AT&T offered a set of conditions to which it would agree, including making speedy Web access available for $10 a month if bundled with phone service and not increasing rates competitors pay to access its networks.

Competitors and consumer groups had until Tuesday to file remarks about the AT&T proposals.

Analysts said they would be surprised if the FCC deviates too far from the conditions AT&T has already offered up — especially into territory as controversial as net neutrality. So far, the Justice Department and 18 states have approved the transaction, making the FCC its last regulatory hurdle to clear.

"I think pretty much what AT&T proposed will be accepted," said Patrick Comack, telecom analyst for Zachary Investment Research in Miami. "The Democrats on the FCC want to show they won something for consumers, but they aren't going to end up pushing AT&T around too much, especially on net neutrality."

While the FCC faces pressure to do something about net neutrality, analysts say the AT&T-BellSouth merger is unlikely to be the forum where it chooses to do so. Congress debated net neutrality this year amid heavy lobbying from the telecom and tech industries but never brought legislation to a floor vote.

"The FCC is not going to set policy for a whole industry based on concessions on one merger," Frost Bank analyst Le Keough said.

AT&T blasted the net neutrality demands, saying that they "smack of public relations-driven opportunism as opposed to a thoughtful approach to policymaking." In its proposed conditions, AT&T said it would abide for 30 months by net neutrality rules the FCC adopted last year.

"The proper place to be debating the pros and cons of net neutrality is in the U.S. Congress or in an industry-wide proceeding at the FCC," said Jim Cicconi, AT&T senior executive vice president external affairs.

Even some merger critics said they're not holding out hope that the FCC will make the company sign off on stringent new net neutrality guarantees. More realistic to expect, they add, are conditions that would offer consumers low-cost broadband and protect rivals that sell to business customers inside the merged AT&T-BellSouth's territory.

"This particular FCC has basically done nothing to stop these mergers," said Bruce Kushnick of watchdog group TeleTruth. "They're not going to make any controversial requirements at this point, especially not on something like net neutrality."

The FCC is split 3-2 in favor of Republicans, but one Republican commissioner, Robert McDowell, will abstain from the vote since he previously worked for a group that represented AT&T and BellSouth competitors. That gives the panel an even partisan split.

FPL Group, Constellation Energy Call Off Their $12.5 Billion Deal (WSJ)

By Andrew Dowell And Christine Buurma

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

FPL Group and Constellation Energy Group called off their $12.5 billion merger, as state regulators' concerns about rising power prices scuttled another major utility deal.

The decision follows Exelon Corp.'s move Sept. 14 to scrap its $17 billion acquisition of Public Service Enterprise Group for similar reasons and makes clear that any deal making in the sector faces a high hurdle.

FPL said it will focus on organic growth rather than mergers in the wake of the failed deal. FPL spokeswoman Mary Lou Kromer said the company will consider acquiring nuclear-power plants and wind farms to build out its wholesale power-generation business.

DOJ_NMG_0086575

Shares of Baltimore-based Constellation were down 19 cents, or 0.3%, to $62.37, while shares of Juno Beach, Fla.-based FPL were up $1.60, or 3.3%, to $49.77 in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

Constellation, the company being acquired in the transaction, asked to call it off because of uncertainty over whether the deal could win regulatory approval in Maryland, the companies said.

The companies both said they have strong prospects as separate operations.

The merger, announced in December, faltered after being caught up in partisan battles between Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich and the Democrat-controlled state Legislature. In June, state lawmakers passed a law that disbanded the Ehrlich-appointed Maryland Public Service Commission after the commission approved a 72% rate rise for Constellation's utility subsidiary, Baltimore Gas & Electric.

In September, the Maryland Court of Appeals ruled that the Legislature couldn't fire the commissioners. But the court left intact a provision of the law that prevents the commission from ruling on the FPL-Constellation deal until its members are replaced, leaving regulatory review of the merger uncertain.

Investment bankers and utilities expected a series of mergers in the fragmented industry, after a Depression-era law limiting utility mergers was repealed last year. The biggest obstacle to deals getting done has proved to be state officials seeking large concessions from utilities over concerns about record electricity rates.

Plug Pulled On Md. Utility Deal (WP)

By Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

Political uproar in Maryland over rising electric utility rates has derailed plans for the $12.4 billion takeover of Constellation Energy Group Inc., owner of the state's largest utility, by a Florida company.

FPL Group Inc., owner of Florida's biggest utility, yesterday abandoned its proposed acquisition after Constellation of Baltimore suggested that the two companies drop the merger because of "continued uncertainty over regulatory and judicial matters in Maryland and the potential for a protracted and open-ended merger review process."

The proposed takeover, unveiled in December, has been at the center of a political brawl in Maryland, made more intense by a request this year by Constellation's Baltimore Gas and Electric Co. unit for a 72 percent increase in electric rates. Litigation was continuing, and Maryland's Public Service Commission still needed to approve the FPL merger.

"It's been a long time in coming, and I'm not surprised," Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) said yesterday. He blamed Democratic legislative leaders for creating uncertainty with a law that temporarily lowered rates and dismissed the state's utility regulators. Maryland's highest court later reinstated the PSC members but let stand a provision of the legislation that prevented those members from ruling on the merger.

The coming elections were unlikely to alter the outlook. Democrats are expected to retain control of the state legislature. And Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, Ehrlich's Democratic challenger, has vowed to fire the PSC members, who he said yesterday had showed an "utter lack of leadership and professionalism."

The end of the merger does not mean any relief for Maryland ratepayers, who still face sharply higher energy costs in a deregulated electricity market. Though rate increases were limited by the legislature this year, the full amount of higher costs will take effect Jan. 1, 2008. Moreover, ratepayers will not receive $21.4 million a year in cost savings from the merger that Constellation had promised to pass on during the next decade. Those savings were supposed to show up starting in January. Cancellation of the merger also makes it more likely that Constellation will reopen negotiations with the legislature on another $386 million in dispute.

But consumer groups critical of Constellation said that the sum would deflect only a small portion of the full rate increases that will be phased in over the next 14 months and that BGE customers were better off without the merger.

Johanna Neumann, a policy advocate at Maryland Public Interest Research Group, said "the blocked merger is a victory for BGE ratepayers." She said the merger "would have created an energy giant large and powerful enough to dictate electric rates" and that "the risk of skyrocketing electric bills far exceeded Constellation's paltry pass-on of savings."

DOJ_NMG_0086576

The collapse of the FPL-Constellation deal highlights the difficulty of merging two utilities, despite the 2005 repeal of the Depression-era Public Utilities Holding Company Act (PUHCA) that many experts had predicted would lead to a major consolidation of the industry. Last month, Exelon Corp. dropped its $17.8 billion bid for Public Service Enterprise Group Inc . after failing to come to an accord with New Jersey regulators.

"There was a lot of enthusiasm after the repeal of PUHCA that all the barriers [to mergers] were gone," said Robert Burns, senior researcher at the National Regulatory Research Institute at Ohio State University. "That is simply not the case. There are still regulatory hurdles to go over and a lot of those hurdles are appropriate. State commissions want to make sure their ratepayers are protected."

Though many analysts had anticipated the merger's cancellation, it was not clear why it occurred now. "There was no particular tipping point or precipitating event," said Paul Allen, senior vice president of corporate affairs at Constellation. "There was no clearly identifiable path forward for obtaining approval. We needed to get on with running our business."

Some sources close to the companies said the collapse of the merger took place during a culture clash between the button-down Constellation and the more freewheeling FPL, especially in dealing with Maryland legislators. FPL chief executive Lewis Hay III said at a conference last month in New York that FPL had "limited patience" left with the Maryland legislature, and on Oct. 4 FPL filed suit against the state and the PSC to force a timely review of the merger.

Hay and Constellation chief executive Mayo A. Shattuck III were "like Felix and Oscar," said one person familiar with the companies who spoke on condition of anonymity to protect his business relationship with them.

But the two chief executives praised each other yesterday in a joint statement, and a Constellation executive said style or corporate culture had nothing to do with the merger's cancellation. "With any two companies, you are going to be able to find differences of style and approach," Constellation's Allen said. "But the deal was a good idea. The transaction made sense. We just couldn't see a path to getting it done."

Constellation and FPL have reorganized over the past few years to take advantage of the partial deregulation of electric utilities. While local utilities used to own their power-generating plants, those plants have now been spun off into companies or, in the case of Constellation and FPL, subsidiaries. With high energy costs, those power generators have been demanding higher prices from utilities, which must then pass them on to customers long used to stable rates. The result has been big profits for power generators and wholesalers, and rate shock for consumers.

By taking over Constellation, FPL would have greatly expanded its reach, and Constellation would have gained financial muscle.

"FPL and Constellation didn't make any bones about it. FPL wasn't interested in the local [Baltimore] utility," said Theresa Czarski, the deputy at the Office of the People's Counsel. "It was interested in Constellation's generating assets."

After spending tens of millions of dollars on lawyers and investment bankers, the two firms are going separate ways.

Analysts say that Constellation remains an attractive business on its own. It has a fleet of relatively low-cost power generation plants, including nuclear, and its energy wholesale business markets electricity across the country to industrial and big commercial customers.

"On a stand-alone basis, we believe the stock is undervalued," Citigroup Inc. analyst Greg Gordon said in a report issued yesterday. He said the main risks to the company were the volatility of energy prices and further legislation limiting rate increases in Maryland.

FPL also asserted that it would grow on its own. Like Constellation, it has a large and profitable energy wholesaling business and its Florida Power and Light utility has been adding about 100,000 customers a year; it now has 4.4 million customers. FPL also has a unit in the wind-farm business.

"We are very much focused on continuing to grow those businesses and will be able to continue to provide shareholder value for some time," said Mary Lou Kromer, FPL's vice president for marketing and communications.

Constellation shares closed yesterday at $62.37, down 19 cents a share. FPL shares closed at $49.77, up $1.60 a share.

Yankee Candle Agrees To $1.4 Billion Buyout (WSJ)

By James Covert

DOJ_NMG_0086577

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

Yankee Candle Co. agreed to be acquired by a private-equity firm for $1.4 billion, plus the assumption of $300 million of debt.

The South Deerfield, Mass., maker of scented candles and home fragrances said Madison Dearborn Partners LLC will buy it for $34.75 a share, in a deal expected to close in the first quarter. Yankee Candle shares soared $5.01, or 17%, to $33.73 apiece in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

The company in July said it had hired Lehman Brothers to help it explore alternatives, including a possible sale. Yesterday, Yankee Candle's chief financial officer, Bruce Besanko, said the auction attracted "multiple interested parties," but he declined to be more specific.

Credit Suisse analyst Paul Lejuez said the deal came sooner than expected and the price was surprisingly high, possibly "an indication that private equity is willing to accept a lower rate of return than one would typically assume."

Madison Dearborn managing director Rob Selati said the Chicago private-equity firm will work with the company's current management to "build on Yankee's brand strength and to capitalize on the significant growth opportunities ahead."

Yankee Candle also said third-quarter net income fell 3.2% to $14.9 million, from $15.4 million a year earlier. With fewer shares outstanding in the latest period, per-share earnings improved to 37 cents from 35 cents. Sales rose 17% to $159.6 million, with same-store sales, or sales at stores open at least a year, up 8%.

Milberg, Weiss & Bush (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

Milberg Weiss is under federal indictment, but that doesn't mean the class-action specialist isn't still making legal mischief. A case in point is Billing v. Credit Suisse First Boston, in which Milberg has even managed to get part of the Bush Administration on its side. Someone in the White House should be embarrassed about this one.

In Billing, Milberg is suing investment banks on behalf of investors who participated in dot-com era IPOs that later went south. The case has been dismissed once, only to be reinstated by the Second Circuit Court of Appeals and is now headed for the Supreme Court. But the Justice Department's Antitrust Division has sided with Milberg, even as the SEC has submitted briefs in defense of the banks.

The Supreme Court has asked the Solicitor General to provide the government's view of the case -- but the question is, which arm of the government? Our sources say that, sometime in the next few days, the SG's office will file a brief recommending that the Supremes overturn the appeals court -- meaning, in short, that the SEC will have won the turf war. But the brief is being circulated within the Administration, so things could still change.

To understand how the SEC and Justice ended up on different sides, some background is in order. The plaintiffs allege that investment banks during the dot-com era engaged in anticompetitive practices violating the Sherman Antitrust Act. Some of the alleged collusion sounds like standard IPO underwriting -- creating a syndicate, building a pre-IPO order book, et cetera.

Some of it, if true, probably crosses the line. In this second category are activities such as requiring IPO investors to buy additional shares after the stock starts trading, punishing those who sell quickly by denying them access to future IPOs. But here's the rub: Such behavior is already barred by securities regulations handed down by the SEC. Milberg Weiss's innovation was to sue on behalf of investors in an antitrust class-action, rather than under securities laws. This creates the nifty potential of a treble-damage award for the plaintiffs (and their lawyers, natch).

The trial judge threw the case out on grounds that this was a securities-law problem, not an antitrust action. When Milberg Weiss appealed, the Second Circuit -- which is vying with the Ninth Circuit in creative law-making -- asked Justice and the SEC for their views. They took different sides, and the Second Circuit ruled for Milberg and the Antitrust Division.

Beltway turf battles are nothing new, but grown-ups in the executive branch are supposed to settle them. For a Bush Administration that has long called for reining in the trial lawyers, allowing its own Antitrust Division to aid Milberg in another abuse of the tort system is an amazing legal and political abdication. We hope somebody at Justice is making sure that the Solicitor General's brief in Billing argues against giving the trial bar an expansion into the antitrust field.

Radio Chain Said To Weigh Selling Itself (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0086578

By Ken Belson And Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

The Mays Family, which built Clear Channel Communications into the country's largest network of radio stations through decades of acquisitions, is in negotiations to be taken private by a consortium of investors for more than $18.5 billion, people involved in the talks said yesterday.

The investors, who have been in discussions with Clear Channel for months, include Providence Equity Partners, the Blackstone Group and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company, these people said.

The negotiations come as family- controlled media companies across the nation explore the possibility of selling their companies or taking them private. Cox Communications, the cable company based in Atlanta, went private in 2004. Cablevision, which is controlled by the Dolan family, is in the middle of negotiations to become private.

Clear Channel said yesterday in a statement that it was "evaluating various strategic alternatives to enhance shareholder value." The company has hired Goldman, Sachs & Company as its financial adviser.

Other potential suitors have emerged in recent days. They include Cerberus Capital Management, Oak Hill Capital Partners and Thomas H. Lee Partners, people briefed on the negotiations said. Now that the company is seeking alternatives, other suitors, including big media companies, could surface.

As of yesterday, Clear Channel had a market capitalization of $16.1 billion, thanks partly to an 18 percent surge in the company's stock since Aug. 9 amid speculation about a sale. Yesterday, shares of Clear Channel rose 15 cents, to $32.35.

Even with the rise in the company's shares, the company could still receive a 15 percent premium through a sale, according to Eileen Furukawa, who covers the company for Citigroup Global Markets. That would represent an offer of about $37.30 per share.

Clear Channel's shares, however, have declined during the last half-decade, reflecting the steady defection of radio listeners who are spending more time listening to iPods and visiting Web sites and writing e-mail messages. Radio stations are also under threat from subscriber-based networks like XM Radio and Sirius Satellite Radio.

More than 9 out of 10 Americans still listen to traditional radio stations, but the amount of time people tune in has slid 14 percent over the last decade, according to Arbitron ratings.

The steady dilution of radio listeners is a far cry from 1972, when Lowry Mays, the company's chairman, founded Clear Channel. A former investment banker, he bought several channels in San Antonio, where the company still has its headquarters. In 1984, the company went public and earned a reputation for turning around depressed stations.

The Federal Communications Commission in 1992 loosened rules on owning radio stations, paving the way for Clear Channel to sweep up more stations. The company now has more than 1,200 stations, and owns a substantial number of billboards and other outdoor advertising.

The company generated $6.6 billion in sales in 2005. Its stations include Z100 in New York and KISS-FM in Los Angeles.

As Clear Channel has grown, it has come under attack for homogenizing radio entertainment by standardizing playlists, playing too many commercials and not running enough local news. This in part spurred the growth of satellite-based subscription services like XM Radio.

In 2004, L. Lowry Mays stepped down as chief executive and one of his sons, Mark, took over. Another son, Randall is the company's chief financial officer. Before joining Clear Channel, he worked in the mergers and acquisitions department at Goldman Sachs.

Last year, Clear Channel sold 10 percent of Clear Channel Outdoor Holdings, its advertising unit, in an initial public offering. The company also spun off Clear Channel Entertainment, an events producer, to shareholders.

Big Law Firms From 2 Coasts Move Closer To A Merger (NYT)

By Michael J. De La Merced

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

Two major law firms — Dewey Ballantine and Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe — came closer to walking down the aisle yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0086579

Top committees of the two firms recommended a deal, the two said yesterday. The combined firm would be called Dewey Orrick, with 1,500 lawyers and offices around the world. Together, they would form the seventh-largest law office in New York, and have revenue around $1 billion, the firms said in a joint statement.

The merger would be the latest in a wave of consolidation among law firms.

A merger "gives us a stronger geographical reach, complementary practice areas and gives us financial strength to continue to build practice areas," the chairman of the management and executive committees, Morton A. Pierce, said.

Orrick's chairman, Ralph H. Baxter Jr., said: "This will create a new and highly unusual, if not unique, value proposition for our clients. Few firms will match the depth we'll have."

Some terms of the deal are not yet final, and it is subject to approval by each firm's partners. Mr. Pierce said the firms hoped to obtain approval by mid-December, paving the way for Dewey Orrick by Jan. 1. The Wall Street Journal reported the move by the firms' top committees yesterday.

Based on details released yesterday, while Dewey's name will have first billing, the new partnership will retain Orrick's signature green "O" logo. Mr. Morton and Mr. Baxter will serve as co-chairmen, with Mr. Baxter taking the additional title of presiding partner.

At a glance, Dewey and Orrick seem like opposite-coast reflections of each other. Both have long histories: Dewey's name is that of the former New York governor and presidential candidate Thomas E. Dewey, while Orrick is one of San Francisco's oldest law firms, founded in 1863.

Dewey Ballantine, a 550-lawyer firm with 11 offices, earned $392 million in revenue and $1.24 in profit per equity partner last year, according to the May issue of The American Lawyer. Orrick, with 950 lawyers in 18 offices, reported $554 million in revenue and $1.24 million in profit per equity partner in the same period.

Both have prominent corporate deal making and litigation practices. Dewey is considered a specialist in mergers and acquisitions; it advised the hospital operator HCA in its $33 billion leveraged buyout, and the Walt Disney Company in its $7.4 billion purchase of Pixar Animation.

A main Orrick niche is in advising companies on debt financing, leading The American Lawyer's list for advising municipal bond underwriting deals. Its clients on several capital market transactions and restructurings last year included Bear Stearns, Banc of America Securities and J. P. Morgan Chase.

Growing Funds Fuel Buyout Boom (WSJ)

By Jason Singer And Henny Sender

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

Already Biggest, Blackstone Pool Will Raise Additional $4.4 Billion As Firms Seek Larger Targets

Accelerating the buyout boom and putting some of the world's biggest public companies in reach, Blackstone Group has decided to increase the size of the world's largest private-equity fund to $20 billion.

The move by Blackstone, which already had raised a record $15.6 billion for the fund from investors, secures bragging rights for now in an industry that has several other giants looking to create funds of $15 billion or more.

But there is much more than pride at stake: Private-equity firms have been on a tear lately, buying up publicly traded businesses with the intention of making them more profitable -- frequently by aggressively cutting costs -- and then selling them for big gains, either to other companies or to public shareholders via new stock listings. Fifteen out of the top 20 buyouts on record have been announced in the past 18 months, and private-equity firms this year have accounted for 17% of all major mergers and acquisitions.

Now, all but the largest public companies are potential acquisition targets, especially given the growing trend of "club deals" involving multiple private-equity firms. Their increased financial firepower -- aided by heavy borrowing at low rates by companies they own -- has giant buyout firms already eyeing takeover targets with stock-market values of $50 billion or more, say people familiar with the matter.

Investment strategists who compile lists of potential targets in recent weeks have pointed to hardware giant Home Depot Inc., computer maker Dell Inc., and semiconductor maker Texas Instruments Inc. In Europe, investment bankers point to other big names, including Vivendi SA of France, BT Group PLC, the British telecommunications company, or even food giant Unilever, which is based in the U.K. and the Netherlands.

DOJ_NMG_0086580

The largest-ever private-equity purchase remains the iconic $25.1 billion acquisition in 1988 of RJR Nabisco by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. Close behind: this year's agreement by KKR, Bain Capital LLC and Merrill Lynch & Co.'s private-equity arm to purchase U.S.-based hospital chain HCA Inc. for $21.3 billion.

Just a year ago, the biggest private-equity funds had little more than $5 billion. Blackstone's previous fund, one of the world's largest at the time, was $6.45 billion, raised in 2002. Blackstone declined comment.

Private-equity firms raise money from deep-pocketed investors, including pension funds, university endowments and wealthy families. The firm's managers make money through fees imposed on their clients -- usually about 1.5% of how much they invested -- and on their companies, along with dividends they have those companies pay. Then they get a big cut of the profits when they sell companies, frequently via lucrative new initial public offerings of stock.

The firms used to raise new funds every five years or so, but now that pace has quickened to as often as every two years, keeping a constant flow of new money pouring in as old investments are cashed out. "We are seeing a significant privatization of corporate America," said James Westra, a lawyer with the Boston office of Weil, Gotshal & Manges LLP, who works closely with private-equity firms.

So far this year, about $159 billion has been secured for new buyout funds world-wide, according to Thomson Financial. The firms have spent $421 billion on buying companies this year, up from $253 billion in all of 2005.

Over the past decade, private-equity funds have average investment returns of 17% a year, Thomson Financial data show, though the biggest funds generally do much better.

Blackstone's move likely will ramp up the race for bigger funds. Carlyle Group of Washington, D.C., is targeting a single fund of $15 billion, but may now opt for a larger size. KKR of New York has several initiatives going which will raise a total of as much as $25 billion, though not in a single fund. Texas Pacific Group has a new $15.2 billion fund. Spokesmen for Carlyle, KKR and TPG all declined to comment.

Martin Halusa, chief executive of private-equity firm Apax Partners Worldwide LLP of London, has said that a $100 billion fund is foreseeable.

Founded in 1985, Blackstone now employs 750 people world-wide. In addition to running private-equity funds, it offers investors slices of hedge funds, and operates a group that helps revamp troubled companies.

It decided to reopen its new $15.6 billion fund to investors because it was approaching a limit on how much it can spend each year. The firm promises its clients that it won't invest more than 40% of its money a year to avoid betting too much at once.

Among institutions that have invested in the new fund: Government of Singapore Investment Corp.; CALSTRS, or the California State Teachers' Retirement System; Calpers, or California Public Employees Retirement System; and the Canada Pension Plan.

The new megafunds likely are to intensify criticisms among some investors, especially about the fees that private-equity firms charge. Several investors in Blackstone's previous funds say they are opting out of this one, citing those fees.

Some investors say the fees allow private-equity firms to prosper even if their deals tank, separating investors' interests from the firms'.

"A lot of models are set up just to generate fees," said Joe Landy, co-head of New York private-equity firm Warburg Pincus LLC, at a recent conference. Warburg doesn't charge the companies it controls such fees.

These firms are subject to increasing public scrutiny. Several firms have received preliminary inquiries from the U.S. Department of Justice regarding possible collusion on deals involving multiple funds teaming up. Blackstone hasn't received an inquiry, a person familiar with the matter says.

Private-equity firms used to be disadvantaged in bidding wars for companies, because buyers in the target's industry could wring greater cost efficiencies out of their purchases, so they could afford to bid more. That is what happened last year when private-equity firm Ripplewood Holdings LLC bid for Maytag but was beat out by Whirlpool Corp.

That balance recently has swung in favor of private-equity firms, which in turn will fuel their ability to buy ever-bigger companies. The reason: The debt markets are extending financing to the private-equity firms at a cheaper rate and on more flexible terms, allowing the private-equity firms to offer more. Private-equity firms recently have paid as much as 20% over their acquisition's current share price.

DOJ_NMG_0086581

Many in the industry say things will only slow down when lenders raise rates or stiffen terms.

"What drives private equity today is how much leverage you can put on your companies," says Robert Kindler, head of mergers and acquisitions for Morgan Stanley. "At some point the merry-go-round has to stop."

Write to Jason Singer at jason.singer@wsj.com1 and Henny Sender at henny.sender@wsj.com2

NYSE To Buy Rest Of Amex Tech Stake (WSJ)

By Aaron Lucchetti

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

NYSE Group Inc. plans to buy the one third of its technology unit that it doesn't own for about $40 million from the American Stock Exchange, according to people familiar with the matter.

NYSE, which operates the New York Stock Exchange, will become full owner of Securities Industry Automation Corp., or SIAC, with the transaction. Amex and NYSE have been negotiating for months to complete a deal.

Both markets see the move as necessary as electronic trading and technology become crucial to gaining business for exchanges now structured as for-profit companies. In that environment, the sharing of technology between two exchange rivals became unpalatable.

NYSE wanted full control of the subsidiary, which handles the exchanges' communications networks and computer systems among other things. Amex gets cash to build its own technology, which it is hoping to roll out later this year after getting regulatory approval.

The deal will make it easier for NYSE to integrate its communications and market-data operations with those of Archipelago Holdings Inc., the electronic-exchange operator that the Big Board merged with in March. Analysts say cost cutting and layoffs are possible at the unit as NYSE tries to expand profit. A deal could close as soon as next month.

NYSE is also hoping to merge with pan-European exchange operator Euronext NV, and a good chunk of the more than $250 million in cost savings anticipated from that deal will come from reducing the number of technology platforms.

SIAC may be further restructured if NYSE finishes its deal with Euronext, which depends on a shareholder vote and is facing some political opposition in Europe.

Write to Aaron Lucchetti at aaron.lucchetti@wsj.com1

German Regulators Say No To Coherent Buy (AP-YBIZ)

AP, October 26, 2006

German Regulators Say No to Coherent's Proposed $376M Acquisition of Excel

NEW YORK (AP) -- Coherent Inc., a Santa Clara, Calif.-based maker of lasers for commercial and scientific uses, said Wednesday German regulators are prohibiting its $376 million acquisition of Excel Technology Inc.

Although the acquisition had passed U.S. antitrust authorities, the German Federal Cartel Office issued a prohibition order on the deal.

"While we are clearly very disappointed and disagree with the FCO's decision, we remain committed to accomplishing acquisitions that meet all our criteria for growth, diversification and financial performance," said John Ambroseo, Coherent's president and chief executive, in a statement.

The deal, announced in February, valued Excel, a maker of electro-optical and laser systems used for scientific, industrial and medical purposes, at $30 per share.

The acquisition was expected to close in the June quarter.

Shares of Coherent were trading at $35.60 in the after-hours session, down 9 cents from Wednesday's closing price of $35.69 on the Nasdaq. Excel shares finished the Nasdaq session unchanged at $29.

German Regulator OKs Metro-Wal-Mart Deal (AP)

AP, October 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0086582

FRANKFURT, Germany --Metro AG's deal to buy Wal-Mart Stores Inc.'s German operations received approval Wednesday from Germany's antitrust regulator, clearing the way for an acquisition that will expand Metro's presence in its home market.

The Federal Cartel Office approved the deal after deciding the addition of the 85 Wal-Mart stores would not give Metro a dominant position in the market.

The deal calls for Duesseldorf-based Metro to take over 19 pieces of Wal-Mart real estate and lease the remaining locations. Neither company has disclosed the deal's value.

Metro will fold the stores, which had sales of nearly euro2 billion in 2005, into its Real hypermarket brand. The first conversions are set to be finished before Christmas, and the rest should be integrated by mid-2007.

The addition of Wal-Mart's warehouses and logistics systems is expected to strengthen the position of Metro's existing 550 Real stores in the German market.

Metro operates more than 2,100 stores in 30 countries worldwide.

The deal, announced in July, marked Wal-Mart's second withdrawal from a major foreign market.

In May, it pulled out of the highly competitive South Korean market. The Bentonville, Arkansas-based retailer is concentrating on expanding in China and Central America.

Wal-Mart entered the German market in 1997 with the acquisition of the Wertkauf and Interspar hypermarket chains. But the German stores, which employ 11,000 people, struggled to break into the local market.

Shares of Metro were down less than half a percent to euro45.64 (US$57.24) in Frankfurt trading.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Military Tells Panel Stryker Unit Is Vital (HSB)

By Gregg K. Kakesako

Honolulu Star-Bulletin, October 26, 2006

An environmental group and Hawaiian activists want a halt to all related activities

Government lawyers say that halting Schofield Barracks' $1.5 billion Stryker unit would do "irreparable harm" to the Army, soldiers of the 2nd Brigade and the nation's security.

They oppose a motion by island environmentalists and Hawaiian activists who want the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to approve a temporary order halting all work on Stryker-related activities in Hawaii.

U.S. Justice Department attorneys Andrew Mergen and Michael Gray on Monday said "national security concerns" are more compelling today than they were on Nov. 5, 2004, when a federal court judge rejected environmentalists' first petition for a preliminary injunction.

The Army argued that the 2nd Brigade is scheduled to become a "fully manned, trained and equipped Stryker Brigade Combat Team, ready for deployment by November 2007."

Lt. Gen. John Brown, who heads Army troops in the Pacific, wrote in a letter published Monday in the Honolulu Star-Bulletin that the combat deployment will be to Iraq. This will be the second time the 25th Infantry Division's 2nd Brigade will pull combat duty there.

David Henkin, attorney with Earthjustice, said he expects the 9th Circuit in San Francisco will rule on its request for a temporary injunction by Tuesday.

Henkin said Earthjustice wants to temporarily stop the project so the environmental group and the Army can discuss what activities can proceed.

On Oct. 5 by a 2-1 vote, a three-judge federal appeals panel ruled that the Army's environmental impact statement was inadequate because it didn't consider other training sites where the 328, 19-ton, eight-wheeled combat vehicles could be located.

Henkin said Earthjustice wants a permanent injunction preventing the Army from proceeding with 28 Stryker-related construction projects, totaling $693 million.

DOJ_NMG_0086583

Henkin said Earthjustice wants the federal court to rule by Tuesday because the Army wants to start construction on a Schofield Barracks Battle Area Complex training area on the next day.

ZapataEngineering was awarded a nearly $5 million contract two years ago to clear 941 acres for gunnery training and weapons qualifications.

In its response, Army lawyers rejected Earthjustice's arguments that the 2nd Brigade could finish its training in Alaska or Washington because the Stryker units assigned to those Army posts would be back from Iraq.

"Training at another location would also requiring transporting ... personnel, equipment and vehicles to that installation that require 80 percent of the Air Force's transport capacity and would consume 40 out of 270 available training days," the Army lawyers wrote.

Government lawyers also said moving the 2nd Brigade out of Hawaii to complete its training would "reduce the Army's posture to deter conflict and meet treaty obligations in the Pacific region including the Republic of Korea."

Shell Could Face Criminal Charges In Russia (NYT)

By Andrew E. Kramer

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

MOSCOW, Oct. 25 — A Russian official threatened criminal prosecutions against employees of Royal Dutch Shell, ratcheting up pressure on the company's $22 billion oil and gas project on Sakhalin Island on Wednesday.

The remarks suggested a further unraveling of the relationship between Western energy companies and the Russian government, which is intent on gaining control of the energy sector.

Shell and two Japanese partners were accused of violating Russian environmental law at their Sakhalin 2 project. The project consists of two offshore platforms, a pipeline, the world's largest liquefied natural gas plant and an oil terminal. A Russian state company, Gazprom, wants a 25 percent share. Mitsui and Mitsubishi, of Japan, are minority owners.

"The breaches at Sakhalin 2 fall under five articles of the criminal code," Yuri Trutnev, the minister of natural resources, said after touring a pipeline Wednesday, in remarks shown on Russian television news. "This falls under criminal law and we think it's necessary to apply it. All the relevant documents should be sent to the prosecutor general within two weeks."

Lower-ranked Russian officials had threatened criminal charges earlier this month. The statement by Mr. Trutnev, however, carried more force and suggested an escalation because he is a member of the cabinet.

Mr. Trutnev said the ministry would calculate the cost of environmental damage from Sakhalin 2 within four months. He also said work on some pipeline sections should halt immediately and that he was preparing to cancel a water use permit, needed by the company.

President Vladimir V. Putin denied during a question-and-answer session on Russian television Wednesday that environmental laws were being selectively enforced against foreign energy companies.

Mr. Trutnev, whose ministry inspected Sakhalin 2 in August and again in September, had said the second inspection provided enough grounds to revoke a major environmental permit. He had said the permit would very likely be canceled this week. He delayed a decision on that permit, however, by one month for further study.

On Wednesday, Shell provided the ministry with its response to the August inspection; the company said 98 percent of the infractions cited had been rectified.

"I am pleased that Minister Trutnev has taken the time to visit Sakhalin to see firsthand the work in progress," Ian Craig, chief executive of Sakhalin Energy, the operating company, said in a statement Wednesday. "There is no question of our commitment to correct any errors that we or our contractors may have made," he said.

A company spokesman, Ivan O. Chernyakhovsky, said he could not respond to the threats of criminal prosecution made by Mr. Trutnev. "A lot was said today; we aren't ready to comment on it all in detail," he said. "We think we have complied with Russian legislation."

Weakening The Fight For Mine Safety (NYT)

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0086584

Despite being twice rebuffed by the Senate, President Bush has named Richard Stickler, a stolid mining industry careerist, to run the mine safety agency whose serial ineptitude has been laid bare this year by the deaths of 42 mineworkers. Waiting until the Senate left town for the elections, Mr. Bush resorted to a recess appointment to place Mr. Stickler at the heart of enforcing new safety reforms that, in earlier hearings, the appointee himself had claimed were not at all that necessary.

To the contrary, these reforms became a crying need brought home to the nation from the depths of the Sago mine disaster in West Virginia, where 12 workers died in January. Sago presented a clinic in failed government oversight. The new law would double a miner's emergency oxygen to two hours; mandate electronic devices to track trapped miners; and repair the damage originally done by the administration in cutting more than 200 mine safety inspectors in the name of budget economy.

Mr. Stickler points to his six years as Pennsylvania mine safety chief to rebut criticism that he is the latest example in the administration's dangerous history of packing safety agencies with pro- industry regulators. But the bulk of his career was in corporate management of mines. Miners and lawmakers have cited the federal agency's own data in warning that injury rates at his mines were higher than the national average. The administration's pro-industry tack is a running scandal exemplified by Steven Griles, a mining lobbyist who was appointed deputy secretary of the interior. Mr. Griles devoted four years to rolling back mine regulations and then returned to lobbying for an industry long known for its patronage clout with politicians.

Senate opposition to Mr. Stickler reached the point that the nomination was twice withheld. The Republican majority leader, Bill Frist, said that if the president resorted to a recess appointment — a device guaranteeing Mr. Stickler at least a year in office — the Senate would schedule a showdown vote in response. Senator Frist must be held to his promise. Lawmakers should demand a bulldog enforcement director rather than another industry lapdog.

Tribal Police Chief, Officer Face Federal Charges (AP)

AP, October 26, 2006

PHOENIX -- The White Mountain Apache tribal police chief and another officer have been charged with manipulating records in a federal investigation after the FBI began looking into the use of departmental funds at casinos.

Police Chief Lincoln Perry and Officer Tim Goode pleaded not guilty Wednesday in U.S. District Court, said Wyn Hornbuckle, spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office. They were each arraigned on one count of conspiracy to falsify records and 17 counts of falsifying records.

Perry and Goode are scheduled to stand trial Dec. 5 in Prescott, according to Hornbuckle.

Federal officials alleged the two men embezzled between $10,000 and $20,000 over a five-year period. According to authorities, Perry and Goode were the only ones allowed to sign on a bank account maintained by the tribal police investigations unit. The account is used for undercover purchases and payment to informants. Perry was already on suspension when the charges were filed.

In February, FBI investigators became aware of the account. A review of records gave rise to a probe into possible embezzlement and theft, Hornbuckle said. In April, a federal grand jury subpoena was issued for bank records dating back to January 2001.

Hornbuckle said Perry and Goode submitted fake receipts to tribal police in response to FBI agents looking into the bank account.

The records showed multiple withdrawals from the account from casinos in Las Vegas, Scottsdale, Hon-Dah, Camp Verde and San Carlos, Hornbuckle said.

After their court appearance Wednesday, Perry and Goode were released and barred from using firearms, gambling, traveling outside the state and contacting tribal police about their case.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

MCLU Says FBI Is Spying On Peace Activists (WCSH)

WCSH-TV, October 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0086585

The FBI has apparently been keeping files on the emails of peace activists in Maine. Last year, the Maine Civil Liberties Union filed a Freedom of Information Act request from the FBI.

Wednesday morning, it released the results, 18 pages of emails that the FBI had in its files.

Those emails were put out by "Peace Action Maine," the "Maine Center for Peace and Justice" and "Veterans for Peace" as they were organizing for two different protests.

Activists say they were shocked that their government was "spying" on them.

"I was surprised. And maybe I'm naive or idealistic, but I think that in America, the first amendment stands for freedom of speech and association. If someone is expressing their views in a peaceful way, they should be free from suspicion and should not be under surveillance or interrogation by the government," said Shenna Bellows from the MCLU.

A spokesperson for the FBI, Nenette Day, says the agency does not monitor or investigate peace groups in Maine. Day says the emails were likely forwarded to the FBI, then placed in a file.

Peace Groups Say FBI Monitored Their E-mails (AP)

AP, October 26, 2006

PORTLAND, Maine - The FBI has turned over e-mails it obtained from members of two Maine peace organizations containing information about demonstrations at the Brunswick Naval Air Station and Bath Iron Works, the Maine Civil Liberties Union said Wednesday.

The e-mails were turned over in response to a Freedom of Information request that the MCLU filed last year.

Obtaining the e-mails of Peace Action Maine and Veterans for Peace is a waste of FBI resources, and it has a chilling effect on people who want to speak out against government policies, said Shenna Bellows, executive director of the MCLU.

It also brings to mind the FBI's clandestine surveillance in decades past of Martin Luther King Jr., John Lennon and civil rights organizations, she said.

"History seems to be repeating itself," she said at a press conference at the Peace and Justice Center.

An FBI spokeswoman said the agency gets its information from a myriad of sources, including concerned citizens who send along correspondence they've obtained.

But it is incorrect to suggest that the FBI was spying on the Maine peace groups or intercepting their e-mails electronically, said Nenette Day of the Boston FBI office.

Day did not know exactly how the FBI came into possession of the e-mails, but said a federal court order would be required to obtain them electronically. The FBI would request such a court order only if it had evidence that a crime or an act of violence was going to be committed, or that national security was being compromised, she said.

"We do not investigate individuals engaged in their constitutional rights, including the right to free speech and assembly," Day said.

The MCLU filed a Freedom of Information request last year on behalf of Peace Action Maine, Veterans for Peace, five other organizations and 15 individuals.

In January, the FBI confirmed that it possessed some e-mails from the Maine Coalition for Peace and Justice, the MCLU said.

Late last month, the MCLU received copies of e-mails the FBI had obtained from Peace Action Maine, Veterans for Peace and two individuals connected to peace groups. The e-mail messages were redacted so they didn't contain names or information considered to be classified.

The e-mails discussed plans for a demonstration of the Blue Angels air show at Brunswick Naval Air Station on Sept. 10, 2005, and about a protest at the christening of a Navy destroyer at Bath Iron Works on July 23, 2005.

Some of the e-mails that were released were written by John "Jack" Bussell, a board member of Veterans for Peace. Bussell, who served in the Army from 1959-79, said peace groups have long suspected their activities are being scrutinized.

"But to see it is shocking," he said.

Cops Arrested For Allegedly Stealing $31,000 (CHIST)

By Frank Main, Crime Reporter

DOJ_NMG_0086586

Chicago Sun-Times, October 26, 2006

Officers Richard E. Doroniuk, 30, and Officer Mahmoud "Mike" Shamah, 27, were picked up at their homes this morning without a struggle. A civilian, Larry "Peanut" Cross, also is implicated. They are charged with conspiracy to commit theft.

Doroniuk allegedly was caught on an Aug. 17 wiretap — the day before one of their ripoffs — discussing that he needed to be careful because other cops had recently been busted.

» Click to enlarge image

They also planned to conduct a home invasion on one of the drug dealers whose lockers they targeted, but the ripoff was never carried out, officials said. They intended to buy a diamond necklace or something else valuable for an unidentified person who was going to help them with the robbery, authorities said.

"Today's arrests result from the department's ongoing commitment to remove bad cops from the streets," said police Supt. Phil Cline.

The arrests come just a month after four police officers were arrested for allegedly invading homes and robbing people of valuables. More cops are expected to be arrested in that case. Earlier this month, the Chicago Police Department launched an evaluation of officers with 20 or more complaints lodged against them to identify problem cops.

The FBI and the police Internal Affairs Division conducted the sting. The FBI learned from an informant that Cross was discussing ripoffs by Doroniuk and Shamah. Cross allegedly asked the informant to provide information about locations for the officers to commit thefts, authorities said.

The FBI directed the informant to tell Cross about the Grand-Pulaski Self Storage facility, where undercover agents rented a unit and left a black backpack-style bag containing $20,000, according to an FBI affidavit.

On June 13, Doroniuk and Shamah allegedly went to the storage unit with a search warrant and two other unidentified officers. Surveillance agents allegedly saw them enter and exit the unit carrying bolt cutters. When they left, the money was allegedly missing.

As of early October, there were no police records showing the money was seized or inventoried, authorities said.

On Aug. 18, the FBI set up another sting at a storage facility at Grand and Kilbourn, where the FBI informant told Cross there were drugs and at least $30,000 in cash from drug sales, authorities said. The FBI put $18,100 in the locker.

Doroniuk, Shamah and four unidentified officers went to the storage unit with a search warrant and seized the money, authorities said. They turned in $7,000 as evidence from the search and allegedly stole the remaining $11,100. Cross told the informant the officers gave him $800, authorities said.

During a wiretapped conversation on Aug. 17, Doroniuk allegedly discussed the arrest with Shamah, saying "We got to be ... real smart about this ... man." Doroniuk also was caught on tape talking about the arrest of other officers with an unidentified accomplice.

Doroniuk joined the department in January 2000 and Shamah's been a Chicago Police officer since August 2001. Both officers are tactical officers in the Morgan Park District on the Southwest Side.

It was unclear whether any of the unidentified officers who participated in the seizures face any disciplinary action.

They are expected to appear before U.S. Magistrate Judge Nan Nolan at 3:30 p.m. today.

2 Chicago Police Officers Charged In Narcotics Case (BVND)

By Mike Robinson

The Belleville News Democrat, October 26, 2006

CHICAGO - Two Chicago police officers were charged Wednesday for allegedly conspiring with a narcotics dealer to steal $31,100 in what they mistakenly believed was drug money.

Officers Richard E. Doroniuk, 30, and Mahmoud "Mike" Shamah, 27, both members of a South Side tactical unit, were arrested without incident in their homes early Wednesday, federal officials said.

The two officers appeared Wednesday afternoon before U.S. Magistrate Judge Nan R. Nolan, who set a bond hearing for Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0086587

Doroniuk attorney Robert Clarke said the officer "is going to get his full day in court and that's what he wants," while Shamah attorney Anthony Pinelli declined to comment because he was still studying the case.

Federal officials said the money had been planted in self-storage lockers as part of a sting operated jointly by FBI agents and Chicago police internal affairs investigators.

Officials said the officers used information from a third defendant, Larry "Peanut" Cross, 55, to obtain search warrants for the lockers.

According to the complaint, the officers failed to report any of the money seized from a locker in June and only part of the cash taken in a second theft in August.

They took the money believing they were ripping off a drug dealer, federal officials said. They said Cross already was in state custody.

A criminal complaint unsealed following the arrests charged all three men with conspiracy to steal government funds.

Police Superintendent Phil Cline said the charges "should send a clear message to the public and the department's 13,600 honorable men and women that officers who violate the public trust will be held accountable."

"Today's arrests result from the department's ongoing commitment to remove bad cops from the streets," Cline said in a statement.

Doroniuk has been a police officer since January 2000 and Shamah since August 2001, federal officials said.

Jail Guard Charged With Accepting Bribes From Inmate (AP)

AP, October 26, 2006

SANTA ANA, October 25, 2006 - A federal grand jury indicted a jail guard Wednesday on charges he accepted $6,000 from an inmate in exchange for smuggling in banned cell phones.

Also on abc7.com:

Daily Newsletter | Breaking News Alerts | Eyewitness News team Bios Jose Abel Flores, 37, of Corona, was arrested Oct. 17 at his work, the Santa Ana City Jail. He was being held on $100,000 bond and was scheduled to be arraigned Nov. 6.

If convicted of two bribery counts, Flores faces a maximum sentence of 30 years in federal prison.

Flores accepted two $3,000 bribes in exchange for bringing cellular telephones to a federal inmate being held in jail on narcotics and weapons charges, according to the indictment. The bribes were paid from a purported friend of Flores, but in fact the friend was an undercover FBI agent, authorities said.

Ring Allegedly Hid Meth In Elmo Dolls (AP)

AP, October 26, 2006

DENVER -- Drug agents broke up an aggressive northern Colorado ring that shipped methamphetamine hidden in Elmo dolls and other toys, authorities said Wednesday.

The alleged ringleader was among 19 people in custody, authorities said. Agents said they seized more than 45 pounds of what they described as high-quality methamphetamine worth $864,000 and capable of supplying 4 million doses.

U.S. Attorney Troy Eid said the alleged ringleader, Rigoverto Valle-Sierra, was arrested Tuesday in Greeley after a yearlong investigation that stretched from Colorado to California.

Jeffrey D. Sweetin, special agent in charge of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration's Rocky Mountain Region, said Valle-Sierra was working with about five methamphetamine rings.

"I've never seen a meth arrest have more impact than this one," he said.

Officials said Valle-Sierra was trying to take over the methamphetamine trade in northern Colorado with an operation that used night-vision goggles and bulletproof vests.

Sweetin said agents believe Valle-Sierra bought methamphetamine in the Los Angeles area but it was probably made in a large lab in Mexico.

Colorado Meth Ring Smuggled Drugs Inside Elmo Dolls And Other Toys, DEA Says (AP)

AP, October 26, 2006

DENVER — Authorities said Wednesday that they have broken up a methamphetamine ring that shipped the drug in toys including an Elmo doll.

Agents said 19 people were in custody, including the alleged leader of the northern Colorado drug ring, and that they seized more than 45 pounds of what they described as high-quality methamphetamine.

Officials released photos of an Elmo doll found in a car in Barstow, Calif., with a caption saying 4 pounds of methamphetamine was found inside. Eid said he could not discuss what happened because the doll of the "Sesame Street" character was evidence in the case.

• Crack the case in FOXNews.com's Crime Center.

Authorities said other toys also were used to hide drugs but did not elaborate. Other photos showed drugs shipped in a suitcase and tucked inside a tire.

U.S. Attorney Troy Eid said the alleged ringleader, Rigoverto Valle-Sierra, was arrested Tuesday in Greeley after a yearlong investigation.

(Story continues below)

Advertise Here Advertisements

Jeffrey D. Sweetin, regional Drug Enforcement Administration special agent in charge, said the operation was selling methamphetamine that was about 99 percent pure, while most methamphetamine sold on the street is about 30 to 40 percent pure. Authorities said the seized drugs, valued at $864,000, amounted to about 4 million doses.

Of the 21 people named in a federal indictment, 12 are suspected illegal immigrants, Eid said. Two suspects remain at large, he said.

Cops Take 45 Lbs. Of Meth In Greeley (DENP)

Denver Post, October 25, 2006

Drug agents raided a number of homes and a business in Greeley Monday and Tuesday, arresting 10 people and confiscating more than 45 pounds of methamphetamine.

Federal agents said the people arrested were part of a large drug ring which had been under surveillance for more than a year.

Last week, a federal grand jury indicted 21 people, including the 10 arrested this week. Another 9 people were already in custody on state charges and 2 people are fugitives.

Agents from the Drug Enforcement Administration and officers from the Weld County Drug Task Force confiscated $59,000 in cash, four weapons, one of which had been stolen, a bullet-proof vest and a night-vision goggles.

DEA agent-in-charge Jeffrey Sweetin said the methamphetamine was made in California and transported to Colorado.

Meth Arrests Put Greeley Cartel On Ice (DENP)

Denver Post, October 26, 2006

Authorities say they have dismantled a drug cartel headquartered in Greeley that moved millions of dollars in high-quality "ice" methamphetamine in buses and packed inside stuffed toys.

Stretching from Los Angeles to Roanoke, Va., the operation primarily sought to monopolize the methamphetamine trade in northern Colorado by relying on a product that was an "unheard of" 99 percent pure, federal and local law enforcement officers said Wednesday.

After a 13-month investigation, agents reportedly seized more methamphetamine in this one operation than was taken in all of 2005 across Colorado.

The potent white powder was mass-produced in Mexican drug factories - an example of a trend away from making smaller batches in scattered trailers, apartments and motel rooms.

With U.S. authorities tightening up on the availability of the over-the-counter medications used to make methamphetamine, drug sellers more often are getting supplies from other nations, said Jeffrey D. Sweetin, special agent in charge of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration's Rocky Mountain division.

On Oct. 18, a federal grand jury returned an indictment charging 21 people - including alleged cartel leader Rigoverto Valle-Sierra - on drug-trafficking charges that could bring sentences ranging from 10 years to life in federal prison, U.S. Attorney Troy Eid said Wednesday in a Denver news conference.

Nineteen of the 21 suspects have been arrested, and five search warrants were served at three homes, a business and a storage unit in Greeley, Eid said. Agents arrested Valle-Sierra without incident Tuesday in Greeley.

"The impact is huge," Sweetin said. "There is a lot less dope in Colorado."

The investigation began in September 2005 and eventually included agents from the DEA, police from Greeley and Los Angeles, and deputies from the Weld County Sheriff's Office.

Officers began making large drug seizures in May in Greeley, Los Angeles and points in between. They ultimately confiscated 53 pounds of methamphetamine with a street value as high as $2.4 million, said Dennis Follett, a Denver DEA agent.

They also seized $12,000 in cash bound in $1,000 stacks, a bulletproof vest, night-vision goggles and four weapons.

Still, the seizures represent only the "tip of the iceberg" of the ice methamphetamine that the drug organization sold on Greeley streets, Sweetin said.

Smugglers used various means to hide the meth, including putting it in plastic bags and stuffing it into tires and an Elmo Sesame Street doll.

Drugs were transported from Mexico through Los Angeles to Greeley, which served as the hub city, and then to Wyoming, Nebraska and Virginia, Eid said.

The 21 suspects represent the upper tier of a drug operation in which hundreds of dealers, including Greeley gang members, distributed the meth to customers that included school-age children and people of all races and economic levels, Follett said.

Twelve of the suspects are in the country illegally, Eid said.

The drug cartel was using the high quality of its product to capture the methamphetamine trade in northern Colorado, Sweetin said. Sellers offered their 99-percent-pure ice at the same price as lower-quality drugs with only 30 to 40 percent purity, he said.

Weld County Sheriff John Cooke said the drugs were flowing to the Greeley area because of a growing population, including a large segment of illegal immigrants. "The supply is coming to the demand," he said.

Meth Ring Broken Up (RMN)

Rocky Mountain News, October 26, 2006

A methamphetamine distribution ring with tentacles across northern Colorado has been smashed and the kingpin arrested, law enforcement authorities announced Wednesday.

A federal grand jury indicted 21 people Oct. 18 on drug-trafficking charges that could result in federal prison sentences for life, officials said at a press conference at the U.S. Attorney's Office in Denver.

Twelve of the 21 people indicted, including one with at least 10 aliases, were in the country illegally.

Officials said more than 45 pounds of high-purity methamphetamine, 1.1 kilos of cocaine and $59,000 were seized during a 13-month investigation. The wholesale value of the methamphetamine was about $865,000, with a street value in the millions, the officials said.

Another 8 pounds of methamphetamine, $12,000, four weapons, a bulletproof vest and a set of night-vision goggles were found in the sweep of arrests in the Greeley area this week.

"Most meth is seized in ounces. This was a monstrous amount," said Jeffrey D. Sweetin, special agent in charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration in the Rocky Mountain states. "This will have an impact for decades in Greeley."

Weld County Sheriff John Cooke said Greeley has emerged as a major point for methamphetamine sales and distribution because of the population growth on the northern Front Range, which includes a large community of illegal immigrants.

"The supply is coming to the demand," the sheriff said.

DOJ_NMG_0086590

Officials said the organization used buses and private vehicles to ferry the illegal drug from southern California to Las Vegas and on to Greeley, bypassing potential markets in cities and resorts along the route. From Greeley, where agents documented links to gangs, most of the methamphetamine was sold in northern Colorado.

However, some of the drug was sent to traffickers in southeastern Wyoming, western Nebraska and as far east as Virginia.

In at least once case, the traffickers stuffed a child's Elmo doll with four pounds of methamphetamine to hide the illicit cargo, Sweetin said.

The alleged leader of the organization, Rigoverto Valle-Sierra, was arrested without incident Tuesday in Greeley, officials said. Weld County Drug Task Force officers and DEA agents arrested nine others earlier this week. Nine more already were in custody on state charges, and two are fugitives.

Trials may not begin for more than a year, but each defendant could face at least 10 years, and up to life, in federal prison, on charges of conspiring to distribute methamphetamine and of distributing the drug, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office. Each defendant also is charged with other drug-trafficking crimes.

U.S. Attorney Troy Eid said the arrests illustrate the trend that methamphetamines are being manufactured in high-volume plants elsewhere and shipped to Colorado. Previously, methamphetamines were cooked in mom-and-pop laboratories for local sale.

The alleged traffickers were organized in overlapping circles of distributors and sellers at various levels in a high-volume trade, as opposed to a vertical structure in which each soldier had a specific duty.

Major meth bust, by the numbers

21 People indicted on charges of transporting methamphetamine from southern California for sale in northern Colorado, with Greeley as the hub.

45 Amount in pounds of meth seized during a 13-month investigation, including 4 pounds packed in a child's Elmo doll.

$865,000 Estimated wholesale value

99% Purity of meth seized

700 Number of small labs that would have to be raided to equal the quantity seized in this sweep.

Ten Arrested In Big Weld Drug Bust (GT)

Greeley Tribune, October 25, 2006

A major multi-agency drug bust resulted in 10 arrests Monday and Tuesday in Weld County, adding to the nine people already in custody on state charges.

Several agencies today announced that a large methamphetamine distribution organization based in Greely has been dismantled by the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Weld County Drug Task Force.

The investigation, which began in September 2005, resulted in the seizure of more than 45 pounds of ICE methamphetamine, 1.1 kilos of cocaine and $59,000 in cash. The organization used buses and cars to transport the high-quality meth from California to Colorado.

On Oct. 18, a federal grand jury in Denver returned an indictment charging 21 individuals with various drug-trafficking crimes, including conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute and to distribute methamphetamine. DEA agents and Weld County Drug Task Force officers arrested 10 people this week, including Rigoverto Valle-Sierra, the alleged leader of the organization.

Two of the 21 individuals are fugitives.

Officers also executive five search warrants at three residences, a business and a storage unit in Greeley.

The case, also involving the Greeley and Evans police departments, Weld County Sheriff's Office and the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, is being prosecuted by the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Local Agent Tipped Off Friends, DEA Says (CA)

Commercial Appeal, October 26, 2006

A federal DEA agent was indicted Wednesday on charges that he tipped off former high school classmates that one of them was a target in a large cocaine trafficking case here in August.

Tommie Purifoy II of West Memphis turned himself in to federal authorities in South Florida where he was assigned as a special agent in the Drug Enforcement Administration's Miami field office.

"It gives me great pain in the pit of my stomach," said Sherri Strange, DEA special agent in charge in Atlanta. "The temptations for agents are great. They handle millions of dollars in cash and contraband, but they cannot compromise the integrity of the office."

She and U.S. Atty. David Kustoff noted that the DEA identified the problem and conducted the investigation that led to Purifoy's indictment.

Purifoy, a Memphis police officer from 2001 to 2004, allegedly passed sensitive DEA information along to Christopher Ivy, who called Sean Williams, who called his cousin, Brian Nicholas Williams, an alleged drug trafficker.

All attended West Memphis High School together and had been friends since at least 1996.

Despite being tipped off to the yearlong investigation, Brian Williams and 10 others were arrested here three days later on Aug. 24 on cocaine trafficking charges.

More than 88 pounds of cocaine and over $500,000 in cash was seized, according to authorities, who called it the largest local drug bust of the year.

According to the indictment, Purifoy was in Memphis on personal business on Aug. 21 and stopped by the DEA office where an ongoing wiretap was being conducted.

When he saw a chart of several driver's licenses in a pyramid-type format, he remarked that he had attended high school with some of the suspects, including Brian Williams.

Later that day, the indictment says, Purifoy called Ivy and told him Brian Williams was the target of a DEA drug investigation.

Ivy then contacted Sean Williams who in turn contacted his cousin, telling him he was at "the top of the food chain."

Purifoy, Ivy and Sean Williams were charged with obstruction of justice.

Purifoy also was charged with unlawful disclosure of electronic surveillance, while Ivy and Williams also were charged with making false statements to federal officers.

The charges against Purifoy carry up to 25 years in prison. He has been suspended without pay.

Kustoff said Ivy worked at a school in Memphis, though he would not identify the school or Ivy's position. Sean Williams worked for a trucking company in Fayetteville, Ark.

DEA Agent Indicted On Charges He Tipped Off Suspect (BRAH)

The Bradenton Herald, October 26, 2006

MEMPHIS, Tenn. - A Drug Enforcement Administration agent who worked in Miami has been indicted on charges of tipping off a former high school classmate who was a target in a drug trafficking investigation.

Tommie Purifoy II turned himself in to the Miami field office, authorities said Wednesday. He has been suspended without pay.

Purifoy is originally from West Memphis, Ark., and was a police officer in Memphis from 2001 to 2004. He was in Memphis on personal business on Aug. 21 and stopped by the local DEA office during a wiretap operation, according to the indictment.

A chart of people suspected in a major cocaine trafficking ring was posted and he remarked that he went to high school with one of the suspects, Brian Nicholas Williams.

Purifoy is accused of passing the information to his friend Christopher Ivy, who passed it along to Sean Williams, the cousin of suspect Brian Nicholas Williams.

Despite the tip, three days later authorities made the largest drug bust in the area for the year, when they seized more than 88 pounds of cocaine and over $500,000 cash. Brian Williams and 10 others were charged in connection with the drug ring.

Purifoy is charged with obstruction of justice and unlawful disclosure of electronic surveillance and could face up to 25 years in prison. Ivy and Sean Williams are charged with obstruction of justice and making false statements to federal officers.

"It gives me great pain in the pit of my stomach," said Sherri Strange, DEA special agent in charge in Atlanta. "The temptations for agents are great. They handle millions of dollars in cash and contraband, but they cannot compromise the integrity of the office."

U.S. Attorney David Kustoff and Strange said the tip was discovered and investigated by the DEA.

MPD Cop Turned DEA Agent Gets Indicted (WPTY)

WPTY-TV, October 25, 2006

DEA Special Agent Tommie Purifoy, II, is charged with obstruction of justice and disclosure of electronic surveillance.

Federal authorities say Purifoy and two other men were indicted Wednesday for telling a Mid-South drug dealer he was being investigated by the DEA.

"The one characteristic of a narcotics agent that can never be compromised," says Sherri Strange, the Special Agent in charge of the investigation, "is his or her integrity."

Strange says Purifoy joined the DEA in 2004 after working for the Memphis Police Department for three years.

Purifoy was assigned to the DEA's Miami bureau. But during a visit home in August he made a trip to the Memphis DEA office.

Investigators say Purifoy was in a wire-tap room and noticed a pyramid of pictures on the wall. The top picture was one of Purifoy's boyhood friends, Brian Williams, a man under investigation for cocaine trafficking.

Williams and Purifoy attended West Memphis High School together in 1996. Their friendship, say investigators, dates back at least a decade.

Here's what the feds say happened next. On August 21st, at 6:15 P.M., Purifoy called another high school buddy, Christopher Ivy, and told him the DEA was watching Williams.

At 7:45 that night, the feds say Ivy called another West Memphis High School pal, Sean Williams. Williams is Brian Williams' cousin and investigators say the two talked soon after Ivy's call.

At 9:59 P.M., the feds say Sean Williams called Brian Williams to tell him he was the target of a federal drug investigation.

The warning didn't matter. Three days later, on August 24th, federal authorities arrested Brian Williams and 10 other people on drug charges. They confiscated 40 kilos of cocaine and more than $500,000 in cash. Investigators say it's the largest coke bust in Memphis this year.

Two months have passed since then. And now Tommie Purifoy, Christopher Ivy and Sean Williams are indicted and charged with interfering with a federal investigation.

Purifoy turned himself in to authorities in Florida Wednesday. Ivy and Williams were in federal court in Memphis on Wednesday. All three are out on bond. They are expected to be arraigned on November 1st at 9:30 A.M.

Investigators say they were able to find out who tipped Brian Williams off because they had placed a wire-tap on Wililams' cellphone.

Federal Agents Bust One Of Their Own For Helping Dealers (WMC)

WMC-TV, October 26, 2006

A member of the Drug Enforcement Agency is on the other side of the law. Tommie Purifoy started working for the DEA in March of 2004 and he was assigned to the Miami Office. But instead of upholding his oath as an agent, he's accused of showing loyalty to his high school friends, who turned out to be drug dealers.

According to the indictment, Tommie Purifoy set aside his duties as a Special Agent for the DEA to warn his friends about a pending drug bust, a wire tap investigation Purifoy learned about while visiting the DEA office in Memphis.

"Purifoy left the office and soon after contacted his friends," said federal investigators. They say Purifoy's friends turned out to be drug traffickers who ran a cocaine distribution ring that was busted up in late August.

More than 40 kilograms were seized in the largest drug bust of the year. Most of the cocaine and cash in the investigation were found in a house on Meadowview Road in Memphis. That's when the DEA learned it had a leak and Tommie Purifoy's days as a special agent became numbered.

"Within 60 days, this man has been indicted by a grand jury and a lot of work has been done to bring the prosecution as quickly as it's moved," said U.S. Attorney David Kustoff.

DOJ_NMG_0086593

Purifoy turned himself in to authorities in Florida where he was assigned to work. He's expected to be released on a signature bond. Two others were indicted today, along with Purifoy. All face obstruction charges. Purifoy is expected to appear in federal court here in about four weeks.

15 Arrested In Richmond Drug Raids (SFC)

By Henry K. Lee, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, October 26, 2006

(10-25) 12:45 PDT RICHMOND -- About 200 federal and local law-enforcement officers targeting a street gang known for drug activity swooped down on North Richmond today, arresting 15 people and seizing nearly a pound of methamphetamine.

The arrests took place during simultaneous 10 a.m. raids in Richmond and unincorporated North Richmond. Contra Costa County sheriff's deputies, Richmond police and FBI SWAT team members dressed in camouflage jumpsuits served at least a dozen federal search warrants.

As sheriff's helicopter Star Two circled overhead, several people were detained in the area of Fifth and Market streets in North Richmond, an unincorporated community of 4,000 residents that police say is a hotbed for drug sales, shootings and violence.

"Our goal is to take the violence out of North Richmond," Contra Costa County sheriff's Lt. Kitty Parker said at the scene.

Many of the suspects sought today were named in sealed federal indictments on various drug and gang-related charges, said Special Agent Joseph Schadler, FBI spokesman in San Francisco. Others were arrested on state charges.

The names of those arrested on federal charges weren't released today pending their appearances Thursday in U.S. District Court in Oakland.

Some people sought today are alleged members or associates of the Project Trojans street gang. On March 14, a similar raid by FBI agents and local police resulted in the arrests of 15 people affiliated with the gang. They were indicted by a federal grand jury in Oakland on charges of cocaine and methamphetamine trafficking.

Police say the 300 or so members of the Project Trojans, classified by the U.S. Department of Justice as one of the most violent African American street gangs in Northern California, are responsible for much of the area's bloodshed, including hundreds of killings.

The gang, also called PJT, has long been selling drugs on North Richmond's streets, and feuds over turf and drug sales have sparked violence, according to police,

A group of residents standing at the corner of Fifth and Market today voiced displeasure at the operation. One woman, who declined to give her name, said officers should be spending time solving homicides. "It don't make no sense," she said.

But authorities said the recent raids in North Richmond were aimed at stemming the tide of violence that is associated with drug and gang activity.

"It's a continual process to make this community safer," said David Johnson, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI in San Francisco. "It's going to take some time to make inroads in this particular community."

E-mail Henry K. Lee at hlee@sfchronicle.com.

15 SUSPECTED GANG MEMBERS ARRESTED IN NORTH RICHMOND (BCNW)

Bay City News Wires, October 26, 2006

Federal, state and local law enforcement agencies arrested 15 suspected gang members in a coordinated raid in unincorporated North Richmond today, according to spokesman for the San Francisco FBI Field Office Joseph Schadler.

More than 200 FBI agents, Contra Costa County sheriff's deputies, Richmond police officers and agents from the West Contra Costa Narcotic Enforcement Team rolled into North Richmond at 10:15 a.m. today and arrested people selling drugs on street corners then stormed 19 buildings simultaneously on federal search warrants.

SWAT teams from Portland, Sacramento, Los Angeles and San Francisco raided the 19 locations and threw flash-bang grenades to flush out the occupants, Schadler said.

Authorities were targeting people believed to be established gang leaders of the Project Trojans street gang, Schadler said.

"The key to this is we're trying to take the head off the organization," Schadler said.

The raid was part of an investigation that began in 2004 into the gang's activities. Wiretap and undercover operations ended in February and the first raid was conducted in March, Schadler said. At that time nine people were arrested for manufacturing and distributing cocaine, crack and methamphetamine.

The charges against the people arrested today will remain sealed until Thursday when the suspects will be brought before a U.S. magistrate judge in Oakland, Schadler said.

No injuries and no incidents were reported during the raid.

Pittsford Man Charged In Federal 'club Drug' Case (RDC)

By Matthew Daneman, Staff writer

Rochester (NY) Democrat & Chronicle, October 26, 2006

A Pittsford man is one of 10 people indicted on federal drug trafficking charges for allegedly smuggling "club drugs" into the United States.

The U.S. Attorney's Office for the Western District of New York announced the charges, which came after an investigation of nearly two years into what the U.S. Justice Department called "a large scale drug smuggling and trafficking group operating in and around Buffalo and Rochester."

The drug ring allegedly smuggled such club drugs as Ecstasy, GHB, ketamine and crystal methamphetamine from Toronto.

Jeffrey Parasida, 28, of Pittsford was charged with a pair of violations under the federal Controlled Substances Act, as were nine other defendants from the Buffalo region, according to the Justice Department.

White Plains Pharmacist Facing Federal Drug Charge (JN)

The Journal News, October 25, 2006

WHITE PLAINS - The owner of a White Plains pharmacy is accused of illegally dispensing tens of thousands of doses of the generic form of the highly addictive painkiller Vicodin, federal authorities said.

Syed Zahid Ali, 58, owner of Post Pharmacy at 82 East Post Road, is due in court next week to face charges he illegally distributed hydrocodone as well as a stimulant used to treat sleep disorders. The Saddle River, N.J., man cannot account for 100,000 tablets of the painkiller, federal authorities said. He is also accused of refilling prescriptions for the drug despite the bottles being marked "no refill."

Ali denied the charges in an interview yesterday at the counter of his pharmacy, which remains open for business.

"I didn't do anything wrong," he said.

Ali said he can account for all the hydrocodone that he has dispensed over the more than six years that he has owned the pharmacy. The tablets were never missing, but his files were, he said.

The illegal trade of prescription painkillers like hydrocodone is "very high and increasing," according to an annual assessment released in January by the National Drug Intelligence Center.

Drug Enforcement Administration agents raided the Post Pharmacy on April 19, 2005, according to court papers filed in federal court in White Plains. They seized Ali's records. After comparing the store's prescription records and inventory with Ali's purchases of the drug from suppliers, they determined 100,000 pills missing.

Ali's purchases of the drug were more than twice the combined total of two other pharmacies in White Plains - a much larger Duane Reade store and Express Drugs, a pharmacy about the size of Post Pharmacy, according to a criminal complaint filed by DEA Agent Stephen Loftus.

Ali said all the hydrocodone he bought went to fill the prescriptions that he received.

"I don't know how much business they're doing," he said of the other pharmacies. "I have the prescriptions."

Ali said that after the DEA raid, he founds five files in the back of his pharmacy that agents missed. The files contained more than 4,000 prescriptions for hydrocodone. Those files square his purchases with his filled prescriptions, he said.

"I calculated how much I bought and how much I dispensed and it came out 100 percent right," he said.

Ali said his lawyer advised him against turning the records over to the DEA. He said he was confident when those records are presented in court, he'll be cleared.

DOJ_NMG_0086595

Herbert Hadad, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia, declined to comment.

Ali also denied he ever refilled prescriptions that carried a prohibition against refill. But undercover White Plains police officers got five such refills in August and September 2004 for hydrocodone and Provigil prescriptions that were single-use or refill-barred, according to the criminal complaint. Provigil is a stimulant used to treat sleep disorders like narcolepsy.

Ali, a licensed pharmacist since 1977, faces up to five years in prison if convicted. He said he has not changed the way he does business since the raids. He still dispenses hydrocodone and Provigil.

"I have deliberately done nothing different," he said.

Trial Date Set In Drug Case (TRE)

The Reporter, October 25, 2006

A 2007 trial date has been set in federal court for a Fairfield man described as a regional drug kingpin by the Drug Enforce-ment Administration.

Federal magistrate Lawrence K. Karlton on Tuesday scheduled 1 p.m. Jan. 23 for the trial of 32-year-old defendant Eduardo Pichardo - also known as Eddie Nunez - in Eastern District Federal Court in Sacramento. In addition, Judge Karlton set 9:30 a.m. Dec. 12 for pre-trial motions in the case.

Pichardo was arrested by DEA agents on June 21 on suspicion of distribution and conspiracy to distribute cocaine and methamphetamine. A DEA spokesman said the arrest culminated a seven-year investigation into a drug trafficking network that stretched from Northern California to Arizona and Alabama.

Last week, Pichardo was indicted on additional charges of money laundering.

Pichardo has pleaded not guilty to all charges. He remains in federal custody.

Bloomberg, Daley Lead Mayors In Coalition Against Gun Violence (AP)

By F.N. D'ALESSIO, The Associated Press

AP, October 26, 2006

CHICAGO (AP) — New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg, Chicago Mayor Richard Daley and Milwaukee Mayor Thomas Barrett had harsh words Wednesday for the Bush administration and the gun lobby's influence on Congress.

"When Washington makes bad decisions to protect criminals rather than the public, we suffer the consequences," Bloomberg said at a news conference outlining the agenda for Thursday's Midwestern summit of Mayors Against Illegal Guns, a group Bloomberg founded with Boston Mayor Thomas Menino.

Bloomberg said he had hoped to have 50 of the nation's mayors on board by the end of this year, but 109 mayors from 44 states already have joined.

"These cities represent more than 44 million Americans," the New York Republican said.

Daley, Bloomberg and Barrett, accompanied by counterparts from a number of smaller cities, complained that inaction by the federal executive branch and the influence of the gun lobby, particularly the National Rifle Association, on Congress have left local officials to combat the problem of illegal weapons.

"Mayors know that illegal guns have nothing to do with the Second Amendment and everything to do with law enforcement," Bloomberg said. "But cities can lead where Congress won't."

He added that the goal of the mayors' group is to "hold Congress' feet to the fire."

White House spokesman Tony Fratto said violent crime has been reduced significantly in recent years, especially in many large cities.

"A lot of the credit for that goes to mayors and law enforcement personnel and cooperation at the local, state and federal levels," Fratto said in an e-mailed statement. "Enforcing gun laws that are on the books is an essential facet of our efforts. The president and Attorney General (Alberto) Gonzales are committed to making sure that existing laws are enforced."

NRA spokesman Andrew Arulanandam said: "If the mayors were serious about reducing crime, what they would do is they would work with city prosecutors to enforce gun laws as opposed to having press conferences."

DOJ_NMG_0086596

Daley, a Democrat, said Chicago police have confiscated 10,803 illegal handguns and assault weapons this year. He said the city still steers firearms violators into the federal court system whenever possible because federal sentences tend to be harsher, but he agreed the gun lobby has a disproportionate influence at the federal level.

"We've had to work hard to keep Congress from making things even worse," said Daley referring, among other things, to federal attempts to restrict cities' access to tracing firearms data.

Bloomberg said the Federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives keeps its own records of multiple firearms purchases and attempted purchases but denies that information to local authorities.

Democrat Barrett said mayors are closer to the problem and have a better view of it than legislators.

"We are the individuals who receive the phone calls from the police saying someone has been murdered," Barrett said. "We are the ones who attend the funerals."

The mayors, including Tulsa, Okla., Mayor Kathy Taylor and Rockford, Ill., Mayor Lawrence Morrisey, spoke at Chicago police headquarters from behind a table loaded with illegal firearms seized by police in recent months. Most were rapid-fire automatic pistols, but there also were automatic shotguns, military-style assault rifles and even a Prohibition-style Thompson submachine gun.

The Midwestern mayors were to meet in an all-day conference Thursday to discuss legal and technological strategies. Bloomberg said Menino would hold a similar conference in Boston on Nov. 9 and Atlanta Mayor Shirley Franklin would hold one in her city Nov. 30.

Gladewater Gun Dealer Faces 5 Years In Prison, $250,000 Fine (LONGNJ)

Longview (TX) News-Journal, October 26, 2006

A gun dealer in Gladewater faces up to five years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000 after pleading guilty to falsifying records needed to purchase a firearm, said U.S. Attorney Matthew D. Orwin in a Wednesday media release.

According to court records, Michael Zirkle, 41, agreed to allow an ATF confidential informant to use someone else's identity on the forms necessary to purchase a .40-caliber pistol.

Zirkle has surrendered his gun dealer's license and forfeited 47 firearms, valued at approximately $19,000, as part of the plea agreement. As a convicted felon he is not permitted to possess a firearm again.

STORE OWNER ADMITS TO ILLEGAL FIREARMS SALES (TMT)

By CASEY KNAUPP, Staff Writer

Tyler (TX) Morning Telegraph, October 26, 2006

A Gladewater pawn shop owner and gun dealer who allegedly sold firearms to felons pleaded guilty Wednesday in federal court.

Michael Zirkle, 39, Gladewater, pleaded guilty to making false statements into the records of a federal firearms licensee. He faces up to five years in prison and could be ordered to pay restitution to the victims or to the community.

On Jan. 6 in Gregg County, a confidential informant for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives entered the "Ace of Pawn" pawn shop in Gladewater, owned by Zirkle. He told the defendant he wanted to buy a .40-caliber pistol for himself, but he wanted to use the identity and personal information of another person when filling out the required ATF form. Zirkle agreed, according to court documents.

U.S. Magistrate Judge John Love allowed Zirkle to continue to remain out of jail on bond pending his sentencing hearing after there were no objections from Assistant U.S. Attorney Jim Noble.

Zirkle surrendered his firearm license and forfeited 47 guns - 31 rifles, six pistols, eight shotguns, a revolver and a machine gun rifle - he possessed as a firearms dealer, defense attorney F.R. "Buck" Files Jr. said during the hearing.

In the plea agreement, Zirkle agreed that the 47 weapons were used to perpetrate the violations stated in the indictment, which includes selling firearms to felons. "The defendant shall not, in any manner, participate in, nor shall aid, assist, support, facilitate, or finance another, in the purchase or sale of any firearm for any purpose, the plea agreement states.

Files said his client listened to all of the audio recordings of conversations between Zirkle and a confidential informant and decided to plead guilty.

DOJ_NMG_0086597

Zirkle was indicted on three counts of false statements of a federal firearms licensee, false statements in the attempted acquisition of a firearm, failure to record sale of firearm and failure to conduct a background search. He was also indicted on five counts of selling a firearm to a felon, failure to record and maintain records of receipt and disposition of firearms and failure to maintain records to receipt and disposition of firearms.

Casey Knaupp covers county, state and federal courts. She can be reached at 903.596.6289. e-mail: news@tylerpaper.com

Old West Leaves Dodge City; Guns Remain (AP-Y)

By Maria Sudekum Fisher, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 26, 2006

Dodge City has a rich history as an Old West frontier town, where cowboys and gunslingers could take a break from the trail and get their fill of saloons and brothels.

Today, the tidy town built on meatpacking and rodeos is again plagued by gunfighters. But this time they're in street gangs, some of which have second-generation members as young as 11. The drug of choice is methamphetamine and the weapons range from automatic rifles to baseball bats.

"When it was old Dodge City, it was cowboys coming off the range and ending up in Dodge and raising hell and letting things go," said John Ball, Dodge City chief of police. "This is entirely different. There is no comparison.

"The gangs, these are people who are choosing to commit dangerous and criminal acts and they're choosing it as a lifestyle that is criminal and wrong. There is no regard for anyone in the community, and I can't begin to explain their rationale."

Street gangs, often thought of as a big-city problem, have been turning up in rural areas across the country since the 1980s, frightening residents and straining smaller law enforcement departments. Rural gangs are often more transitory than their urban counterparts, but they appear to have a foothold in several communities.

About 24,000 gangs operate around the country, according to the U.S. Department of Justice, which estimates there are about 760,000 members in 2,900 communities.

The 2004 Youth Gang Survey conducted by the Justice Department, 82 percent of large cities surveyed, 42 percent of suburban counties, 27 percent of smaller cities and 14 percent of rural counties reported active youth gangs.

In Ottumwa, Iowa, Chief of Police Jim Clark says gangs are starting to show up in his town of about 25,000. Five years ago, Ottumwa had an occasional visit from a gang member from Los Angeles or Chicago. Now, Clark estimates there about 100 gang members in town. Some moved to Ottumwa with their families. Others have been sent to live with relatives to escape gangs in bigger cities, Clark said.

"But then they start up the same kind of violence," he said.

For now, Ottumwa gangs are mostly involved in petty violence, graffiti and gang fights.

"But my concern is that we stay on top of it so it doesn't get so out of hand that we start having drive-by shootings," Clark said.

Rural gangs are often more locally grown than urban gangs, said Arlen Egley Jr., senior research associate at the National Youth Gang Center in Tallahassee, Fla. But if they are attached to a national gang, like the Crips or the Bloods, they're more likely to "cut and paste" from those gang traditions.

"You'll find Bloods wearing blue," Egley said, when they traditionally wear red. These "hybrid" gangs are more prevalent in the Midwest, he said.

Gang activity in Dodge City started in the 1980s. Ball said he now estimates the town of 25,000 has more than 300 gang members, most of whom are Hispanic. Dodge City is one of the few western Kansas towns that has been growing, largely due to the influx of Latinos drawn to the meatpacking industry in southwest Kansas.

A recent uptick in gang violence over the summer caught the town's attention. From Aug. 19 to Sept. 22, the city recorded seven drive-by shootings. No one was killed, but police made nine gang-related arrests after the shootings, and houses that weren't intended as targets were sprayed with bullets.

Ball said the violence not only threatens residents, but also ties up the police department, which has about 50 officers.

DOJ_NMG_0086598

"We don't have some of the resources or the manpower that other bigger departments do," he said.

Vickie Mercado, a longtime Dodge City resident, wants her hometown to get a handle on gangs. Mercado's 18-year-old son, Justin, who was not in a gang, was shot to death by a 14-year-old gang member who is eligible for parole in 2011 for Justin's death.

That was 10 years ago. Before Justin's death, Mercado and her family always felt safe at home.

Justin's death galvanized the community — for a while. An organization, Stop the Violence, was started to educate Dodge City residents about gangs. But interest in the group has tapered off.

"I think it'll take another tragedy for people to come forward and get involved again," Mercado said.

But another tragedy is what she wants to avoid.

___

On the Net:

The National Youth Gang Center: http://www.iir.com/nygc/

Fugitive Fatally Shot Was Holding Shoe, Not Gun (AP)

AP, October 25, 2006

LITHONIA, Ga. - Federal agents fatally shot a fugitive early Wednesday after the man refused to put down what they thought was a gun but turned out to be a shoe.

Agents went to an apartment complex in suburban Atlanta to arrest 24-year-old Youwiers Vilpie, said U.S. Marshal Richard Mecum. They were serving a warrant from the Drug Enforcement Administration office in south Florida. Vilpie also was wanted for questioning in two homicides in Ft. Myers, Fla., Mecum said.

Agents first tried to use a Taser to stun him, but it wasn't effect, Mecum said.

advertisement

He said Vilpie at some point emerged with "something in his hand and he pointed it at them."

"They weren't sure what it was because it was dark, and they thought it was a gun," Mecum said. "They told him several times, 'Put it down, put it down, put it down,' and he wouldn't put it down and kept pointing it at them."

After the shooting, the agents discovered Vilpie had had his hand inside a shoe.

Suspect Killed After Confrontation With U.S. Marshal (AJC)

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 26, 2006

Federal agents shot and killed a fugitive from south Florida early Wednesday when he refused to put down what they thought was a gun, but turned out to be a shoe.

Agents from the Southeast Regional Fugitive Task Force went to the Hillandale Park apartments near Lithonia about 4 a.m. to arrest 24-year-old Youwus Vilpre, said Richard Mecum, U.S. Marshal for North Georgia.

John Spink / AJC

IMMIGRATION:

A Former Salvadoran Army Officer Convicted Of Killing Priests Is Arrested In L.A. As A Human Rights Violator (LAT)

By Hector Becerra, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 26, 2006

A former Salvadoran army officer convicted of killing priests is arrested in L.A. as a human rights violator.

Gonzalo Guevara Cerritos was a decorated, American-trained officer in the Salvadoran army.

But for the last year, the 43-year-old toiled as a janitor at a West Los Angeles-area motel, a man with a secret who was always looking over his shoulder, his girlfriend said.

DOJ_NMG_0086599

His clandestine existence came to an end Wednesday, when federal authorities announced that they had arrested him as an illegal immigrant who was a human rights violator.

The Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency said Guevara Cerritos was one of nine Salvadoran officers and soldiers implicated in one of the most notorious massacres in El Salvador's history: the 1989 death squad murders of six Jesuit priests whom some in the army viewed as subversives.

A sublieutenant with the Atlacatl Battalion during El Salvador's war against the Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front, a leftist guerrilla group, Guevara Cerritos was convicted for his role in the slayings.

In 1993, he received a pardon as part of a general amnesty that was granted after the country's 12-year civil war.

His girlfriend, Eusebia Mejia, 45, said Guevara Cerritos could never escape the shadow of the massacre and fled to the United States in hopes of a new start.

But when he arrived in Los Angeles — home to more than 250,000 Salvadorans — he quickly realized he would not find peace. Fearing that someone would recognize him on the streets of Los Angeles, he kept his head down and rarely went out.

"He was a real homebody," said Mejia, of Watts, who has lived in L.A. for 11 years and met Guevara Cerritos after he arrived in the city. "For him, it was from home to work, and from work to home. And every Sunday to church."

But the strategy apparently didn't work: Federal authorities said it was a tip from the public that put them on Guevara Cerritos' trail.

He was taken into custody Oct. 19 as part of an effort by U.S. immigration agents to catch and deport human rights violators.

"We will not allow the United States to be a place of refuge for aliens seeking to escape a violent criminal past," said Robert Schoch, a special agent for the federal immigration office in Los Angeles.

In 2003, the agency formed a unit to investigate individuals who were involved in crimes such as genocide, war crimes and persecution.

Guevara Cerritos' arrest resonated among Los Angeles' Salvadorans, many of whom fled human rights abuses during the civil war.

"This goes to show that no one escapes God's justice," said Aquiles Magaña of Carecen, an El Salvadoran immigrant rights organization.

The priests' murders created a worldwide furor in part because Guevara Cerritos and the other assailants had received training from the U.S. government, taking courses at the School of the Americas at Ft. Benning, Ga.

The bloodshed occurred before dawn, Nov. 16, 1989, at the rectory of El Salvador's Jesuit-run University of Central America. All but one of the priests were in nightclothes and slippers when they were shot. A dormitory cook and her teenage daughter also were killed.

Salvadoran courts ultimately ruled that Guevara Cerritos did not fire any of the fatal shots, but found that he was part of the conspiracy. He was convicted of conspiring to commit acts of terrorism and placed under house arrest for two years.

When the amnesty set him and many other army officials free, Mejia said, his life didn't get easy.

She said Guevara Cerritos lived in fear that someone would eventually seek revenge in El Salvador. Every year, the priests' killings were re-created in his hometown of San Salvador and soldiers involved in the incident were burned in effigy.

"He didn't come to the U.S. to hide from justice. He came for asylum, trying to seek refuge," said his attorney, Fernando Romo. "He said he was always looking behind his back, always concerned people would recognize him. Now he's definitely worried they're going to send him back."

Guevara Cerritos is being held at a detention facility in Lancaster pending a deportation hearing.

Romo said Guevara Cerritos' training as a lieutenant in the Salvadoran army helped him cross the rugged Arizona desert last year with the help of a coyote.

Mejia said the U.S. government is wrong about Guevara Cerritos. Rather than being a human rights abuser, she described him as a loving father figure to her children and a gentle, God-fearing man.

"He was a good man," she said.

His attorney also disputed the government contention that a tip led them to Guevara Cerritos.

DOJ_NMG_0086600

He says his client was trying to seek asylum and that someone in the government matched his name using the Internet and informed immigration officials, who declined to provide details about the tip.

Other Salvadorans are less sympathetic to Guevara Cerritos' plight.

"He probably thought that by coming to the U.S., things would be better," said Carlos Vaquerano, a Salvadoran activist who said he lost three brothers to the death squads. "He probably thought he could escape his past. That nobody would notice him."

Vaquerano said it was not unheard of for people who were involved in the paramilitary squads to come to the U.S.

Some even became active in churches, he added, "as a way of getting forgiveness."

*

hector.becerra@latimes.com

Voters On Immigration: Action, Please (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, October 26, 2006

BENSON, ARIZ.

Much of America hit the pause button this fall on the flaming debate over illegal immigration, once it became clear Congress would not act before the election. But not Arizona.

Here in a state where the wave of border crossers is so great that it washes over every aspect of life, illegal immigration is a flash point in virtually every political race this fall. Moreover, there's a candidate for every view - from those saying "send 'em back and bar the door" to those who'd provide a path for citizenship for some undocumented workers.

Randy Graf, a Republican who hopes to win the open seat in a House district that sits on the border, is one who takes a tough stance. As he led a biker rally against illegal immigration on Sunday, someone handed him a frayed denim vest that "used to belong to an illegal alien." When Mr. Graf put it on, the crowd cheered. But the theatrics went too far, and his face blanked when the giver joked: "It has a bullet hole in the back."

Graf is in an uphill battle to hold the Eighth Congressional District for the Republicans. Predecessor Rep. Jim Kolbe, who is retiring, holds a more moderate view of immigration reform, as does Graf's Democratic challenger, Gabrielle Giffords. But Graf is banking that a majority of voters in this district feel as he does - and there are signs that Arizonans are, indeed, worked up over illegal immigration.

"Our surveys show that immigration is the most important issue for likely voters in this state," says Fred Solop, a political scientist at Northern Arizona University and director of the Social Research Laboratory there. But voters aren't distinguishing between competing proposals, he adds: "They just want something to be done."

The state's all-Republican congressional delegation - some of whom are in unexpectedly close contests for reelection - is deeply divided on the immigration issue. Sharing Representative Kolbe's view are Rep. Jeff Flake, in the upscale Phoenix suburb of Mesa, and the very popular Sen. John McCain. They'd like to see an approach to immigration reform that includes a path to citizenship for some of the 12 million people now in the US illegally.

On the other side are Graf and Rep. J.D. Hayworth, who represents the also-upscale Fifth Congressional District in Scottsdale. They say their colleagues' plan amounts to amnesty for illegal immigrants and would reward people for breaking the law. The nation must secure its borders first, they say. Then there's Sen. Jon Kyl, up for reelection this year, who favors expanding a guestworker program but who would also require undocumented workers to leave the US before applying for citizenship.

"Arizona is a microcosm of the nation when it comes to views on this issue. We're ground zero for the debate," says Farrell Quinlan, a spokesman for the Arizona Chamber of Commerce in Phoenix. "Our economy is growing, and a lot of industries have grown to rely on that source of labor."

Senator McCain's approach is to put party loyalty ahead of immigration differences. He has endorsed both Graf and Representative Hayworth, rather than candidates whose views on immigration are closer to his own. He is also stumping for Senator Kyl. Immigration's toll on Arizona

In peak migration season, more than 8,000 immigrants cross from Mexico into Arizona every day, according to the National Border Patrol Council. Many find jobs in the state's booming construction, tourism, and farm industries. But the surge in newcomers exacts a heavy toll on schools, hospitals, and law enforcement, as well as on the migrants themselves, who in summer months perish by the scores in Arizona's harsh border regions.

DOJ_NMG_0086601

"Politicians have very little will to change the current system because they're beholden to corporate interests who want the status quo maintained," says T.J. Bonner, president of the National Border Patrol Council of the AFL-CIO.

Arizonans will also vote next month on four ballot initiatives concerning illegal immigration. These include moves to deny bail to illegal immigrants charged with serious felonies, to refuse punitive damage awards to illegals involved in civil lawsuits, to make English the state's official language, and to bar undocumented people from receiving in-state tuition rates, state-funded childcare assistance, and other educational services.

On Friday, the US Supreme Court threw out an order by a federal appeals court that blocked Arizona from enforcing Proposition 200, which requires voters to have voter identification. The governor's seat

Besides McCain, Arizona's other key player in the immigration debate is Gov. Janet Napolitano (D). While she has vetoed GOP bills that would have allowed local police to screen and deport undocumented people, she also makes the case that immigration is a federal responsibility and that Washington should do more to relieve costs borne by border states. In August 2005, she declared a border emergency and has stepped up cooperation with Mexico on issues such as human trafficking and those making fraudulent IDs.

On Nov. 7, she faces Republican Len Munsil, who promises to spend $515 million on border security during his first term as governor, and Libertarian Barry Hess, who says he would give the 110th Congress just 60 days to come up with a plan to secure the border. He also supports cooperating with citizen militias such as the Minutemen.

"It's been very helpful for us to have a governor in Arizona who has a strong record on immigration," says Kate Bedingfield, a spokeswoman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. The race for the Eighth district

A founding member of the Minuteman Project and a former state legislator, Graf says his primary goal, if elected, is to stop illegal immigration. While President Bush has increased the border patrol to 14,000 agents by the end of this year, "it will take 40,000 to 50,000 more officers to secure the borders," he said Saturday at a town-hall meeting at a retirement community in Tucson.

National GOP leaders had urged Graf not to run because, they say, he is too hard-core on this issue for the Eight District.

Ms. Giffords, a state senator, is leading Graf in recent polls by double digits. She says Americans do not have confidence in the US House of Representatives, especially its ability to solve the immigration crisis.

"We are shouldering the cost of what is a national problem," she said at the same Tucson meeting on Saturday. Giffords prefers a more comprehensive approach to reform legislation, to open more legal avenues for work "so the border patrol can focus on drug smugglers." A surprise contest in the Fifth

In one of the surprises of the electoral season, Representative Hayworth finds himself in a race that's too close to call. Ordinarily, Hayworth is a fixture on the GOP talk circuit, sent to places where Republican colleagues are in tight races, but he has been staying close to home this time, aides say. His lead in the polls over Democratic challenger Harry Mitchell - once in the double digits - is now down to two or three points. Each camp says its own private poll gives its candidate a slight edge.

"A lot of money is going into that race," says Mr. Solop, the pollster. "Both national parties are in there now."

In a virtuoso debate appearance in Scottsdale on Monday, Hayworth reminded constituents that he is the only Arizonan in history to have served on the powerful House Ways and Means Committee - a role that has allowed him to help the district. Two weeks ago, President Bush signed the Homeland Security Appropriations Act for fiscal year 2007, including funding for a fence along the border with Mexico, in Scottsdale, he said.

Mr. Mitchell, for his part, said Washington has the wrong priorities and that the nation needs a tough, realistic immigration plan.

"The enthusiasm is on our side," said Mitchell at a fundraiser on Friday, shouting over the thunk-thunk-thunk of the music of alternative pop rockers Jimmy Eat World and the Format. Tickets sold out in three days, mainly to students.

"J.D. is really out of touch," Mitchell says of his opponent. "He wants to only seal the border and make everyone a felon. It's just plain not realistic."

DOJ_NMG_0086602

Mitchell, who helped lead Tempe's redevelopment and has a statue in his honor, adds: "The state has a 3.6 percent unemployment rate, and it depends on tourism, hospitality, and construction, and they need these workers."

Edward Hermes, a student representative on the Arizona Board of Regents, came to the fundraiser to check out Mitchell's message. "We're tired of all the positioning," he says. "We want a solution."

On Monday, Arizona State University students in Tempe marched to Phoenix in protest over Proposition 300 - the ballot initiative that denies education services and child-care benefits to illegal immigrants.

"Some 60,000 to 100,000 students apply to the university every year. If you spend 20 minutes on each one, you would need 17 full-time positions to deal with Prop. 300," says Jean Moreau. "Tuition goes up every year, and I don't see how we're going to get the money without cutting more classes."

"Voters are in a very ugly mood, on issues ranging from the war, scandals in Washington, the apparent loss of a moral compass, and the economy," says pollster Earl DeBerge of the Rocky Mountain Poll in Flagstaff, Ariz.

TAX:

Survey Finds Giving By Wealthy Largely Immune To Tax Changes (WSJ)

By Sally Beatty

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

Many wealthy people would still give a lot to charity even if Congress wiped out popular breaks for donating, a study suggests. While these high-net-worth Americans already contribute two-thirds of household charitable giving, donating $126 billion last year alone, they would give more if nonprofits could rein in administrative costs and better demonstrate the impact of donations.

The researchers at the Center on Philanthropy at Indiana University, underwritten by Bank of America Corp., distributed 30,000 surveys between June and September in neighborhoods where the average household had liquid assets of $3 million or more. Responses from 945 were used in the analysis. The survey, designed as a nationally representative random sample, defined high-net-worth households as those with incomes of greater than $200,000 or assets over $1 million. Such homes represent 3.1% of U.S. households, the researchers said.

The results are at odds with several stereotypes about how and why rich people give to charity. Patrick Rooney, director of research at the center, said previous research has shown that giving declines generally when the value of tax deductions on the donation declines. But 52% of responding households said their giving would stay the same if they received no income-tax deductions for it. And 38% said such giving would somewhat decrease, but only 7% said it would dramatically decrease.

In addition, 56% said the amount they would leave to charity in an estate plan would remain the same if the estate tax were repealed. Politicians and charity officials have been arguing for years about whether a repeal of the estate tax would be good or bad for charity and society at large. Some wealthy Americans, including investor-philanthropists George Soros and Warren Buffett, have argued that doing so could hurt philanthropy by removing incentives to give to charity. But in the study, only a small percentage of high-net-worth households, 1.6%, said repealing the estate tax would dramatically decrease their charitable giving, while 3.9% said it would somewhat decrease giving. Prof. Rooney said that suggests the very rich are less sensitive to tax rates.

The arts, meanwhile, have long been associated with the very rich. But the households surveyed said they give just 11% of their charity dollars to the arts. Nearly double that amount went both to religion and education, each getting about 22% of donations from these households.

Other recent surveys conducted by the center have found that Americans generally give far more in percentage terms -- a full 60% -- to religion. But these households give a lower percentage to education, health and the arts than the wealthy, the center has found.

Charities are under pressure to contain administrative costs and demonstrate the impact of their work. Nearly 75% of the wealthy surveyed said they would give more if less money was spent on administration, and nearly 60% said they would give more if they were able to determine the impact of their gifts.

DOJ_NMG_0086603

The study also found that 41% use wills to give away money, and almost 20% use foundations. A large majority of the wealthy (nearly 80%) do volunteer work, and a majority (61%) serve on charity boards. Only 8% say they give as a way to limit funds that will go to their heirs.

"Maybe part of what is driving this lack of reported tax motivation is that this group feels like they are primarily motivated by altruism and giving back to society," said Prof. Rooney.

IRS Help Can Be Hard To Get, Audit Says (USAT)

By Kevin Mccoy

USA Today, October 26, 2006

Got a complex tax problem? Phoning an IRS Taxpayer Assistance Center for an appointment won't necessarily produce a solution, a federal audit shows.

The Treasury Department inspector general overseeing the IRS called 50 assistance centers — 36 with tax account problems and 14 with tax law questions. Auditors reported that eight phone messages weren't returned, and five weren't returned within two business days as IRS guidelines require.

Moreover, auditors managed to schedule appointments for just five of the 36 calls that involved tax account problems, the type of complex tax issues that often require a face-to-face session to resolve.

That performance, outlined in an audit released late last week, undermined the centers' mission, the auditors concluded. They stressed that the "convenience of scheduling appointments could encourage taxpayers to try to resolve tax account problems earlier, thus reducing taxpayer burden."

"When the IRS doesn't provide proper customer service, it's harder for honest taxpayers to pay their taxes correctly," said Carol Guthrie, a spokeswoman for Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., the ranking minority member on the Senate Finance Committee.

"The IRS has made it clear it would like taxpayers to go to its website" for help, said Colleen Kelley, head of the National Treasury Employees Union, which represents IRS workers. "That works for some people, but not for others."

The IRS maintains 400 Taxpayer Assistance Centers nationwide. It encourages taxpayers to request face-to-face appointments for tax account issues that are difficult to resolve over the telephone.

Designated taxpayer phone lines in the offices logged about 500,000 calls during the 2006 federal tax season, from January through mid-April, the audit reported.

Sixty-eight of the centers had been scheduled to close under an IRS budget-cutting plan announced in 2005.

The agency reversed that plan last year after some members of Congress, the IRS employee union and the National Taxpayer Advocate's office argued that shutdowns would hurt the poor, the elderly and others who have limited access to tax counseling.

The new audit blamed the difficulty of getting return calls and appointments on IRS employees who either failed to follow, or were unfamiliar with, agency guidelines. Moreover, the audit characterized some IRS regulations as unclear and obsolete.

"There are no criteria for the Taxpayer Assistance Center employees to follow to determine if an appointment should be made for any tax account issue, or if an appointment can be made only for complex issues that cannot be resolved over the telephone," the audit reported.

Auditors recommended that the IRS update the guidelines and develop new controls to ensure that taxpayer calls are returned.

In a formal response, Richard Morgante, head of the IRS Wage and Investment Division, wrote that the agency agreed to implement the recommendations.

"We will ensure our employees understand we will not refuse an appointment to any taxpayer," Morgante wrote.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

FT Interview: Rob Portman (FT)

By Krishna Guha In Washington

DOJ_NMG_0086604

Financial Times, October 26, 2006

A Democrat victory in next month's midterm elections would jeopardise efforts to contain government spending, put upward pressure on taxes and undermine -America's ability to negotiate free trade agreements, Rob Portman, the White House budget director, claimed on Wednesday.

In an interview with the Financial Times, Mr Portman said voters had an economic choice to make at the polls on November 7.

"There is a clear distinction between Republicans and Democrats, both on the revenue side and on the spending side."

Mr Portman, a former US trade representative, said that "unfortunately" there was also a clear choice on free trade, with Republicans in favour and Democrats largely against.

However, he said he was hopeful that the two parties could come together for a serious attempt to reform Social Security and Medicare after the election, regardless of who won.

His comments come as the Bush administration tries to put the economy at the -centre of the election debate, hoping to capitalise on low unemployment, rising wages, falling petrol prices and a strong stock market.

Mr Portman told the Financial Times that if the Democrats took control of Congress, there would be more pressure for higher spending on non-defence discretionary expenditure. He said the alternative budget for 2007 put forward by Democrats in the House of Representatives increased spending by $177bn (€140bn, £94.5bn) over five years.

"That was positioned as a moderate budget," he said.

He warned voters against assuming that President George W. Bush could veto all extra spending proposals.

"Yes, the president has veto power, and could use it more frequently. But we also need to get these bills done. It is always a matter of negotiation," he said. Mr Portman also suggested that Mr Bush might not veto an increase in the minimum wage proposed by a Democrat Congress, provided it was part of a "package" that included relief for small businesses.

On taxes, Mr Portman asserted that "the Democrat leadership says different things at different times".

He said some congressional Democrats wanted to let all the Bush tax cuts expire, while some wanted to let the tax cuts for bigger earners expire, along with the dividend and capital gains tax cuts.

"They are not going to make the tax cuts permanent."

But he conceded that even a majority Republican Congress might not find the votes to make all the tax cuts permanent. He said the argument had been shifting in favour of this, with revenues now above their 40-year average of 18.2 per cent of gross domestic product.

Mr Portman claimed a Democrat-run Congress would seek to raise taxes in other areas to offset reform of the Alternative Minimum Tax.

He regretted that trade had become a partisan issue.

"If you look at Republicans vs Democrats, there is a very clear delineation now, unfortunately, on trade. The Democrat leadership is against trade agreements. I don't mean Nafta and big agreements – they seem to be against them all."

A Democrat win next month would make it "more difficult, definitely" for the administration to secure an extension for its fast-track Trade Promotion Authority.

However, he said a renewed push on reform of Social Security and Medicare would still be possible, even if Congress changed hands. A growing number of Democrats as well as Republicans in Congress recognised the need to slow the growth of entitlement spending.

"I think it is possible regardless," he said.

Entering The Era Of Smart Card ID (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

The government begins issuing a new identification card tomorrow, the kickoff of a multiyear effort to provide all government workers and many contractors with a "smart card" that can be used to verify their identity when they enter a building or log onto computer networks.

DOJ_NMG_0086605

In addition to showing a person's name and agency, an electronic chip in the card will contain personal data, such as images from two fingerprints, a special identification number and digital certificates that permit access to places and systems.

President Bush issued a homeland security directive in 2004 requiring that agencies issue the cards and install software that will allow them to be recognized across the government. The goal is to have government employees carry one ID card, replacing the multiple cards many employees must use to get into offices or obtain sensitive information.

Issuing the cards and upgrading equipment to read them will probably take three to five years, said Karen Evans , the administrator for electronic government and technology at the Office of Management and Budget. The ambitious effort, she said, will improve national security and ensure "that we give access to who we should."

Groups concerned about privacy rights and database security are watching the Bush administration's card project, in part because it may provide lessons for ongoing debates on whether Americans should carry a national identification card.

Evans said personal data on government employees and contractors would not be compiled in one vast database. However, it seems likely that some large records-keeping systems will be created or expanded with the advent of the new card.

There is no tally of how many smart cards will be handed out across the government, but they will number in the millions. The Defense Department, for example, has 3.2 million "common access cards" in circulation and will replace them as they expire -- a five-year project that includes deployment of new software.

There's also no estimate of how many federal employees will be issued the new smart card tomorrow.

Officials at the Office of Management and Budget hope to see the cards roll out tomorrow in cities with large numbers of federal employees, such as Washington, Atlanta, Denver, Seattle and New York. OMB has asked agencies to send in a photocopy of a card they have issued, with appropriate privacy redactions, so that the White House knows they have put a smart-card program in place.

The General Services Administration and the Interior Department are issuing the smart cards on behalf of numerous agencies and departments. Some, such as Defense and the Social Security Administration, will run their own card programs.

The Social Security Administration said it issued a smart card to Jo Anne Barnhart , the agency's commissioner, last week, and plans to issue about 100,000 of the cards over the next two years.

The Defense Department issues about 10,000 ID cards every day. Matt Boehmer , director of the joint advertising market research and studies program at the Defense Human Resources Agency, has volunteered to take on the ceremonial role of first Defense recipient of the next-generation ID card, said Lynne Prince , acting director for the department's access card office.

Bush called for "secure and reliable forms of identification" to be developed for government workers as part of the administration's efforts to stop terrorists, criminals and unauthorized persons from getting into federal buildings and hacking into computer systems.

Employees receiving the smart card undergo a credit and criminal background check.

The process set up by the GSA, which is providing card services to 38 federal agencies and departments, takes a person's fingerprints, checks them against FBI records and enters them into a database, along with a photograph and other personal data.

The GSA had enrolled more than 70 people as of yesterday, an official said.

"We have assured our clients that one person from every participating agency will receive a credential on Friday. We probably will be issuing more than one, but that is our minimum target," said Michel Kareis , the GSA program manager.

Kareis said the GSA smart-card database will cover at least 400,000 people, and probably more because information on how many contractors will need the card is incomplete.

The GSA cards will cost the agencies $110 for each initial issuance and $52 annually for card and database maintenance. If more than 500,000 cards are issued, the GSA will be able to take advantage of the volume and lower prices, Kareis said.

She said the GSA plans to set up about 200 enrollment stations throughout the nation, starting next year, to get the new ID cards out to federal employees.

OTHER NEWS:

Fed Leaves Rates Alone For The Third Time (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0086606

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, October 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Federal Reserve, holding interest rates steady Wednesday for the third consecutive meeting, says it expects economic growth to continue, despite the widespread slump in the housing market.

But the central bank cautioned that inflation remains a threat given the tight job market, even after the recent fall in energy prices.

"Economic growth has slowed over the course of the year, partly reflecting a cooling of the housing market," the Fed said in a statement at the conclusion of its two-day meeting. "Going forward, the economy seems likely to expand at a moderate pace."

The Fed kept its target for short-term interest rates steady at 5.25%, the highest in nearly six years. Although the Fed does not directly set mortgage or other private-sector loan rates, its short-term rate target is used as a benchmark when banks price consumer and business loans.

Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke and other officials have said they expect inflation to gradually moderate as growth slows. However, they repeated their warning that incoming data will determine whether they need to raise rates again.

"We don't think there will be any more rate hikes," Global Insight chief economist Nariman Behravesh told clients. Economists at the firm expect the Fed to cut rates next year, possibly as early as March.

More than half of 53 top economists surveyed by USA TODAY Oct. 13-18 expect the Fed to hold steady for months, then reduce rates in the first half of 2007. The economists, on average, expect one rate cut.

But some economists cautioned against complacency, pointing out that inflation was still too high. The core consumer price index, an inflation measure that excludes food and energy, is up 2.9% in the past 12 months, above the Fed's informal 1%-2% comfort range.

"We continue to look for the next move from the Fed to be a hike in rates," John Ryding of Bear Stearns said in a note to clients, adding the timing of any move was unclear.

The central bank raised rates 17 times in quarter-point increments from June 2004 to June 2006. The effort was designed to remove excess stimulus from the economy and keep inflation under wraps.

The economy expanded at a brisk 5.6% annual rate in the first quarter of the year but slowed to a 2.6% pace in the second. The government will announce its third-quarter growth estimate on Friday. Behravesh expects growth to have cooled to a 1.5% annual rate, which he says would be the low before a moderate pickup.

Richmond Fed President Jeffrey Lacker dissented for a third meeting, preferring a quarter-point rate increase to combat inflation. Lacker is the first Fed official to do so since 1998, Moody's Economy.com. says.

Fed Again Leaves Rates Unchanged (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Federal Reserve held short-term interest rates steady for its third consecutive meeting as it continued to bet on a moderation of both inflation and economic growth.

Even as it left rates at 5.25% yesterday, the Fed again warned that it is worried about inflation.

Since Ben Bernanke became Fed chairman in February, he has faced, first, the threat of rising inflation and then a housing-led economic slowdown. The latest data, and the statement released by the Fed after its meeting yesterday, suggest that the central bank sees the risks on both sides diminishing. That makes it less likely that rates will change in either direction in coming months.

Both the rate action and statement were largely expected. Bond prices rallied and bond yields, which move in the opposite direction to prices, fell, apparently because investors had expected more hints of a possible rate increase.

Futures markets' expectations of Fed actions have swung sharply in the past month, from betting on several rate cuts starting as soon as December to seeing a small probability that the Fed might raise rates.

DOJ_NMG_0086607

In its statement, the Fed said growth has slowed in part because of a "cooling" housing market. "Going forward, the economy seems likely to expand at a moderate pace," it said, a notable addition to its statement released after last month's meeting.

Core inflation, which excludes food and energy, remains "elevated" but inflation pressures are likely to moderate thanks to lower energy prices, "contained" inflation expectations, and the impact of previous rate increases, the Fed said.

"Some inflation risks remain," the Fed said, but whether rates would rise again depends on the outlook and "incoming information."

For the third straight meeting, Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond President Jeffrey Lacker cast the lone dissent among the 11 voting members of the Federal Open Market Committee. He argued in favor of a quarter-percentage point rate increase in the target federal-funds rate, charged on overnight loans between banks. (One voting seat is empty and seven other members don't vote.)

Mr. Bernanke has faced shifting challenges since taking office. Core inflation has risen to 2.9% from 2.1%, the highest level in a decade. Although inflation by the Fed's preferred price index is lower, it, too, is above the 2% level many Fed officials have said they are comfortable with. That led the Fed to raise rates at its first three meetings under Mr. Bernanke.

Then later economic growth, under the weight of falling home and automobile sales, began to slow, to an estimated annual rate of about 2% in the third quarter. That would be the second-lowest level since 2003. The official growth figure will be reported tomorrow.

In recent weeks, though, both inflation and growth worries have eased. Energy prices have plunged, and the Fed expects the indirect impact of that drop to pull down core inflation in the coming year or so. Yesterday's Fed statement dropped a reference from the previous month to energy and commodity prices as a source of inflation pressure.

There is little sign the economy outside housing and cars has slowed much. Some economists said the housing market has shown tentative signs of hitting bottom.

Yesterday, the National Association of Realtors said existing-home sales fell 2% in September to an annual rate of 6.18 million, from August. The inventory of existing homes remained at about 7.3 months of sales for the third consecutive month.

"We might be having what some colleagues have described as a false landing rather than soft landing," said Carl Tannenbaum, chief economist at LaSalle Bank. He said growth could rebound to 3% in the current quarter as the housing correction ends and consumers benefit from a 25% to 40% drop in gasoline prices.

"The Fed must ask itself: Did things slow down long enough and far enough to reduce pressure on capacity? I think the next move [on rates] is probably up."

Rajeev Dhawan, director of the Economic Forecasting Center at Georgia State University, predicted the Fed would cut rates by January. With long-term rates well below short-term rates -- a relationship that in the past has foreshadowed recession -- "the risk factors are too high," he said.

The shifting momentum of growth from strong to weak and back to moderate reflects the remarkable stability the U.S. economy now enjoys, said John Makin, a scholar at the American Enterprise Institute. "As has often been the case over the past five years, the slowdown itself has set into motion market adjustments that may mitigate or even reverse it," he wrote in a report.

For example, the Fed's decision to pause as the housing market weakened led investors to drive down long-term rates on bonds and mortgages. That, with a lag, has helped put a floor under housing.

Online lender Quicken Loans Inc.'s pipeline of mortgage applications has grown 20% to 25% since rates began to ease in late June, said the company's chief economist, Bob Walters. The increase has been driven mostly by refinancing applications, while the number of applications for new-home purchases remains steady. "Whether we've seen the bottom or not, remains to be seen," he said.

Fed Holds Key Rate Steady At 5.25% (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0086608

Federal Reserve policymakers decided to hold short-term interest rates steady yesterday but left the door open to raising them in coming months if inflation stays too high.

The economy has lost steam this year, partly because of the sharp downturn in the housing market, the central bank's policymaking Federal Open Market Committee said in a statement after a two-day meeting.

That slowdown should eventually help ease inflation, but unemployment remains low and factories remain busy, which could fan price pressures in the shorter term.

"Some inflation risks remain," the central bankers said, making it clear they might move interest rates higher if inflation proves more stubborn than they forecast.

Even so, the committee had an upbeat outlook, saying it expects the economy to "expand at a moderate pace" -- a sign that it doesn't expect the housing slump to drag the rest of the economy into a recession.

"It seems like we have rising odds of a soft landing," said Elizabeth Weymouth, a global investment specialist at J.P. Morgan Private Bank. "The risk of a recession has faded dramatically, and inflation appears headed back down."

Stocks rose shortly after the Fed's announcement, as investors welcomed that message and concluded the central bank will leave interest rates on hold for a while.

The committee left its benchmark federal funds rate, the overnight rate charged on loans between banks, at 5.25 percent. The Fed has held the benchmark rate at that level since June, after raising it gradually from 1 percent over two years.

One of the committee's 11 voting members voted against the decision. Jeffrey M. Lacker, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond, in his third dissent in as many Fed meetings, would have preferred to raise the funds rate to 5.5 percent.

"The longer inflation remains elevated, the more difficult it will be to bring it back down," Lacker said in a speech in Washington two weeks ago, explaining that he thinks another rate increase is needed to lower inflation more quickly.

Inflation surged earlier this year as oil prices peaked above $77 a barrel in July, and as prices climbed for education, medical care, rental housing and other items.

But inflation has fallen as fuel prices have tumbled since mid-August. The Labor Department's consumer price index declined 0.5 percent in September, and was up 2.1 percent in the 12 months ended in September.

However, economists also look for signs of underlying inflation by studying core measures that exclude volatile food and fuel prices. The core CPI rose 0.2 percent last month and 2.9 percent from September 2005 -- the highest 12-month increase in a decade.

The Fed expects inflation to fall over time because of lower fuel prices, slower economic growth and other factors, the statement said.

But some analysts were more skeptical, noting that falling gasoline prices have helped spur consumer spending, that the labor market remains tight and that wages have been rising -- all potential sources of inflationary pressure.

Fed policymakers "are betting on energy prices to basically do their work for them," said Drew Matus, a senior economist with Lehman Brothers Inc., which predicts the central bank will lift its benchmark rate once more to 5.5 percent before it is done.

"We expect the slowdown in growth will not be sufficient to pull down inflation on its own. You'll need a little extra boost" in interest rates," Matus said.

The Fed seeks to control inflation and encourage economic growth by adjusting interest rates. Tighter credit discourages consumers and businesses from borrowing and spending, which dampens growth and price pressures; easier credit does the opposite.

The Fed's benchmark rate directly influences other short-term rates, such as those charged on credit cards and home-equity loans. But it only indirectly influences long-term rates, which are determined more by global financial markets. Mortgage rates, for example, have declined in recent months.

The Fed spent some of its two-day meeting discussing its communication policies. Members of the group had agreed in August that they wanted to find better ways to inform the public about their economic goals. The Fed announced no changes yesterday on that issue.

Home Prices Keep Sliding; Buyers Sit Tight (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0086609

By James R. Hagerty

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

The air continues to seep out of the U.S. housing market, according to the latest data, and some economists are warning that prices will keep declining through much of 2007.

The National Association of Realtors yesterday reported the biggest drop in home prices since the trade group began compiling price data in 1968. Specifically, the association said the median price for home sales completed in September was $220,000, down 2.2% from a year earlier. That matched a revised 2.2% decline in August. In addition to being the largest price drops in at least 38 years, the back-to-back declines are the first time median home prices have fallen since 1995.

Other data gathered by The Wall Street Journal show large inventories of unsold homes and declining price trends in most major metropolitan areas.

"Housing is still contracting," says Gregory Miller, chief economist at SunTrust Banks Inc. in Atlanta. "We haven't yet found the bottom." Mr. Miller doesn't expect house prices to resume their usual rising trend until 2008.

The latest report is likely to encourage many potential buyers to hold off in the hope of further price declines. "There's no rush," says Robert Cook, a procurement manager living in Whitehall, Pa., who is looking to buy a larger home for his family in Pennsylvania's Lehigh Valley.

Rather than slash their prices, some sellers are taking homes off the market until they see stronger demand. Audrey Heckaman, a pharmaceutical sales representative in Cleveland, bought a new condo in a golfing community in Naples, Fla., in 2004 for $221,000. Early this year, she put it on the market for $429,000. But she found that too many other units in the same development were on the market. After cutting her price to $384,000, she yanked the home from the market in June and found renters for part of the year. In the long run, she figures, demand from retiring baby boomers will drive prices back up.

For those who want to buy now, sellers are dangling lots of incentives. A developer in Dadeland, Fla., near Miami, is offering $5,000 of furniture as an inducement for buyers of new condominiums, says Ronald A. Shuffield, president of the brokerage firm Esslinger-Wooten-Maxwell Inc. Other developers offer to pay some of the fees and other costs usually borne by home purchasers.

Some people who are forced to sell quickly are suffering huge losses. At an auction in Naples last weekend, the highest bid for a three-bedroom lakefront house was $440,000, including commissions and auction fees. The house had sold in July 2005 for $690,000.

Despite the recent drop-off, house prices remain far above the levels of five years ago, and they continue to rise in some areas, including Seattle, Houston and Raleigh, N.C. But they are falling sharply in other places. In Massachusetts, the median price for single-family homes in September was down 8.3% from a year before, according to Warren Group Inc., a publisher and data collector in Boston. In Phoenix, the median price dropped 4.8% in September, the local Realtors association reported.

In some areas, prices are only just beginning to fall back toward realistic levels, says Thomas Lawler, a housing economist in Vienna, Va. He believes that prices could fall more than 10% from their peak levels in markets such as Sacramento, Calif.; San Diego; Las Vegas; Reno, Nev.; Phoenix and parts of northern Virginia and Florida.

Nationwide, sales of previously occupied homes in September were at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 6.2 million, down 1.9% from August and 14% from a year earlier, the Realtors group reported.

In a mildly positive sign for home sellers, the number of homes listed for sale at the end of September declined 2.4% from a month earlier to 3.75 million. But that was smaller than the usual decline in September, when the resumption of school and the approach of the holidays typically begin to reduce the number of for-sale signs. Over the past decade, inventories of home sales have declined an average of 3.6% in September from the previous month.

Inventories in September were up about 35% from a year earlier. A surge in inventories, fueled partly by investors rushing for the exits, began chilling the housing market in mid-2005 after a five-year boom that more than doubled prices in many areas.

Despite the spreading weakness in house prices, few experts expect anything approaching a collapse. The economy continues to expand, though at a slower rate, and a recent drop in interest rates helps make mortgage costs more affordable.

To gauge residential real-estate prospects for 27 major metro areas, The Wall Street Journal gathered data on inventories of homes for sale at the end of the second quarter from a variety of local sources; pricing trends based on surveys of real-estate agents by Daniel Oppenheim, an analyst at Banc of America Securities in New York, a unit of Bank of America Corp.; and data on late mortgage payments and job-creation prospects from Moody's Economy.com, a research firm in West Chester, Pa. Employment trends tend to drive demand for housing.

DOJ_NMG_0086610

Metropolitan areas with large increases in homes on the market and weak job-growth projections include Detroit, New York and Los Angeles. Inventories have more than doubled from a year earlier in the Miami, Orlando, Tampa and Phoenix metro areas, but strong job and population growth should help to soak up excess supply in the next few years.

Even within metro areas, price trends vary considerably depending on neighborhoods and types of housing. In northern New Jersey, for instance, prices for homes below about $400,000 may start rising again slightly by next spring if interest rates remain around current levels, says Jeffrey Otteau, president of Otteau Valuation Group Inc., an appraisal and research firm in East Brunswick, N.J. At that price level, "there's virtually zero construction," he says. But he says there is such a glut of luxury housing in the area that prices of such homes won't recover before 2008.

Tom Doyle, an agent at Naples Realty Services who compiles market data on his Web site (www.naplesinsider.com), estimates that prices for typical homes in the area are down 15% to 20% from their peak a year ago. Inventory has doubled during that time, but many of the homes on the market are priced so high that they have "only a lottery's chance of selling," he says. Looking ahead to this winter's selling season, Mr. Doyle says he expects prices to be flat to lower because of the large supply of homes for sale.

Seattle has been one of the strongest markets in recent months but is showing signs of losing some steam as inventories of unsold homes rise. In 17 counties of western and central Washington State covered by the Northwest Multiple Listing Service, the median price in September was up 9.4% from a year earlier, the first single-digit increase in two years.

Mike Skahen, owner of real-estate brokerage Lake & Co. in Seattle, says inventory is still lean in good neighborhoods near the area's biggest employers. But the overall market is slowing to a more normal pace as "buyers are feeling they can be more selective."

Houston's market is benefiting from job growth at energy and technology companies and draws newcomers because of its low home prices. The median price in the second quarter was $152,700, compared with a national median of $227,500, according to the National Association of Realtors.

In North Carolina, Charlotte, Raleigh and some other areas have been strong lately as moderate weather and relatively low housing costs attract employers and retirees. Pat Riley, president of Allen Tate Realtors in Charlotte, has noticed increasing numbers of people moving to North Carolina from Florida to flee congestion and high housing and insurance costs. One hitch: Some people moving to Charlotte are having trouble selling their homes elsewhere and so are delaying purchases.

The median price of new and previously occupied homes sold in the eight-county Charlotte region was $182,000 in the third quarter, up 6% from a year earlier, according to Market Opportunity Research Enterprises, a research firm in Rocky Mount, N.C. But the Charlotte market may be starting to cool a bit. The Charlotte Regional Realtors Association reported that home sales in September slipped 2% from a year earlier, while the average price edged down 0.2%.

The California Association of Realtors last week forecast that the median home price in the state will slip 2% to $550,000 in 2007, after rising 7% in 2006 and 16% in 2005. That would mark the first California-wide decline since 1996. California's last house-price slump lasted from 1992 through 1996.

Leslie Appleton-Young, the California Realtors' chief economist, says she doesn't expect the current downturn to be as severe as the one in the 1990s because she thinks the job market will be healthier this time. Many people don't need to sell and will withdraw their homes from the market until demand recovers, she says. Still, she adds, some investors who bought near the top and took on too much debt "are going to get into trouble."

Sellers Sing The Blues As Price Drop Sets Record (USAT)

By Noelle Knox

USA Today, October 26, 2006

Then: San Diego's housing market was so hot that the town house next to Jeff Cruce's was flipped from buyer to seller three times in three years. The owners, who never moved in, didn't even need to put up a “For Sale” sign.

DOJ_NMG_0086611

Now: Since August, Cruce and seven of his neighbors have put their town houses on the market (that's nearly 20% of the units in the complex). All have cut their prices, including Cruce, who chopped his price last month by $30,000 to $559,000. Not one has received an offer yet. Each time one owner would lower the asking price, it put pressure on the others to follow, says Cruce, 38, a salesman who's moving to Atlanta.

That domino effect, rippling through neighborhoods across the country, pushed down the nation's median home price in September by the largest amount on record, the National Association of Realtors (NAR) said Wednesday.

The median price for a single-family home slipped 2.5% from September last year to $219,800, the sharpest annual drop since the NAR began tracking the data in 1969. The median-priced condominium fell 2.8% to $219,800, the fourth annual decline in a row.

At the same time, the volume of home sales fell for the sixth straight month, tumbling 14% in September compared with a year ago.

In the softest real estate markets, sellers are waking up to the harsh reality that they can't get anywhere near what their neighbors sold their homes for last year. So they're grudgingly reducing their asking prices and offering to pay closing costs.

At the same time, many buyers, emboldened by the transformed market, are low-balling sellers and getting deals they couldn't have imagined last year.

Just ask Sevan Derderian and Reggie Johnson.

In 2004, Derderian bought a house in Las Vegas as an investment for $281,000. He found tenants, but he kicked them out after 10 months because their rent was always late.

“I found that it's really hard to be a landlord from a state or two away,” says Derderian, 43, a salesman in Los Angeles. He held onto the property for another year, hoping prices would keep going up. Once the market turned south, though, he panicked.

He listed the house in the summer for $305,000. Having owned real estate only during boom years, he assumed it would sell in about a week. After a month, he cut the price to $289,900. Another week went by. He offered to pay nearly $9,000 toward a buyer's closing costs.

Then along came Johnson, a 38-year-old truck driver, who snapped up the house and boasts, “I got a great deal.”

Derderian, in the meantime, lost about $25,000 from paying the mortgage on an empty home.

That's a risk confronting sellers in 56 metro areas, including Las Vegas, San Diego, Phoenix, New York and Miami, that are expected to suffer annual price drops, according to a study this month by Moody's Economy.com.

Prices in a few markets, such as Las Vegas and Portland, Ore., won't bottom out until 2009, the study projected, and in many areas prices will stay flat through the end of the decade. (For a full list, see www.money.usatoday.com.)

“It was surprising just how quickly the market seemed to turn,” says Mark Zandi, chief economist for Economy.com. “It was like, boom, boom, bust. It was like, ‘What happened?' The psychology in the marketplace unraveled very rapidly.”

In fact, about half of American homeowners who thought of selling their homes in the past year have delayed putting their homes on the market, according to a USA TODAY/Gallup poll conducted this month.

And roughly one-third of those who had considered selling have abandoned the idea. (The poll of 1,007 adults has a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.)

Of course, home prices aren't going to fall in every market. About one-third of the nation is expected to see moderate price growth for the rest of the year. Those areas include Dallas, Austin, Newark, Del., and Birmingham, Ala. — areas where prices didn't test the stratosphere during the boom.

Even in the once-sizzling markets, homeowners and investors who bought their properties more than two years ago should still see modest gains if they sell in the current market.

But it's clearly a buyer's market now. The number of homes for sale has bulged to a 7.3-month supply compared with 4.6 months last September. The backlog of homes for sale is thickest in the areas that witnessed the fastest price growth and investor activity.

“It's frustrating,” says Cindy Holliday, a high school math teacher who recently took a job in Chicago. “Homes were selling for so much more a few months ago, and now nothing's selling at all.”

Holliday and her husband were house hunting in Chicago in June when they put their home in Ocala, Fla., up for sale.

DOJ_NMG_0086612

"Before we put our house on the market, houses were selling so fast we didn't think we'd have a problem selling our house at all," says Holliday, 31.

"When we got back down there (to Ocala), just about every other house on our street was for sale. It was very depressing."

Though their house probably would have fetched nearly $200,000 earlier this year, they listed it at $179,000. A couple of weeks ago, they trimmed the price to $174,500.

But it's no easier for sellers in Chicago, says Javier Diaz. He's made several profitable real estate investments, but the three-unit apartment building he bought in Chicago earlier this year wasn't one of them.

"I figured this year the property would go up 30 or 40 grand, but that didn't happen," says Diaz, 28.

He put it up for sale in September, asking $415,000. He's already cut the price twice, to $375,000. That's less than he owes on his loan, which means that if Diaz sells at that price, he'll have to pull $5,000 out of his own pocket to pay the bank.

Being a mortgage broker, Diaz knows some investors who used their home equity like debit cards. He says of the quick decline in real estate, "It's coming like a culture shock to many."

Vicki di Bernardo agrees. "It taught us a lesson," she says of the downturn in Las Vegas. "It was a little risky, but we got caught up in it. Everyone was doing it. … (Now) everyone is very, very nervous here about the real estate market."

She recalls buying a single-family home in the Las Vegas suburb of Summerlin as an investment in 2003.

"We were on a huge waiting list, and our names came up, and we had to go in with a check and give it to them within a couple of hours or they'd go to the next on the list."

She rented the house out for two years. But when her tenants moved out in February, she put it on the market for $574,000.

"In the first three months, we didn't have one showing — not one," says di Bernardo, 60, who works in human resources. At the end of May, she dropped the price to $519,000. Three weeks later, she came down to $499,000. Even then, only looky-loos came by.

"There was so much inventory" on the market, di Bernardo recalls. "So many builders had offered huge incentives, like no mortgage payments for 12 months or a swimming pool. We had it on the market for $479,000 when an offer came in at $460,000."

She grabbed it. She still made $175,000, but that's about $100,000 less than she'd have made if she sold last year.

Builders, with no emotional attachment to their homes, have become one of the biggest financial threats to individual sellers. New-home sales are down 16% this year. Building permits for single-family homes are off by 20%. Faced with a huge number of cancellations, builders began trying to lure buyers with eye-catching deals, such as free vacations, media rooms and landscaping.

That's what's hurting Bryan Rauch. In January, he bought a home in Anthem, Ariz., where Pulte Homes is offering a slew of incentives, including advice from re-sale experts to help buyers fix up and sell their current homes.

"The plan was to renovate it and flip it," says Rauch, 37, a nurse-turned-real-estate-investor.

He put the home back on the market in February, at $284,000, then lowered the price repeatedly until he hit $270,000. Still no buyers. After six months, he rented it out at a $500-a-month loss.

"The problem is the builder is giving away homes," Rauch says. "Properties like this are now selling for the low $200s."

But Rauch needs to cut his losses. So he's putting the home back on the market at $260,000 and crossing his fingers — like a lot of other sellers around the country.

A Record Drop In Home Prices (WP)

By Kirstin Downey

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

The price of existing homes last month fell 2.2 percent, the largest monthly decline in the almost four decades the number has been tracked, according to an industry report released yesterday.

Nationwide, the number of existing single-family homes sold fell 14.2 percent in September compared with September 2005, according to the report from the National Association of Realtors. The number of sales has fallen each month since March.

DOJ_NMG_0086613

Prices fell everywhere in the country, with the Northeast and West most affected. Declines were more moderate in the South, which includes the Washington area.

The median price nationally of an existing single-family home in September was $220,000, down from $225,000 a year earlier. It was the largest monthly decline since the Realtors began monitoring prices monthly in 1968. It was the second month in a row that home prices fell compared with a year earlier. The median is the point at which half of the homes cost more and half cost less.

One reason prices are dropping is that sellers are having a harder time finding buyers.

Nazirahk Amen, 39, a natural medicine practitioner and acupuncturist, thought a buyer would snap up his three-bedroom, three-bath Cape Cod in Takoma Park. He was so confident that his organic garden and greenhouse would be a particularly strong lure in that community that he bought another house nearby and moved. For the past two months, he has been making two mortgage payments, and recently reduced the price $25,000 to attract a bidder.

"Of course it's frustrating," Amen said. "I'm looking for this to end. It's frustrating, to say the least."

Realtors' association officials blame the continuing slump on what Lawrence Yun, the group's senior economist, called "confidence issues." Yun said buyers are waiting until they think the market has hit bottom, particularly because high prices have made houses less affordable.

"Psychological factors have people on the sidelines," Yun said. "They are waiting to time the market."

Yun saw reason for optimism, and thinks an upturn is at hand. He said the September figures represent a "trough in the market," because for the past two months, the inventory of unsold homes has fallen slightly.

"Supply was artificially elevated" earlier in the year when real estate investors bailed out of the market, Yun said.

Thomas M. Stevens, a Vienna-based real estate broker who serves as president of the national trade group, said in a statement that he was heartened by the decline in properties coming onto the market, which he said would lead to a better "supply balance."

Charles W. McMillion, an economist and president of District-based MBG Information Services, said he saw little sign that the decline was ending. "I don't see stability when sales continue to decline sharply and price continued to decline sharply," McMillion said. "It's pretty hard to argue we've reached a sustainable level."

Peter Morici, an economist at the University of Maryland, said reduced inventory of unsold houses may mean "frustrated buyers are removing their homes from the market." Morici said that major price adjustments will be needed to bring the market back into balance.

"The speculative frenzy of recent years is causing a major adjustment, and the happy talk of Realtors is prolonging the process," Morici said. "The absence of realistic analysis about the extent of overvaluation is characteristic in an industry that sees nothing but an upward progression for values, but houses like any other asset can be overpriced. . . . Things are likely to get worse before they get better."

According to yesterday's report, prices in the Northeast in September dropped 5.1 percent compared with a year earlier and those in the West dropped 4.3 percent. In the South, they were down 1.6 percent.

The federal government is scheduled to release figures today on sales of new homes, which have also been falling this year. That weakness has been reflected in the earnings reports of national home builders. This week, for instance, Dallas-based builder Centex Corp., which has 40 projects in the Washington area, reported that its earnings in the quarter ended Sept. 30 fell 59 percent. "We have been aggressively responding to deteriorating market conditions" by reducing land purchases and cutting staff, Timothy R. Eller, Centex's chairman and chief executive, said in a statement.

Dow Hits High After Fed Keeps Rates Steady (USAT)

USA Today, October 26, 2006

NEW YORK — The Dow Jones industrial notched its third consecutive record Wednesday — its third such winning streak in three weeks — after the Federal Reserve did as expected and left interest rates unchanged (story, 1B).

DOJ_NMG_0086614

The Dow rose 6.80 points to 12,134.68. While that was less than 0.1%, it was a new closing high and extended the Dow's 2006 gain to 13.2%. The Standard & Poor's 500 set another 2006 high as it rose 4.84 points to 1382.22 and stretched its gain for the year to 10.7%. The Nasdaq composite remained the laggard. It gained 11.75 points to 2356.59 for a 6.9% 2006 gain.

The Fed's Open Market Committee kept its benchmark rate unchanged at 5.25% for a third straight meeting, but it noted in its accompanying policy statement that recent readings on inflation have moved higher recently.

Stocks waffled after the Fed's decision was released as investors worried that inflation concerns could prompt the central bank to resume its rate increases in the future. There may also have been some disappointment because "It's not a sign that the Fed is going to be cutting rates anytime soon," says Drew Matus, senior economist at Lehman Bros.

Highlights:

Amazon.com jumped $4.05, or 12%, to $37.68. Late Tuesday, the online retailer reported better-than-expected third-quarter results and gave bullish guidance for the current period.

•Adobe Systems added 85 cents to $38.94. The software company boosted its fourth-quarter earnings guidance based on a gain from the recent sale of an equity investment.

•Altria rose $2.28 to $82.10. The cigarette giant posted a small drop in third-quarter profit and said its board would announce in January plans for a possible divestiture of Kraft Foods. Kraft fell 2 cents to $35.34.

•GateHouse Media closed at $21.17, up 18% from the $18 at which the newspaper publisher went public.

•Yankee Candle climbed $5.01, or 17%, to $33.73 on news Madison Dearborn Partners is buying the retailer for $34.75 a share, or $1.4 billion in cash.

•LifeCell plunged $8.02, or 25%, to $23.82. The maker of products from human tissue for use in surgeries said third-quarter profit more than doubled but lowered its 2006 outlook.

•DaimlerChrysler climbed $2.35 to $54.68. The automaker posted 37% lower third-quarter profit but still beat estimates (story, 3B). General Motors fell $1.48 to $34.71. It posted a smaller loss in the third quarter (story, 1B).

Stocks Rise On Fed News But Crude Curbs Gains (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

The stock market rallied on news that the Federal Reserve isn't raising rates but gains were held in check by a jump in crude-oil prices, which typically hurts stocks.

In its weekly report on U.S. stockpiles of various energy products like gasoline and heating oil, the Energy Department said crude storage was down nearly 1% to 332.3 million barrels for the period ended Friday, contrary to traders' expectations for a rise.

As a result, crude contracts for December delivery leapt $2.05, or 3.5%, to $61.40 a barrel. The rally pushed prices back into positive territory for the year, up 0.6% on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose 6.80 points, or 0.1%, to 12134.68, up 13.2% for the year. Among the blue-chip measure's 30 component companies, Exxon Mobil rallied 1.6% because of crude's run-up. But weak third-quarter results at both Boeing and General Motors pushed their shares down more than 3% each.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index gained 0.4%, or 4.84 points, to 1382.22, up 10.7% for the year. The technology-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index rose 0.5%, or 11.75 points, to 2356.59, up 6.9% for the year.

As expected, the Fed left its key rate target unchanged at 5.25%. In its statement, the Fed deleted its previous mention of energy prices and other commodities, which have generally fallen since policy makers met last month and identified them as a potential source of inflation. The Fed included a new sentence: "Going forward, the economy seems likely to expand at a moderate pace."

Elizabeth Weymouth, global investment specialist at J.P. Morgan Private Bank, said the statement supported the growing sentiment on Wall Street this week that a rate cut is unlikely in the near future. She said it also bolstered investment advice that her firm has been touting to clients this week -- that economic growth should remain strong enough into early 2007 to support strong profit growth at big-name U.S. companies.

DOJ_NMG_0086615

"We think this is a time for investors to add some risk to their portfolios," via stocks in the Russell 1000-stock index, said Ms. Weymouth.

In a recent report to clients, economists at Credit Suisse said the Fed is likely to maintain "a tightening bias" for some time. But that doesn't necessarily mean a rate boost is imminent, they said. Rather, central bankers could merely be discouraging traders from betting on a rate cut, or they could be leaving themselves leeway while they consider their next move, Credit Suisse economist Kathleen Stephansen said in an interview. "They may have some fine-tuning to do at some point, but you won't see a tightening cycle," including several increases in a row, she predicted.

In other news, sales of existing homes in the U.S. fell 1.9% in September. The median price of a single-family home slipped to $219,800, down 2.5% from a year ago, the biggest price drop on record, according to the National Association of Realtors.

In major U.S. market action:

Bond prices rose. The 10-year note gained 14/32 point, or $4.375 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.767%. The 30-year bond rose 28/32 to yield 4.888%.

The dollar weakened. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar fell to 119.02 yen, compared with 119.30 yen. The euro rose to $1.2610 from $1.2563.

Amtrak Careless In Managing Outside Counsel, Report Says (WSJ)

By Nathan Koppel And Ashby Jones

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

Amtrak has been careless in managing law firms that have billed it millions in legal fees, according to a report released Wednesday by federal investigators.

The report, issued jointly by Amtrak's Office of Inspector General and the U.S. Department of Transportation Inspector General, said that the law department of the passenger railroad, for example, failed consistently to request and manage budgets for legal work. Also, law firms engaged in "block billing," in which firms lump tasks under one entry of an invoice rather than showing the costs of each task. The practice is prohibited by Amtrak's billing guidelines, the report says.

MORE INFORMATION

1

Read the report2 on Amtrak's management of outside legal services. (Adobe Acrobat3 required.)

"About 30% of the billings were block billed, which is actually not allowed," says U.S. Rep. John Mica (R., Fla.), a member of the House Committee on Transportation and Infrastructure who requested the probe.

Amtrak, which is federally subsidized, has been struggling to reverse years of losses and has faced Bush administration calls to sharply reduce its long-distance train service.

A letter addressed to Rep. Mica and released Wednesday from the chairman of Amtrak's board, David Laney, said Amtrak reduced annual legal fees by 26%, or $8 million, since 2003, and in the past five years, working with outside law firms, recovered $79 million in cash from legal settlements. "Still … the report should provide us with valuable guidance as we continue to improve Law Department operations," the letter said.

From 2002 to 2005, according to the report, Amtrak paid more than $100 million in legal fees -- $40 million of which went to 10 firms, which are listed in the report. The firms with the highest billings were Landman Corsi Ballaine & Ford P.C. ($11.6 million); Manatt, Phelps & Phillips LLP ($7.4 million) and DLA Piper LLP ($4.1 million). The firms did not immediately respond to requests for comment. (See the full list of firms, at the Law Blog4.)

While finding fault with Amtrak, the report did not criticize law firms by name. But all of the firms listed failed to follow at least some of Amtrak's guidelines, according to John Toothman, a professional legal-fee auditor who was hired by Amtrak's Office of Inspector General to assist it in its investigation of billing practices.

Americans Expect Major Changes If Dems Win Nov. 7 (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, October 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0086616

WASHINGTON — Most Americans predict Democrats will win control of the House of Representatives in the elections Nov. 7, and they expect big things to follow — some good, some not — if Democrats take over the Senate, too, a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll shows.

If Democrats take over the House and Senate in January, more than 8 in 10 say, Congress would probably set a timetable to withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq, a step favored by nearly two-thirds.

Less popular: Nearly two-thirds expect a Democratic Congress would raise federal income taxes. Three-fourths disapprove of that.

Any such legislation would have to be signed by President Bush to take effect. Or Congress would need two-thirds majorities in both chambers to override any veto.

The survey of 1,002 adults Friday through Sunday underscores the high expectations and some trepidations around the prospect that Democrats could regain control of Congress for the first time since 1994. A 54% majority, including 1 in 4 Republicans, say a takeover of the House is likely.

If so, some analysts say, Democratic leaders would need to take care not to overreach.

"Key Democrats are acutely aware that when they got the White House in 1993, they went on a left-wing binge (with) Hillary's health care and … scared the devil out of the American people and caused them to lose their congressional majority" two years later, says former congressman Dick Armey, who became House majority leader when Republicans took over.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., in line to be the first female speaker if her party prevails, has outlined a plan for a Democratic-led House's first 100 hours. She promises Democrats would put in place rules to limit the influence of lobbyists, then enact all the recommendations made by the bipartisan commission that investigated the 9/11 attacks.

The next steps would be to raise the federal minimum wage to $7.25 an hour, cut the interest rate on student loans in half and lift a ban that has prevented the government from negotiating directly with pharmaceutical companies for lower drug prices for Medicare patients.

She also would face the pent-up demands of partisan Democrats. Michigan Rep. John Conyers, the senior Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, has called for impeachment hearings against the president, which Pelosi has ruled out.

Party identification shapes attitudes toward what a Democratic Congress would probably do, the poll shows.

Democrats were twice as likely as Republicans to say a new Congress would implement the 9/11 Commission's recommendations. They also were more likely to say a Democratic Congress would provide health care to all who lack it.

Republicans surveyed were twice as likely as Democrats to predict the new Congress would cut back on anti-terrorism efforts, raise taxes and take steps to make same-sex marriage legal.

Candidates Matter Some Places, But Not Everywhere (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, October 26, 2006

Two factors have come together to enhance Democratic prospects for a major House sweep — and neither one has much to do with the quality of Democratic recruiting in the two dozen or so top-tier Democratic House opportunities.

First, a handful of Republican House nominees with considerable political baggage have created competitive races for Democrats in places they couldn't have anticipated. And second, even relatively weak second- and third-tier Democratic candidates are in competitive races because of the developing political wave.

If the GOP loses seats in places such as Idaho's 1st district, Colorado's 5th and Michigan's 7th, you are going to hear plenty of complaining by moderate and establishment Republicans about the Club for Growth.

The club, which supports anti-tax conservatives, helped Bill Sali win the Republican nomination in Idaho, Doug Lamborn win in Colorado and Tim Walberg topple incumbent Rep. Joe Schwarz (R) in Michigan — each in a district that should not be competitive in a normal general election. But 2006 isn't a normal year, and while all three GOP nominees could well win in November, the contests aren't slam dunks.

Sali, who seems to take pride in not being a team player, may well lose some Republican votes to attorney Larry Grant (D). Colorado conservative Lamborn hasn't been endorsed by outgoing Rep. Joel Hefley (R), who believes that the Republican nominee ran such an unseemly primary campaign that he isn't backing Lamborn over Democrat Jay Fawcett. And in Michigan, Walberg angered some Republicans when he ran against a sitting Congressman, though he certainly should be able to beat Sharon Renier, a fourth-tier Democrat who had raised less than $40,000 through Oct. 18.

DOJ_NMG_0086617

Elsewhere, at least a couple of other Republicans who also should be headed for certain victory are suffering from self-inflicted wounds or serious political baggage.

In Florida's 13th district, Vern Buchanan, who made some enemies as a businessman and during the GOP Congressional primary, has yet to unify his party. And in Wyoming, the state's at-large Representative, Barbara Cubin, has done what she can to turn a laugher into a serious contest.

The "bigger candidate" problem for Republicans is that this cycle, candidate quality doesn't mean what it did in the past.

By traditional measures, Republicans have a long list of well-qualified, well-prepared Congressional candidates, many of them incumbents. Unfortunately for them, many voters don't seem to care much about credentials this year. They just want to send a message, and they don't care about the messenger as long as he or she has a "D" behind his or her name.

In 2002 and 2004, voters were concerned about terrorism and homeland security, and they seemed inclined to prefer political hopefuls with experience and proven accomplishments. Why take a chance on an amateur who had to make important decisions about the economy and the nation's security?

This year, many of the Democrats making a serious run at Republican incumbents and open seats never have held elective office and have no experience in a legislative body. By many measures, they are relatively weak.

Perhaps the starkest contrast in credentials can be seen in three GOP open seats in the Midwest — in Minnesota's 6th, Illinois' 6th and Wisconsin's 8th, where the three GOP nominees, Michele Bachmann, Peter Roskam and John Gard, are state legislators, while the Democrats in the three contests, Patty Wetterling, Tammy Duckworth and Steve Kagen, never have held elective office.

But that's just the tip of the iceberg. In California's 4th, Charlie Brown (D) is a 26-year veteran of the Air Force who served on the professional staff of the Roseville Police Department. His "elective" experience, according to his Web site, is limited to service chairing the "Supervisory Committee" of a credit union.

In California's 11th district, Democrat Jerry McNerney has been an engineer and energy consultant and is now CEO of a start-up company that manufactures wind turbines. In Washington's 8th district, Democratic nominee Darcy Burner was a former manager at Microsoft.

Heath Shuler (D) in North Carolina's 11th is a former football player and a real estate agent. Democrat Joe Donnelly, in Indiana's 2nd district, is an attorney and businessman who lost bids for the state Senate and for Congress; he never has held elective office. The same goes for businessman Jack Davis, the Democrat who's taking on GOP Rep. Tom Reynolds in New York's 26th district.

And I'm not done yet. Democrats Ellen Simon (Arizona's 1st), Charlie Stuart (Florida's 8th), Christine Jennings (Florida's 13th), Tim Walz (Minnesota's 1st), Victoria Wulsin (Ohio's 2nd), Lois Murphy (Pennsylvania's 6th), Joe Sestak (Pennsylvania's 7th), Patrick Murphy (Pennsylvania's 8th) and Chris Carney (Pennsylvania's 10th) also never have held elective office. There are others, but you get the drift.

I'm certainly not suggesting that all of these Democrats lack qualifications to be in Congress. Many current Members held no previous elective office, and a background in politics or government doesn't guarantee success in Congress. Obviously, businessmen, lawyers and community activists can be — and have been — successful in legislative bodies.

But it is remarkable how similar this group of Democratic candidates is to the GOP class of 1994, when, by my count, 37 freshmen were elected without having held a previous elective office.

Some of those Republicans, including now-Sens. John Ensign (Nev.) and Richard Burr (N.C.), Rep. Sue Kelly (N.Y.) and former Rep. George Nethercutt (Wash.), developed into respected, successful legislators. But others, including former Reps. Wes Cooley (Ore.), Enid Greene Waldholtz (Utah) and Steve Stockman (Texas), were disasters.

Every cycle is different. Often, voters are looking for candidates with legislative experience and who are Washington, D.C., savvy. This year, those assets appear to be liabilities. And that's another reason why Republicans are finding the going tougher than expected in House races.

DOJ_NMG_0086618

Democratic House Leader Under GOP Attack (FT)

By Holly Yeager In Washington

Financial Times, October 26, 2006

Republicans have found a strange new weapon as they fight to maintain control of Congress: Nancy Pelosi.

Mrs Pelosi, Democratic leader in the House of Representatives, is poised to become Speaker of the House – third in line for the presidency and the first woman to hold that post – if her party takes the majority in the midterm elections on November 7.

In the waning days of the campaign, Republicans have stepped up their attention to her, calling her a San Francisco liberal and warning about the wrong-headed policies of a "Perilous Pelosi Majority".

They have hammered away at what they say is her weak stance on security, highlighting comments she made last month that capturing Osama bin Laden would be "five years too late . . . even to capture him now I don't think makes us any safer".

Dick Cheney, the vice-president, told an interviewer that Mrs Pelosi "is not in sync with the vast majority of the American people", and represents "that side of the Democratic party that has not been supportive of and does not believe in a really robust, aggressive prosecution of the global war on terror".

Deborah Pryce, a Republican from Ohio embroiled in a tough re-election campaign, declared that a Democratic majority under Mrs Pelosi would "take us back to the failed economic policies of the past, including massive tax increases and wasteful government spending". A television advertisement for a Republican in Georgia declares that she will "reward illegal aliens with welfare, food-stamps, and free education".

Whether the Republican strategy will be effective is hard to gauge. A Newsweek poll this week found that 25 per cent had a favourable view of her and 26 per cent unfavourable. But another 26 per cent said they had never heard of her and 23 per cent were unsure.

Mrs Pelosi's office brushed aside the recent attacks. "Republicans' scare tactics and distortions are a sign of their desperation to keep their power," a spokeswoman said.

Elected to Congress in 1987, Ms Pelosi is the scion of a political family. Her father was a member of Congress and mayor of Baltimore, Maryland – a position also held by one of her brothers.

She has won high marks for keeping Democrats in line and is a frequent, and often harsh, critic of her Republican colleagues and the Bush White House. When reminded in a CBS interview this week that she had called Republicans "im-moral" and "corrupt", she replied: "Well, actually, when I called them those names, I was being gentle. There are much worse things I could've said about them." Despite that, she has vowed to return civility to the House, pledging to allow the minority party to offer amendments and participate in debates in ways that Republicans have not.

In the first 100 hours of a Democratic majority, she has vowed to rewrite House lobbying rules, increase the minimum wage, reduce interest rates on student loans, adopt the homeland security recommendations made by the bipartisan 9/11 Commission and give the government the power to negotiate with drugs companies for lower prices for the Medicare prescription drug programme.

And, despite pressure from some liberal activists, she has also ruled out the impeachment of President George W. Bush over Iraq. "Making them lame ducks is good enough for me."

Stakes Are High For Business Community In Nov. Elections (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, October 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — If Democrats pick up the 15 seats they need to gain a House majority on Nov. 7, liberal Charles Rangel of New York, an outspoken critic of President Bush's sweeping tax cuts, will chair the powerful Ways and Means Committee, overseeing taxes, trade and Social Security.

So it's no surprise that Republicans from Bush on down warn that a Democratic victory would spell higher taxes and slower growth. A six-seat swing in the Senate would give Democrats a majority there.

"The last time they (Democrats) had control of Congress, in 1993, they passed a massive tax increase. They'll do it again if they can," Vice President Cheney told a recent fundraiser for Rep. Barbara Cubin, R-Wyo., criticizing Rangel by name.

DOJ_NMG_0086619

While the war in Iraq, congressional page and influence-peddling scandals and parochial concerns have been top issues this campaign season, the election could have big implications for the business agenda — taxes, trade, regulation and spending — which has been set in recent years by a GOP White House and Congress.

Republicans, lagging in some key House and Senate races, are making the case that a Democratic victory would endanger economic gains. Voters don't seem to agree; USA TODAY/Gallup and other surveys show Americans by a wide margin trust Democrats more to manage the economy.

Nariman Behravesh, chief economist of Global Insight, says a return to divided government could improve the outlook by forcing the White House and Congress to compromise on such issues as immigration and reducing budget deficits. David Rosenberg of Merrill Lynch, however, advises his clients that "protectionist, pro-labor populist policies favoring the proletariat at the expense of the capitalist" are in store if Democrats win.

Rangel calls the White House rhetoric overblown, saying he has no plans to retroactively alter the Bush tax cuts and wants cooperation, not confrontation. A first move as chairman, he says, would be to seek a meeting with Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, former Clinton Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin and others to find common ground.

"The biggest mountain that I have to climb is getting credibility, getting something done in a bipartisan way," Rangel says, adding that "The atmosphere of cooperation to a large degree is going to be created by the president or not created by the president."

While trying not to be overconfident, House and Senate Democrats have laid out an agenda for their possible first days in power that includes: no congressional pay increases until the minimum wage is raised; ending some tax breaks for oil and gas firms; reopening the Medicare prescription drug law to negotiate lower prices with manufacturers; and offering college tuition tax breaks.

That differs from Bush's top priorities, which include extending individual and business tax cuts that expire in 2010 and pushing ahead on new trade deals. Bush has also said he would like to try again to create private accounts under Social Security.

"We have been able to do great things with our economy, despite some of the worst obstacles that we have ever faced," Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez said in an interview outlining the stakes of the election. "We need to recognize that and not change strategies … a change of strategy at this point would be a tax increase."

A Democratic victory in the Senate would give Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts the chairmanship of the Education and Labor Committee; Max Baucus of Montana, the Finance panel; and Chris Dodd of Connecticut could helm the Banking panel.

Respondents to an Oct. 6-8 USA TODAY/Gallup poll gave Democrats a 54% to 36% edge when asked which party could better handle the economy, and high marks on issues such as energy and health care. "Everything is going up but the wages," says Ellen Morel of Florida, a poll respondent who is supporting Democrats.

Still, some voters worry Democrats might not be up to the task, and Democrats acknowledge the numbers could erode before election day. An Oct. 20-22 USA TODAY/Gallup poll found 86% of voters would approve of Democratic efforts to raise the minimum wage, but only 23% would back an income tax increase. More than 60% expect Democrats to boost taxes.

"The first thing they (Democrats) will want to do is raise taxes," says Richard Bothwell of Longview, Texas, an independent. "I'm not saying Republicans have done a great job. … They've spent more, obviously. But you've got to consider they're fighting a war."

Michael Donohue of the National Federation of Independent Business, which represents small firms, predicts the most likely outcome of any regime change would be stalemate, as a lame-duck GOP president fights a more assertive Democratic party. Until July, when he vetoed legislation to expand federally supported stem cell research, Bush had never vetoed a bill.

To date, 69% of pharmaceutical and health care donations and 83% of oil and gas funds have gone to the GOP this election cycle, according to the non-profit Center for Responsive Politics. Insurance and banking interests are heavily supporting the GOP.

But Democrats, running about even with the GOP in the technology and securities industries, and ahead in the entertainment sector, say firms are hedging their bets.

DOJ_NMG_0086620

"As the potential chairman of the Financial Services Committee, I have picked up a lot of new friends without being any nicer," says Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass. "It started in the spring, but it's picked up. It's better than a Dale Carnegie course."

Democratic gains could reshape the agenda on a host of issues

Minimum wage

Senate Democrats, with a core group of Republicans, this year mustered more than a 50-vote majority for an up-or-down vote on raising the minimum wage, which has been $5.15 an hour since 1997. Still, they were shy of the 60 votes needed to limit debate and allow passage.

This fall, pressured from their own ranks, Republicans offered an alternative plan pairing a minimum wage increase to $7.25 an hour with a bill to eliminate estate taxes on estates of up to $5 million or $10 million for married couples and to liberalize taxes on larger estates. Most House Democrats opposed the bill, which died in the Senate, calling the tax provisions a poison pill.

"We would expect we'd present a vote to increase the minimum wage very early in the session. That's not a mystery to anybody," says Rep. George Miller, a California Democrat in line to become chairman of the House Committee on Education and the Workforce. "There are constraints, but we think there are huge opportunities … to get rid of some of the toxic poison in the system and reach across the aisle."

Current committee chairman Rep. Buck McKeon, R-Calif., says if his party retains power, future legislation would probably look like the previous minimum wage/estate tax package.

"We did vote to raise the minimum wage. … The feeling was that they (Democrats) would rather have the issue than to do the things that they talk about," McKeon says.

McKeon says Democratic colleagues pulled him aside before the House adjourned this fall, seeking favors for next year on the assumption they would continue in the minority. "Nothing is going to change," he says.

Trade

House Republicans last year extended the voting on the U.S.-Central American Free Trade Agreement (CAFTA) long after the standard 15 minutes had expired, twisting arms until they picked up enough GOP votes to eke out a 217-215 victory. Just 15 Democrats voted "yes" for the deal, which was opposed by labor unions.

Several trade votes are pending, including legislation to extend the administration's special authority to negotiate trade deals, as well as pacts with Peru, Malaysia and South Korea. Talks on a global trade deal are continuing.

"The trade environment is a difficult one, anyway," says Bill Miller of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. "Certainly, Republicans were the bulk of the votes in the House and the Senate to move the CAFTA bill."

Miller worries the election could result in punitive actions toward China, which has a huge trade surplus with the USA. Democrats and several Republicans want China to move faster on changing its currency policies. Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., who would become chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee, is one of those seeking action against China and other nations he accuses of manipulating their currencies.

Rangel says he's willing to work with the White House and Republicans on trade initiatives, but acknowledges it could be tough to bring Democrats along, given partisan tensions of recent years.

"Most of the new members on the committee, Democrats and Republicans, have never worked together," Rangel says.

Budget and taxes

Since the 2000 election, Bush has won a broad array of business and personal tax cuts. His victories on the economic front also include legislation to overhaul the private pension system, trade deals, an overhaul of bankruptcy laws and reduced business regulation. The White House says those policies have led to low unemployment, steady expansion and record corporate profits.

Democrats paint a less rosy picture, pointing out that inflation-adjusted wages have been stagnant, while long-term unemployment remains high. The federal budget has moved from a $236 billion surplus in fiscal 2000 to years of consecutive deficits, including a $250 billion shortfall in 2006. The non-partisan Congressional Budget Office has projected that the 2007 deficit will be $286 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0086621

Democrats have vowed to return to budget rules requiring new tax cuts or spending programs to be offset elsewhere in the budget. Rangel says he has no plans to go after the Bush tax cuts but warns that initiatives such as tax reform or eliminating the alternative minimum tax (which was designed to ensure the wealthy did not evade taxes, but is ensnaring middle-class taxpayers) have to be paid for.

"We did raise taxes on the wealthy (in the 1990s). … What happened as a result was the best economy in U.S. history. Democrats will not renew some of the tax cuts. … In some cases, we will provide more relief," says Frank, in line to chair the Financial Services Committee, which oversees banking.

Republicans say letting current tax cuts expire amounts to a tax increase.

House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, in a recent memo to Republicans, called the Democratic position on taxes the party's "biggest vulnerability" and said Republicans should "relentlessly hammer" at the issue.

"We must remind every American about the Democrats' tax hike agenda and its destructive consequences for our economy," Boehner said in the Oct. 16 memo.

Democrats could find it tough to live within their promised budget rules and fulfill their promises to increase funding for education, a technology initiative, select tax breaks and other proposals.

Other issues

Aside from the top priorities, Frank wants to get the government back into building affordable housing, based on a private/public model.

He would bring in Federal Reserve and World Bank officials for hearings on income inequality.

Other initiatives include energy legislation focused on conservation and alternative fuels, increased oversight of the Food and Drug Administration and Federal Communications Commission, and legislation to increase data privacy and mortgage lending.

Pharmaceutical companies are warning that Democratic plans to allow the government to negotiate prices under the Medicare drug plan would hurt the program.

"Price controls have never succeeded in keeping down costs or expanding access to needed medicines," the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers Association of America said this week.

Bush Calls Nov. 7 Referendum On Iraq, Taxes (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

President Bush yesterday staked the Republican agenda for the final two years of his administration to tax cuts and Iraq, saying next month's election is a referendum on both, and chided Democrats for "dancing in the end zone" to celebrate victory prematurely.

"The two issues I see in the campaign can be boiled down to who best to protect this country and who best to keep taxes low. That's what the referendum's about," Mr. Bush said at a morning press conference at the White House.

He said he also will push the unfinished business of his second term -- reforming Social Security, overhauling the tax code and pushing for a broad immigration bill -- and is "more likely to achieve those three objectives with a Republican-controlled Congress and a Republican-controlled Senate."

For a president who in 2003 famously said he doesn't read newspapers, Mr. Bush appears to have closely followed news reports this year and seemed amused at the amount of attention being paid to Democratic leaders who would hold top positions if power changed hands.

"We got some people dancing in the end zone here in Washington, D.C. They got them measuring their drapes," he said. "They're going over to the Capitol and saying, well, 'My new office looks beautiful. I think I'm going to have this size drape there or this color.' "

That was an apparent reference to House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, who could become the next speaker of the House, and who joked to the Associated Press recently that she could then have any office suite she wanted. Mr. Bush also seemed to take aim at Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat, who recently earned a cover story in Time magazine titled "Why Barack Obama could be the next president."

DOJ_NMG_0086622

"Magazines have got all kinds of new stars emerging when they haven't even won the votes yet," Mr. Bush said.

Mrs. Pelosi's office said Democrats are not overconfident.

"There's not a tape measure in sight," said spokeswoman Jennifer Crider. "We're not taking anything for granted."

She said this year's election for Democrats is a referendum on Iraq and the economy, but also on Mr. Bush's push to reform Social Security and on a broader quest for change at the top levels of government.

Democrats also tried to turned the tax attack back on Republicans, arguing that by leaving town without extending the college-tuition tax credit or sales-tax deductions the majority party has also fostered a tax increase.

Republicans had insisted on coupling those tax cuts with a broader package that included permanent elimination of the estate tax -- something Democrats refused to do.

Mr. Bush did little to dispel reports that he and his top advisers are confident about next month's outcome.

"We're organized," he said. "We've got a fantastic grass-roots organization to turn out the vote."

The president also said he does not resent those Republicans who are running by criticizing his Iraq policy, "nor am I resentful that a lot of Democrats are using my picture. All I ask is that they pick out a good one."

Wall Street Handicaps Stocks, Sectors As Voting Nears (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, October 26, 2006

NEW YORK — Democrats aren't big fans of Wal-Mart. Nor are they fond of Halliburton, due to the energy firm's activities in Iraq and ties to Vice President Cheney. Democrats aren't chummy with tobacco companies such as Altria, either.

That's why those companies' stocks might be hurt if Democrats sweep the upcoming midterm elections and seize control of the Senate and House of Representatives from Republicans, say UBS analysts in a report.

In every national election, there are winners and losers on Capitol Hill and Wall Street. The Nov. 7 congressional election is no exception. Wall Street analysts have been handicapping which stocks and industry sectors will go up and which will go down, depending on the outcome of the vote.

Ironically, even the scenario that will result in the biggest change — a Democratic sweep — is unlikely to result in the type of major policy changes that could seriously rattle financial markets, says Thomas Doerflinger, strategist at UBS.

The reason: If Democrats win, they will likely hold slim majorities and will avoid appearing too liberal to improve their chances of winning the presidential election in 2008, he adds.

What's more, “Faced with a Democratic majority in Congress, President Bush would utilize his veto pen a little more readily,” says Jerry Webman, chief economist at Oppenheimer Funds.

The likely result would be legislative “gridlock,” which historically has been bullish for stocks, notes Mark Riepe of the Schwab Center for Investment Research. His analysis of election years dating to 1953 shows that the average return of the Standard & Poor's 500 index was 14.1% per year in gridlock years, vs. a 10.4% gain when one party controlled the presidency and both chambers of Congress.

However, Riepe argues that elections have less impact on the stock market than people think. Politicians, he says, have little control over the key drivers of asset prices, such as interest rate policy, geopolitics and health of the economy.

Perhaps the biggest influence on stocks if Democrats win both chambers is the expected change in “tone” on Capitol Hill, UBS says. With Democrats likely to take control of influential committees, they will be able to shape the tenor of the political debate.

In a recent report, UBS said Democrats would likely exert pressure on Republicans by holding high-profile hearings on controversial topics, such as “global warming, Halliburton's activities in Iraq, Wal-Mart's employment practices and allegedly excessive pharmaceutical prices.”

If “government by subpoena” occurs, it would create “headline risk” for a number of key industries and companies, says Jason Cole, federal affairs manager at UBS.

DOJ_NMG_0086623

If the Democrats take over Congress, energy and health care stocks could be losers, given the possibility of new legislation to tax energy firms' "excess profits," and imposing "price controls" on health care, noted Schwab's director of sector analysis Brad Sorensen in a report titled "Do Elections Matter for the Market?"

On the flip side, if Republicans retain control of Congress, it boosts the chances that tax cuts set to expire in 2010 will be extended. That would be a plus for energy, technology, telecom and industrial companies, because it would make it easier for them to plan for the future, says Sorensen.

Another possible outcome is a split decision, with the Democrats taking the House but the Republicans hanging on to the Senate, says Joseph Quinlan, chief market strategist at Bank of America.

A wild card to how the U.S. market reacts once the polls close are foreign investors, Quinlan stresses.

A Democratic win, he says, could "unnerve foreign investors," who would likely view the results as a sign of growing U.S. protectionism and less support for globalization.

"None of this is supportive of the U.S. dollar and … U.S. securities," adds Quinlan. "Foreigners vote with their wallets. Given their hefty ownership of U.S. stocks and bonds," their vote counts.

Why Democrats Are Losing The Culture War (USAT)

By Amy Sullivan

USA Today, October 26, 2006

On the surface, solid majorities of Americans agree with Democratic Party values. They want universal health care, support increasing the minimum wage, believe stricter environmental regulations are needed and worth paying for, and think the best way to achieve peace is through diplomacy.

By contrast, only 12% say abortion and gay marriage are more important issues than poverty and universal health care, according to a recent survey by the Center for American Values in Public Life, a project funded by the liberal group People For the American Way. And a paltry 5% of Americans identified abortion and gay marriage as their top issues.

Based on these numbers, Democrats should be beating Republicans at the ballot box. But precisely the opposite has happened in the past few national elections.

One answer is that national security is still a major issue, generally favoring Republicans. But more important is the fact that abortion and gay marriage are proxies for deeply held cultural concerns. They tell voters something about the character of a candidate — or a party.

Most voters worry about escalating challenges to family stability and the losing battle to instill good values in their children instead of the materialism and coarseness peddled by popular culture. They fear that our society has developed a casualness about life, especially as science has made it easier to manipulate and create beings.

Banning gay marriage and outlawing abortion don't directly address those anxieties. But proposals like these at least acknowledge that the concerns exist and are valid. So while Republicans offer the wrong prescriptions, they get the diagnosis right. And they win because most of the time, Democrats won't admit that anything is wrong. In politics, as in most areas of life, something always beats nothing.

Despite the uproar over Janet Jackson's wardrobe malfunction a couple of years ago, most parents don't fret that the accidental sighting of a breast or hearing of a swear word will scar their children. They're more concerned about the unrealistic ideas kids get from popular culture about consumption and body image and violence as a way of handling conflict.

Sadly, too many liberals react to complaints about popular culture as if they're teenagers. They either jut out their chins and growl, "If you don't like it, don't watch it," or they stay silent for fear of looking like prudes. Given the ridicule that Tipper Gore faced for promoting warning labels for explicit music lyrics and the derision that followed Hillary Clinton's effort to keep violent video games away from kids, perhaps it's no surprise that most keep their mouths shut. That silence, however, hands conservatives a victory. As David Callahan points out in his book The Moral Center, "When the right complains about the media's descent into tawdriness, it puts them on the side of most Americans."

Even an issue on which Democrats seem to have the winning position can turn out to be a loser for the party in the long run. Most Americans now believe that research on stem cells should be allowed. But as Noam Scheiber recently pointed out in The New Republic magazine, the polls also suggest that they have serious concerns about the morality of unrestricted scientific research. They don't want to wake up tomorrow and discover that we're cloning humans without ever having a conversation as a society about the moral issues involved. By framing the debate as a choice between theology or science, Democrats essentially argued that anyone who has qualms about scientific progress is a troglodyte. That puts them on the losing side of the moral question, even as they win the specific policy debate.

DOJ_NMG_0086624

There's promising evidence, though, that this moral tone-deafness of Democrats may be about to change. Abortion, perhaps the most contentious moral issue of them all, is also the one area in which Democrats are poised to move past the political debate and address the real concerns of Americans. Over the past two years, a growing number of Democrats in the House and Senate have gotten behind "abortion reduction" efforts that seek to prevent unwanted pregnancies and provide support to women who want to carry their pregnancies to term.

This new approach reduces abortions without putting women in jeopardy or jail. The average American doesn't want to overturn Roe v. Wade or start locking up doctors. But neither does she buy the liberal line that 1.3 million abortions per year are just the price you pay for living in a free and modern society.

Democrats are right when they argue that their party's position on issues such as poverty, health care and job creation reflect a powerful moral value — helping those who have less. But they're wrong to think that's enough to win back the cultural voters they've lost.

Abortion and gay marriage — and the deep-seated cultural anxieties they represent — are threshold issues for voters. If a candidate can show he understands voters' concerns about the culture, then they'll listen to what else he has to say. If he tells them instead that there's nothing to worry about and tries to change the subject, they've already tuned out.

The good news for Democrats is that if the party can just get past the threshold, it stands a much better chance of connecting with voters who already agree with them on the pressing issues that should decide elections.

Amy Sullivan, a contributing editor for The Washington Monthly magazine, is writing a book about religion and the left.

Democrats Eyeing Upstate Races In Their Effort To Retake Congress (NYT)

By Raymond Hernandez

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

AUBURN, N.Y., Oct. 25 — Once pessimistic about making gains in the Republican bastion of upstate New York, Democrats have now made the region a focal point in their campaign to retake Congress, pouring money and troops into several districts where they believe the Republican incumbents are vulnerable.

With less than two weeks to go before the midterm election, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee is financing hard-hitting advertisements in three districts that criticize the Republicans for ethical lapses, supporting the war in Iraq and advancing President Bush's agenda. It has spent $2 million in races in the state so far.

There are also extensive get-out-the-vote campaigns being organized in at least four Republican-held districts, with Democratic challengers receiving heavy support from national and state party operatives, as well as legions of volunteers and workers from unions, third parties and liberal advocacy groups like MoveOn.org.

And former President Bill Clinton, who has campaigned relentlessly for Democratic candidates locked in tight races elsewhere in the country, is scheduled to swing through New York on Thursday, when he will headline airport rallies for three Democratic candidates from Albany to Syracuse.

Republican congressmen in the upstate region have long benefited from being in districts that have been drawn to tilt in their favor. But in recent weeks, several Republicans — including Rep. Thomas Reynolds from Erie County, the fourth-ranking Republican in the House of Representatives — have found themselves on the defensive largely because of Mr. Bush's continued unpopularity, grim reports out of Iraq and the disclosure of sexually explicit e-mail messages between a Republican lawmaker and young male Congressional pages.

More than that, even some Republicans privately acknowledge that the overwhelming leads held by Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, the Democratic candidate for governor, and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton may dampen spirits among Republican voters and boost Democratic turnout across the state.

DOJ_NMG_0086625

But while many Republicans say that they are worried about the political climate, they assert that the contests will be decided on local issues as well as on the personalities and reputation of the candidates.

The situation in New York appears to reflect a shift in the playing field that is occurring nationally as more once-safe Republican Congressional seats seem to be coming into play. The Democrats need to pick up 15 seats to regain control of the House. The new push upstate reflects a shift of expectations by the Democrats. As the fall campaign season opened six weeks ago, the Democrats had all but given up hope of scoring major gains in New York after having predicted in the spring that they could pick up as many as five seats there.

Now, with evidence of Democratic strength reflected in fund-raising and in internal polls, Democratic leaders in Washington say they see an opportunity to provide additional momentum to candidates in New York who had once been considered long shots.

"The national climate is seen more clearly in a state like New York where opportunities have increased as voters have made it more and more clear that they're sick of the status quo in Washington," said Bill Burton, a spokesman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

Kevin Madden, a Republican strategist in Washington who was involved in New York politics for years, dismissed Democratic efforts in New York as little more than a political ruse intended to create the impression that there are more seats in play than there are. He predicted that this strategy would backfire.

"It's not a particularly wise head-fake because Democrats will end up wasting resources in New York that they could have spent in competitive races in Pennsylvania and Ohio," he said. "Fundamentally, these races in New York are contests between individuals."

Democrats feel that their best opportunity for taking a Republican seat is the race for New York's 24th Congressional District, which cuts a U-shaped swath through central New York south of Syracuse. The race pits State Senator Raymond A. Meier, a Republican, against the Democrat, Michael A. Arcuri, the Oneida County district attorney, in a battle to succeed Representative Sherwood L. Boehlert, a moderate Republican who is retiring after 24 years in the House.

The contest is so fierce that the Democratic and Republican Congressional re-election committees have spent more than $2.4 million on advertising here. That is on top of the nearly $1.5 million that the Arcuri and Meier campaigns reported spending in their latest financial disclosure statements, at the end of September.

Another Republican incumbent who is high on the Democrats' list of targets is Mr. Reynolds, who is trailing his Democratic challenger, Jack Davis, in recent polls after facing questions about whether he responded vigorously enough after learning about e-mail exchanges between Representative Mark Foley, a Florida Republican, and a young Congressional page.

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee recently began running an advertisement that, while never mentioning the scandal directly, accuses Mr. Reynolds of "bad judgment" for his refusal to vote for bonus pay for troops while voting to increase his own pay in Congress. Republican strategists to the Reynolds campaign said the advertisement is false and meant to deflect attention from the weakness of the Democrats' own candidate in the race.

In three other New York races, Democrats say that their chances are less certain, but still believe they are within striking range if there is a powerful Democratic tide on Election Day.

The Republican incumbents who are targets in these races are John Randy Kuhl Jr., who faces a challenge from Eric Massa in the 29th Congressional District in the Southern Tier region of the state; James T. Walsh who is battling Dan Maffei in the 25th District in the Syracuse region; and John E. Sweeney who is in a race against Kirsten Gillibrand in the 20th District outside Albany.

Though the 24th has roughly 40,000 more registered Republicans than Democrats, experts say the race is a tossup. Mr. Arcuri, attempting to tap voter dismay with the direction of the country, wants to present himself as a "Boehlert moderate" on issues like the environment and someone who opposes many of the policies of President Bush and his conservative allies on Capitol Hill.

"He is extremely conservative," Mr. Arcuri said of Mr. Meier in a recent interview.

Mr. Meier is running as a results-oriented politician with a long record of delivering state aid for the district, a strategy on display the other day when he was honored at a senior citizen center in Kirkland for $50,000 he secured in Albany for the center.

DOJ_NMG_0086626

In an interview afterward, Mr. Meier acknowledged that it is a tough climate for Republicans, particularly given Mr. Bush's sagging approval ratings. But he argued that voters would ultimately judge him on his record. "People still view this as a local race," he said. "It's a choice between me and my opponent and not a referendum on anything else."

As for the renewed optimism Democrats have about their prospect in New York, perhaps the clearest example is the race in the neighboring district pitting Mr. Walsh, a Republican fixture in the Syracuse region, and Mr. Maffei, a former aide to Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan who is making his first run for public office.

Only a few weeks ago, Mr. Maffei was openly critical of party leaders in Washington for not investing enough money in his race. Now, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, closely eyeing his district, says it is set to spend tens of thousands of dollars on the race, and major party figures, including Mr. Spitzer and both Clintons, have been rushing to campaign with him.

Mike Whyland, a spokesman for Mr. Maffei, said he welcomed the support from Washington, though he added it would have been helpful if it had come earlier. "Why is the D.C.C.C. getting involved now?" he said. "They might have internal polling that shows what we already know — that this race is tight and getting tighter."

Liberalism's Limits In Kentucky (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

FLORENCE, Ky. -- Democratic candidate Ken Lucas looked like he would rather be any place other than Kentucky's public television studios Monday night as he debated freshman Republican Rep. Geoff Davis. A moderate conservative, Lucas was not going deep into the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) liberal playbook that is intended to nationalize midterm congressional elections.

Lucas had been coaxed out of political retirement at age 73 to run for the northern Kentucky congressional seat he held for three terms. That put Davis, a conservative 25 years Lucas's junior and highly regarded among House Republicans, on the endangered list, trailing in early polls. But Lucas showed Monday night that this has not been a happy campaign for him. While Democratic candidates nationwide pillory George W. Bush, Lucas did not mention the president's name and appeared uncomfortable with the DCCC attack litany.

Democrats must win seats such as this one to achieve a substantial working majority in the House. But Republicans have limited the election in Kentucky's 4th Congressional District to a "choice" between two candidates instead of a "referendum" on an unpopular Republican president and Congress. That demonstrates that the struggle for Congress is not really a national election but is about 50 hotly contested local ones.

Registered Democrats are still a majority in the 4th District, thanks to rural areas where voters maintain their ancestral political faith. But Cincinnati's burgeoning Kentucky suburbs are Catholic, Republican and conservative. They elected Republican Jim Bunning to six terms before he went to the Senate in 1998. Lucas, a popular local official, replaced him as one of the more conservative Democrats in the House -- with a 71 percent lifetime American Conservative Union (ACU) rating.

Lucas survived a surprisingly close call in 2002 against an underfunded Davis. Raised in Pittsburgh, Davis came to Kentucky in 1989 following graduation from West Point and 10 years as an Army officer. Lucas kept his pledge to leave after three terms, and Davis won in 2004 against radio personality Nick Clooney (father of actor George Clooney).

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, the celebrated DCCC chairman, scored a recruiting coup the next year by getting Lucas to run. Returning the 4th District to Democratic hands was part of a national grand design. The problem was fitting Lucas's square conservative peg into the liberal hole of the DCCC game plan.

Lucas tried in Monday night's debate. He taunted Davis for voting the Republican line 96 percent of the time as "a pawn of your party" and attacked "a culture of corruption" (while never mentioning the Mark Foley scandal). Lucas missed the party line on Iraq, asserting: "We must win the war in Iraq. We have no other choice." Commenting on North Korea's dictator Kim Jong Il, Lucas said: "He seems to be very popular with his people."

DOJ_NMG_0086627

Lucas in the debate twice derisively called attention to the use of big words by Davis. Indeed, Davis is a policy wonk, considered by colleagues on the conservative Republican Study Committee to be one of the best-informed members of Congress. As for being a pawn, Davis noted his opposition to President Bush's Social Security reform. But the ACU rated him at 88 percent, and he is a social conservative. Asked his views on abortion by a student at Pendleton County High School the day after the debate, Davis replied: "I'm 100 percent pro-life."

But Davis spends more time dispensing pork than preaching the conservative gospel. Traveling through nominally Democratic rural areas Tuesday, Davis stopped in Berry (population 310) for presentation of a $209,891 check from the federal government to establish broadband access there. The little town is 83 percent Democratic, but Davis figures to carry it. Gary Taylor, a local bank officer, told me he is a registered Democrat but is voting for Davis "because he has helped us, and we haven't heard from Ken Lucas."

With Kentucky returns coming early election night, the reports from the 4th District will be a harbinger. A victory by Lucas probably would be part of a Democratic wave and a Republican disaster. A win by Davis would entrench a Republican conservative in Congress far into the future. It would also mark the limits of nationalizing congressional elections.

A Hard Year To Be An Ohio Republican (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

One of an occasional series

COLUMBUS, Ohio -- Any other year, Rep. Deborah Pryce would have wrapped up her race for re-election months ago.

The fourth-ranking House Republican and self-proclaimed "moderate," Mrs. Pryce has cruised to victory in Ohio's 15th Congressional District the past six times with at least 60 percent of the vote, in a dead-heat district where President Bush and Sen. John Kerry just about split the vote in 2004.

But this year, with Mr. Bush sliding into disastrous levels in the polls and Republicans in Ohio imploding amid corruption charges and unpopular policies, she is struggling against a boilerplate Democratic candidate whose attacks are similar to those being used across the nation by Democratic challengers.

"This is a referendum on the policies of this current administration," says that candidate -- Mary Jo Kilroy, a Franklin County commissioner from the left wing of the Democratic Party.

Defining moment

The battle for control of the U.S. House runs right through the Midwest, with Democrats making a major bid for two or three Republican-held House seats each in Ohio, Kentucky and Indiana. That means the fate of Republicans' House majority should be clear soon after 7:30 p.m. on Nov. 7, the closing time for Ohio's polls, the latest of those three states.

It promises to be a watershed election for Ohio. If Democrats do well, it means this state is the ultimate swing state. But the elections will cement Ohio's Republican credentials if the Democrats fail to capture any of the major prizes.

Every statewide constitutional office here is held by Republicans as are both U.S. Senate seats and 12 of the 18 U.S. House seats. They include national party leaders Mrs. Pryce, the House Republican Conference chairman, and House Majority Leader John A. Boehner. Republicans also have sizable majorities in both state legislative chambers.

This year, though, Democrats expect major victories up and down the Ohio ballot, leading off with Ted Strickland, a Democratic congressman who is on the verge of trouncing Republican Ken Blackwell in the governor's race.

Democrat Sherrod Brown also holds a lead in the U.S. Senate race against incumbent Republican Sen. Mike DeWine -- one of the seven races likely to determine control of the Senate.

Mr. Brown has attacked the Republican for lost jobs in the state and for his support of the Iraq war in Washington. Mr. DeWine argues that the Democrat has little to show for his seven terms in Congress. A Mason-Dixon poll released Tuesday showed Mr. Brown with a lead of eight percentage points.

DOJ_NMG_0086628

All politics is local

Unlike other parts of the country, Republicans' problems in Ohio are not primarily the national mood or antipathy toward Mr. Bush, who polls above 40 percent in approval ratings, higher than his national average.

Instead, it is local -- a mixture of a faltering economy, state Republicans who pushed through huge tax increases, a school system that few voters seem pleased with, and Bob Taft, the departing Republican governor, who pleaded no contest last year to violating state ethics laws.

Adding to that, Rep. Bob Ney, a Republican, announced two months ago that he wouldn't seek re-election, forcing Republicans to scramble to fill his slot on the ballot. Then, two weeks ago, Ney pleaded guilty to corruption charges stemming from the investigation into lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

"It's a combination of the state and the national mood. We have had our troubles here in Ohio -- our governor's numbers are very low, we've had our own set of scandals, and the same is true in Washington, so you have a fairly soured public and Rahm Emanuel just saw opportunity here," Mrs. Pryce said, referring to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee chairman.

Still, those opportunities are less than they could have been.

Democrats had hoped to capture up to eight House seats here, but that list has been reduced. There are now three solid Democratic opportunities -- Mrs. Pryce's 15th district, Ney's 18th district and the 2nd Congressional District, where first-term Rep. Jean Schmidt won a special election last year.

They also have a longer shot at Rep. Steve Chabot, a Republican from Cincinnati.

Guilt by association

The race for Ney's seat is emblematic of Republican challenges.

The Democratic candidate, Zack Space, is running a clean-government campaign against national and state Republican leaders.

That worked well when his opponent was Ney, and he is trying to adapt it to new Republican candidate Joy Padgett, accusing her of having ties to corrupt figures.

"From convicted Ohio Governor Bob Taft, to disgraced Congressman Bob Ney, to House Speaker Dennis Hastert now under fire for 'Foleygate' -- or most recently Karl Rove, who has agreed to host a $5,000 per PAC fundraiser in Washington D.C. -- Padgett refuses to break her ties to corruption," Mr. Space said on the day Ney pleaded guilty.

This district is the most reliably Republican in the state, having delivered 57 percent of its vote in 2004 to Mr. Bush, and in any other year, Mrs. Padgett would have a built-in advantage over Mr. Space.

But Mrs. Padgett, a state senator, only started running after winning a special primary election after Ney gave up his bid in August. Her red campaign yard signs -- which repeat her last name three times -- seem to capture her biggest challenge: building up name recognition.

She said she doesn't see voters penalizing her for Mr. Taft or Mr. Bush, but stresses that she has voted against Mr. Taft in the legislature and will be willing to buck Mr. Bush in Congress.

"The president is president, he's got his role. I'm not in his administration. I will be in Congress," she told reporters after accepting the U.S. Chamber of Commerce endorsement two weeks ago.

The bigger issues

As for Ney, it's not clear how much of a drag he will be, especially because the charges play differently on the ground in Ohio than they do among the politicos in Washington.

Dr. John Antalis, an ophthalmologist in Cambridge who usually all but ignores politics, said he would probably have voted for Ney because someone he trusts vouches for Ney.

But Dr. Antalis, watching his son's football practice one afternoon, said he's so angry about the Iraq war that he won't support any Republicans who support Mr. Bush.

"I'm going to vote against Republicans until there's a change in the House, just because of that one issue," he said.

Democrats have several ace cards this year, including a statewide ballot question on raising the minimum wage that will energize key labor voters.

And Democrats here are still energized by the 2004 presidential election results, which many think were tinkered with by Mr. Blackwell, the secretary of state.

Ohio became the pivotal state in those elections, when Democratic candidate Mr. Kerry refused to concede the race on election night because of the slim margin here and rumors of voting irregularities. Democrats' fury settled on Mr. Blackwell, one of the nation's most prominent black Republicans, who they argue worked overtime to complicate voting in 2004.

Getting personal

In Mrs. Pryce's district, though, the race is just a verbal slug-fest of names and labels.

The most recent barb was Mrs. Kilroy's ads, run on Christian radio, accusing Mrs. Pryce of failing to do enough to investigate former Rep. Mark Foley, who resigned Sept. 29 amid charges that he had made inappropriate advances to teenagers who had been in the House page program.

Mrs. Pryce, who has called Mr. Foley a friend, said the charges did hurt her somewhat.

"We had a week of distraction. In close campaigns, you never need that. We had polling that showed it was significant," she said, although she said the debate two weeks ago helped to refocus the campaign.

Mrs. Kilroy's most consistent attack has been that Mrs. Pryce is "a right-wing apologist, and she's been serving a right-wing agenda" by supporting national Republicans on the war in Iraq, spending, tax cuts and Social Security reform.

For her part, Mrs. Pryce may be the only candidate anywhere -- Republican or Democrat -- eager to tie herself to Sen. Robert Menendez, the New Jersey Democrat who is reportedly under investigation for corruption.

Mrs. Pryce touted her work with him on health care legislation as an example of how she has bridged partisan divides.

She also puts herself in the camp of Sen. Joe Lieberman, the Connecticut Democrat who lost his party's primary this year and is running as an independent, and tries to turn that back on Mrs. Kilroy.

"Her wing of her party drove him out, threw him out," she said.

The two women clearly don't care much for each other, and the tone of the race is harsh. Mrs. Pryce even felt the need to apologize to her mother when the two met at the Columbus Metropolitan Club debate, which aired on WOSU radio and television.

"My mother's mad at me, but I had no choice," she said, adding that she had to respond in kind after liberal interest groups sponsored attack ads and phone-bank calls.

"As soon as we recover, we'll be back on the positive," she said, prompting Mrs. Kilroy to note that Mrs. Pryce is "going to have negative ads for a long time, then."

In Old Textile District, The Free-Trade Issue Dominates (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

KANNAPOLIS, N.C., Oct. 23 — It has been three years since the old brick textile mill here shut down, throwing 4,800 people out of work. Yet the mill, which once made pillowcases and closed in part because of competition from imports, casts a shadow over the heated race for Congress in this once booming industrial enclave of North Carolina.

As if by chance, though probably not, both candidates are linked to the old mill. Charles Cannon, legendary founder of the Cannon textile empire and grandfather of Representative Robin Hayes, the Republican incumbent, built it in the 1920's, and Mr. Hayes worked summers there as a youth.

Larry Kissell, his Democratic opponent, worked there for 27 years before becoming a high school teacher in 2001, when, he says, he saw "the handwriting on the wall" about its future. Now his campaign is organized around the threat of foreign competition and Mr. Hayes's tiebreaking vote last year for a trade accord with Central America.

"The No. 1 issue voters care about this year is jobs," Mr. Kissell said Monday as he campaigned door to door in a neighborhood near the rubble-strewn field where the Kannapolis mill once stood. "We have lost 10,000 jobs in the textile industry here in the last several years. Free trade has not been good for this district."

DOJ_NMG_0086630

By most accounts, Mr. Kissell has an uphill battle in trying to unseat Mr. Hayes, who has withstood challenges on the trade issue in the past. In 2001, he was put on the defensive for casting another tiebreaking vote for a trade measure, after a last-minute reversal accompanied by his weeping on the House floor.

But Mr. Kissell is one of a dozen Democratic candidates for the House, and a few for the Senate, who are making at least some headway in tapping voter anxiety about trade.

In Ohio, Senator Mike DeWine, a Republican in a race against Representative Sherrod Brown, is being hammered for his support of trade bills. In upstate New York, Representative Thomas M. Reynolds, chairman of the House Republicans' campaign committee, faces stiff opposition over the same issue.

If many pro-trade Republicans lose on Election Day, President Bush, who has had trouble winning approval of trade deals in the past, could face even tougher odds.

"If the Democrats do as well as it appears, you're going to see more resistance to trade agreements," said Mickey Kantor, a top trade negotiator under President Bill Clinton, who corralled a hundred or so Democrats for the trade deals of the 1990's.

By contrast, only a handful of Democrats voted for the deals negotiated by Mr. Bush, in an environment of Congressional economic populism that has led to other fights, including widespread criticism of China's economic practices and broad opposition to foreign purchases of American companies.

The antitrade climate has recently persuaded Republicans to avoid putting lawmakers like Mr. Hayes on the spot. In September, they pulled bills opening up trade with Vietnam, Peru and a number of poor countries. There is talk that especially if the Democrats win a majority in either chamber, Republicans may try to pass these bills in a lame-duck session before the new Congress arrives in January.

"At the very least, Democrats are going to demand new requirements on enforcement of labor, environmental and corruption problems with our trading partners," Mr. Kantor said. "I would welcome that."

Trade is not the only issue here in North Carolina's Eighth Congressional District, which spreads across the piedmont in the center of the state and encompasses old and new high-tech industries, farms, the prosperous banking corridors of Charlotte and people who work at Fort Bragg, where support for the Iraq war and for Republicans remains high.

Even some Democrats concede that Mr. Hayes has done well for many of his constituents, especially farmers and the defense industry. He also points with pride to his efforts in getting state and county financing for Castle & Cooke and the Dole Food Company to build a corporate research center on the site of the razed Kannapolis mill.

Further, his record on free trade is not easy to simplify. The Democratic campaign has focused on his last-minute decision to cast the deciding vote for the Central American Free Trade Agreement last year, when he yielded to blandishments from Republican leaders after vowing to vote no. Mr. Kissell says the vote was a "flip-flop" that broke faith with constituents, but Mr. Hayes argues that the late concessions he wrung from the Bush administration changed the nature of what he was voting for.

Among the promises, he says, was one that led to an agreement with China later in the year imposing American quotas on 36 types of textile imports. Another brought a clause in the Central America accord that requires that future clothing imports from Nicaragua include interior lining made in the remaining mills of his home state.

"I got commitments the length and breadth of which I had never seen for my district," Mr. Hayes said. "So it's not a flip-flop. I voted for a whole different piece of legislation than the one that had been discussed up to that point. It was a tremendous leap in the right direction for this district."

The congressman says his views on trade have evolved over the years from one of reflexive opposition to one of accepting some of the reality of global competition.

"When I first went to Congress," said Mr. Hayes, who is now concluding his fourth term, "my outlook was to vote no and stop these trade agreements. Well, obviously that wasn't working. Do you take something that's not working and hope for better results? I don't think so. Or do you slow down free trade and in the meantime bring additional opportunities to the district?"

To demonstrate, Mr. Hayes stumped the farm areas of his district on Monday with Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns to tell voters that the Central America agreement had cleared the way for more soybeans, cotton, hogs and chickens to be exported.

"It's awfully easy to denigrate free trade," Mr. Johanns told a farm group in Monroe, southeast of Kannapolis. "This agreement was very much in favor of the United States farmer."

DOJ_NMG_0086631

Though Mr. Kissell's chances may not be great, Democrats say he could pull an upset, given his creative insurgent tactics. He got a lot of publicity, for example, from a stunt selling gasoline at $1.22 a gallon to remind voters of the price when his opponent first took office eight years ago.

And when news reports showed that Mr. Kissell had $88.94 in his campaign account, compared with $1 million for Mr. Hayes, he merrily announced that he was sorry it was not zero. An additional $150,000 quickly came in, along with promises of help from two popular North Carolina Democrats, former Senator John Edwards and former Gov. Jim Hunt.

In interviews, both candidates said national issues like the scandals in Congress and the Iraq war were not foremost in the minds of constituents. Mr. Kissell treads lightly on the war, and also takes a hard-line stance on immigration, opposing legalized status for any illegal immigrants.

Mr. Hayes looks confident, a man who can draw on his family's role here. Traveling across the area in a pickup truck, he loves to point out landmarks: the hometown of the country singer Randy Travis, a friend's agricultural processing plant, a new titanium factory.

"Welcome to Oakboro, where they have the biggest Fourth of July parade in the district," he said as the place whizzed by. "There's Stanly High School, where we just stood up an R.O.T.C. unit the other day."

Asked about the mood of the district, he said with a smile, "Well, they like their congressman."

In the 19th century the piedmont was a place of farming, and in the 20th a place of manufacturing. In the 21st century, he said, it will retool to new industries and businesses.

The campaign against him, he said, is out of a Democratic playbook.

" 'You got to attack Hayes on trade,' " he said. " 'That's the way to get him.' Whoever the candidate is, they latch on to that.

"Meanwhile, we continue doing the same thing. We're here, we talk to them, we listen. They don't necessarily think you'll solve their problems, but they want to know you're interested."

Fed Up With Everybody (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

South Bend, Indiana

In the campaign headquarters of Representative Chris Chocola, a Republican running for re-election in Indiana's bellwether Second Congressional District, there is a large photo of Ronald Reagan on the wall, but no picture of President Bush.

Mr. Bush, once such an asset for Republican candidates, has become a potentially devastating liability for campaigns like Mr. Chocola's.

"He's not as popular as he was," the congressman said in an interview, "but I would say he's still respected."

Mr. Chocola is in big political trouble and he knows that President Bush is much more the cause than the solution. Any mention of the Bush administration tends to turn local Republicans as chilly as the dusting of lake-effect snow that fell over South Bend the other night.

Lucy McKee, a 40-year-old part-time supermarket clerk, told me, "I voted for Bush twice. Now I just want him gone."

Mr. Bush has come into this northern Indiana district to raise money for the Chocola campaign but he has not been asked to appear with the congressman publicly to rally the dispirited troops.

"I don't know that it would help me," said Mr. Chocola. He candidly acknowledged that being seen as aligned with Mr. Bush "is not as much of a positive as it used to be."

With control of the House at stake, the G.O.P. can hardly afford to lose Mr. Chocola's seat. Two years ago he defeated his Democratic opponent, Joe Donnelly, by roughly nine percentage points. Mr. Donnelly is his opponent again this year, and a recent public poll showed him leading Mr. Chocola by about five points. Mr. Chocola said his own internal polls showed the race as a dead heat.

Democrats seem confident they will win control of the House on Nov. 7, and Mr. Chocola is not convinced they are wrong. "If you listen to the news every night," he said, "it would be hard to say that's not possible."

DOJ_NMG_0086632

His district, which has been hurt by the downturn in the auto industry, is more of a bellwether than most. “If I win,” said Mr. Chocola, “then I think there is a reasonable chance we will hold the House. If I don’t, I think there’s a reasonable chance we won’t.”

To win, Mr. Chocola and the G.O.P. will have to deal with the unhappiness of voters like Ms. McKee and like Jeri Niazi, a 60-year-old South Bend resident who works as a security monitor at the University of Notre Dame and describes herself as a “lifelong registered Republican.”

“What’s happening now is frightening to me,” she said. “The war. The deficit. The cronyism. I’m the kind of Republican who signed on for balanced budgets, minimal government and letting people go about their lives. I feel like somebody has thrown away that playbook.”

Ms. Niazi said she is pro-business but she “never dreamed” that corporate interests would achieve the kind of overwhelming and corrosive influence on the federal government that they have under President Bush.

“They are cleaning up,” she said, “while people here are having a tough time making ends meet.”

The overwhelming sense I took away from interviews with voters in and around South Bend was a feeling of disillusionment with government. Republicans and Democrats spoke sourly about the Bush administration, but no one expected dramatic changes if the Democrats gained control of one or both houses of Congress. “People say the Democrats are weak, and frankly, I think they are,” said Vernon DeWitt, who recently moved to Mishawaka from St. Louis. “I’m fed up with everybody.”

The big issue here, as in most of the country, is Iraq, which will have claimed close to 3,000 American lives by the end of this year, and which has lasted almost as long as the U.S. involvement in World War II.

“The war creates stress on the electorate,” said Congressman Chocola. “I think it wears people’s patience. They don’t see a clear light at the end of the tunnel. They see every night on the news the bad things going on, and they almost never see any of the good things going on.”

It’s understood that this is a very tough political environment for Republicans. People want change. But the lack of great enthusiasm for the Democrats is an indication that the system itself is not working well, and that would be a problem more serious than even Iraq.

There are only two major parties. Where do troubled voters turn if the country is in a serious fix and neither party is seen as having an adequate solution?

Schumer Upbeat On Democrats' Senate Odds (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

Sen. Charles E. Schumer, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, says he is just as surprised as anyone that Democrats have a legitimate shot at taking control of the Senate in the November election.

"Here we are, two weeks from Election Day, in a position we'd never thought we'd be in," the New York Democrat said yesterday during a National Press Club appearance with his Republican counterpart, North Carolina Sen. Elizabeth Dole.

"In 2005, most people were predicting we'd be lucky just to keep our 45 [seats]," Mr. Schumer said. "And now, I'd be disappointed if we just hold."

Mrs. Dole, chairwoman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee, acknowledged the negative draw President Bush's Iraq policy is having on her party's candidates, but she asked what leaving Iraq now would accomplish and questioned the national security credentials of Democrats.

"If Democrats were to take over the Senate, you're going to see a weaker security situation," she said.

Mr. Schumer brushed off the national security criticism, saying Republicans were resorting to name-calling out of desperation.

"The Republican candidates have nowhere to run," he joked. "It's as if they are in a small room where all the exit doors are locked."

Mrs. Dole said her party's weak showing in pre-election polls was the typical byproduct of an incumbent presidency.

"A midterm is always tough," she said. "The incumbent party almost always loses a significant number of seats."

DOJ_NMG_0086633

That trend was bucked by Democrats in 1998 and Republicans in 2002.

With Democrats targeting seven Republican incumbents, polling data suggests it is most likely that races in Virginia, Tennessee and Missouri will determine who controls the Senate. Most polls also show the Democrats leading in the Republican-held states of Montana, Ohio, Rhode Island and Pennsylvania.

Nonetheless, Mrs. Dole said that Republicans have a $14 million cash-on-hand fundraising advantage in those states and that Democrats must defend a few seats of their own in Maryland and New Jersey.

"I'm sure they never imagined they would be fighting to retain seats like these," she said. "We'll continue to fight for all of our incumbents."

Since 2002, Republicans have enjoyed a significant advantage in voter turnout, thanks to what party activists call the "72-hour strategy."

"We know that the Republicans have a very good turnout machine," Mr. Schumer said.

He said, however, that in addition to a more favorable political climate, Democrats have been upgrading their turnout plans.

"The gap is going to be considerably less," he said. "People are more open to the Democratic message."

This year, the DSCC has broken its annual fundraising losing streak to the NRSC, according to campaign-finance records.

Mr. Schumer said that's because voter trends are working in his party's favor.

"We're in a much stronger position heading into November than we thought we'd be," he said. Still, he was quick to add, "It's not a done deal. No one on our side is breaking out the champagne."

In Tight Race, Ad On Black Candidate Stirs Furor (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

KNOXVILLE, Tenn., Oct. 25 — The Tennessee Senate race, one of the most competitive and potentially decisive battles of the midterm election, became even more unpredictable this week after a furor over a Republican television commercial that stood out even in a year of negative advertising.

The commercial, financed by the Republican National Committee, was aimed at Representative Harold E. Ford Jr., the black Democrat from Memphis whose campaign for the Senate this year has kept the Republicans on the defensive in a state where they never expected to have trouble holding the seat.

The spot, which was first broadcast last week and was disappearing from the air on Wednesday, featured a series of people in mock man-on-the street interviews talking sarcastically about Mr. Ford and his stands on issues including the estate tax and national security.

The controversy erupted over one of the people featured: an attractive white woman, bare-shouldered, who declares that she met Mr. Ford at a “Playboy party,” and closes the commercial by looking into the camera and saying, with a wink, “Harold, call me.”

A spokeswoman for Mr. Ford, who is single, said he was one of 3,000 people who attended a Playboy party at the Super Bowl last year in Jacksonville, Fla.

Critics asserted that the advertisement was a clear effort to play to racial stereotypes and fears, essentially, playing the race card in an election where Mr. Ford is trying to break a century of history and become the first black senator from the South since Reconstruction.

Hilary Shelton, director of the N.A.A.C.P.’s Washington bureau, said the spot took aim at the sensitivities many Americans still have about interracial dating.

John Geer, a professor at Vanderbilt University and a specialist in political advertising, said that it “is playing to a lot of fears” and “frankly makes the Willie Horton ad look like child’s play.”

Professor Geer was alluding to the case of a convicted black murderer used in Republican commercials contending that the 1988 Democratic nominee for president, Michael S. Dukakis, was soft on crime.

DOJ_NMG_0086634

Mr. Ford has been campaigning as an independent, new generation Democrat dedicated to changing the atmosphere in Washington; to putting more attention on the needs of the middle class and on bread and butter issues like health care and to bringing a fresh approach to the war in Iraq. He has strongly resisted Republican efforts to pigeonhole him as a liberal.

Bob Corker, the Republican candidate, offers himself as committed to Tennessee values, with a track record in business and public life of solving problems, in contrast to what he asserts is Mr. Ford's "total life experience" in Washington politics and serving the Ford political dynasty in Memphis.

The debate over the spot was more impassioned on the campaign trail Wednesday, when Mr. Ford and his allies took their bus across a wide swath of eastern and middle Tennessee, campaigning in small towns and courthouse squares.

Representative Lincoln Davis, the conservative Democrat from the heavily rural district in the state's midsection, introduced Mr. Ford at a rally in Crossville with a fierce attack on the advertisement.

"I'm ashamed at what I see Republicans putting out today," Mr. Davis declared, as an overwhelmingly white audience of more than a hundred cheered on the small town square. "You tell Karl Rove that we don't want this stuff on TV in Tennessee. We don't want our kids seeing that."

Mr. Ford told his audience here, and elsewhere in recent days, that the attacks were simply a sign of desperation, a sign the Republicans have nothing else to say. He added, "You know your opponent is scared when his main opposition against you is, 'My opponent likes girls.' " The audience erupted in laughter.

"You know it's a big problem if at the end of a race, if the best they can come up with is this sleaze they're putting up," he said.

In an interview, Mr. Ford demurred when asked if he thought the advertisement was injecting race into the campaign. "You need to ask those people over there what they tried to do with that ad," he said. "It's tasteless, but I've come to expect that from my opponent."

Mr. Corker, a former mayor of Chattanooga, quickly tried to distance his campaign from the advertisement. The Corker campaign had been claiming momentum in recent days, citing a flurry of recent polls indicating the Republican had regained a slight lead after steadying its message and its campaign organization.

A spokesman for the Corker campaign, Todd Womack, said the campaign was pleased that the spot had been taken off the air. "It was tacky, over the top," Mr. Womack said. "Tennesseans deserve better."

The spot was paid for by the Republican National Committee but was produced by an independent expenditure group that is supposed to have an arm's length relationship with the actual campaigns. As a result, Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee, said he did not see the spot before it was broadcast and did not have the power to order it removed.

Even so, Mr. Mehlman said he did not see a racial subtext to the ad. "I will tell you that when I looked at the ad, that was not my reaction," he said. "I hear and respect people who had a different reaction, and I hope they respect me, too."

Moreover, Republican spokesmen said they did not believe the advertisement had been taken off the air in response to the controversy, but had simply, in the words of one, "run its course."

The furor puts Mr. Mehlman in a difficult position. He has spent considerable time as the national chairman preaching the inclusiveness of the Republican Party and its openness to black candidates and black voters. He said in an interview Wednesday night that he did not believe that this would damage his Republican outreach efforts.

Officials with the Republican independent expenditure committee, who include longtime allies of the Bush political circle, did not respond to requests for comment.

The Senate race here is one of three, along with Missouri and Virginia, that are pivotal to control of the Senate, and all three are considered neck-and-neck. Mr. Ford and Mr. Corker are seeking the seat left vacant by the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist, who is retiring.

A Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg poll published this week showed Mr. Corker leading Mr. Ford, 49 percent to 44 percent. The poll was conducted last Friday through Monday, and had a margin of sampling error of plus or minus four percentage points.

DOJ_NMG_0086635

If he wins, the campaign Mr. Ford has been running here will be considered a roadmap for Democrats in conservative and rural areas. Mr. Davis invariably introduced him this week as a man who would never "take away your Bible or your gun," but would raise the minimum wage so people could afford them.

With just 13 days to go, Mr. Ford is generating an intense response on the campaign trail as elderly white women reach for his hand and tell him they are praying for him, and he is swamped by autograph hunters and picture takers.

At one point, Mr. Davis's eyes welled up as Mr. Ford worked his way through a crowd — largely friendly, although not entirely so — at a heavily Republican barbecue. "You're watching history," Mr. Davis said.

Mr. Ford said later that he was not thinking history. "I'm trying to win a race," he said, before he jumped into his bus, whose destination sign read, "success express."

Contentious Race Republicans' Hold On The South Gets Test In Tennessee (WSJ)

By Corey Dade And Nikhil Deogun

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

KNOXVILLE, Tenn. -- Race has long been a deciding factor in Southern politics, helping determine who is picked to represent the region in Washington. Now, parts of the upper South -- including Tennessee, Virginia and North Carolina -- are attracting significant numbers of people from other parts of the country who aren't steeped in the region's traditions but are drawn to good jobs, lower taxes, top-notch universities and affordable real estate.

This migratory shift is scrambling the region's electoral politics. It is raising Democratic hopes that some parts of the South may no longer be as monolithic in their support of the Republican Party and may be more accepting of African-American candidates.

That helps explain why Harold Ford Jr., a 36-year-old congressman and scion of a famed African-American political dynasty, is in a statistical dead heat with his Republican opponent in the race for the U.S. Senate seat being vacated by Majority Leader Bill Frist. If Mr. Ford wins, he will become the first black senator from the South since Reconstruction. One major factor may be an unheralded demographic shift.

Over lunch at The Tomato Head restaurant, local attorney Bert Ritchie, a 67-year-old who moved here from Chicago five years ago and voted twice for George W. Bush, says he plans to vote for Mr. Ford because he thinks Republicans "abused their ascendancy a little bit." His lunch-mate, Mark Heinz, is agonizing over his own decision. After voting for Mr. Ford's opponent, Bob Corker, in the Republican primary in August, Mr. Heinz, a 37-year-old Philadelphia native, is having second thoughts.

Messrs. Heinz and Ritchie, who are both white, say race isn't a factor, in part because they hail from cities that have had black mayors. "When I came here for college in 1988 I was really shocked at how racially divided it was," says Mr. Heinz, who attended the University of Tennessee. "But I think in the last 15 years or so, with transplants coming in, people are becoming more accepting."

Tennessee has the 16th-largest population among U.S. states but posted the 10th-fastest growth rate from 2004 to 2005. The percentage of native Tennesseans has dipped to 62%, down from 70% in 1990, according to the U.S. Census Bureau.

Virginia and Tennessee are in "the midst of a non-Southern demographic makeover," says William Frey, a demographer at the Brookings Institution. Last year, the population of Tennessee included almost 20% who were born outside the South, versus 13.5% in 1990. "The tipping point may not be there yet in terms of making [Tennessee] from a red state to a blue state but it's moving in that direction."

WHAT THE SENATE POLLS SAY

1 • See a graphic2 of how the balance of power in the Senate will shift after the 2006 election, if the results of current polls are borne out on Nov. 7.

• Graphic: The Senate's Uncertain Seats3

• Charts: African Americans in Congress

The Tennessee race is considered an important test of how strong the Republican hold is on the South. In recent weeks, the campaign has become increasingly bitter as Democrats accuse Republicans of injecting race into a campaign that had been largely free of it. They allege that frequent references in campaign commercials to the Memphis political dynasty from which Mr. Ford hails and to his dating life are designed to play on racial fears.

DOJ_NMG_0086636

Republicans deny the charge. "I've been doing this since 1974 and I've never gone there," says Tom Ingram, Mr. Corker's campaign manager.

How Mr. Ford does may well decide the fate of the Senate -- and it also may signal how seriously to take the prospect of Sen. Barack Obama, the Illinois Democrat, as a viable presidential candidate.

"This becomes an indicator of how feasible it is for an African-American politician, or a Latino politician, to think in terms of appealing to a broader constituency," says Bruce Oppenheimer, a political science professor at Vanderbilt University in Nashville.

Signs of Acceptance

There are already signs of such acceptance. In Georgia, the attorney general for the past nine years has been a black Democrat, as is the labor commissioner. That state also elected a black Supreme Court chief justice. The northeast corner of Tennessee, known as Tri-Cities (for Kingsport, Bristol and Johnson City), is the archetypical GOP stronghold and 96% white, but its state representative is an African-American Democrat who is so popular that he faces no Republican opposition in November.

As more people move from elsewhere to Tennessee, "it has leavened and hybridized the society here," making a candidate's background less important, says Gov. Phil Bredesen, who grew up in upstate New York and graduated from Harvard University before moving to Tennessee in 1975.

In his earlier runs for office, a major hurdle was "being born and brought up on the wrong side of the Mason-Dixon Line," says Mr. Bredesen, a Democrat. This year, he is expected to cruise to re-election, and while "there are still people who won't vote for me because I'm a Yankee, and I'm sure there are people who would not vote for Ford because he is an African-American...it's not been an overwhelming issue."

Nowhere is the shift in population more visible than in Nashville, both the geographic and political center of the state. Wedged between the pillars of liberal, majority-black Memphis in the west and conservative, predominantly white Knoxville in the east, the capital city and its suburbs are experiencing the sort of dynamic change that transformed other southern cities, such as Atlanta and Charlotte, N.C. Loft apartments are being erected and trendy bars hum with activity. At Radius10, a new restaurant overlooking downtown, a customer favorite is the $18 foie gras appetizer.

In the 1980s and 1990s, Southern states became a magnet for auto companies and other manufacturers looking to set up plants in right-to-work states. Tennessee was among the first to benefit from this shift, when Nissan Motor Co. in 1981 opened a plant in Smyrna, Tenn. Today, the auto industry employs nearly 127,000 people in Tennessee. Workers at the area auto plants who followed their companies from Michigan and elsewhere in the Midwest fill the Gaylord Entertainment Center when the Nashville Predators hockey team hosts the Detroit Red Wings. Disapproving locals nicknamed those with divided loyalties "PredWings" fans.

These days, the city is benefiting from an influx of white-collar jobs. Nine company headquarters, bringing 4,635 jobs, have moved here in four years.

The latest is Nissan, which has relocated its North American headquarters from California to the Nashville area, bringing with it about 500 white-collar employees. The company has since added hundreds more employees. Until it builds its new headquarters in Franklin, Tenn., the company's temporary head office is in downtown Nashville in the BellSouth tower, a building affectionately called the "Bat" tower because of two giant spires that rise from the top of the structure in a shape resembling the cowl worn by Batman.

While it's impossible to know the politics of the new transplants, a number of them eagerly shook hands with Mr. Ford one day last month as they filed into work, with several of the women taking pictures on their cellphones and gushing about his good looks. (A bachelor, he was named a few years ago as one of People magazine's 50 most beautiful people.)

Mr. Ford, who was educated in a Washington prep school while his father served in Congress, is particularly adept at appealing to his liberal base while reaching out to conservative voters. He is a frequent guest on Fox News and Don Imus's television and syndicated radio show. He speaks often about loving Jesus and highlights his conservative position on some social issues -- such as banning gay marriage and supporting a constitutional amendment to outlaw flag-burning.

DOJ_NMG_0086637

At a two-hour prayer breakfast last week at the Hilton hotel in downtown Nashville, Mr. Ford basked in the adulation as preacher after preacher exhorted the mostly African-American audience to vote for him.

An hour later, Mr. Ford was in front of a totally different audience: the Tennessee Sheriffs' Association. With the exception of a couple of black sheriffs, the audience was all white males, mostly middle-aged or older. Mr. Ford told his life story, frequently highlighting his conservative credentials, such as how he voted for the toughest anti-immigration measure brought before the House.

Sheriff Terry Ashe, of Lebanon, Tenn., later said he plans to support Mr. Ford because he believes it's important to have someone with Washington experience dealing with Iraq and other major issues. "He won't have a learning curve -- just give him a Snickers bar and a Coke, and he'll be at work tomorrow," said Sheriff Ashe, who voted for Presidents Reagan and Clinton.

Race, said Sheriff Ashe, who is white, is "a quiet issue" that could determine the election. "I just hope Tennessee has moved beyond those days."

Mr. Ford was happy with the reception he got from the sheriffs. "The perception that there are people here who wouldn't vote for me because of who I am -- I've never accepted that," Mr. Ford said in an interview after meeting with them. "I'm trying to win every county in the state. Take a look at those sheriffs. I think if they don't vote for us, I think they'll at least think long and hard and listen closely to the issues."

Unlike some African-American politicians, Mr. Ford rarely brings up race or talks about issues long championed by black politicians, such as affirmative action. "I don't focus" on race, he says. "I do know that on Saturday when we play Alabama and Erik Ainge throws that first pass, as long as the guy is wearing an orange jersey we won't care what color the guy is underneath the jersey," he adds, referring to the University of Tennessee quarterback, who is white. "When I get to the Senate, they'll introduce me as the senator from Tennessee and my job is to represent Tennesseans."

Indeed, some whites say they haven't voted for black candidates in past statewide contests because they weren't strong candidates or their positions on issues didn't align with their own. One reason Mr. Ford is attracting wide support, they say, is because he is moderate on social issues and has shown a willingness to challenge his own party.

By one demographic factor, Mr. Ford should be far behind in the polls. Tennessee has one of the lowest African-American populations in the South -- about 16%. Logically, that should put African-American candidates at a disadvantage for statewide office because they can't count on a massive bloc of votes to give them a head start in a statewide election. But political scientists say the reverse may be true: In states with smaller black populations, whites don't feel as threatened and the state isn't as polarized. For instance, African-Americans make up a very high percentage of Mississippi and Alabama -- 36.5% and 26%, respectively -- and black voters tend to vote Democrat while white voters go for Republicans. The "blacker" the state, the larger President Bush's margin of victory in 2004.

The Real Test

The real test will come on Nov. 7. Polls have often shown African-American candidates scoring well in the polls only to fail to clinch the election. In 1990, former Atlanta Mayor Andrew Young drew wide support from white business leaders in his run for Georgia governor but lost in the Democratic primary. The same year, former Charlotte Mayor Harvey Gantt challenged Sen. Jesse Helms -- one of the South's most vocal opponents of racial integration and Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. in the 1960s -- and was well ahead in the polls but nevertheless lost. Even former Virginia Gov. L. Douglas Wilder, who is the only black elected to a governorship in the U.S., won in 1989 by a much narrower margin -- half a percentage point -- than the 10% indicated in exit polls.

Some political scientists and strategists refer to it as the "15% lie" -- when whites, bowing to societal pressure, tell pollsters they intend to vote for a black candidate but fail to do so in the voting booths. Indeed, several political experts believe that despite Mr. Ford's strong showing in the polls, some whites may desert him at the last minute. "We'll get the non-surprise surprise when Ford doesn't get the vote," says Thomas F. Schaller, an associate professor of political science at the University of Maryland and author of a new book, "Whistling Past Dixie," which argues that most of the South is beyond Democrats' reach.

While race has been largely absent from the campaign, that's changed of late. A group called Tennesseans for Truth aired a radio ad in the town of Gallatin, which said that Mr. Ford and the other members of the Congressional Black Caucus "represent the interests of black people above all others" and secretly submit an annual federal budget "to fund aid to black Americans. Discrimination at its worst," the narrator says.

DOJ_NMG_0086638

The Ford campaign contacted the Corker camp and urged the campaign to denounce the ad. Mr. Corker did so and asked the radio station to discontinue the ad.

Just yesterday, after mounting criticism, including from Mr. Corker himself, the Republican National Committee said that it will no longer run a television ad featuring a blonde woman baring her shoulders and saying, "I met Harold at a Playboy party." Democrats complained the ad was meant to invoke old taboos about interracial relationships. Mr. Ford has acknowledged attending a party sponsored by Playboy at the Super Bowl last year, telling reporters, "I like football and I like girls." The National Republican Senatorial Committee, meanwhile, has a Web site, www.fancyford.com4, which chronicles what it calls Mr. Ford's lavish lifestyle.

Another flashpoint has been references made by the Corker campaign and Republican groups to Mr. Ford's family, which helped run Memphis's political machine. Mr. Ford's father was acquitted of federal bank fraud, an uncle has been indicted for allegedly taking bribes -- charges he denies -- and an aunt's election to the state legislature was declared invalid after voting irregularities. "It's not personal about the members of the family. It's an issue about power and political greed and issues that everybody in the state is familiar with," says Mr. Ingram, from the Corker campaign.

Democrats worry that the Republican ad blitz will keep white voters away. Nathan Vaughn, the black Democrat who represents the conservative and overwhelmingly white Tri-Cities area in the state legislature and is campaigning for Mr. Ford, says he has received "good feedback" about the congressman's candidacy. "He's an intellect...but you have these campaign handlers who are basically throwing bombs into the crowd with these stereotypical terms like 'slick.' If you do that enough, people will think it's true if they don't hear anything to the contrary."

Ford Foundation (WSJ)

By Kimberley A. Strassel

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

KNOXVILLE, Tenn. -- If Bob Corker's campaign has a favorite phrase these days, it's "clear choice." Warming up for a press conference, the Republican Senate candidate tells reporters that this race offers a "clear choice" between himself and Rep. Harold Ford, Jr., his Democratic opponent. Lamar Alexander shows up to note "a real choice" come November. "Yes," says Mr. Corker. "I would like to emphasize that there is a clear choice . . ."

Mr. Corker is clearly hoping that if he says it enough, voters might start to believe him. They haven't so far, which explains why Mr. Ford has the Republican Party worried. A year ago, nobody would have given the 36-year-old Democrat a chance. The South isn't exactly friendly territory for the left; Tennessee hasn't elected a Democrat to the Senate since 1990.

Long odds. Yet today Mr. Ford is dogging Mr. Corker at the polls, threatening an upset in a race that could determine the balance of power in the Senate. Over the past year the Democrat has run right on social issues and defense, neutralizing two areas that so often hurt Democrats. That has freed him up to run a more populist campaign on economic issues. The calculation is proving a winner, and offers some lessons to national Democrats still interested in again becoming viable in the South.

At least some of Mr. Ford's advantages are experience and luck. A political family scion, he's had 10 years in the House to develop a charisma that TV cameras love and plays well against his more buttoned-up opponent. The Democrat was basically unchallenged for the nomination, allowing him to pump out his message early while Mr. Corker was locked in a vicious three-way primary. And then there's the storm cloud raging around the GOP -- Mark Foley, the war, corruption -- which has discouraged Tennessee Republicans. Some are casting about for an alternative, some for a reason to vote at all.

Luck aside, good candidates take advantage of their environment -- and Mr. Ford is good. His big goal has been to firmly identify with this buckle of the Bible belt, talking up his faith and conservative views on social issues. He points to his recent votes for bans on partial birth abortion, flag desecration and gay marriage. A cofounder of the House Faith-Based Caucus, Mr. Ford filmed one of his campaign ads in a church. Mr. Ford tells me -- with a satisfied look that would surely make Howard Dean squirm -- that he even has the support of Mr. Corker's former rector.

DOJ_NMG_0086639

Many Tennesseans -- including Republicans -- miss the part about how Mr. Ford's faith is also his justification for more liberal economic positions in the name of "social justice." Also lending credibility is the fact -- endlessly trumpeted -- that he has taken these conservative positions despite flack from his party, and despite representing the most liberal district in Tennessee, urban Memphis.

On trickier issues, Mr. Ford has perfected the art of Third Way-ism, presenting himself as an "independent" thinker on issues such as the Iraq war. He knows many Republicans are uncomfortable with the current situation, but that they also won't get behind a cut-and-run Democrat. He's been generally supportive of the war, but also highly critical of the strategy, for which he suggests a new approach: partition of the country. There's nothing new about the idea of dividing Iraq; but Mr. Ford's votes for the war in Congress, and his willingness to talk about the need for it, has certainly resonated better than have the "credentials" of the many war vets Democrats recruited to run elsewhere. "[Mr. Corker] can't name a single issue where I'm a liberal," Mr. Ford says. "They've had a hard time putting me in a box. That's been very frustrating for Republicans."

No more so than Mr. Corker, who has struggled to put daylight between himself and his rival -- on the war, immigration, social issues. His job is all the harder given that he doesn't have a record that allows him to gain traction on issues where Mr. Ford is vulnerable. Taxes are a good example, as Mr. Ford is on record as saying he'd raise them on the rich, and has voted against key Bush tax cuts. His line that his pro-tax votes were in the name of balanced budgets isn't one that always washes with voters.

Yet Mr. Corker hasn't wanted to talk about taxes, lest the past be revived. He was state finance czar under Gov. Don Sundquist, who earned voters' ire for pushing a new income tax. As Chattanooga mayor, Mr. Corker himself raised property taxes. While the Republican has carved out key policy differences in areas such as health care or education reform, they've figured little in the debate.

Tom Ingram, Mr. Corker's campaign manger, admits drawing a liberal-conservative comparison didn't work: "It's tough to pin labels on either of these guys," he says. "The message we've got now is that on the one hand we have an experienced, accomplished Tennessean, and on the other hand a Washington politician who is perpetuating the Ford political dynasty." In other words, biography, usually the last refuge of the desperate -- though Mr. Corker may win despite this. His campaign will get a big infusion of cash now the national party is focused on a Tennessee victory.

More important, Republicans are catching on to Mr. Ford's weakness -- voters' suspicion that he isn't as conservative as he says. You hear "closet liberal" intimations that his votes in recent years were planned with an eye for a Senate run, as well as examples of flip-floppery on issues like partial birth abortion (he voted against a ban in 1997) and the Kelo property rights decision. Tennesseans have seen this before, and are wary: They elected Jim Sasser as a conservative Democrat and watched him vote liberal. Ditto Al Gore.

Overcoming these fears is Mr. Ford's challenge, though what matters is that he is trying to do just that -- and making headway. The Democratic Party has been aware of its weaknesses on social issues and national defense for years, but with Howard Dean and Nancy Pelosi in charge, it has refused to budge from a liberal stance that resonates mainly in New York and California. Mr. Ford has shown that voters elsewhere will respond to Democrats who aren't afraid to really talk with them -- and vote with them -- on God and guns.

A Right Kind Of Democrat (LAT)

By Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, October 26, 2006

He is pro-business and antiabortion. He is an evangelical Christian and an avid hunter. But, unexpectedly, Heath Shuler is a Democrat, and he is running for Congress in North Carolina.

Shuler is part of a phalanx of unusually conservative Democratic candidates who may deliver crucial victories over GOP incumbents and help their party win control of the House.

Republicans are ringing alarms about what the House would be like if the GOP lost control: a throwback to the unreconstructed liberalism of big-government activism, tax increases and a weak-kneed defense policy. They point with

DOJ_NMG_0086640

Halloween-season horror to the likely lineup of Democratic committee chairs, including Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles) and other liberal old-timers.

But, like Shuler, many of the Democratic candidates most likely to be elected are cut from a different cloth. Sixteen of them have been endorsed by the Blue Dogs, a coalition of conservative Democrats. Several used to be Republicans. Shuler was recruited to run as a Republican a few years ago but opted not to.

In the waning days of the election campaign, candidates are increasingly debating what a Democratic-controlled Congress would be like: Would the tone and agenda be set by the Heath Shulers of the party, or its Henry Waxmans?

With so many conservative-leaning candidates at the forefront of the Democratic effort, House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) has, at least for now, stuck to a minimalist agenda that steers clear of grand, liberal ambitions. Instead, Democratic leaders are focusing — and almost all serious Democratic candidates are campaigning on — a more limited, six-point agenda that includes raising the minimum wage, repealing tax breaks for oil companies, restoring college tuition tax breaks, cutting Medicare drug costs and other plans they believe could draw bipartisan support.

The limited agenda has won endorsements even from Democrats as conservative as candidate Ken Lucas of Kentucky — a former House member who, before he left Congress in 2004, voted "present" rather than vote for Pelosi in the traditional party-line vote for House speaker.

Republicans charge that the apparent moderation in Democratic candidates is a smokescreen meant to obscure their support for a party steered by liberals and initiatives such as tax increases.

"They claim to be pro-life, pro-gun and anti-tax, yet their first vote in Congress would be to elect the most liberal speaker in American history," said Jonathan Collegio, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, which aims to enlarge the GOP majority in the House. "In the first hundred hours they will roll back tax cuts and open investigations into the administration."

Even some centrist Democrats privately fret that the chairmen-in-waiting may be harboring pent-up desires for a robust liberal agenda and partisan investigations that could hurt the party. "There's a desperate need for fresh blood, a general changing of the guard," said one moderate Democrat who asked not to be named.

An influx of new blood from the party's right wing could test party leaders' ability to maintain the remarkable unity they have forged during their years in the minority. Among the party's House challengers, 33 are conservative enough to be endorsed by either the Blue Dogs or the political arm of the centrist Democratic Leadership Council. Nearly all are on the Cook Political Report's latest list of Democrats most likely to win seats now held by Republicans. The party needs to pick up 15 seats to win a majority in the House.

With more conservative Democrats in the House, President Bush could have a new opening to reach across the aisle. But so far, he shows no signs of preparing to do so. One of the few issues he cites as a priority for next year is his plan to overhaul Social Security — a nonstarter among Democrats of all political stripes.

Bush's senior advisors have been meeting to plan next year's agenda, but apparently none of those discussions have focused on contingency planning for a Congress led by Democrats.

"I believe I'll be working with a Republican-controlled Congress and a Republican-controlled Senate," Bush said at a Wednesday news conference.

If they won a majority in the House, Democrats would be severely limited in what they could accomplish legislatively without control of the Senate and with Bush in office. Still, even a slim majority would give committee chairmen power to conduct investigations and issue subpoenas — tools they want to use to scrutinize Bush's policy on Iraq and other issues they believe the GOP bypassed.

In line to assume those powers is a cadre of unapologetic liberals of an older generation. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), first elected to the House in 1955, is poised to return to the Energy and Commerce chairmanship he held before Republicans won the House in 1994. David R. Obey (D-Wis.) would return as Appropriations chairman. Waxman is in line to be chairman of the Government Reform Committee, an important venue for investigations.

DOJ_NMG_0086641

In addition, minority-group members would gain great power in a Democratic House. African Americans are in line to become chairmen of the committees on taxation (Charles B. Rangel of New York), the judiciary (John Conyers Jr. of Michigan) and intelligence (Alcee L. Hastings of Florida).

Republicans are spotlighting that lineup, portraying it as extremist. They jumped on Conyers for calling for impeachment hearings against Bush, an idea Pelosi flatly dismisses. Republicans delight in pointing out that Hastings, before becoming a House member, was impeached as a federal judge.

Democrats say they believe such tactics are designed to mobilize conservatives and will not eclipse their efforts to present a more moderate face to swing voters. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee last year made a point of recruiting conservative candidates and even some former Republicans for this year's midterm election, in some cases muscling out more-liberal contenders who seemed likely to lose in Republican-leaning territory.

"The Democrats are going to retake the House of Representatives by electing conservative and moderate Democrats," said Rep. Mike Ross (D-Ark.), a member of the Blue Dog Coalition. "We're going to move our party back to the middle."

Republicans, in ads and elsewhere, have tried to discredit Democrats' conservative credentials — mostly by linking them to Pelosi.

In Indiana, GOP Rep. John Hostettler is running behind Democrat Brad Ellsworth, a sheriff who opposes abortion rights and same-sex marriage. But a new Hostettler radio ad says a vote for Ellsworth would be a vote for Pelosi.

"Pelosi will then put in motion her radical plan to advance the homosexual agenda," the ad says.

In Kentucky, ads by GOP Rep. Ron Lewis call attention to the fact that his Democratic opponent, retired Army Col. Mike Weaver, has accepted donations from Pelosi. "He is not a certified conservative," Lewis said.

But Weaver, a state representative, is against abortion, gun control and same-sex marriage. He founded a conservative group in the state Legislature to push his party to the right.

In North Carolina, Shuler, who is running against GOP Rep. Charles H. Taylor, turned down encouragement to run for the House in 2002 as a Republican, despite his conservative views.

Shuler, a former quarterback for the Washington Redskins and New Orleans Saints, stuck with the Democratic Party, his spokesman said, because he wanted to "help those who cannot help themselves — and that's the Democratic Party."

But Shuler dodges the question of whether he would support Pelosi as speaker, saying he wants to interview all candidates for that post.

Celebrities Face Off On Stem Cell Issue In Mo. (USAT)

USA Today, October 26, 2006

Opponents of a Missouri ballot measure that would amend the state constitution to allow research using embryonic stem cells have produced a star-studded TV ad to press their cause. The ad features former St. Louis Rams quarterback and Super Bowl hero Kurt Warner, St. Louis Cardinals pitcher Jeff Suppan, Kansas City Royals baseball player Mike Sweeney, Everybody Loves Raymond actress Patricia Heaton and The Passion of the Christ star James Caviezel.

Supporters of the measure have been running ads featuring singer Sheryl Crow, a Missouri native. And Democratic Senate candidate Claire McCaskill's campaign is airing ads featuring a quivering Michael J. Fox, who has Parkinson's disease, urging voters to elect her because of her support for stem cell research. Conservative radio talk show host Rush Limbaugh criticized the ad and suggested Fox was either off his medication or acting. Limbaugh later apologized.

The ballot measure has been a major issue in McCaskill's too-close-to-call battle to unseat GOP Sen. Jim Talent, who opposes the measure.

Schumer, Dole at odds on fate of Senate

New York Sen. Charles Schumer, head of the Democrats' Senate campaign committee, said his party is “on the edge” of taking control of the chamber in elections Nov. 7. His GOP counterpart, North Carolina Sen. Elizabeth Dole, countered him at a National Press Club lunch, saying the GOP will hold its majority. Dole said a poll Wednesday shows GOP candidate Michael Steele has closed to within 3 percentage points of Democrat Ben Cardin in Maryland. She rejected Schumer's claim that

DOJ_NMG_0086642

Republicans are running from foreign policy issues. If Democrats control the Senate, “you're going to see a weaker security system,” she said.

Schumer said GOP attacks on Democrats aren't working because voters are unhappy with President Bush and “they don't want a rubber-stamp Congress.” — Jill Lawrence

Pa. senator shifts TV ads to cable channels

GOP Sen. Rick Santorum's re-election campaign in Pennsylvania has moved most of its TV ads from broadcast TV to cable channels such as CNN, A&E and the Discovery Channel, Santorum media consultant John Brabender said. He said the move is a strategic one as the race against Democrat Bob Casey, who leads in polls, heads to the final days. “We're buying as heavily on cable as we can,” he said. “This is about reaching undecided voters.” G. Terry Madonna, a political science professor at Franklin & Marshall College, said it sounded more like a cash-saving move: “Why would you give up commercial TV if you can afford it?”

Political Pitches At The World Series (LAT)

By Stephanie Simon

The Los Angeles Times, October 26, 2006

A political ad featuring actor Michael J. Fox — his body jerking uncontrollably from Parkinson's disease — has touched off an unusual war of celebrity sound bites against the backdrop of the World Series.

St. Louis Cardinals fans watching the first game of the baseball championship last week saw Fox, racked with tremors, urging them to vote for Missouri's Democratic candidate for Senate, Claire McCaskill, who backs a ballot measure to protect embryonic stem cell research.

In response, opponents of the measure rushed to assemble their own celebrity commercial. The 60-second spot, due to air during Game 4 of the World Series, features the Cardinals' starting pitcher, Jeff Suppan. (The game was postponed Wednesday due to rain and is now scheduled for tonight.)

Athletes and actors have long lent their star power to political campaigns. Days after leading the Boston Red Sox to a World Series title in 2004, pitcher Curt Schilling began stumping for President Bush, endorsing him in recorded phone calls to New England voters and appearing by his side at rallies.

Hollywood came out in force for Democratic challenger Sen. John F. Kerry: Danny DeVito drove voters to the polls in Florida, Sharon Stone rallied crowds in Maine and Leonardo DiCaprio hit the campaign trail in Ohio.

But national celebrities don't often take the leap of filming ads for candidates or political causes.

"They give money. They attend fundraisers. But for the most part, they tend not to lend their likeness to political spots," said Evan Tracey, chief operating officer of TMS Media Intelligence/Campaign Media Analysis Group, an Arlington, Va., firm that tracks political ads.

Fox has been an exception. He filmed ads for Kerry and for the successful California campaign for a ballot initiative promoting stem cell research. (The California campaign also featured a commercial made by paralyzed actor Christopher Reeve just days before his death in October 2004.)

This year's spot has drawn more attention than the 2004 ads because Fox looks so debilitated. His body jerks so violently in the 30-second spot that conservative talk show host Rush Limbaugh mockingly mimicked the tremors and suggested that Fox was exaggerating his symptoms. Limbaugh later apologized, but the uproar over his remarks made the Fox ad the talk of the political world — and prompted thousands of people to view it online.

Some scientists believe that embryonic stem cell research could produce treatments for diseases such as Parkinson's, a progressive disorder that affects nerve cells in the brain, impairing motor control. Missouri's ballot measure would enshrine the right to conduct such research in the state constitution.

Opponents in Missouri and on the federal level have sought to block research on embryos because they consider the cluster of cells a human being and recoil at the idea of destroying that nascent life in scientific experiments. Opponents also argue that the research is exploitative because scientists sometimes pay women to donate their eggs.

DOJ_NMG_0086643

The Missouri committee opposing the stem cell ballot initiative has emphasized the exploitation argument and has asserted that the measure would open the door to human cloning.

Even before the Fox ad aired, the group had been working with actor James Caviezel, who played Jesus in the film "The Passion of the Christ," to identify celebrities who supported their cause. The Fox spot spurred them to hurry their efforts. On Tuesday, they picked up footage from Suppan, who was so eager to help that he videotaped his own remarks, said Austin Ruse, a spokesman for Missourians Against Human Cloning.

Arizona Cardinals quarterback Kurt Warner, who led the St. Louis Rams to the Super Bowl in 2000, also joined the effort.

The ad was scheduled to air twice on Missouri TV stations during Game 4. It's a coveted slot for a political ad. But political analyst Tobe Berkovitz said he wasn't sure it would be nearly as effective as the Fox pitch, which tugged at viewers' hearts.

"What you do in Missouri matters to millions of Americans — Americans like me," said Fox, who has suffered from Parkinson's for 15 years. He has made similar commercials for Democratic candidates in Maryland and Wisconsin.

The ad opposing the ballot initiative is much less emotional. Suppan, Warner, Caviezel and others look directly into the camera and assert that the measure is a fraud that will open the door to human cloning. "Don't be deceived," says Suppan, who is not wearing his baseball uniform.

"For every celebrity ad that works, there are probably three that don't, because voters don't connect the celebrity to the cause," said Berkovitz, interim dean of the College of Communication at Boston University. The latest polls show the measure to protect stem cell research winning handily in Missouri. McCaskill is locked in a tight race with incumbent Jim Talent, a Republican who opposes the ballot measure.

Jesus' Words Used Vs. Stem-cell Initiative (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

The actor who played Jesus in "The Passion of the Christ" is drawing on his knowledge of that film's Aramaic language and his image as Christ for his latest role -- using Jesus' words to ask Missouri voters to oppose a stem-cell research measure on the Nov. 7 ballot.

Actor Jim Caviezel opens the political ad with a brief statement in Aramaic, the common tongue of biblical-era Palestine and the language of Mel Gibson's blockbuster movie, saying: "Le-bar nash be-neshak."

Bill Fulco, the Loyola Marymount professor who translated Mr. Gibson's script for "Passion" and coached the actors on the ancient language, told The Washington Times yesterday the phrase means: "You betray the Son of Man with a kiss," a reference to Judas' betraying Christ and a phrase used in the Greek of Luke's Gospel.

Cathy Cleaver Ruse, a spokeswoman for Missourians Against Human Cloning, which produced the ad, said the group had Mr. Caviezel say the Aramaic phrase in a contemporary setting but without subtitles "to make the ad a little more intriguing."

When presented with Mr. Fulco's translation, which was confirmed by several other Aramaic scholars, the group agreed to release the exact translation exclusively to The Times.

"It means 'You betray me with a kiss,' which means Amendment Two is a betrayal because it is deceptive," Ms. Ruse said. "It promises one thing and delivers another."

Tom Schreiner, a professor of New Testament interpretation at the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, said yesterday Mr. Caviezel is implying the amendment may seem "loving and kind" to its supporters, but when read closely, it is "actually a betrayal."

Nathan Jastram, a biblical scholar from Concordia University in Wisconsin, agreed, saying it implies "murder is being planned under the guise of compassion."

"Just as Judas betrayed Jesus to death while testifying with a kiss that he was his friend, so stem-cell researchers are causing the death of embryos while testifying to the public that they are searching for ways to promote life," he said.

The 60-second ad, scheduled for airing during the World Series game between the St. Louis Cardinals and the Detroit Tigers last night, also features Cardinals pitcher Jeff Suppan and former St. Louis Rams quarterback Kurt Warner. It has been played more than 160,000 times on YouTube.com since its release Tuesday night to the media.

DOJ_NMG_0086644

Mr. Suppan and Mr. Warner say voters shouldn't be "tricked." Mr. Caviezel finishes out the ad, this time in English: "You know now. Don't do it. Vote No on Two."

Mr. Suppan and Mr. Caviezel are both Roman Catholics; Mr. Warner is an evangelical.

The ad was produced in response to Michael J. Fox, the Parkinson's-afflicted actor who asks voters in a television ad to choose pro-stem cell research candidate Democrat Claire McCaskill on Nov. 7.

"What you do in Missouri matters to millions of Americans. Americans like me," Mr. Fox says in the ad, which has been played more than 1 million times on YouTube.

Conservative radio talk-show host Rush Limbaugh suggested Mr. Fox was deliberately not taking his medication to enhance his symptoms for the benefit of the camera, something Mr. Fox has acknowledged doing in the past. Mr. Limbaugh has since apologized, but he is standing by his criticism of the Fox ad as misleading.

The celebrity back-and-forth on Missouri's stem-cell measure is the latest chapter in what has been a long debate involving Mrs. McCaskill and incumbent Republican Sen. Jim Talent, who opposes the ballot initiative.

Most polls show the ballot measure, which needs a simple majority to pass, with a strong lead. Ms. Ruse said the ad will run statewide with an aim to educate the many undecided voters in the final 12 days before the election.

Rabbi Shmuel Herzfeld of the National Synagogue in Washington said he finds the Caviezel ad "distasteful."

"There's another religious approach that embraces research on stem cells because it saves lives," he said. "There should be a discussion about that."

Republicans Intensify Push In New Jersey (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 25 — National Republican campaign strategists are beginning an intensive last-minute offensive in New Jersey, seizing on the tight race between Senator Robert Menendez, a Democrat, and his Republican challenger, Thomas H. Kean Jr.

Officials with the National Republican Senatorial Committee said they were putting $3.5 million into the race in its final 12 days to pay for television advertisements attacking Mr. Menendez that were expected to be on major stations by Thursday morning.

Brian Nick, a spokesman for the committee, said Mr. Kean had remained at least competitive with Mr. Menendez — though trailing in two recent polls — despite being outspent. Mr. Nick said the committee believed that the new advertising, produced by a quasi-independent arm of the committee created under federal campaign finance law, had the potential to change the dynamic of the race.

“We’re coming in with financial resources to help get parity in spending,” Mr. Nick said. “And when that happens, Kean will win.”

Brian Jones, a spokesman for the Republican National Committee, said the party would provide an extra push for Mr. Kean with an aggressive drive to get out the vote.

“We feel that there’s a real opportunity in New Jersey,” Mr. Jones said.

The $3.5 million advertising outlay is a major investment in two of the most expensive media markets in the nation, New York and Philadelphia, both of which transmit into New Jersey.

Mr. Kean had spent $2.5 million through Sept. 30, with $3.2 million left on hand for his final push, according to campaign finance records. Mr. Menendez had spent $6.5 million and had $5.5 million left as of Sept. 30, according to the filings.

The new push in New Jersey reflects the state’s status as the Republicans’ great hope this year. Mr. Menendez’s Senate seat is the only one now held by a Democrat that Republicans in Washington believe they can steal away this year.

Democrats need to gain six seats to win control of the Senate next year, a goal that several polls show to be within the realm of possibility.

Though New Jersey tends to vote Democratic, it has a history of selecting moderate Republicans like Mr. Kean, a state senator whose father was New Jersey governor and more recently was a chairman of the Sept. 11 commission.

DOJ_NMG_0086645

Mr. Kean has run an extremely tough race, despite the advantages that Mr. Menendez has as an incumbent and prominent fund-raiser for his party. The race has been so competitive that Democratic leaders, who have managed to keep Republican Senate candidates on the run elsewhere, acknowledge that this is the one Democratic-held Senate seat that is vulnerable.

Mr. Kean has sought to portray Mr. Menendez as an unethical politician who has his roots in the notorious Hudson County political machine. He has, for example, pointed to a nonprofit agency that paid more than $320,000 to lease a building in Union City from Mr. Menendez for nearly a decade while he helped the agency, the North Hudson Community Action Corporation, secure millions of dollars in federal grants. Mr. Menendez has said that the rent was comparable to market rates at the time and that he has done nothing wrong.

Mr. Menendez has sought to tie Mr. Kean to the policies of President Bush, whose popularity polls show is unpopular in New Jersey. He has also tried linking Mr. Kean to a jailed Hudson County Democrat whom Mr. Kean's campaign had contacted in hopes of undercutting Mr. Menendez.

Mr. Kean has attempted to distance himself from the Bush administration, recently calling for the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Democrats had not expected to find themselves playing defense this year in New Jersey, a solidly Democratic state in recent statewide elections. State voters have not elected a Republican to the United States Senate since 1972 .

Last year, Jon S. Corzine, who was the senior senator at the time, left office after being elected governor. He chose Mr. Menendez, a United States representative for Hudson County at the time, to complete the remainder of his term.

Phil Singer, a spokesman for Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, said his committee had spent $7.5 million on the race in New Jersey, and had a $4 million advertising campaign running now.

And he suggested that the Republican push in New Jersey represented a bluff. "They've got no place else to go," he said.

Matt Miller, a spokesman for Mr. Menendez, said his campaign was not concerned, as it has millions more dollars in the bank than Mr. Kean does. And he said several recent polls showed Mr. Menendez ahead in the race, including a Gannett poll showing Mr. Menendez up by nine percentage points.

But a Los Angeles Times poll released on Tuesday showed Mr. Menendez just four percentage points ahead of Mr. Kean.

Cardin, Steele Play Gotcha In Three-way Debate (BSUN)

By Jennifer Skalka

The Baltimore Sun, October 26, 2006

ARLINGTON, Va. -- In the most tempestuous encounter to date of Maryland's U.S. Senate contest, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele and Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin played a heated game of gotcha during a televised debate Wednesday, with Steele pressed into offering his clear support for the war in Iraq and Cardin stumbling when queried about the location of a planned Metro line in the vote-rich Washington suburbs.

The candidates sparred for an hour, talking over each other from the start and bickering about their views on embryonic stem cell research, health care and the Iraq conflict. Each contender claimed he could better bring change to Washington and that his opponent is beholden to party bosses.

"George Bush helped finance his campaign for the United States Senate," Cardin, a 10-term congressman, said of Steele. "The lieutenant governor agrees with George Bush's agenda on Social Security, on health care, the war in Iraq."

Steele snapped back: "This gentleman, this congressman has been running against George Bush for over a year. Haven't you noticed, sir, he's not represented on this stage."

"You were hand-picked by Congressman Steny Hoyer to get in this race," Steele continued, referring to the House minority leader who represents Southern Maryland and who has campaigned extensively for Cardin. "If you weren't, Kweisi Mfume should be sitting here," referring to Cardin's Democratic primary opponent

Kevin Zeese, the third-party candidate who joined Steele and Cardin for the debate taped at the News Channel 8 studio and broadcast Wednesday night on Maryland Public Television, said both men are products of a broken political system.

"I'm the only one not in bed with the special interests," said Zeese, who is the nominee of the Green, Libertarian and Populist parties.

DOJ_NMG_0086646

Debate moderator Bruce DePuyt said at the outset that the debate would have no rules, and though the candidates sat next to each other in armchairs instead of behind podiums, what ensued was a conversation in which they could barely conceal their personal disdain for each other. One exchange between Cardin and Steele about the Iraq war showed that tensions are high with less than two weeks to go until the Nov. 7 election.

"I just wish the congressman would get off his talking points and listen to what I'm saying and listen to what I've said on this issue and stop trying to drill home a dead point that doesn't reflect my reality," Steele said, when Cardin tried to tie Steele's support for the war to President Bush's policy of maintaining military presence in Iraq. "I know the words that come out of my mouth," Cardin interrupted Steele. "It's a very simple question, very simple question, very simple question," he said.

"What is the question?" Steele responded.

"Should we have gone into Iraq?" Cardin asked.

"Yes, we should have, to deal with the terror that was there," Steele said.

Cardin voted against the 2002 Iraq war resolution but has supported subsequent funding initiatives to provide the troops with the equipment and gear they need to get the job done. During the Senate campaign he has called for 10,000 troops to be sent home monthly from the region. Steele said Wednesday that the government needs to "put in place the mechanisms for our troops to come home," but he called Cardin's original vote against the war "wrong-headed."

"You guys are both wrong on the war, I tell you," Zeese said, adding that the U.S. needs "to get out of Iraq rapidly and responsibly."

The Maryland Senate contest made national news this week when actor Michael J. Fox, who starred in the sitcoms Family Ties and Spin City, cut a television ad for Cardin. Fox has Parkinson's disease, a degenerative ailment that many scientists believe could benefit from treatments derived from embryonic stem cell research. Cardin supports federal funding for such efforts. Steele does not.

During Wednesday's debate, Steele said, "I am four square for stem cell research, absolutely we should be funding stem cell research and accelerating that funding certainly with respect to cord blood and adult stem cells. Where I draw the line is when it comes to embryonic stem cell research. I do not support measures that would destroy that embryo because I respect the life that that embryo represents and is."

Cardin said embryonic stem cell research "holds out tremendous promise" for those suffering.

"Mr. Steele and I have a fundamental disagreement," Cardin said. "I'm in favor of moving forward with embryonic stem cell research; he opposes it."

This week, conservative commentator Rush Limbaugh criticized the Fox ad, saying about Fox, whose head and body jerk about during the spot: "Either he didn't take his medication or he's acting." Limbaugh later apologized. Fox appears in similar spots for Democrats running in Missouri and New Jersey.

DePuyt asked Steele how he felt about Limbaugh's characterization. Steele said at first that he had not heard Limbaugh's full comments so DePuyt replayed them for the lieutenant governor. Steele then called the radio personality "more than over the line." On that count the leading Senate candidates agreed. Cardin called Limbaugh's remarks "outrageous."

Cardin and Steele butted heads when Steele brought up a planned Metro route in the Washington suburbs called the Purple line, which would link a 14-mile stretch between New Carrollton and Bethesda.

"Sir, with all due respect could you tell me where the Purple Line is planning to run,?" Steele, a Prince George's resident, asked Cardin. "Could you tell me about the plan to build out the Metro system in the metropolitan region. Where do we plan to take it?"

"I'm very familiar with the Purple Line," Cardin said before stammering and stalling and mentioning something about Chevy Chase before realizing he was under no obligation to answer to Steele.

"I'm not going to answer your question," Cardin barked.

Steele pounced. "This gentleman has no clue about metro traffic congestion in this region," Steele said, calling for Cardin's plan to deal with the issue.

DOJ_NMG_0086647

The debate marked the second time the candidates have met on the same stage at the same time. They are tentatively scheduled to face off Thursday in a forum hosted by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in Charles County and again Sunday on NBC's Meet the Press with Tim Russert.

Steele rushed out of the lobby of the Arlington high-rise without taking questions from reporters, saying only that the debate was "fun." Cardin told reporters that Steele's political allegiance is obvious. "He clearly aligned himself with George Bush on the war in Iraq," Cardin said.

Zeese declared himself the winner.

Cardin, Steele Face Off In Contentious Debate (WP)

By Matthew Mosk And Ann E. Marimow

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

U.S. Senate candidate Benjamin Cardin (D) appeared caught off guard during a freewheeling debate on News Channel 8 this afternoon when his opponent, Republican Michael S. Steele tried to quiz him on the route of the proposed Metro rail Purple Line.

After starting to hazard a guess, sputtering out "Chevy Chase," Cardin snapped, "I'm not going to answer your question," and pushed back at Steele, asking him about national health insurance.

Later, Cardin was asked repeatedly by reporters if he knew the Purple Line route and while he insisted that he did, he refused to risk an answer. "I support the Purple Line," he said, then added, "I'm not sure they've settled on specific sites."

For the record, the line is proposed to run from Bethesda to the New Carrollton Metro Station. The unanswered question, Steele said, was a pointed illustration of how little the Baltimore area congressman knows about suburban Washington issues.

"I appreciate Ben finally locating where Prince George's County is . . . and finally using the words Purple Line," Steele said.

The hour-long debate, which ranged over subjects including stem cell research to the war in Iraq to health insurance reform, at times seemed more of a shouting match. There were no rules, and through much of the sparring, Bruce DePuyt, who hosts the WJLA program "News Talk Live," sat back and let it unfold.

The debate is one of three this week that will pit Cardin against Steele and independent candidate Kevin Zeese. The campaign for Maryland's open Senate seat, which is in its final two week stretch, appears to remain a close contest, with polls showing Cardin leading Steele.

In one segment of the debate, Cardin pressed Steele on his initial support for the Iraq war.

Steele responded by calling it "heartening to see the president move to where the American people have been for some time."

"How would you have voted in Congress if you'd had the chance?" Cardin pressed, adding that he believes Steele would have supported the president.

"Do not disrespect me and tell me what I would have done at the time," Steele replied. He then acknowledged he did support going into Iraq.

DePuyt asked Steele about a recent flap over actor Michael J. Fox's appearance in a campaign ad, in which he urges people to back Cardin because of his support for embryonic stem cell research.

In the spot, Fox showed startling signs of Parkinson's disease, contorting as he spoke.

The host asked Steele what he thought of conservative commentator Rush Limbaugh's suggestion that Fox was "acting" and exaggerating the symptoms of his disease.

Steele called the talk show host's remarks "a little bit over the line," but said he really didn't hear Limbaugh's comments. DePuyt then played the remarks for viewers.

"That's a little more than over the line," Steele said.

Senate Hopefuls Squabble, Call Each Other 'Handpicked' (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0086648

Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele and Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin yesterday wrangled over the origins of their U.S. Senate campaigns, with each accusing the other of being "handpicked" by their parties' leaders.

"The lieutenant governor was recruited by George Bush," said Mr. Cardin, a Democrat. "George Bush helped finance his campaign."

Mr. Steele, 48, said that Mr. Cardin "has been running against George Bush for a year and a half. ..."

"You talk about handpicked," Mr. Steele, a Republican, told Mr. Cardin. "You were handpicked by [House Democratic Whip] Steny Hoyer to get in this race. ..."

"If you weren't [handpicked], Kweisi Mfume should've been sitting here," he added, referring to the past president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, who lost the Democratic primary to Mr. Cardin last month.

A visibly flustered Mr. Cardin said, "I won a competitive primary. ... Kweisi Mfume is supporting me."

The debate at NewsChannel 8 studios in Rosslyn, which included Green Party nominee Kevin Zeese, was the first of three between Mr. Steele and Mr. Cardin that will culminate Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press."

The war in Iraq, embryonic stem-cell research and mass transit were other dominant issues in the debate.

When pressed, Mr. Steele said that U.S. forces should have invaded Iraq in 2003 "to deal with the terrorist threat."

Mr. Cardin, 63, voted against sending troops to Iraq, but Mr. Zeese attacked Mr. Cardin for voting several times to finance the war.

"After your first vote, you have been wrong, wrong, wrong," Mr. Zeese said.

Mr. Cardin also appeared unaware of exactly where Metro plans to begin and end the Purple Line, which Mr. Steele used to portray him as out of touch.

Mr. Steele reiterated his support for stem-cell research using adult stem cells and his opposition to embryonic research, which he considers abortion. Mr. Cardin said he supports embryonic research.

After the debate, Mr. Cardin complained that the open format allowed too many interruptions.

At one point, Mr. Steele, sitting next to Mr. Cardin, said the 10-term congressman had failed as a leader. "For 20 years, sir, you have sat in the [congressional] seat and wasted the opportunity to lead," he said.

Mr. Steele, who is black, is hoping for support from black voters, especially in Prince George's County and Baltimore.

Though Mr. Cardin, who is white, won the overall primary, Mr. Mfume bested him in those two jurisdictions. According to the State Board of Elections, Mr. Mfume won 74,637 votes, and Mr. Cardin 19,824 in Prince George's County. In Baltimore, Mr. Mfume won 52,335 votes and Mr. Cardin 25,051.

Since then, Mr. Mfume has made only one appearance in support of Mr. Cardin, during which he noted the lack of diversity in the Maryland Democratic ticket.

During the primary season, Mr. Mfume accused Mr. Hoyer and state Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr., both of whom are white, of trying to force him out of the contest.

The Senate nominees are scheduled to debate today in Charles County, where five white men in 2004 set fire to more than two dozen homes owned mostly by black families in the state's biggest residential arson case.

"I specifically asked for [the debate] to be there," Mr. Steele told reporters and editors at The Washington Times on Monday.

Meanwhile, two polls yesterday provided different pictures of the race.

The National Republican Senatorial Committee released a poll showing the race to be a dead heat. Mr. Cardin had 41.3 percent of the vote, and Mr. Steele 38.7 percent.

The poll of 602 likely voters was conducted by Houston-based Voter Consumer Research and has a margin of error of 3.9 percentage points.

A poll by the District-based Garin-Hart-Yang Research Group showed Mr. Cardin with 52 percent of the vote and Mr. Steele with 40 percent.

Iraq, Stem Cell Research Topics At Second Senate Debate (AP)

AP, October 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0086649

ARLINGTON, Va. -- Maryland's Senate candidates debated for a second time Wednesday afternoon, and the war in Iraq and stem cell research were the main topics of conversation.

Democratic Rep. Ben Cardin said he supported embryonic stem cell research. His campaign has put out a televised endorsement from actor Michael J. Fox on the matter.

Republican Lt. Gov. Michael Steele said he did not approve of destroying embryos in the name of research. But, he added that he thinks the government should fund other types of stem cell research.

The candidates sparred on Iraq as well.

Steele at first said he "applauded" Cardin for voting against the war. When the moderator expressed surprise, Steele then said it was "wrong-headed."

The Republican said he would have voted for the war initially but called for a new approach to the conflict now.

The debate also included third-party candidate Kevin Zeese, who said both Steele and Cardin cannot be independent senators because they've taken contributions from business interests.

The debate will be replayed statewide Wednesday night on public television.

The candidates will also debate Thursday in Charles County and Sunday on NBC's "Meet The Press."

Black Democrats Pull Punches In Maryland Race (WT)

By Brian Debose And Jon Ward

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

Local black Democratic leaders will not attack Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele in his U.S. Senate race, even as they campaign and appear in ads for his opponent -- Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, a fellow Democrat.

"I think that is a tactical decision," said Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, the District's nonvoting congressional representative. "If [Mr. Steele] has a large or fairly large black vote, why or how could you alienate that vote by going after him doing personal attacks? There is just no way."

Former Prince George's County Executive Wayne K. Curry, who has not yet endorsed anyone in the Senate race, said it is wise for black politicians to avoid criticizing Mr. Steele, a Republican and the first black to win a statewide election in Maryland.

"Obviously, that would make good sense because Michael is not disdained among African-Americans," said Mr. Curry, who has attended a campaign event for Mr. Steele but not for Mr. Cardin.

Rep. Elijah E. Cummings supported Kweisi Mfume, past president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, in the Democratic primary for the Senate. He said there is no need to pillory Mr. Steele because his positions on various issues are unappealing among most black voters.

"I don't think you have to attack Steele," said Mr. Cummings, of Baltimore. "All you have to do is ask him where he is on issues like the Iraq war, universal health care, stem-cell research, college-tuition assistance, and who are going to be our judges, and on President Bush's policies."

Race has been prominent in the Maryland Senate contest, as Democrats have tried to blunt Mr. Steele's appeal among blacks, their most loyal -- and, some say, neglected -- voting bloc.

Early in the campaign season, pollster Cornell Belcher identified an "emerging black swing vote" and advised Democrats in a memo to portray Mr. Steele as a "typical Republican in the eyes of voters, as opposed to an African-American candidate."

A key battleground in the Maryland Senate race will be Prince George's County, which has the highest concentration of blacks and registered Democrats in the state.

At The Washington Times on Monday, Mr. Steele -- who was raised in Petworth -- said that he supports full congressional voting rights for the District.

Mrs. Norton, who is working with Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican, on a bill that would give the District a vote in the House, noted the significance of Mr. Steele's support for the effort.

"We gave Maryland its black middle class, and they completely and totally identify with and understand that D.C. has no voting rights," she said, "and so what Steele has done is identify himself with a traditional African-American political issue."

DOJ_NMG_0086650

But Mr. Curry said that Mr. Steele's commercials have not addressed black voters' concerns on issues such as education and that the lieutenant governor still has some work to do to "galvanize" black voters.

"For one, he's got to prove to people he wouldn't be another Clarence Thomas," Mr. Curry said, referring to the U.S. Supreme Court justice.

Meanwhile, black Democratic leaders' support for Mr. Cardin has appeared muted, at best.

Mr. Mfume, whom Mr. Cardin defeated in last month's primary, has made only one appearance in support of the nominee, during which he noted the lack of diversity in the state party's ticket by saying it "looks like the Democratic ticket for state office in 1956."

He has since been out of sight and contact, but his son, Michael, has endorsed Mr. Steele.

Mrs. Norton said that she has not been contacted to record an ad for Mr. Cardin but added that she hopes someone from the region has, "because many of his people are our people."

Rep. Albert R. Wynn of Prince George's County said he recorded a radio ad weeks ago for Mr. Cardin but was not sure when it would run.

Mr. Cardin yesterday said he was not aware of the Wynn ad.

Allen, Webb Stake Out Positions On 'No Child' (WP)

By Maria Glod

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

In a state skeptical of federal intrusion in local school affairs, Virginia Sen. George Allen and challenger James Webb each say they support the goals of No Child Left Behind but quarrel with how the federal law has played out.

The Democratic challenger says schools need more federal funding to fulfill mandates to test students and narrow achievement gaps. The Republican incumbent, who voted for the landmark legislation five years ago, now argues that states need more flexibility in how they grade schools. But neither candidate supports an outright repeal of the law.

Whoever wins Nov. 7 will have a vote when Congress debates whether to renew the controversial law, which aims to push students in a range of grades to attain near-universal proficiency in reading and math by 2014. The law requires testing for all students from grades 3 through 8 and once during high school, and it requires schools to show that students in racial, ethnic and other groups are making adequate progress. Schools that fall short can face sanctions up to the threat of state intervention.

As Virginia governor in the mid-1990s, Allen was chief architect of the school accountability program that measures progress using the Standards of Learning tests. Since voting for No Child Left Behind, he has become critical of the federal initiative. State officials in that time have also complained about aspects of the law.

In a speech at Patrick Henry College in Purcellville this month, Allen told students that the federal law is "forcing Virginia schools to dumb down our curriculum." He later said that whereas the federal law focuses on reading and math, Virginia's testing system is "more comprehensive" and includes science and social studies.

Allen has proposed to amend the law by allowing states that have accountability programs to be granted waivers from certain federal requirements. His bill also would require states to expand testing to include U.S. history and civics.

In an interview this month with Washington Post reporters and editors, Webb said that the "intentions" of the No Child law are good but that Washington has not provided enough money. Congressional Democrats charge that the Bush administration and Republican-led Congress have delivered tens of billions of dollars less than the law authorized in education aid.

"You have federal requirements that are being put into place without the full amount of funding so that local jurisdictions are having to make up the difference, which is taking money away from other things they could be doing," Webb said. He also said the law places too much focus on teaching "toward standards" instead of teaching students to "think and adapt."

Kristian Denny Todd, a spokeswoman for Webb, said he hasn't decided whether he would vote to renew the law. "In terms of a vote for reauthorization," she said, "he's going to have to take a look at it and make sure the funds are dedicated."

The law has popped up as a campaign issue in various states. In Maryland, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, the Republican candidate for Senate, alluded to No Child Left Behind in a television advertisement that said his party "built a system that teaches to a test." Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, Steele's Democratic opponent, voted for the law in the House in 2001 but now -- like Webb -- says it has been underfunded.

DOJ_NMG_0086651

Analysts said education does not appear to be a driving issue in a Virginia Senate race dominated by debate over taxes, the war in Iraq and questions of character.

"The differences between the candidates appear quite subtle to most voters and not substantial enough to make any real difference except perhaps with a small number of committed educational professionals," said Mark J. Rozell, a professor of public policy at George Mason University.

"It's the lost issue in this campaign," said Robert D. Holsworth, a political scientist at Virginia Commonwealth University.

On his campaign Web site, Webb, a former Navy secretary, devotes 11 paragraphs to the Iraq war and two to education.

In a recent TV ad, Allen's wife, Susan, said the senator is a "father first" and has worked "hard to raise academic standards." But the spot did not mention his concerns about the law.

Holsworth said he was surprised that Allen hasn't used his critique of the law to demonstrate independence from President Bush.

"It's an area where he can easily deflect the argument that he's attached at the hip to the president," Holsworth said.

The candidates are split on another educational controversy: school vouchers. Webb's spokeswoman said the Democrat opposes public funding to help pay private school tuition -- a position that helped him win the endorsement of the Virginia Education Association, a teachers union that is an affiliate of the National Education Association. Allen voted in 2004 for a spending bill that launched an experimental voucher program in the District. "There should not be a federal prohibition" on vouchers, he said.

On higher education, Webb's spokeswoman said one of his priorities would be to help U.S. troops involved in fighting terrorism attend college after leaving the military. Denny Todd said Webb envisions a plan modeled after the post-World War II G.I. Bill. She said Webb would seek government funding for tuition and other expenses.

Allen, who often talks about the need for more engineers and scientists, has touted his support of proposals to provide $250 million in technology grants for historically black colleges, tribal colleges and other institutions that serve minority students.

Allen, Webb Tour Va.; Wilder Backs Webb (WP)

By Tim Craig And Lisa Rein

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

Democratic U.S. Senate candidate James Webb campaigned yesterday in Northern Virginia with the state's current governor at his side, and hours later he picked up a key endorsement from a former governor in Richmond.

Webb, joined by Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D), appealed to retirees and students at stops in Fairfax and Prince William counties before heading to Richmond to appear with former Gov. L. Douglas Wilder, now the mayor of Richmond and a popular figure among African American voters.

Webb's opponent, incumbent Sen. George Allen (R), stumped through southwestern Virginia yesterday with Kentucky Sen. Mitch McConnell (R), the majority whip. The Allen campaign also released a radio commercial featuring Allen's most prominent black supporter, state Sen. Benjamin J. Lambert III (D-Richmond).

Allen and Webb had courted Wilder for his support. Wilder, a Democrat, is independent-minded and likes to build suspense for his endorsements by waiting until late in a campaign to announce his choices. His support isn't always guaranteed; in 1997, he declined to endorse Democrat Donald S. Beyer Jr. for governor.

Two years ago, he stood with Allen to condemn then-Gov. Mark R. Warner's proposed tax increases and urged the Democratic governor to put the idea to a vote of the people. Later that year, Wilder was the keynote speaker at a retreat for the state GOP.

But yesterday, he said voters should choose Webb to send the message that they are opposed to the war in Iraq and Republican economic policies. He said he would do all he could, including campaign events and TV ads, to support Webb.

DOJ_NMG_0086652

"I think the time is now to take the action necessary to help turn around the ill-fated direction the country has taken," said Wilder, who was governor from 1990 to 1994. "For that reason, I will support an individual who served in combat for his nation . . . and will fight to represent the needs of the common man . . . to put this country back on course."

Allen and Webb have been vying for votes from African Americans in a campaign marred by accusations of racism. Allen has been dogged by questions about his racial sensitivity, and Webb has been put on the defensive over a magazine article he wrote in 1979 opposing women in combat, which some have said was demeaning to women.

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, which is spending millions to bolster Webb, has been running radio ads on black stations highlighting Allen's fondness as a young man for Confederate heritage and allegations that he used racial slurs in college. The Allen campaign and the Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee responded yesterday with Lambert's ad, which will air on several African American radio stations.

Lambert urges listeners to discount charges about Allen's past and focus on his support for historically black colleges, black farmers and the Voting Rights Act.

"I have fought racism all my life, and I've learned to judge people by what they do now, not what they have done 30 years ago," Lambert said.

McConnell, in an interview, said that Virginians would see a large tax increase if Webb is elected, referring to past statements by Webb that he would let some of President Bush's tax cuts expire. "You cannot let the tax cuts expire without having a rather large increase," McConnell said.

But Wilder said yesterday that Bush's economic policies have benefited the rich while doing little for the poor and middle class.

"We need someone who will look out for individuals in all walks of life," Wilder said.

Wilder said he considers Allen a "close friend" but cannot support him because he is a reliable vote for GOP leaders in Congress. Wilder called Allen yesterday morning.

"I said to Senator Allen, I do not want to see two more years of absolute control by Republicans owning both houses [of Congress], because it will send the wrong message to the president that he is doing right, and what he is doing, in my judgment, is wrong," Wilder said.

Dick Wadhams, Allen's campaign manager, said that the senator understood.

"I don't think it is a big surprise that the Democratic mayor of Richmond would endorse the Democratic nominee for the U.S. Senate," Wadhams said. "But Senator Allen still respects Mayor Wilder and looks forward to working with him on issues as he had in the past."

Kaine and Warner have also cleared their schedules for the race's closing days to stump for Webb.

"This is a person who probably never thought about running for political office," Kaine told about 100 senior citizens gathered yesterday at the Fairfax, a community for retired military officers near Fort Belvoir. "But the times compelled him to step forward."

The retirees at the Fairfax were a mix of Democrats and Republicans, but they spoke Webb's language. The former Marine who led a platoon in Vietnam and was Navy secretary under President Ronald Reagan was introduced as "Mr. Secretary." When Webb said he had lived in "33 different houses" by the time he graduated from high school, many nodded.

Virginia Mayor Endorses Senator's Opponent (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

RICHMOND, Va., Oct. 25 (AP) — Mayor L. Douglas Wilder on Wednesday endorsed Jim Webb and his challenge of Senator George Allen.

Mr. Wilder, the Virginia governor from 1990 to 1994, promised to help Mr. Webb, a Democrat, with voter turnout in the weeks leading to the Nov. 7 election. He said Mr. Webb could beat Mr. Allen, a Republican, if he got a large voter turnout in Hampton Roads and Richmond.

"Those are the battlegrounds," Mr. Wilder said. "A lot will depend on the turnout in those areas."

DOJ_NMG_0086653

Mr. Allen's campaign has been plagued by controversy. He has been accused of using racially insensitive language and has appeared to bristle at the recent revelation that his mother was born Jewish.

Mr. Webb said he had sought Mr. Wilder's counsel in the campaign. "There is no living American who understands the demographics of Virginia like Douglas Wilder," he said.

Mr. Wilder, who remains the nation's first and only elected black governor, said he was angry at the way President Bush had handled the Iraq war. "I think the Iraq war has been wrong from the beginning," Mr. Wilder said. "We've been in this terrible quagmire for four years. The American people have been sold a bill of goods."

Mr. Wilder remains an influential figure among Virginia's minority voters. In 2004, he was elected mayor with 80 percent of the vote in the majority black capital city.

Denise Elder, a Richmond resident, said she thought Mr. Allen's "macaca" comment, an obscure racial slur directed toward a Webb volunteer of Indian descent at a campaign rally in August, would have more of an impact on minority voters than Mr. Wilder's endorsement.

"With the name-calling, people were already ready to vote" against Mr. Allen, Ms. Elder said.

Though a Democrat, Mr. Wilder has an unpredictable, often conservative streak that means Democrats can never take his backing for granted.

Wilder Backs Webb In Race (WT)

By Seth Mclaughlin And Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

Richmond Mayor L. Douglas Wilder, a former governor whose endorsement has had significant impact in several elections, yesterday said fellow Democrat James H. Webb Jr. is the best choice for Virginians because he is independent-minded and will fight for "the common man."

"I think Jim Webb is the right man for Virginia at this time. I think he can win and will win," said Mr. Wilder, who became the nation's first black governor in 1990.

Mr. Wilder's endorsement comes at a crucial time for Mr. Webb, with most polls showing that he still trails Sen. George Allen, a Republican. A Mason-Dixon poll released Tuesday showed Mr. Allen pulling away from Mr. Webb after a previous poll had shown them in a dead heat.

Mr. Wilder said he is endorsing Mr. Webb, a former Navy secretary under President Reagan, because he will fight against the "pattern of inefficiency, ineptitude and scandal" in the Republican-controlled Congress.

"The direction of the war is wrong, the direction of the economy is wrong, the divide is too deep between the haves and have-nots," Mr. Wilder told reporters in Richmond yesterday. "We need to reinvest our resources in the American people, and I think this is the man to do it."

Mr. Webb said that Mr. Wilder, a grandson of slaves, is "a historical figure in our country for his own professional journey," including his service as a soldier in the Korean War.

"This endorsement is much more than an endorsement directed at the African-American community," said Mr. Webb, a former Republican. "This is an individual who has tremendous respect all across the different ethnic and regional groups in Virginia. It's a very important endorsement for me."

The Allen campaign said the endorsement was no surprise. They noted their radio ad featuring state Sen. Benjamin J. Lambert III, a black Richmond Democrat who has endorsed Mr. Allen. In the ad, Mr. Lambert notes Mr. Allen's support for black farmers and the Voting Rights Act.

Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams brushed aside the relevance of the Wilder endorsement. He said it came "apparently reluctantly" since the mayor waited until the final 13 days of the campaign.

"Mayor Wilder is a Democrat, and it would be expected that he would support the Democratic nominee for Senate," Mr. Wadhams said.

Mr. Wilder is well-known for withholding his endorsement for the final weeks of a race, elevating its importance.

Last fall, Mr. Wilder endorsed Timothy M. Kaine less than a week before the Democrat won the governor's race.

DOJ_NMG_0086654

"It's huge," Mr. Kaine said yesterday of the endorsement. "He is a person who retains a high degree of popularity, and Virginians have great affection for him. ... It's a boost."

Mr. Wilder has not always supported his party's nominee or elected leader. In 2004, he criticized Gov. Mark Warner for proposing a tax increase. Mr. Wilder had said he never would have endorsed Mr. Warner had he known the Democrat would raise taxes.

Last fall, Mr. Wilder declined to make an endorsement in the attorney general's race, which Democratic state Sen. R. Creigh Deeds, after a recount, lost by a scant 323 votes.

Black voters could be key on Nov. 7. Twenty percent of Virginia's population is black, a 2004 census shows.

Mr. Allen won 20 percent of the black vote when elected in 1993 to succeed Mr. Wilder as governor, and 17 percent in his 2000 race when he unseated Democratic Sen. Charles S. Robb, whom Mr. Wilder endorsed.

This time, Mr. Allen has been dogged by accusations of racism since he was taped calling an Indian-American Webb volunteer "macaca" at a campaign stop in August.

Some former University of Virginia classmates claimed they recalled Mr. Allen frequently using the "N-word." Mr. Allen denies the racial slur was ever part of his vocabulary.

Mr. Allen, who has been scrutinized for years for his past affection for the Confederate battle flag and for once displaying a hangman's noose in his law office, has been endorsed by several black pastors and by a black Richmond newspaper.

Mr. Webb also has faced criticism over comments he made that affirmative action should be scaled back for just blacks or opened up to poor whites. He has since tempered his comments and recently received the endorsement of the state's Legislative Black Caucus.

Mr. Wilder said both men should be judged on where they stand on the issues and who they are today. "Many of us evolve," he said.

Also yesterday, the Webb campaign said actor Michael J. Fox will appear with the Democrat Nov. 2 in Arlington. Mr. Fox, who is afflicted with Parkinson's disease, has supported Democrats who favor embryonic stem-cell research.

An Ascent Shadowed By Questions On Race (WP)

By Bill Turque

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

In February 2004, Sen. George Allen was on a bus taking him from Birmingham to Selma, Ala. On a video screen in front of him was "Eyes on the Prize," the acclaimed documentary chronicling the civil rights movement.

Allen "knew very little" about the history of that struggle, according to his seatmate, Paul Gillis, former president of the Virginia NAACP. But Gillis, once a bitter critic and now one of his few prominent black supporters, was impressed with Allen's willingness to take a three-day pilgrimage, sponsored by the nonpartisan Faith & Politics Institute, to visit the battlegrounds of that era and listen to the testimony of those who spilled their blood.

It was many miles from the sun-splashed Los Angeles suburbs, where some classmates at Palos Verdes High School recall a lone tobacco-chewing teenage cowboy who was disliked, even feared.

"George was not what I would call mainstream," said Don Gause, a wide receiver who caught Allen's passes for the Sea Kings. One reason, Gause said, was that Allen used anti-black epithets and "ran with a group of guys off the football field" who used the same language.

"George took some hard lines in that area," said Gause, a real estate executive in Orange County, Calif. His sense, though, was that it was more for attention than out of any racial animus.

"He was immature, like most of us," Gause said. "He was looking for who he was."

Who George Allen was, and who he is today after 23 years in politics, remains an issue as the Virginia Republican seeks reelection. Supporters say the pilgrimage was one leg of a journey that has led to genuine maturation for Allen, 54, whose style melds Ronald Reagan's optimism with George W. Bush's Texas swagger.

DOJ_NMG_0086655

Popular as a governor and a senator, with a genial presence on the campaign trail, Allen has considered running for president. But a series of events have revived lingering questions about his attitudes on race and have helped turn what was expected to be an easy path to reelection into a fight for his political career.

At an August rally in southwest Virginia, Allen interrupted a routine stump speech and pointed to a man of Indian descent who was videotaping the event for his Democratic opponent, James Webb, and called the aide "macaca," a genus of monkey. Some of Allen's former football teammates at the University of Virginia came forward later to say that he routinely used racist language. Asked at a debate last month about reports of his Jewish roots, he denounced the accounts as "aspersions" before confirming them a day later.

The episodes unraveled an effort by Allen to mend a reputation for racial insensitivity that has pursued him through his steady rise from Palos Verdes to college athlete, lawyer, state legislator, governor and, in 2000, U.S. senator. Allen has, for example, had to explain his fondness for the Confederate flag and the presence of a hangman's noose in his Charlottesville law office.

In his first Senate term, he has taken three civil rights pilgrimages, co-sponsored a resolution apologizing to lynching victims and their descendants, and proposed allocating a half-billion dollars to historically black colleges.

But "macaca" raises a question: Has Allen really evolved, or did his true nature slip into public view?

Allen, who denies using racist language, declined requests for an interview, asking instead for written questions. By yesterday, his campaign had not provided answers.

Those closest to him say that Allen is no bigot and that partisan enemies have seized on murky 30-year-old anecdotes and meaningless lapses in political correctness to damage him.

"Politics has become more of a contact sport than football," said Allen's brother Bruce, general manager of the Tampa Bay Buccaneers. "I know the person. I know the man."

Others from Allen's past said they saw a distressingly familiar, coldly taunting hatred when they viewed the macaca tape.

"So let's give a welcome to macaca here," Allen said, pointing a finger. "Welcome to America and the real world of Virginia." Allen later said he didn't know what the word meant and apologized to the Webb volunteer, S.R. Sidarth.

"I saw how he looked, that attitude of condescension and superiority," said Ed Sabornie, a former Virginia player and now a professor of special education at North Carolina State University.

"That rang a bell for me."'Greasers, Surfers, Crew-Cutters'

There was darkness on the edges of the world of privilege and glamour in which Allen grew up.

His father, George Allen, was the milk-chugging NFL Hall of Famer who took the Washington Redskins to their first Super Bowl in 1973. He compiled a 116-47-5 record over 12 seasons as a coach with the Los Angeles Rams and the Redskins but made room for little else in his life.

"If a man is going to succeed in anything, he must neglect everything else, whether it is his wife, his children or himself," he told an interviewer in 1970.

Even when he took his sons to the Rams' summer training camp, they spent most of their time with Allen's assistants and friendly players such as Deacon Jones, said Gause, who accompanied the younger Allen one year.

When the coach was at their Mediterranean-style home on a cul-de-sac with jaw-dropping views of the Pacific Ocean, the family's spirits rose and fell with the fortunes of the team.

After a painful 1968 loss, George and his brother Gregory elected to go home with neighbors rather than face their father's black mood. In her vivid family memoir, "Fifth Quarter," his sister Jennifer Allen described violence at home, including her father breaking Gregory's nose in a fight at the dinner table after a 1969 playoff loss.

Neither Jennifer nor Gregory Allen responded to requests for interviews. Bruce Allen, who said he doesn't remember the incident, said his sister's book was written "from a little girl's eyes" and should not be taken literally.

Allen's mother, Henrietta, known as Etty, is a gracious woman with a bitter and sometimes fiercely vindictive side, especially when it comes to protecting her husband's reputation. She effectively raised the Allen children on her own.

"Etty ran the show," said Melvin Durslag, a columnist for the now-defunct Los Angeles Herald Examiner and a longtime family friend.

DOJ_NMG_0086656

She also carried the pain of her own turbulent childhood. Born in Tunis to French-Jewish parents, Etty Lumbroso endured the 1942-43 Nazi occupation and Allied bombing that destroyed her home. She watched her father, Felix, a wine importer, taken to a labor camp by the Germans. She met Allen in 1950 while visiting friends in Sioux City, Iowa, where he was coaching at Morningside College. They married a year later.

On summer evenings when the coach and the boys were at training camp, Jennifer Allen wrote, Etty would sip wine and lament the death in a motorcycle accident of a French fiancÃ© she called "the love of my life."

Etty told The Washington Post last month that her husband, who died in 1990, asked her to conceal her Jewish identity from his family and that she and Allen wanted to protect their children from the fear she experienced during the war. It remained a secret between her and her husband, she said, until a dinner conversation with George in August.

There was a price to pay for the long years of keeping the secret. Her daughter hints at the private pain in the form of boxes from Tunis and France, stacked in the garage in Palos Verdes. Etty told Jennifer she would never unpack them. Jennifer wrote that she always looked at her mother's life before she met her father as "an unopened box."

Young George and his two brothers filled the gaps at home with friends Jennifer described as "greasers, surfers, crew-cutters" who were "toughs."

"My brothers led each pack," she said. As the oldest, George was sometimes the enforcer. When Jennifer refused to go to bed, he dragged her upstairs by her hair.

One of Allen's friends, Deke Applegate, said Allen's crowd was rough-and-tumble but disputes Gause's recollection of racism. "That's not the guy I hung out with," said Applegate, a Las Vegas businessman.

Allen and Applegate did share an affinity for the Confederate flag. Yearbook pictures show them with pins on their collars. Applegate said it was a "symbol of rebellion against the establishment," nothing more.

Others say Allen acted out at school. Tim Good, a classmate, said he had to confront the 6-foot-plus Allen after his younger brother reported that Allen had stolen his bicycle.

"George Allen was a big bully," said Good, now an accountant in Torrance, Calif. Allen denied stealing the bike, but Good said it reappeared at school the next day.

One morning, students arrived to see workers removing graffiti spray-painted on an outside wall. It was the day of a basketball game with the lone majority-black school in Palos Verdes's athletic conference, Morningside High in Inglewood.

The graffiti included the phrase "Kill Whitey," said Good, who added that former students have said that Allen was responsible. In a 2000 interview with The Post, Allen said there was an incident at school but declined to discuss the details. "I did something wrong when I was young that I regret," he said.

After a year at the University of California at Los Angeles, Allen followed his family east in 1971, when his father was named coach of the Redskins. His football teammates at the University of Virginia said they found some of the same racial insensitivity.

"People gave him a wide berth," said Ken Shelton, one of three former Cavaliers who told Salon magazine in September that Allen regularly used racial slurs for blacks.

Shelton, a North Carolina radiologist, said in an interview that in Newcomb Hall, the student center, Allen would spit tobacco juice "anywhere -- on the walls, on the floors, in the elevators" and habitually shouldered people aside as he walked by.

Change was beginning to stir in Charlottesville, long a clubby redoubt for the sons of Virginia's white establishment. Blacks and women had started to shake up the campus culture. The football team included the first four African Americans to receive full athletic scholarships.

It was a challenging environment for the athletes. Harrison Davis, the Cavaliers' first black starter at quarterback, who regularly received hate mail, said he never heard Allen use racial slurs. Nor did Stanley Land, a defensive tackle. But Land, a Houston chemical executive, said he was offended by the Confederate flags he saw in Allen's van and his campus apartment, especially when some of his teammates were under such pressure.

"To me, that showed a lack of real respect for his African American teammates," Land said.

'Not the Man He Once Was'

DOJ_NMG_0086657

In 1979, Roy Parks's land-use and design firm in Charlottesville needed more room. He spoke to George Allen about renting space in the building he owned on Market Street, where he'd set up his law practice. As the negotiations came to naught, Parks said, their conversations drifted to politics.

Allen, getting ready to make his first run for the state legislature, allowed that he had supported a Democrat, Edward Lane, for state attorney general in 1977. Lane had been a segregationist in the 1950s, an architect of Virginia's "massive resistance" movement in which communities closed schools rather than comply with court orders to integrate. He lost to Republican J. Marshall Coleman.

"When I questioned George further, he said that Lane, like him, was an advocate for states' rights and was only a man of his time," said Parks, who was stunned by Allen's admission.

Lane, now 82 and ill with Parkinson's disease, was unable to comment. His wife, Jean, said she has no memory of Allen's support.

As a state legislator in 1984, Allen was one of 27 members of the House of Delegates to oppose a holiday honoring Martin Luther King Jr. During his 1993 gubernatorial campaign, he acknowledged displaying the Confederate flag in his living room, calling it part of a flag collection. A hangman's noose, which he said was part of a Western memorabilia collection, hung in his law office.

As governor, Allen appointed one black cabinet member, Kay Coles James, as secretary of health and human resources, and a Latino, Transportation Secretary Robert E. Martinez. Midway through his term, the number of African Americans in senior posts had declined by half from the tenure of L. Douglas Wilder, the state's first black governor, according to an audit by a state watchdog agency. For three years, he incensed black leaders with an annual Confederate History Month proclamation that failed to mention slavery.

Allen had an active term as governor. He abolished the state's parole system, replacing it with a "truth in sentencing" law that requires those convicted of crimes to serve the bulk of their sentence. He pushed through changes in welfare and education policy and signed a measure requiring parental notification for minors seeking abortions.

As he launched his 2000 Senate campaign, Allen began some attempts to mend racial fences. He backed Gov. James S. Gilmore's proposal for an MLK holiday in Virginia. After defeating Charles S. Robb, his first floor speech was in support of the appointment of Richmond lawyer Roger Gregory, an African American, to the 4th Circuit federal appeals court. Then came the 2004 pilgrimage, the first of three that he took.

"None of us can presume to know what the motivation is" for Allen's civil rights trips, said the Rev. Douglas Tanner, who recently retired as president and chief executive of the Faith & Politics Institute. "For someone in politics, it's always likely to be a mixture of genuine interest and whatever the political advantage is."

Gillis, who has supported other Republicans, said that he doesn't know whether Allen used racist language but that, in the end, it's not that important. "I've had white friends who've used those words in the heat of passion," he said. "It's a time past. He's not the man he once was."

Allen remains an opponent of affirmative action. In 2005, the NAACP said he supported legislation deemed to be in its interest 15 percent of the time.

More often, his advocacy is in initiatives such as his co-sponsorship of the resolution apologizing to lynching victims and their descendants. In other areas, he has co-authored legislation blocking federal taxes on Internet access and online sales. He also collaborated on the National Nanotechnology Initiative, which invests $3.7 billion in research.

His appearances before black audiences are a delicate dance. At the NAACP state conference in Hampton on Friday night, he got no questions about "macaca" or other recent revelations.

When the moderator presented Allen with an application for a lifetime membership, he happily took the opportunity for a positive gesture.

Later, answering a question about racial profiling, Allen explained that he opposed the practice. When someone in the audience said "Amen," Allen was briefly startled.

"Did I say that right?" he asked.

DOJ_NMG_0086658

Metro researcher Meg Smith, researcher Rena Kirsch and director of information resources Lucy Shackelford contributed to this report.

GOP Sees Hope In Michigan Race (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

Republicans are turning to Michigan in the final days of the campaign in search of a major upset that would protect their majority in the U.S. Senate.

Mike Bouchard, the popular Republican sheriff of Michigan's second-largest county, trails Democratic incumbent Sen. Debbie Stabenow. But recent polls suggest that Mr. Bouchard may be closing the gap, with two surveys indicating a single-digit difference.

"In many of our states, we're battling a national climate that is quite difficult," Brian Nick, spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC), said yesterday. "The climate in Michigan makes it an opportunity unlike any other state in the country."

Across the country, polls show a deep anti-incumbent resentment among voters exhausted from six years of Republican dominance in Washington and tired of the war in Iraq.

In Michigan, voters are more concerned about finding jobs. The economy there, inexorably linked to the ailing auto industry, is sputtering with an unemployment rate of nearly twice the national average. And it's Democrats who hold the governor's mansion and both Senate seats.

That's not to say Mr. Bouchard has an easy task ahead of him. While two polls show him trailing by seven points or less, others show the gap as much as 18 percent.

But this year, that's enough for hope among Republicans in this state. Many view Mrs. Stabenow as vulnerable and are pleased with Mr. Bouchard's campaign.

Republican heavy-hitters, such as former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, Sen. John McCain of Arizona and Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney have been to the state to campaign for Mr. Bouchard. President Bush travels there today.

The Bouchard campaign also has been the beneficiary of a national fundraising effort. The NRSC spent $1 million on the campaign's behalf, one of only three states where the national Republicans have gone on the offense. Also, members of the conservative group Club for Growth donated more than $250,000.

All this national attention cuts both ways, said Stabenow spokesman Brett Colburn, referring to Mr. Bush's visit today.

"Asking George Bush to campaign for you right now is like asking the captain of the Titanic to take your boat out for a spin," he said. "If the Republicans actually think Michigan is one of their best bets for a win in the Senate, they really are headed for an ugly Election Day."

Despite Mr. Bush's low poll numbers, Bouchard campaign spokesman David All said the campaign welcomes the national attention and Mr. Bush's visit, especially because it's slated for just hours after the president signs a bill to construct 700 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border.

"As a 20-year lawman, Sheriff Bouchard is pleased to see a measure signed into law, which will help secure the border," Mr. All said.

Races In Mich. Explore Economy's Electoral Impact (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, October 26, 2006

SOUTH LYON, Mich. — Tanya Nevitt sits in the back of the Java House Café as Republican gubernatorial candidate Dick DeVos makes his standard pitch for change. She doesn't need much convincing.

“It's been a rough few years,” says Nevitt, 32, the mother of three young children. She now buys their clothes at Target and Wal-Mart rather than The Gap. “Regardless of who is in charge right now, I am prone to vote for a challenger.”

DOJ_NMG_0086659

A few miles away in Novi, just outside Detroit, a group of women facing the same economic malaise sit around a table at the Picasso Café with Democratic Gov. Jennifer Granholm. They don't blame her for the state's 7.1% jobless rate. It's more the fault of President Bush and Republican policies in Washington, they say.

"I don't believe in tax cut, tax cut, tax cut, tax cut," says Gwen Markham, 53, a piano teacher. "I have a 19-year-old and a 15-year-old who are going to pay for that."

In an election dominated by the war in Iraq, the impact of an economy recovering from recession is less clear. Democrats note that wages have not kept up with some prices, particularly for health care and college tuition. That, they say, should help their party. Others cite three years of job creation, a 4.6% national unemployment rate, declining gas prices and high stock prices as evidence the country is on the right course — a plus for Republicans.

President Bush, who arrives in the Detroit suburbs today to raise money for GOP Senate candidate Mike Bouchard, has spent much of the week highlighting the economy as a strong point for Republican candidates. Beyond the war on terrorism, he said Wednesday, the key issue in next month's elections should be "Who best to keep taxes low?" He said Tuesday in Sarasota, Fla., that Democrats "are genetically disposed to raise your taxes."

Yet even if the economy works to the benefit of Republicans, it may not do so in Michigan. Granholm is struggling with a difficult state economy — only Mississippi, wracked by Hurricane Katrina, has a higher jobless rate (7.2%) — but she is leading narrowly in recent polls, and incumbent Democratic Sen. Debbie Stabenow enjoys a bigger lead over Bouchard.

"It's not the unemployment rate," Granholm says. "It's the fact that people's personal income has dropped. We're seeing it play out here in spades."

Both parties in Washington believe the economy will help them at the polls Nov. 7.

Americans, Democrats say, can't pay for college tuition or health insurance, much less save enough for retirement. "Most Americans have been treading water economically," says Rep. Sandy Levin, D-Mich., whose district Bush visits today.

Unions and others aligned with Democrats have been seeking to highlight that. Communities United to Strengthen America, an outgrowth of the labor movement, has reached out to 800,000 households in 11 congressional districts from Connecticut to Colorado that Democrats hope to capture next month. "People are still faced with stagnating wages and rising living costs," spokesman Harrison Schmitt says.

That's not the economy that White House budget director Rob Portman sees when he travels on behalf of GOP candidates, even in his native Ohio and the struggling Midwest. "There's a lot of good news out there," Portman says. The question for voters, he says, is "do you want to put this at risk by increasing taxes at this time?"

David Littmann, senior economist at the Mackinac Center for Public Policy in Michigan, says all the economic signs are positive for Republicans. Wages are outpacing inflation; interest rates remain low; the federal deficit is declining.

"There's a lot of fiction out there," he says. "The majority are much better off than they were two to three years ago."

A USA TODAY/Gallup Poll taken last weekend shows 44% of Americans rate the economy good or excellent, the highest percentage since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks in 2001. Fifty-five percent rate it fair or poor.

DeVos calls attention to the economy wherever he goes. The Amway heir, who has pumped $14 million of his own money into the governor's race, is spending the last two weeks in a customized bus emblazoned with phrases such as "Michigan is the ONLY state losing jobs" and "Personal bankruptcy rates are at an all-time high." He campaigns as an economic Mr. Fix-It. "I'm not a talker," he says. "I'm just a doer."

Granholm has maintained a slight lead in polls by campaigning at a frenetic pace, often in a GM Suburban dressed up like an ear of corn and powered by ethanol. Pelted with questions on the economy, health care, education and other pocketbook concerns, she ticks off a list of initiatives designed to diversify the state's auto-dominated economy.

With a Republican president and a Democratic governor, residents of the hard-hit state have a choice of whom to blame. Some, such as Al Rasegan, 64, a General Motors retiree, say it's not Bush's fault. Without the tax cuts, he says, things would have been worse. "I think Bush ought to get credit for turning the economy around," he says.

Others say that while Granholm remains under fire here, Republicans who have controlled Washington for longer than she's been in Lansing are equally at fault.

DOJ_NMG_0086660

"There's a sense of disappointment with both the White House and Congress," says Rich Studley, executive vice president of the Michigan Chamber of Commerce. "Conservatives in Congress are as much a part of the problem as anyone else."

For many, the problem isn't with Democrats or Republicans but their refusal to work together.

"I think there needs to be more cooperation," says Ottilie Nott, 88, of Walled Lake, wearing a Detroit Tigers pennant fever T-shirt at her Milford senior center. "They need to work better together."

Michigan's Messy DeVos (WSJ)

By Shikha Dalmia

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

DETROIT -- Besides the Tigers, the main thing on the minds of Michigan residents is the state's tanking economy. So when the state's most prominent Republican businessman entered the gubernatorial fray promising to turn things around, it should have been a home run. Instead, 10 days before the election, Dick DeVos has lost his 15-point summer lead over Jennifer Granholm, the Democratic incumbent, and is now trailing by more than eight points in most polls. The fault is not in his stars but in himself: At a time when Michigan needs economic leadership, he has so far shown little charisma, creativity -- or courage of convictions.

That Michigan has become the Mississippi of the Midwest is no secret (actually, Mississippi is doing better than Michigan right now). While the rest of the country is experiencing real overall growth of 3.2%, Michigan is in a single-state recession. Its unemployment rate, at 7.1%, is twice the national average; it was the only state last year not hit by a hurricane to lose jobs. Personal per capita income is 7% below the national average. Home foreclosure rates have doubled this year. And over the last four years, 200,000 economic refugees have left the state, a trend that will only accelerate as the ongoing downsizing of the Big Three forces other auto-related industries to lay off workers.

Ms. Granholm's chief strategy for dealing with Michigan's grim economic situation, comically enough, is to blame Mr. DeVos, even though the last -- and only -- time he held elected office was as a member of the State Board of Education a decade ago. She has lambasted Amway, his company, which does business in 90 countries, for opening offices in China and "outsourcing" Michigan jobs. She has accused him of personally "allowing" the sexual abuse of mentally ill elder citizens because he had a 1% stake in a publicly traded nursing home chain where some incidents were recently discovered. And just when one thought this Hollywood-starlet-turned-Harvard-lawyer couldn't get any nastier, she did another hit job in their last debate, accusing him of tax evasion for incorporating some of Amway's overseas subsidiaries in Bermuda. "I have never seen a sitting governor run so many negative attacks against an opponent," notes Bill Ballenger, publisher of the respected non-partisan political newsletter Inside Michigan Politics. "She has few accomplishments to list so she knows that if she allows this election to become a referendum on her, she'll lose."

Although Mr. DeVos, who has spent $30 million of his own money on the campaign, has recovered from his initial shell-shock and become better at deflecting such attacks, he has done little to challenge her on economic fundamentals -- her big vulnerability given that two-thirds of Michigan voters believe that the state has been going in the wrong economic direction under her. No one expects a candidate in a union state to win as a free trader. But Mr. DeVos has granted Ms. Granholm's protectionist premises. He has countered her attacks against his company's overseas operations by accusing her of not doing enough to convince Honda officials to locate in Michigan -- as if it were a governor's job to negotiate business deals. Worse, instead of staying focused on creating an attractive business climate by cutting taxes and government, his plan to make Michigan globally competitive involves opening offices in 10 countries to promote trade and tourism.

The fundamental reason why not a single non-U.S. auto maker has ever opened a major plant in Michigan -- notes David L. Littmann, a senior economist at the Mackinac Center for Public Policy -- is not a lack of these offices, but that it costs too much to generate wealth in this state. Thanks to the strong union presence, Michigan's labor costs relative to productivity are the second-highest in the nation. Normally, an economy might adapt to such realities by "diversifying" -- to use a buzzword that both candidates bandy -- into non-unionized service industries. But Michigan's onerous combination of redistributive regulations and high taxes has prevented even this from happening, making it more vulnerable to the imploding auto industry.

DOJ_NMG_0086661

It is not surprising that a big-government careerist like Ms. Granholm has few ideas for addressing these issues beyond an old industrial policy of accelerating infrastructure-rebuilding -- "Every orange cone means a job," she beams into the TV camera! -- and issuing bonds to invest in government-picked start-ups. But for someone whose main campaign theme is that as a businessman he understands the challenges facing Michigan's businesses, Mr. DeVos's proposals, so far, are disappointing, to say the least.

He recently endorsed a law raising the minimum wage, disregarding that it will contribute to growing unemployment while making it harder for small businesses to remain profitable. He does insist -- correctly -- that lowering Michigan's tax burden, which is much above the national average on a per capita basis, ought to be priority No. 1. But apart from calling for the repeal of an already repealed Single Business Tax that assessed businesses on their payrolls as opposed to profits, his only other suggestion so far is scrapping the Personal Property Tax. This tax discourages businesses from making capital investments by taxing new machines, equipment and furniture. But the problem is that it is one item in a laundry list of petty programs -- not embedded in any consistent policy vision.

While Mr. DeVos's failure to enunciate such a vision is likely calculated to position him as a moderate, in reality it is only making him less believable to independent voters. Meanwhile, his conservative base is dispirited because he has diluted his commitment to school choice and is opposing a ballot proposal banning the government from using racial preferences. "He has to stop playing safe and take bolder positions," warns Tim Shields, a GOP political consultant. "Otherwise, his base might well decide that it does not make a difference who gets elected and stay home."

But articulating a vision is not just about attracting voters, it is also about obtaining a mandate to govern successfully. A vision will give him the clout and clarity, should he squeeze out a late-inning comeback, to resist the inevitable calls by Democrats to replace the business tax cuts with new taxes, and to insist, instead, on spending restraint to unshackle Michigan's economy.

Ms. Dalmia is a senior analyst at the Reason Foundation, a free-market think tank.

Connecticut Crucible For A War Debate (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

When the three candidates in Connecticut's celebrated Senate race met for their final debate on Monday night in New London, only one of them appeared to be having a good time.

It was not Ned Lamont, the tense and fidgety businessman who had captured the Democratic nomination as an opponent of the Iraq war. It was certainly not Joseph Lieberman, the three-term Democratic senator who had lost the primary to Lamont because of his support of that war and is running as an independent. Lieberman looked exhausted and exasperated by his situation, even though polls show him to be in front.

No, the only person who was relaxed, good-humored and reveling in the moment was Alan Schlesinger, the bulky Republican nominee whom no one gives a chance of winning. He jabbed humorously and effectively at both his opponents, noting how ironic it was that "a Greenwich multimillionaire" such as Lamont was running as a Democrat, while Lieberman, whose long list of liberal positions Schlesinger cited, was "masquerading as a Republican."

When a raucous bunch of zealots in the theater audience interrupted Lieberman's closing statement, and the feeble shushing of the senator and moderator George Stephanopoulos failed to silence them, it was Schlesinger who stepped to the edge of the stage and, with his size and commanding voice, ordered them to pipe down -- receiving thanks from Lieberman for his intervention.

It is not clear what the performance by the underfinanced Schlesinger, who has been officially abandoned as a candidate by the state and national GOP organizations, will do to the race. Lamont strategists hope he will attract more voters from the Republican base and thereby deprive Lieberman of support he might get from Republicans grateful for his sticking with President Bush on the war.

Lamont has no appeal to those Republicans and is also losing to Lieberman among independents, who respond to the senator's claim that he follows his conscience on national policy and delivers for the state. Polls also show that Lieberman has been taking more than one-third of the Democratic vote from Lamont. Reducing that percentage has become the chief objective for the Lamont campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0086662

Schlesinger threw down a challenge to both his opponents by taking a question about morality and foreign policy as an opportunity to unload on the topic of illegal immigration. Stephanopoulos tried to steer him back to the subject matter of the question, but Schlesinger was not to be deterred from joining the chorus of Republicans in other states, including embattled Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum, decrying Bush's policies and demanding that the border be closed.

Neither Lieberman nor Lamont took the bait, preferring to continue their own debate on Iraq.

The outcome of their fight is important nationally for the meaning that will be attached. While other states such as Missouri, Tennessee, Ohio and Virginia will decide whether Republicans or Democrats control the Senate, this Connecticut race constitutes perhaps the nation's clearest test on the Iraq war.

Lieberman insists he is not wholly in the Bush camp but still argues that a victory in Iraq is possible and essential for American security -- whatever that may mean. "I'm not ready to give up on the Muslim world," he said, adding that a democratic Iraq could serve as a model for the Middle East. His winning and returning to the Senate and its Democratic caucus would slow, if not reverse, growing pressure from the Democrats for an early pullout of U.S. forces.

On the other hand, should Lamont repeat his primary win over Lieberman and capture the seat, it would add immeasurably to the momentum of the antiwar forces. He says that he is running in order to end the nightmare of "140,000 of our brave troops stuck in the middle of a bloody civil war."

Lamont himself is not a strong figure or a compelling politician; he looks like a juvenile in a drawing room comedy, and he is competitive mainly because he has sunk much of his fortune into this race. Lieberman is an exhausted veteran, barely able to conceal his irritation at having to fight for a seat he feels that he owns. When challenged on his record, he turns testy.

Their weaknesses were exposed by Schlesinger's good humor. But theirs is the fight that counts -- and it counts a lot.

A New Campaign Tactic: Manipulating Google Data (NYT)

By Tom Zeller Jr.

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

If things go as planned for liberal bloggers in the next few weeks, searching Google for “Jon Kyl,” the Republican senator from Arizona now running for re-election, will produce high among the returns a link to an April 13 article from The Phoenix New Times, an alternative weekly.

Mr. Kyl “has spent his time in Washington kowtowing to the Bush administration and the radical right,” the article suggests, “very often to the detriment of Arizonans.”

Searching Google for “Peter King,” the Republican congressman from Long Island, would bring up a link to a Newsday article headlined “King Endorses Ethnic Profiling.”

Fifty or so other Republican candidates have also been made targets in a sophisticated “Google bombing” campaign intended to game the search engine’s ranking algorithms. By flooding the Web with references to the candidates and repeatedly cross-linking to specific articles and sites on the Web, it is possible to take advantage of Google’s formula and force those articles to the top of the list of search results.

The project was originally aimed at 70 Republican candidates but was scaled back to roughly 50 because Chris Bowers, who conceived it, thought some of the negative articles too partisan.

The articles to be used “had to come from news sources that would be widely trusted in the given district,” said Mr. Bowers, a contributor at MyDD.com (Direct Democracy), a liberal group blog. “We wanted actual news reports so it would be clear that we weren’t making anything up.”

Each name is associated with one article. Those articles are embedded in hyperlinks that are now being distributed widely among the left-leaning blogosphere. In an entry at MyDD.com this week, Mr. Bowers said: “When you discuss any of these races in the future, please, use the same embedded hyperlink when reprinting the Republican’s name. Then, I suppose, we will see what happens.”

DOJ_NMG_0086663

An accompanying part of the project is intended to buy up Google Adwords, so that searches for the candidates' names will bring up advertisements that point to the articles as well. But Mr. Bowers said his hopes for this were fading, because he was very busy.

The ability to manipulate the search engine's results has been demonstrated in the past. Searching for "miserable failure," for example, produces the official Web site of President Bush.

But it is far from clear whether this particular campaign will be successful. Much depends on the extent of political discussion already tied to a particular candidate's name.

It will be harder to manipulate results for searches of the name of a candidate who has already been widely covered in the news and widely discussed in the blogosphere, because so many links and so many pages already refer to that particular name. Search results on lesser-known candidates, with a smaller body of references and links, may be easier to change.

"We don't condone the practice of Google bombing, or any other action that seeks to affect the integrity of our search results," said Ricardo Reyes, a Google spokesman. "A site's ranking in Google's search results is automatically determined by computer algorithms using thousands of factors to calculate a page's relevance to a given query."

The company's faith in its system has produced a hands-off policy when it comes to correcting for the effects of Google bombs in the past. Over all, Google says, the integrity of the search product remains intact.

Writing in the company's blog last year, Marissa Mayer, Google's director of consumer Web products, suggested that pranks might be "distracting to some, but they don't affect the overall quality of our search service, whose objectivity, as always, remains the core of our mission."

Still, some conservative blogs have condemned Mr. Bowers's tactic. These include Outside the Beltway, which has called him "unscrupulous," and Hot Air, which declared the effort "fascinatingly evil."

But Mr. Bowers suggested that he was acting with complete transparency and said he hoped political campaigns would take up the tactic, which he called "search engine optimization," as a standard part of their arsenal.

"I did this out in the open using my real name, using my own Web site," he said. "There's no hidden agenda. One of the reasons for this is to show that campaigns should be doing this on their own."

Indeed, if all campaigns were doing it, the playing field might well be leveled.

Mr. Bowers said he did not believe the practice would actually deceive most Internet users.

"I think Internet users are very smart and most are aware of what a Google bomb is," he said, "and they will be aware that results can be massaged a bit."

Arab Americans Trending Democratic In Swing States (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

A new poll of Arab Americans in four battleground states shows a large shift in voter preferences that now favors Democratic candidates. If true, it represents a major shift from as recently as the 2000 presidential election, when then-Gov. George Bush won nearly 50 percent of Arab Americans' votes.

The survey, conducted by Zogby International for the Arab American Institute (AAI), of likely voters in Ohio, Florida and Pennsylvania found that Arab Americans are supporting Democrat gubernatorial and Senate candidates by close to 3-1 margins.

"This first started in early 2002," said AAI President James Zogby. "It enlarged in 2004, and now, in 2006, has grown to very large majorities." And with a number of close races potentially shifting the control of Congress, the major shift of even a small ethnic bloc could give one side the edge.

According to the AAI, the Arab American community is projected to cast a likely turnout of 510,000 voters who represent "up to" 5 percent of all voters in Michigan, 2 percent in Ohio and Florida and more than 1.5 percent in Pennsylvania.

Among those half-million voters, 45 percent self-identify as Democrats, while 31 percent call themselves Republicans. In all four states, the Democrats are leading among Arab Americans by large margins, with Florida's gubernatorial race being the exception.

"Clearly, there is a trend in the Democrats' direction," Mr. Zogby said. "Clearly, there is a vote for change."

DOJ_NMG_0086664

Gov. Edward G. Rendell, Pennsylvania Democrat, leads his Republican opponent Lynn Swann 67 percent to 22 percent, according to the poll. Similarly, in Ohio, Democrat gubernatorial candidate Ted Strickland leads Republican J. Kenneth Blackwell 60 percent to 21 percent.

This is also true in Michigan, even though the Republican Senate candidate, Michael Bouchard, is the grandson of Lebanese immigrants. The Zogby poll showed Mr. Bouchard trailing among Arab American voters to Democrat Sen. Debbie Stabenow 54 percent to 31 percent.

The numbers are a far cry from as recently as 2000, when Mr. Zogby says President Bush won the support of 46 percent of Arab Americans, compared with 38 percent who went for Al Gore. Independent candidate Ralph Nader, who is Lebanese, received 13 percent of the vote.

Pollster John Zogby, James Zogby's brother, said that his initial data on Arab-American voting trends, conducted between 1981 and 1984, showed "a fairly even balance" in voter identification between Democrats, Republicans and independents. For the most part, that trend continued through the late 1990s.

"In 1996, that parity was present," Mr. Zogby said. There has been a 12-point shift away from the Republicans over the past decade, he said.

However, Mr. Zogby said the shift toward Democrats was not necessarily a permanent one. "I'm not convinced those numbers are locked in place," he said. "John Kerry got 3-to-1 over George Bush, and he didn't earn it."

Mr. Zogby said the door could be open for a 2008 Republican presidential candidate who offers "a dramatic shift in policy" from the current administration. Democrats are benefiting mostly from being the opposition party. "In Ohio, it's because [Senate candidate Rep.] Sherrod Brown is not the Republican," he said.

Election May Turn On What Happened In Vegas (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf

USA Today, October 26, 2006

A Las Vegas cocktail waitress said Wednesday she was offered money to recant allegations that a Republican congressman running for Nevada governor assaulted and propositioned her.

Less than two weeks before the Nov. 7 election, the alleged bribery attempt that Chrissy Mazzeo, 32, described at a news conference reignited a sex-tinged controversy that Rep. Jim Gibbons says could influence his tight contest with Democratic state Sen. Dina Titus.

Gibbon's lawyer, Don Campbell, later at a news conference called Mazzeo “an exceedingly troubled young woman” with a “troubled past,” who was making “wild and reckless allegations.”

Gibbons, 61, who is married, has denied the allegations.

Mazzeo, who is raising a 3-year-old daughter alone, made three 911 calls on Oct. 13, then told police that Gibbons grabbed her arms in a parking garage, pushed her against a wall and pressured her for sex after drinking with her and four companions in a restaurant.

A police report quotes Gibbons as saying he had grabbed the arm of the woman, who “might have been tipsy,” to catch her from tripping and falling as he was helping her find her truck. Police reports say Gibbons and Mazzeo said they had been drinking wine.

Mazzeo told police Oct. 14 she didn't want to “go up against” Gibbons. She declined to press criminal charges but did not retract her allegations.

After accounts of the alleged incident appeared in local news media, Gibbons strongly denied the allegations publicly.

Clark County Sheriff Bill Young, a political supporter of Gibbons, urged voters to consider possible political motivations for the sexual misconduct allegations so close to the election.

Mazzeo's lawyer, Richard Wright, said Wednesday that Gibbons had thrown the woman's credibility into question. “I want all the truth to come out,” Mazzeo said.

Wright said a friend of Mazzeo had offered her money to sign a statement for Gibbons saying that nothing untoward had happened.

DOJ_NMG_0086665

Wright said he wants the Clark County district attorney's office to conduct an independent investigation.

Wednesday night, county District Attorney David Roger told KLAS-TV in Las Vegas that he is willing to pursue an investigation provided he has full cooperation from Mazzeo. Wright has said Mazzeo would cooperate and has offered to take a polygraph test.

Gibbons told the Reno Gazette-Journal on Monday that the incident "is going to have an impact on our campaign," but he said he would win.

The most recent public poll, conducted by Zogby International for The Wall Street Journal and released Friday, showed Gibbons leading Titus by 5 percentage points. The poll had a margin of error of +/-4 percentage points.

"If the public sees it as a reflection of bad judgment (by Gibbons), it can't help but have an impact on the campaign," Titus told the Reno newspaper Tuesday. "I have not commented, because I think it speaks for itself. It points to bad judgment, regardless of what happened."

Candidates Show Strain Of Tough Election Season (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 25 — With the finish line looming in one of the most intense Congressional election seasons in years, candidates are moving into take-no-prisoners mode. Some might consider taking a deep breath instead.

Fighting for their jobs in an increasingly frenzied political environment, several candidates are showing signs of strain, uttering words they later wish they could take back, running last-ditch advertisements that push the envelope and taking other actions that are out of the political ordinary. The gaffes can have real consequences, coming when voters are paying the closest attention.

Representative Barbara Cubin, a Wyoming Republican facing a strong challenge in what should be a safe seat, this week told an opponent who uses a wheelchair that she would slap him were he not disabled.

Representative Christopher Shays, Republican of Connecticut, normally a low-key moderate, portrayed the treatment of Iraqis at the Abu Ghraib prison as the product of a sex ring rather than of abuse. Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the No. 2 Democrat in the House, accused a black Senate candidate of "slavishly" supporting Republican policies and later apologized for a poor choice of words.

Senator Conrad Burns, a Republican fighting for his seat in Montana, hinted that there was a secret party plan for the war in Iraq. Representative Harold E. Ford Jr. of Tennessee used his campaign bus to interrupt a news conference of his opponent in the Senate race. Representative John Hostetler, an embattled Indiana Republican, broadcast a radio advertisement accusing the House Democratic leader, Representative Nancy Pelosi, of harboring a radical homosexual agenda.

John Raese, a businessman running against Senator Robert C. Byrd, a West Virginia Democrat who is 88, disparaged Mr. Byrd's physical condition. Mr. Byrd had suggested earlier that his opponent's late father would be ashamed of his son's candidacy.

"Thank God there are only 13 days left," said Tom Gavin, a spokesman for Mr. Byrd.

Political veterans say they are not surprised that some candidates are losing their cool.

"It is definitely the funny season," said Ed Rollins, a longtime Republican strategist. "When everybody thinks they are in jeopardy, whether they are or not, there is real panic. All these Republicans who thought they were in safe seats have seen their numbers drop dramatically. They are freaked."

Mr. Rollins and others attributed some of the missteps to the exhaustion of candidates who are running on fumes, the pressure of facing real competition for the first time in years, a desire to leave no stone unturned and a surly attitude that can overtake difficult campaigns in their final days.

"You hate your opponent, the press and the local politicos," said James Carville, an adviser to former President Bill Clinton and other candidates. "The combination of fatigue and pressure and everything causes people to do ridiculous things." Mr. Carville said that campaign operatives tended to overschedule late in the game. "Oftentimes," he said, "the campaigns and candidates would say, 'What do you think I should do?' And my answer is one word: less."

DOJ_NMG_0086666

After a debate on Sunday night in Casper, Wyo., Ms. Cubin approached the libertarian candidate, Thomas Rankin, who had questioned her on taking campaign aid from Tom DeLay, the former majority leader, and suggested that if Mr. Rankin, who has multiple sclerosis, did not use a wheelchair, "I'd slap you across the face."

Recounting the exchange Wednesday, Mr. Rankin said, "I feel that she is very worried about losing percentage points in the polls." He noted that the race included a third candidate, a Democrat, nipping at Ms. Cubin's heels.

Ms. Cubin's campaign did not respond to a request for comment on Wednesday, but she has offered an apology in local news interviews and attributed the remark to the stress and frustration of the campaign.

Mr. Shays, locked in a very difficult re-election campaign, also later backed away from his characterization this month of the Abu Ghraib scandal as the result of a sex ring among the military jailers.

But he has not retracted another remark that has drawn attention. Defending Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's handling of the Mark Foley Congressional page scandal, Mr. Shays said that Mr. Hastert "did not drive over a bridge and leave a young person in the water," a reference to a 1969 car accident involving Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, in which a female passenger died. Mr. Kennedy had campaigned for Mr. Shays's opponent, Diane Farrell.

Many considered the acid comments by Mr. Shays to be out of character. "The pressure, I think, was getting to him," said John Orman, a politics professor at Fairfield University and a former Congressional candidate.

Mr. Burns, the outspoken Montana senator who has been involved in a series of verbal dust-ups this year, drew comparisons this month to Richard M. Nixon during the Vietnam War when he chided his Democratic opponent, Jon Tester, over Iraq and said Mr. Bush had a plan for victory he was not sharing with Democrats. Mr. Burns later acknowledged that he occasionally spoke without thinking.

Senator Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, chairwoman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee, agreed with him on that point on Wednesday.

"Now, you know, occasionally he may say something that he shouldn't say," Mrs. Dole said during an appearance at the National Press Club. "He's an honest guy, and so that may happen."

With time running out and their seats in jeopardy, candidates are also reaching for their toughest advertisements. The one-minute radio spot being broadcast by Mr. Hostetler in Indiana warns that a Democratic victory will allow Ms. Pelosi to move forward with a radical homosexual agenda, assisted by Representative Barney Frank of Massachusetts, an openly gay member who was reprimanded by the House in 1990 for ethical breaches involving his relationship with a male prostitute.

Mr. Hostetler's campaign did not respond to a request to discuss the advertisement, but Ms. Pelosi's office did.

"It reeks of desperation," said Brendan Daly, a spokesman for the Democratic leader. "It is just the time of year when people go crazy and do crazy things, but it is not going to help them."

In West Virginia, Mr. Raese, who had previously avoided the subject of Mr. Byrd's advancing years and his occasional reliance on two canes, on Monday asked the editorial board of The Charleston Daily Mail, "Would you hire Robert Byrd if he came in and asked for a job?"

Gary Abernathy, a spokesman for Mr. Raese, said the comment reflected the candidate's frank style. "We have not made Senator Byrd's age or faculties part of the campaign rhetoric," he said. "But John feels it is obviously a factor that is a legitimate question when are you are discussing this race."

Mr. Gavin, the spokesman for Mr. Byrd, said the senator was not all that offended by the gibe. "Thankfully, Senator Byrd is not looking to take a job with Mr. Raese's companies," he said. "He will have a job for six more years."

Hillary Clinton Wins Minds But Not Yet Hearts (FT)

By Edward Luce In Washington

Financial Times, October 26, 2006

Hillary Clinton summoned a patient laugh. Having just been asked whether she had ever undergone plastic surgery, she replied: "You can look at these wrinkles – they're real."

John Spencer, the Republican whose senatorial campaign against Mrs Clinton looks more like a kamikaze mission each day, had suggested as much to one of New York's tabloids.

DOJ_NMG_0086667

"You seen pictures of her back then? Phew," said Mr Spencer. "I don't know why Bill married her."

Some suggest his real goal is to serve the larger Republican interest by ensuring that Mrs Clinton's victory next month is so emphatic she will gather unstoppable momentum to become the Democratic presidential candidate for 2008.

But there are reasons to believe the Republicans might be too sanguine about how easy it would be for their candidate to defeat Mrs Clinton in 2008, regardless of which party wins the mid-term congressional elections on November 7. A recent opinion poll in Time magazine put Mrs Clinton neck and neck with John McCain, the most likely Republican contender in the 2008 election, at 47 per cent apiece.

Watching Mrs Clinton, who turns 59 today, on the campaign trail in Long Island explains why many people who used to be hostile to her have become more open-minded.

Six years ago, when the then First Lady was selected as the Democratic candidate for New York, many saw her move as a brief stopover en route to a larger prize.

But Mrs Clinton has worked assiduously to win federal contracts and funding for communities in her state. For example, she successfully prevented the closure of a military base at Niagara and clinched $20bn (€15.5bn, £10.5bn) of immediate funding for New York after the September 11 2001 attacks.

Now she campaigns tirelessly to get better treatment for the fire and police employees who were affected by the dust at Ground Zero.

"Six years ago this room was not exactly a hothouse of support for me," said Mrs Clinton at the Suffolk Benevolent Association, a police station in suburban Long Island. Flanked by the type of hard-faced cops who would not give the time of day to a liberal, she was evidently among supporters.

"We are endorsing Mrs Clinton for the Senate because she understands us and stands up for our interests," said the local police spokesman.

At an event to rename a federal post office after a local Navy Special Forces officer killed last year fighting the Taliban in Afghanistan, Mrs Clinton spoke convincingly about military valour to hundreds of Long Island veterans.

Her speech betrayed years of diligent activity on the Senate armed services committee – Mrs Clinton's favourite platform on Capitol Hill.

"I have to admire her intelligence," said Thomas Tarragon, a retired major who said he was viscerally opposed to Mrs Clinton because she had allegedly "lied" to protect the then president Bill Clinton from the consequences of his infidelities in the White House. "The speech she gave today could have been given word-for-word by George Bush. The difference is that Mr Bush would have meant it."

In spite of her evident crowd-pulling abilities, doubts about her authenticity are unlikely to fade.

During the two senatorial debates and at press conferences on the campaign trail, Mrs Clinton has been dogged by two recurring questions.

Will she still be a senator six years from now when her term elapses? And how can she criticise Mr Bush for invading Iraq when she supported the congressional resolution which authorised it?

Mrs Clinton evades both with lawyerly consistency. "I have made no decision [about 2008]," says Mrs Clinton, although the fact she has raised close to $50m – far more than any other Democrat – for a senatorial race she could win for free keeps doubts simmering.

On Iraq, she says she thought the October 2002 resolution authorising force meant that it would never have to be used – an interpretation few others shared at the time. "I regret the way the president has used his authority," she says.

Meanwhile, Mrs Clinton's large staff, who jokingly refer to themselves as "Hillaryland", permit only homoeopathic doses of unscripted exposure.

Given the harsh tabloid scrutiny that Mrs Clinton has faced – barely a day passes without someone criticising what she is wearing or hinting at something about her husband – such protectiveness is understandable.

But even some of the veterans Mrs Clinton has won over say that her "message discipline" might become a liability during a presidential campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0086668

"Nobody really knows what she believes," said one bemedalled veteran, who was nevertheless happy that Mrs Clinton's speech had hit all the right notes about sacrifice on the battlefield.

US Faces 'bigger Skills Gap' Than India (FT)

By Francesco Guerrera, Richard Waters And Rebecca Knight

Financial Times, October 26, 2006

Azim Premji, chairman of Wipro, the Indian outsourcing group, has warned that the US faces a more acute skills shortage in information technology than India, blaming failings in America's education system and restrictive immigration policies.

The comments will bolster arguments by US companies such as Microsoft, General Electric, Google and Intel, which have urged Washington to act to reverse the steady erosion in the stock of domestic IT talent.

"There is a scarcity of IT professionals in the US," Mr Premji told the Financial Times. "Engineering is not growing talent, and that is a cause of concern."

He said Indian groups would confound expectations of a looming skills shortage in the country and continue to draw on lower-cost, highly trained graduates to retain their technological edge.

However, he said Wipro would also continue to expand outside India to serve non-English speaking countries and could open a base in Russia within 18 months.

Mr Premji, a Stanford University graduate, said the US education system was not doing enough to attract mathematics and science teachers or to steer students towards those subjects.

"Math is not considered as important, and students are not getting a premium when they graduate as engineers," he said. The US produces about 70,000 engineering graduates a year, a fraction of India's 400,000, though that number is boosted by holders of three-year diplomas.

Willard Daggett, president of the International Center for Leadership in Education, said: "The problem is not that our schools aren't what they used to be; the problem is that our schools are what they used to be."

Mr Premji said US skill shortages have been made more acute by visa rules that have cut the number of science students and professionals allowed into the US. He said the curbs made it difficult for outsourcing companies to serve US-based customers and warned that the powerful Indian IT industry could lobby the Indian government to impose retaliatory measures on the US.

Bill Gates, Microsoft's founder, has been warning about the evaporation of interest in computer science at US universities for more than two years.

Jeffrey Immelt, GE's chief, told a Washington audience in January that the US was on its way to becoming "the massage capital of the world", with more students graduating in sports sciences than electrical engineering.

The Era Of What's Next (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

Wooster, Ohio

Sometimes liberalism is dominant and sometimes conservatism is dominant, but sometimes there is no dominant ideology.

Between 1932 and 1968, liberalism dominated American politics. The big accomplishments were liberal accomplishments — Social Security, Medicare, the civil rights movement. Even if Republicans sometimes held the White House, the general drift of things was still to the left.

Between 1980 and 2006, conservatism was dominant. The big accomplishments were conservative accomplishments — the defeat of communism, the reinvigoration of the economy through deregulation, tax reform and monetarism, the rebalancing of the culture to emphasize family, work and individual responsibility. Even if Democrats sometimes held the White House, the general drift of things was to the right.

But in some eras there is no dominant political tendency. The 1970's were such a period. That decade was marked not by a change in political winds so much as by disillusionment and a scrambling of political categories. People who once had been liberals drifted away. Voters became cynical about politics itself. The pendulum swung not only from left to right but from politics to antipolitics. Jimmy Carter promised a break from the normal methods of political life.

DOJ_NMG_0086669

We're about to enter another of those periods without a dominant ideology. It's clear that this election will mark the end of conservative dominance. This election is a period, not a comma in political history.

That's clear not only because Republicans could lose their majorities, but for several other reasons. First, conservatives have exhausted their agenda. They have little new left to propose and have lost their edge on issues like fiscal discipline and foreign policy. Second, conservatives are beset by scandals, the kind of institutional decay that afflicts movements at the end of their political lives. Third, the Reagan coalition is splintering, with the factions going off in wildly different directions.

Fourth, there is no viable orthodox conservative candidate for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination. Orthodox conservatives like Allen, Frist and Santorum are fading, and only heterodox figures like McCain, Giuliani and Romney are rising.

If you look at the political landscape, identification with the Republican Party is falling but identification with the Democratic Party is not rising. Instead, there is a spike in the number of people who do not identify with either. People correctly perceive that neither party has a coherent agenda this year.

In the near term, the candidates who thrive will be those who offer a new way of politics. This might be the maverick independence of McCain, or the ostentatiously deliberative style of Obama, or it could be the manner of somebody whom none of us are even thinking about. Candidates who seem conventional will have a tough time. This includes Hillary Clinton.

Process issues will come to the fore, issues that have to do with the way politics is conducted. So will issues of character and decision-making style. George Bush's secretive and declarative method will soon seem archaic — like the silent picture acting style in the age of sound. Instead, voters will look for candidates as interactive as the technology around them.

The center of political gravity will shift. In the liberal era, the urban Northeast dominated the landscape. In the conservative era, it was in the South and in bedroom communities like those in Southern California. In the coming era, the center of gravity will move to the West and the Midwestern plains, and to the pragmatic, untethered office park suburbs sprouting up there.

The people who will be most important are those who can most precisely identify the new era's defining problems. The first is the continuing rise of Islamic fundamentalism. It's clear the categories of the nation-state era — rollback and containment — are not working to reverse extremism, but what will? The second big problem is entitlement spending and the stultification of government.

The third challenge is the emergence of China and India — seizing the opportunities afforded by those new workers, mitigating the pain associated with tougher competition and managing the fiscal imbalances. The fourth is the growing importance of cognitive skills and cultural capital, the need to surround people, especially children, with stable relationships if they are to flourish.

One party will become distracted by passing squalls, but the other will focus on those issues. Then, a new period of dominance will begin.

Special Treatment For Air America (WT)

By John R. Lott Jr. And Bradley A. Smith

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

When is a campaign donation not a campaign donation? Apparently if you spend the money to run a radio program instead of paying for campaign ads that run on that same program. Just look at Air America. With $41 million in losses since 2004, and $9.8 million owed just to Robert Glaser, RealNetworks chairman, Democrats who bankrolled this "company" weren't so much investors as campaign contributors. The losses are seen as simple business ineptitude,but Air America effectively, and perhaps intentionally, cleverly avoided the campaign finance limits which Democrats had worked so hard to pass.

With McCain-Feingold's "hard money" donation limits of $2,000 per candidate and "soft money" limits to party campaign committees of $57,500, there is no way that Mr. Glaser or other wealthy Democratic donors could have legally given such large sums directly to Democrats. But Air America provided a vehicle for their multimillion-dollar political campaigns.

Take Al Franken's show last Friday, the very day the network was declaring bankruptcy. The program devoted two-and-a-half hours to "Meet the Democrats," where five U.S. House and Senate candidates explained why they were the people for the job. Two-and-a-half hours straight of candidates talking is hardly stirring radio, but it is the Democrats' version of religious radio. Hardly meant to make a profit, but there to inspire the troops. After all, when the network started in 2004, Al Franken announced that: "I'm doing this because I want to use my energies to get Bush unelected."

DOJ_NMG_0086670

Since Air America started, successful radio entrepreneurs — most notably Rush Limbaugh — have argued that Air America never had a business model that made sense. But perhaps it had a model that made political sense.

It's hardly a coincidence that Air America debuted in time for the 2004 presidential campaign or that the bankruptcy filing was put off long enough so that creditors actions won't stop broadcasts before the Nov. 7 election. As if the willingness to lose money weren't already obvious, over a year ago the network started asking listeners to donate money to keep the programs on the air.

Air America merely follows a grand tradition of circumvention by the very people who have supported campaign-finance regulation. George Soros donated millions to help pass McCain-Feingold, but was quick to work around it so that his big dollars could keep flowing. During the 2004 presidential campaign,Mr. Soros was prohibited from giving money directly to his preferred candidate, Howard Dean, so he gave $15 million to MoveOn.org so that it could raise the money for Mr. Dean.

The big innovation for Air America was using the bankruptcy laws to turn non-Democrats into involuntary campaign donors. Not only are Democratic "investors" out in the cold, but landlords, limo services, law firms, stations that sold Air America air time and state governments are owed money. Apparently, the network still owes the Gloria Wise Boys and Girls Club, a New York City program for poor kids, a whopping $875,000 — money that was transferred from the club by its former director. But even while these people are being stiffed, since the bankruptcy Air America's founders brazenly announced they are starting a new left-wing radio network.

More importantly, though, Air America shows what a mess campaign finance regulations are in. As Justice Anthony Scalia noted during the oral arguments on McCain-Feingold's constitutionality: "if history teaches us anything, [it] is that when you plug one means of expression, the money will go to whatever means of expression are left." One such means is the press: broadcast stations, magazines and newspapers are exempt from the law.

But the term "news media" is difficult to define. When McCain-Feingold first passed in 2002, the National Rifle Association generated outrage when it talked about buying a TV station, so that like other media, it could mention a candidate's name during the 60 days before the general election. Sen. John Kerry demanded that the Federal Election Commission block any attempt by the NRA to get a media exemption, stating, "We urge you to prevent the NRA from hijacking America's airwaves with the gun lobby's money." There is no record of Mr. Kerry objecting to Air America's expenditures.

Unfortunately, the contradictions may soon be getting a lot worse. Recently two Seattle radio talk-show hosts were found guilty of violating the Washington State's campaign finance regulations. The monetary value of their commentary on an initiative exceeded campaign contribution limits.Their sin was apparently to fight for lower taxes. What's next? A monetary value assigned to positive news stories in newspapers?

News organizations will rightly claim that they cannot do their jobs if campaign-finance regulations are applied to them. Hopefully even the majority on the Supreme Court, which supported McCain-Feingold, will realize that regulating the content of news stories and regulating who is part of the media goes too far.

How to solve this problem? One solution — we'll call it the First Amendment solution — is to deregulate the system, let the voters hear what people (even those with "big money") have to say, and trust the voters to choose wisely. The alternative is to extend restrictions to the press. If the latter course is chosen, Mr. Soros and his friends risk finally bringing to America the strict government control of the news he witnessed firsthand as a boy growing up under Nazi and communist dictators.

John R. Lott Jr., the dean's visiting professor at SUNY-Binghamton, served as an unpaid expert witness for the plaintiffs in the McCain-Feingold case.Bradley A. Smith, chairman of the Center for Competitive Politics, is a law professor at Capital University Law School and a former chairman of the Federal Election Commission.

Kiss Of Death For 'President'? (USAT)

By Anthony Breznican

USA Today, October 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0086671

How do you get people to go to a movie that sounds like it's committing treason?

That's the challenge facing Newmarket Films' new Death of a President, a fictional documentary about what could happen if President Bush were assassinated.

Simply joking about killing a sitting president is a quick way to get a visit from the Secret Service. Could the theme make potential moviegoers skittish?

"It's not a crime to see the movie," jokes Richard Abramowitz, marketing director for Newmarket, which also released the controversial The Passion of the Christ. "The film does not promote violence on any level. It no more advocates for assassination of the president than Silence of the Lambs advocates for cannibalism."

Death of a President, from British director and co-writer Gabriel Range, has raised hackles ever since it premiered in September at the Toronto Film Festival.

Some large theater chains balked at featuring it, and the film will open Friday in about 100 theaters, mostly art houses. CNN and Fox News refused to run ads for the movie.

"There's a provocative element to it, particularly in synopsis," Abramowitz says. "A one-sentence logline makes the film sound more incendiary than it is."

The film starts with the faux assassination in 2007 and features fictional Secret Service agents, speechwriters, investigators and journalists discussing the events and their repercussions.

One of the suspects has ties to Syria, which leads the newly inaugurated President Cheney to threaten military force.

Range, who has made similar theoretical films about the "collapse" of Britain's transportation and banking systems, says he used Bush instead of a fictional substitute because the story would have been powerless without the trappings of current events.

"This film is about the world we live in," he says. "It's about the consequences of the climate of fear."

Though it won the International Critics Award in Toronto, reviews have been divided.

Jim Emerson, who is filling in for the ailing Roger Ebert at the Chicago Sun-Times, wrote that the use of real characters is "seamless, intelligent and maybe even necessary to an understanding of George W. Bush's role in the world." The Hollywood Reporter's Kirk Honeycutt called Range's manipulation of real footage a "morally dubious tactic."

Conservatives and liberals alike have condemned the subject matter. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton called the film "despicable."

Though the White House is obviously displeased with his film, Range says he was contacted only once by the Secret Service, when he was shooting motorcade scenes in Chicago.

Range says Secret Service agents did not ask him to submit a script for review. "I think it was clear to them that the film was being made, and no way was it going to incite anyone to do this."

A Capital Connection (WP)

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

THE QUALITY of communication between the Washington area and Beijing could influence global stability. But there is no direct flight between the two capitals. Over the next couple of months, the Transportation Department will consider whether that should change. For economic reasons as well as geopolitical ones, the department should back a United Airlines proposal to launch daily service to Beijing from Dulles International Airport.

Because the Chinese government restricts direct flights into Beijing and Shanghai, the number of American cities with nonstop access has to be rationed. At present, there are direct connections to Shanghai, Beijing or both from San Francisco, Los Angeles, Chicago, New York and Newark. Under an agreement with the Chinese, the Transportation Department can give out one more direct link. Washington is competing for the prize with Newark, Detroit and Dallas. All contestants pad their case with scrolls of politicians' signatures and learned economic studies.

Newark serves a large region full of globe-trotters, but it already has direct service to Shanghai and there are daily nonstop flights to Beijing from New York's John F. Kennedy International Airport. Detroit and Dallas lack direct flights, but their populations are 5.4 million and 6.2 million, respectively; the Washington metro area (including Baltimore) has 8.2 million. Washingtonians are more prone to visit China, too. In 2005, according to Transportation Department data, 49,200 people flew (indirectly) from Washington to Beijing. But only 29,510 travelers flew the Detroit-Shanghai route that Northwest Airlines would like to serve. And only 13,390 flew from Dallas to Beijing, the route proposed by American Airlines.

DOJ_NMG_0086672

The critics of the Washington route complain that United Airlines already hogs four direct flights to China a day, and awarding it a fifth would give it an unfair lead on its competitors. But United would have only a third of the nonstop flights to China. Moreover, in a market in which regulation creates artificial scarcity, what matters is not just the variety of suppliers but the quantity of the supply. Because United is proposing to use a bigger aircraft than its competitors, awarding the route to Washington would probably do more to hold down prices than awarding it to one of the other bidders.

Washington is the nation's fourth most-populous metro area after New York, Los Angeles and Chicago. That makes it the biggest without direct flights to China. For the Transportation Department, this shouldn't be a hard decision.

Not So Big Oil (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

Our favorite headline this week has to be "Big Worries for Big Oil," reporting that oil company profits are under pressure as oil prices decline. Exxon Mobil, Royal Dutch Shell, BP and other members of the vast energy conspiracy may have a hard time keeping their run of profit growth going now that oil prices have fallen to $60 or so a barrel from upwards of $80.

Imagine that: Oil companies are subject to market forces. They may make big profits when the price of oil rises, but those profits invariably fall back down to Earth when oil prices decline. This is also what happened in the 1990s, as oil crashed below $20 a barrel after the heights reached in the 1970s. The companies and their shareholders swallowed those declines, as they should have.

This cycle is typical of commodity markets, and is part of the risk of doing business. The run-up in oil prices over the past couple of years was rooted in worries about supply related to hurricanes, Middle East tensions and low stockpiles, as well as growing demand in a strong global economy and the Federal Reserve's easy money policy. As supply fears and demand have ebbed and the Fed has tightened, prices have fallen back down, albeit still to higher levels than a decade ago.

The recent price decline is also proof of the folly of a "windfall profits" tax or similar punitive measures against Big Oil favored by so many politicians. Only this week, however, Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi repeated her pledge to soak the oil companies if her party takes over the House next month.

Her policy seems to be that when oil prices decline, oil company shareholders must absorb all the market risk and the lower profits. But when oil prices rise, the companies must hand over a cut of their profits to Members of Congress to spend as they like. The only "windfall" is for the political class.

Chad Says Sudan Is Arming Rebels (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

NDJAMENA, Chad, Oct. 25 — The Chadian government on Wednesday accused Sudan of supplying rebel groups seeking to overthrow President Idriss Déby with weapons and providing them cover to operate in Sudanese territory.

The accusation, made by government and military officials as a rebel group moved toward the capital, heightened the already tense relations between the neighboring countries. They have been at odds over the rebellion in Darfur, which Sudan accuses Chad's government of supporting.

"These rebels entered Chad from Sudan, and they could only have procured this type of military equipment within the sight of and with the knowledge of the Sudanese authorities," the Chadian foreign minister, Ahmar Allami, told Agence France-Presse. "Sudan cannot deny it."

Lt. Col. Mahamat Hassane, a spokesman for the Chadian military, said the rebel group had reached the provincial town of Am Timan, but had not gone any further.

The loose coalition of several rebel factions opposed to Mr. Déby's government have advanced from the eastern part of the country toward the capital, but appear to have stalled. The government has sent reinforcements to Mongo, hoping to prevent the rebels from marching into the capital.

DOJ_NMG_0086673

Government officials and diplomats feared a replay of the coup attempt in April, when hundreds of troops drove across the eastern scrubland into Ndjamena, and fierce firefights broke out. About 300 people were killed in the fighting, though the coup attempt failed.

In the current standoff, there have been no confrontations between the rebels and the army. The rebel group has occupied at least two towns, but their location, the size of their force and their intentions remain unclear. The group appears to be well armed — it fired a SAM-7 ground-to-air missile at a French military plane, according to the French government, but did not hit it.

Chad and Sudan have been trading accusations over the past year that each country supports rebel movements in the other. The countries appeared to reconcile this summer under a nonaggression pact brokered by Libya. Sudan's president, Omar al-Bashir, attended the inauguration of Mr. Déby, who was re-elected in May after changing the Constitution to allow him to run for a third term.

The increased conflict along the porous border between Chad and Sudan has stymied aid operations to help the estimated 250,000 Sudanese refugees in Chad and 2.5 million displaced Darfurians inside Sudan. It has also forced tens of thousands of Chadians to flee their homes, some into war-ravaged Darfur.

U.S. Faults Europeans' Proposed Iran Sanctions (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

The Bush administration has raised sharp but unspecified objections to a draft package of sanctions against Iran floated by European countries.

The resolution, proposed by Britain, France and Germany under the aegis of the United Nations, seeks to cut off most outside support to Iran's nuclear and ballistic-missile programs, while limiting the travel of top Iranian military officials, European diplomats said yesterday.

Iran's uranium-enrichment program has raised suspicions that it aims to develop atomic weapons, though Tehran maintains it has only civilian-energy goals. The Europeans, who have led the diplomacy with Iran for nearly three years, are trying to craft an initial package of economic penalties that will win the support of Washington, which wants tougher punishments, as well as Russia and China, which are leery of sanctioning Iran.

A U.S. official who reviewed the draft said, "The Europeans have a fundamental difference with us on how to proceed, and this draft reflects that difference."

This first sanctions package is meant to be part of a series of increasingly stern resolutions if Iran continues to steam ahead on its nuclear program. Yet the difficulty in forging consensus on this first step shows how hard it will be to win agreement on a second sanctions plan.

Bush administration officials yesterday declined to provide details on how they would like the draft resolution altered, other than to say it isn't yet stringent enough. They cautioned that negotiations on specific language are at an early stage, and differences could be resolved in coming days. Russian and Chinese diplomats said they were still reviewing the draft and declined to comment.

Top officials in Moscow and Beijing have expressed reservations about imposing any measures that would encourage the Iranians to pull out of the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty or to reject future cooperation with the International Atomic Energy Agency. Iran signed the treaty in the 1960s, forswearing nuclear weapons in exchange for access to technology that could be used for an energy program.

One issue particularly sensitive to Moscow is the future of the Russian-led work on Iran's Bushehr nuclear-power plant, which Russia doesn't want to see canceled. The draft would allow that work to continue, but without Russia supplying the reactor with fuel. U.S. officials said they would like the language on Bushehr to be altered, but declined to provide details of what Washington wants.

A U.N. resolution in July threatened to impose sanctions on Iran if it didn't suspend uranium enrichment and agree to return to negotiations by the end of August. Since then, the U.S., Russia, China, France and Britain -- the five veto-wielding members of the U.N. Security Council -- have wrestled with what sort of penalties might bring Tehran back to the table.

DOJ_NMG_0086674

The Bush administration has hoped that concerns about North Korea's nuclear test earlier this month might galvanize support for a more muscular approach toward Tehran. Yet Iran's oil wealth and complex commercial interactions with Europe, Russia and China make the U.N. diplomatic effort more complex.

European and U.S. diplomats said negotiations over the draft resolution could drag into next week or beyond.

Write to Neil King Jr. at neil.king@wsj.com1

Draft Iran Resolution Would Restrict Students (NYT)

By Helene Cooper And Thom Shanker

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 25 — The United States and three European allies have given Russia and China a draft text for a Security Council resolution against Iran's nuclear program. The proposal includes the extraordinary step of preventing Iranian students from studying nuclear physics at foreign universities and colleges.

The draft resolution would also prohibit any technical or financial assistance that could benefit Iran's nuclear program, and would impose a visa ban on any Iranians involved in nuclear activities, according to European diplomats involved in the negotiations.

Bush administration officials and their European counterparts have been squabbling over details of the draft resolution for the past week, and the horse-trading will probably increase now that the Russians and the Chinese have been given the draft.

United Nations ambassadors from the six countries — the five permanent members of the Security Council and Germany — are scheduled to meet Thursday to debate the resolution, officials said.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice urged the Security Council to move rapidly to adopt the resolution, saying the authority and standing of the international community were at stake.

"For the international community to be credible, it must pass a resolution now that holds Iran accountable for its defiance," Ms. Rice said during a speech on Asia policy at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative Washington policy research organization.

She said that Iran and North Korea had challenged international attempts to halt the proliferation of unconventional weapons, and cautioned that the Iranian leadership was assessing how strictly the world community would enforce recent United Nations sanctions on North Korea.

"The Iranian regime is watching how the world responds to North Korea's behavior, and it can now see that the international community will confront this threat," she said. "Iran can see that the path North Korea is choosing is not leading to more prestige and more prosperity or more security; it's leading to just the opposite."

But after five months of missed deadlines, counterproposals and diplomatic overtures on Iran, few officials from any of the six countries involved were willing to predict when a final sanctions resolution might pass the Security Council. "A matter of weeks," one senior Bush administration official said. "Maybe."

"Will it be the resolution that we would have if we had written it by ourselves? Probably not, but that's part of multilateral diplomacy," Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman, said. "We fully support this draft, and we look forward to its adoption."

As is customary in diplomatic negotiations, officials who were most up to date on the talks would not allow themselves to be publicly identified by name or nationality. Those who discussed it on background came from several nations involved in the talks.

It was unclear just how far-reaching the proposed ban against nuclear education for Iranian students abroad would be, and the diplomats involved in the negotiations did not seem to have resolved that issue.

The prohibition would ban any training and education of Iranian citizens if it could eventually contribute to nuclear and ballistic missile programs. But whether such a ban would extend to all physics courses, or even to mathematics and other courses, remained undetermined.

The bickering of late has largely been tactical, with the United States on one side and Europe on the other, with both sides trying to decide how best to get the Russians and Chinese to sign on to tough sanctions.

DOJ_NMG_0086675

The American ambassador to the United Nations, John R. Bolton, for instance demanded that the draft resolution bar Russia from continuing to build Iran's first nuclear power plant — at Bushehr, in the southwest of the country — American and European negotiators said. While some American officials acknowledged that a provision against all work on Bushehr was unrealistic, Mr. Bolton wanted to put it on the table as a bargaining chip to get other Russian concessions, European diplomats said.

The French and British, however, disagreed with that approach, arguing that Bushehr was a "red line" for the Russian foreign minister, Sergey Lavrov, and there was no point in putting something in the draft that would come out anyway.

"It's like a flea market," said one European diplomat. "The Americans say, 'We have to make the text even stronger because we know the Russians will water it down.' But that's not a productive way of thinking."

The draft resolution states that sanctions would apply to fuel at Bushehr but not construction, diplomats said.

Iran Said To Be Stepping Up Nuclear Programme (FT)

By Najmeh Bozorgmeh In Tehran And Guy Dinmore In Washington

Financial Times, October 26, 2006

Iran was reported on Wednesday to be accelerating its uranium enrichment process even as Europe took the first steps at the United Nations Security Council towards obtaining a resolution that would impose sanctions on Iran for refusing to suspend its nuclear fuel programme.

Iran's semi-official student news agency, ISNA, quoted an unnamed Iranian official who said a second network, or cascade, of centrifuges used to produce enriched uranium was installed last week, and that injection of the gas feed would take place this week.

"The product of the second cascade will be achieved soon after gas injection," the official said.

Iran began running one cascade of 164 centrifuges at its Natanz facility under UN inspection in January. It denies it has a weapons programme and says the uranium will only be enriched to the low level needed to fuel a civilian nuclear reactor.

Experts in Tehran believe Iran's installation of the second cascade is intended to signal its defiance of sanctions that have been threatened following the Islamic republic's refusal to heed a UN security council demand to suspend the programme that set an August 31 deadline.

"It's a significant part of Iran's policy… to show 'stick policy' will lead only to escalation of [the] crisis and won't hurt Iran's irreversible path," commented Aftab website which is close to Hassan Rowhani, the former nuclear negotiator.

Regime insiders say Iran's top leadership is not particularly worried about nuclear-related sanctions.

On Wednesday France, Germany and the UK – the so-called EU3 that had been negotiating with Iran – presented a draft sanctions resolution to the US, Russia and China for discussion.

Diplomats said one issue at dispute between the EU3 and the US was the future of the Bushehr reactor under construction by Russia in southern Iran. The draft says the "construction" of Bushehr is exempt from the sanctions, but the US has sought to block Russia's planned supply of nuclear fuel next year.

Nicholas Burns, US under secretary of state, said he did not think the Bushehr issue would be a major stumbling block.

The European proposal would seek to prohibit nuclear and ballistic missile cooperation with Iran - unless exempted - by taking "necessary measures" to prevent the supply, sale or transfer of materials and technology. It would also halt related financial transactions, block international travel for Iranians connected to those activities and freeze their overseas assets.

A list is to be drawn up of individuals subject to the travel ban and asset freeze. It is not clear how far up the political hierarchy such a list might go.

Discussions among the five permanent members of the Security Souncil and Germany are to start on Thursday.

Tony Blair, the UK prime minister, told parliament that the UK was working closely with other veto-wielding Security Council members to get a "proper, binding resolution".

The US and Europe say the proposed resolution is intended as a first step, and would be followed by steadily escalating measures if Iran did not comply.

DOJ_NMG_0086676

At the same time, diplomats are worried that the process could end up replicating the crisis with North Korea whereby Iran would respond to threats by expelling UN inspectors and quitting the nuclear Non Proliferation Treaty. For this reason Europe – including the Russians who have a $1bn contract – are insisting that the Bushehr project should be allowed to continue.

European officials hope negotiations will resume with Iran but on the precondition that it first suspend its enrichment programme.

President George W. Bush reiterated on Wednesday that the US would be ready to join Europe in negotiations following verifiable suspension.

"We've got a lot of issues with Iran," Mr Bush told a news conference. "The first is whether or not they will help this young democracy succeed," he said, referring to Iraq. He said the "second issue" was whether Iran would help the Lebanese government, and that the "big issue" was "whether or not Iran will end up with a nuclear weapon".

Secretary Of State ElBaradei (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

Mohamed ElBaradei, the director general of the U.N.'s International Atomic Energy Agency, is supposed to be the Jack Webb of the nuclear nonproliferation scene, a "just the facts" man who reports his findings to his political superiors in the U.N. Security Council. Lately, however, he's been sounding more like the real life Jimmy Carter than the fictional TV detective.

"I don't think sanctions work as a penalty," Mr. ElBaradei opined after meeting with Condoleezza Rice on Monday. The director general was talking about North Korea, of whose leaders he took the forgiving view that they are testing nuclear weapons because "they feel isolated, they feel they are not getting the security they need." As for Iran, "the jury is still out on whether they are developing a nuclear weapon." However, he was quite certain that "at the end of the day, we have to bite the bullet and talk to North Korea and Iran." No doubt Condi was grateful for this free public chiding.

Leave aside for now the substance of Mr. ElBaradei's policy views; at stake here is the question of whether the IAEA can be trusted to be "continuously objective and impartial," words the director general has used elsewhere to describe his organization. That's also the line he took when he was lobbying in 2005 for an unprecedented third term against the opposition of then Undersecretary of State John Bolton, keeping the job after Ms. Rice and the White House acquiesced while asking Mr. ElBaradei to be tough on Iran.

These assurances look disingenuous now that Mr. ElBaradei is offering confident judgments, well above his pay grade, about Kim Jong Il's motives -- and cautious ones about Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's. It's even harder to believe given the selective leaks and political hits the IAEA has recently practiced against the Bush Administration and its allies in Congress.

Consider a recent imbroglio between Mr. ElBaradei and Pete Hoekstra, Chairman of the House's Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence. In the last year, and initially with bipartisan agreement, Mr. Hoekstra's committee has published regular reports on threats to American security, including on al Qaeda, North Korea and Iran. These reports are generally based on reputable open sources and are intended for broad public distribution and debate. They also repeatedly acknowledge that "the United States . . . [lacks] critical information needed for analysts to make some key judgments."

In other words, there's not much to get worked up about here. At least not until the IAEA decided to leak to the press an ostensibly private letter to Mr. Hoekstra detailing its objections to a report on Iran, which the agency variously labeled "outrageous," "dishonest," "erroneous" and "misleading."

And what was so dreadful about the report, which had bipartisan blessing? Aside from huffing over two committee "errors" -- one of them trivial, the other semantic -- the IAEA took furious exception over the committee's statement that the IAEA had decided to remove Chris Charlier, its chief weapons' inspector for Iran, after Mr. Charlier said publicly that he thought the Iranians were intent on building a nuclear weapon.

The IAEA insists that it was Iran, not the IAEA, that demanded Mr. Charlier's removal, and that Iran is within its legal rights to do so. That's true. But it is also true that Iran has repeatedly -- and illegally -- denied IAEA inspectors the multiple-entry visas they need to do their job.

DOJ_NMG_0086677

"Iran has consistently been in non-compliance with its safeguards agreement on this point," a former IAEA official recently told the Platts news agency. "And until now the IAEA has been unwilling to draw international attention to that fact." Our sources tell us that, in addition to Mr. Charlier, Iran denied entry to two other IAEA weapons inspectors in August alone.

This is no small thing. Under Mr. ElBaradei's leadership the IAEA has presented itself as the ultimate arbiter on questions of nuclear proliferation, despite its failures to detect Iraq's nuclear-weapons programs in the 1980s and Libya's in the early part of this decade. Yet if the IAEA cannot get its personnel unimpeded into Iran -- and especially if Iran can bar the toughest, most skeptical inspectors -- the quality of the IAEA's information and the reliability of its judgments are bound to deteriorate.

Had Mr. ElBaradei been doing his real job, he might have made a more strenuous effort at pointing out publicly Iran's failures to comply with its obligations, rather than offer grand pronouncements on diplomacy and making partisan intrusions into American politics by critiquing Congressional white papers and Administration policy. As it is, we have Mr. Hoekstra to thank for bringing to light yet another instance of Iran's bad faith, and of the U.N.'s unreliability.

Iranian Ex-Leader Sought In Argentina (WP/AP)

By Oscar Serrat

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

BUENOS AIRES, Oct. 25 -- Argentine prosecutors asked a federal judge on Wednesday to order the arrest of former Iranian president Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani and seven other people in the 1994 suicide bombing of a Jewish community center here that killed 85 people.

The decision to attack the center "was undertaken in 1993 by the highest authorities of the then-government of Iran," prosecutor Alberto Nisman said at a news conference. He said the actual attack was entrusted to the Lebanon-based group Hezbollah.

The detonation of an explosives-laden vehicle near the Jewish center in Buenos Aires was among the worst terrorist attacks ever on Argentine soil. In addition to killing 85 people, the attack injured more than 200.

Iran's government has vehemently denied any involvement in the bombing, following repeated accusations by Jewish community leaders and others here. Iranian authorities in Buenos Aires declined to comment.

Prosecutors urged the judge to seek international and national arrest orders for Rafsanjani, who was Iran's president from 1989 to 1997. They also asked the judge to detain former intelligence chief Ali Fallahijan and former foreign minister Ali Akbar Velayati.

In addition, they urged the arrest of two former commanders of Iran's Revolutionary Guards, two former Iranian diplomats and a former Hezbollah security chief for external affairs.

Nisman and fellow prosecutor Marcelo MartÃ-nez Burgos said they suspected that Hezbollah undertook activities outside Lebanon only "under orders directly emanating from the regime in Tehran."

Federal Judge Rodolfo Canicoba Corral made no public comments after the news conference. Under Argentine law, the judge is allowed an indefinite period to accept or reject such recommendations.

The two prosecutors head a special investigative unit probing the attack on the Jewish center, since rebuilt into a heavily guarded fortress-like compound.

Nisman announced in November 2005 that investigators believed a 21-year-old Lebanese member of Hezbollah was the suicide bomber.

The attack on the seven-story center, a symbol of Argentina's more than 200,000-strong Jewish population, was the second of two attacks against Jews in Argentina during the 1990s.

In March 1992, a blast destroyed the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires. Twenty-nine people died in that attack, which has also been blamed on Hezbollah.

Some people here speculated that the embassy bombing was inspired by Argentina's support for the U.S.-led coalition that expelled Iraqi forces from Kuwait during the Persian Gulf War in 1991. Others said Argentina's Jewish community, one of the largest in Latin America, represented an obvious target for Israel's opponents.

DOJ_NMG_0086678

Although Jewish community leaders and others have said they suspect the involvement of Middle East terrorists in the 1994 attack, lack of progress in tracking down the organizers has made families of the victims increasingly bitter. In 2004, about a dozen former police officers and an accused trafficker in stolen vehicles were acquitted of charges that they had formed a "local connection" in the bombing.

Argentina Seeks Arrest Of Former Iranian Leader (USAT/AP)

By Oscar Serrat

USA Today, October 26, 2006

BUENOS AIRES — Argentine prosecutors asked a federal judge on Wednesday to order the arrest of former Iranian president Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani and seven others in the 1994 bombing of a Jewish cultural center that killed 85.

The decision to attack the center "was undertaken in 1993 by the highest authorities of the then-government of Iran," prosecutor Alberto Nisman said. He said the attack was carried out by the Lebanon-based group Hezbollah.

The bombing of the Jewish cultural center in Buenos Aires killed 85 people and injured more than 200 when a vehicle laden with explosives detonated near the building. It was the worst terrorist attack in Argentine history.

Iran's government has vehemently denied any involvement in the attack following repeated accusations by Jewish community and other leaders here. Iranian authorities here contacted by the Associated Press had no comment.

Prosecutors urged the judge to seek international and national arrest orders for Rafsanjani, Iran's president from 1989 to 1997. They also asked the judge to detain other former Iranian officials, including an intelligence chief, Ali Fallahijan, and a foreign minister, Ali Ar Velayati.

The prosecutors urged the arrest of two former commanders of Iran's Revolutionary Guards, two former Iranian diplomats and a former Hezbollah security chief.

Nisman and fellow prosecutor Marcelo Martinez Burgos said they suspected that Hezbollah undertook activities outside Lebanon only "under orders directly emanating from the regime in Tehran."

Federal Judge Rodolfo Canicoba Corral had no comment. He has an indefinite amount of time to accept or reject the recommendations.

The current investigation began after Argentina's federal courts in 2004 halted a botched investigation into the case.

Nisman announced last November that investigators believed a suspected 21-year-old Lebanese Hezbollah militant had been identified as the suicide bomber.

Jewish center leaders said Wednesday that they had no immediate statement.

The attack on the seven-story Jewish center, a symbol of Argentina's more than 200,000-strong Jewish population, was the second of two attacks targeting Jews in Argentina during the 1990s.

A March 1992 blast destroyed the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires, killing 29 people.

Argentine Prosecutor Ties Iran To Bombing Of Jewish Center (MCT)

By Claudia Sanchez, Jack Chang And Kevin G. Hall

McClatchy Newspapers, October 26, 2006

BUENOS AIRES, Argentina - An Argentine prosecutor on Wednesday sought the arrest of former Iranian President Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, accusing him of approving the 1994 car bombing that killed 85 people at a Jewish community center in the Argentine capital.

Prosecutor Alberto Nisman charged that six other Iranians and a Lebanese were involved in the attack, including a top Hezbollah figure, Imad Fayez Mugniyah. Mugniyah is already wanted by the United States for allegedly plotting the 1983 bombing of the U.S. Marine barracks in Beirut and the 1985 hijacking of a TWA airliner, which resulted in the murder of U.S. Navy diver Robert Stethem.

Nisman said the accused met on Aug. 13, 1993, in Mashad, one of Iran's holiest cities, to approve the attack. He charged that the plot involved not only top political officials, but also lower-level diplomats in the Iranian Embassy in Buenos Aires.

"It wasn't a decision taken around a coffee table one day to the next by five or six gentlemen," said Nisman. He called it a well-calculated plan that was part of a "terrorist matrix" that included assassinations in France, Germany and Switzerland.

DOJ_NMG_0086679

Nisman is the first Argentine official to publicly accuse officials in Tehran of involvement in the attack, which many here consider the Argentine equivalent of Sept. 11, and his charges lend credence to longstanding American claims that Iran and Hezbollah are sponsors of international terrorism.

But they aren't likely to result in arrests anytime soon. Judge Rodolfo Canicoba Corral must first approve Nisman's findings and issue arrest warrants. Then Argentina would have to seek the suspects' extradition from Iran - a request Iran is unlikely to honor.

Warrants could, however, prevent the suspects from traveling freely outside Iran; they'd be subject to arrest under international police agreements.

Nisman, who spoke to reporters in Buenos Aires, released few details of his investigation. A full report was given to Canicoba on a CD because of the volume of the material. It's unknown when Canicoba will rule on the matter.

How Nisman traced the bombing to a specific meeting attended by Rafsanjani is also unknown. In Washington, Vincent Cannistraro, a former head of counterterrorism operations and analysis for the CIA, said he doesn't know of anyone who can confirm the meeting.

"From an intelligence point of view, we know Mugniyah directed the operation," Cannistraro said. "There's been no confirmation of any meeting. ... No one has that precise intelligence. I do know there is not a hard source that is credible and attended that meeting."

Rafsanjani was the president of Iran from 1989 to 1997 and remains a powerful political force there. He ran for president last year, but was defeated by the current president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. He currently serves as chairman of the Expediency Discernment Council, a powerful body that attempts to resolve policy differences between the government and the clerics who must approve all government actions.

In 1997, German prosecutors said they believed Rafsanjani ordered the murder of an Iranian-Kurdish leader there, but Rafsanjani was never charged.

Rafsanjani also was the go-between in the arms-for-hostages deals that gave rise to the Iran-contra affair during Ronald Reagan's presidency.

Mugniyah has an extensive terrorist resume. He was indicted in the United States for Stethem's murder and is on the European Union's list of most wanted terrorists. He's variously described as Hezbollah's head of security and a founder of the organization. In addition to the Marines barracks bombing, he's thought to have been involved in the 1983 bombing of the U.S. Embassy in Beirut and the kidnapping of journalist Terry Anderson there.

The United States has offered a $5 million reward for his capture.

The bombing of the AMIA Jewish center here has remained an open wound, with accusations of bungling and cover-ups being levied against successive Argentine governments. The only people tried in the case were two Argentine police officers accused of helping terrorists obtain a van used to carry a hidden bomb. Both were cleared.

Adding to the mystery, a former Iranian spy alleged in 2003 that Carlos Saul Menem, Argentina's president at the time of the bombing, received $10 million in a secret Swiss bank account as payment from Iran to quash the investigation. Menem, of Syrian descent, acknowledged the secret account but denied the hush money.

Later that same year, as Argentina tried to have Great Britain extradite Hadi Soleimanpour, Iran's former ambassador to Argentina, news reports emerged that the chief Argentine judge investigating the bombing - Juan Jose Galeano - paid a witness $400,000 for testimony and that he was writing a book on the case. He was removed from the case in 2004, and Nisman was appointed to investigate.

Against that backdrop, families of the victims had their doubts Wednesday.

"After more than 12 years, we had hoped for more results," said Sofia Guterman, whose 28-year-old daughter, Andrea, perished in the attack, which also injured more than 200. "I don't think it'll be very easy to extradite those people."

Lawyers representing the victims were a bit more upbeat. Marta Nercellas, who's investigated the Iranian connection even when her government wouldn't, told McClatchy Newspapers that there's new evidence in Nisman's case.

Nercellas said Nisman's report includes testimony from former Iranian spies and ex-Hezbollah fighters who now reside in Europe.

DOJ_NMG_0086680

"There are new and different testimonies," she said.

McClatchy Newspapers special correspondent Sanchez reported from Buenos Aires, Chang from Rio de Janeiro and Hall from Washington.

Rice Presses South Korea On Sanctions (AP-Y)

By Anne Gearan, Ap Diplomatic Writer

AP, October 26, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice gently prodded South Korea on Wednesday to show a strong commitment to international sanctions imposed against North Korea for its nuclear test this month.

Rice said the U.S. has no wish to tell Seoul how it should coexist with its neighbor and noted the vigorous debate in South Korea over the future of its "sunshine policy" of partial rapprochement.

But she said North Korea's test of a nuclear device Oct. 9 "requires a strong response," and said that adherence to a U.N. resolution banning the sale of weapons material, luxury goods and more to North Korea is key. The sanctions also seek interception of ships believed to be carrying suspect materials.

"It requires a strong commitment by South Korea," she told the conservative Heritage Foundation. "Any activities need to be seen in the light of making certain to implement that resolution."

South Korea so far has balked at taking strong measures to support the sanctions, mindful of Pyongyang's massive armed forces poised at the border, its family and cultural ties with the North and its wish to expand economic relations with its neighbor.

"We understand that this is a complicated set of issues for South Korea," she said. "South Koreans don't need us to tell them what to do about their policies."

Rice returned Sunday from a weeklong trip to Asia and Moscow to line up support for the U.N. resolution, approved five days after the North's nuclear test.

"North Korea's behavior poses a regional challenge and it must be addressed in a regional context," she said. "South Korea must be part of the solution, as should Japan and China and Russia.

"These countries all share an interest in a denuclearized Korean Peninsula. They all have leverage to help bring it about. And they must all accept their share of the responsibility to help," Rice said.

S. Korea Official Quits Over North Policy (WT)

By Andrew Salmon

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

SEOUL -- South Korea's unification minister resigned yesterday, the highest-profile casualty yet in a battle over the government's North Korea policy after an Oct. 9 nuclear test by Pyongyang.

"I am confident about the results our North Korean engagement policy achieved," said Lee Jong-seok, who became unification minister in February.

A strong advocate of engagement and reconciliation with the communist North, Mr. Lee said, "Faced with North Korea's nuclear test, I apologize to the people and to the president."

He said efforts to achieve "peace and security and inter-Korean reconciliation on the peninsula are being recklessly politicized."

Policy toward North Korea has been the subject of fierce debate after Pyongyang's underground nuclear detonation.

In the immediate wake of the test -- conducted despite repeated warnings from Seoul -- opinion polls suggested a strong public reaction against the government's engagement policy toward the North.

Other key supporters of the policy also are departing the government of President Roh Moo-hyun.

Defense Minister Yoon Kwang-ung resigned Monday, citing strained negotiations over the command of U.S. forces during wartime, and Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon, the U.N. secretary-general-designate, is expected to depart his post in the near future.

The U.N. Security Council unanimously adopted sanctions against North Korea less than a week after the nuclear test, but South Korea has been reluctant to punish Pyongyang for fear of angering the often-hostile neighbor.

DOJ_NMG_0086681

South Korean investments, which have earned the North about $1 billion in foreign currency, are under scrutiny.

The main projects include a South Korean-financed industrial park and a South Korean tourist project in the North.

North Korea yesterday warned the South not to participate in the U.N. sanctions, calling it a "declaration of confrontation against its own people" and threatening to "take corresponding measures" if the South goes along.

The sanctions include a requirement to inspect cargo ships thought to be holding missile- and nuclear-related materials.

President Bush dismissed the North's rhetoric.

"The leader of North Korea likes to threaten," Mr. Bush told reporters in Washington, referring to the North's Kim Jong-il.

Kim Myung-whai of the Institute of Korean Studies noted the shift in public opinion since the nuclear test.

"The engagement policy is not popular among people; many politicians and the public think it has to be changed," he said.

Peter Beck, who heads the International Crisis Group's Seoul office, said there is little evidence that South Korea's government will change its policy toward the North.

"Government seems unwilling to link North-South cooperation with the broader goal of putting an end to North Korea's nuclear arms," Mr. Beck said.

Rice Plays Down Veiled Putin Criticism Of US Handling Of NKorea Crisis (AFP-Y)

AFP, October 26, 2006

The United States brushed aside a complaint by Russian President Vladimir Putin that North Korea tested a nuclear weapon because it had been backed into a corner by its rivals.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who met Putin last week in Moscow, said she had extensive discussions on the North Korean issue with Russian leaders and agreed on the need to implement UN sanctions against Pyongyang over its October 9 test.

The goal of the resolution, she said, is to force North Korea back into six-party talks on giving up its nuclear program in exchange for aid and improved relations with the international community.

"It is true that people are concerned that North Korea have a path out if it decides to choose that path out," she said when asked about Putin's remarks during an appearance at the conservative Heritage Foundation think tank.

"And I think we have established that there is indeed a path, which is the six-party talks -- that all North Korea needs to do is return to those and return to them seriously," she said.

In what was seen as veiled criticism of the aggressive US policy on North Korea, Putin said earlier on Russian television that one of the reasons Pyongyang chose to set off its first nuclear explosion was that "not all participants in the (six-party) talks process could find the right tone in the talks".

"You never need to push a situation into a dead end. You never put one of the participants in negotiations in such a situation where it has almost no exit, except one -- to escalate the situation," Putin said.

Rice played down the remarks.

"I don't read anything into concerns that you worry about North Korea being locked into a corner, because everybody understands that they've got to implement the resolution," she said.

The six-party talks include China, Japan, Russia, South Korea, the United States and North Korea.

Tokyo Denies Report It Wants Nuke Meet (AP)

By Hans Greimel, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 26, 2006

Japan's foreign ministry Thursday denied a news report that the government is planning a meeting with the U.S. and South Korea as early as next month to solidify a common stance on the North Korean nuclear standoff.

The report comes amid growing concerns that South Korea has been hesitant to join the United States and Japan in punishing North Korea for conducting its first-ever nuclear test earlier this month.

Kyodo News agency, citing unidentified government officials, said the meeting among the allies will likely be held in Seoul, the South Korean capital, and include the nations' chief delegates on the North Korean nuclear crisis.

DOJ_NMG_0086682

The goal is to lay the groundwork for working-level meetings with the three and Russia and China, on the sidelines of November's Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation forum in Vietnam, Kyodo said.

Japan wants the trilateral meeting to reaffirm the demand that the North Korean nuclear crisis be resolved through six-party talks that include North Korea, South Korea, the United States, Japan, China and Russia, according to the report.

A Foreign Ministry spokeswoman denied the report. She spoke on condition of anonymity, citing ministry protocol.

North Korea has rejected the six-party format, saying it first wants the United States to lift financial restrictions imposed against the country. It has also been pushing for direct bilateral talks with Washington, a demand the United States has refused.

On Wednesday, South Korea said it formed a task force to look at how to impose U.N. sanctions on North Korea for its nuclear test, while the communist nation warned it would take countermeasures against any such move by the South.

The U.N. Security Council unanimously adopted a resolution sanctioning the North for its Oct. 9 nuclear test, but South Korea — a major aid provider to the impoverished North — has been reluctant to adopt stern measures against its volatile neighbor.

The U.N. resolution calls for all member countries to state how they plan to implement sanctions on the North within 30 days from its Oct. 14 adoption.

Later Wednesday, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice gently prodded Seoul to show a strong commitment to the sanctions.

N. Korea Warns South Against Sanctions (AP-Y)

By Jae-soon Chang

AP, October 26, 2006

North Korea warned South Korea against joining international sanctions, saying Wednesday that its neighbor would "pay a high price" if it joins the U.S.-led drive to punish the reclusive communist nation for its nuclear test.

The statement from the North's Committee for the Peaceful Reunification of the Fatherland came as South Korea struggles to determine how it should enforce the U.N. sanctions, including whether to help interdict North Korean cargo ships suspected of transporting materials for unconventional weapons.

"If the South Korean authorities end up joining U.S.-led moves to sanction and stifle (the North) we will regard it as a declaration of confrontation against its own people ... and take corresponding measures," the North's Committee for the Peaceful Reunification of the Fatherland said in a statement.

President Bush dismissed North Korea's threats, saying leader Kim Jong Il was probing for weaknesses in the international community.

"The leader of North Korea likes to threaten," Bush told reporters in Washington. "In my judgment, what he's doing is testing the will of the five countries that are working together to convince him there's a better way forward for his people."

The U.N. Security Council unanimously adopted a sanctions resolution five days after the North's Oct. 9 test, and a South Korean task force met this week to determine how the country should address the measures, including what to do about joint economic projects with the North.

South Korea's participation in the sanctioning the North is important because the country is one of the main aid providers to the impoverished communist nation, along with China.

But both countries have been reluctant to impose stern measures against their volatile neighbor. China, North Korea's closest ally, voted for the U.N. resolution but is concerned that excessive measures could worsen the situation. South Korea has expressed similar concerns, although there was no immediate response to Wednesday's statement from North Korea.

"If North-South relations collapse due to reckless and imprudent sanctions against us the South Korean authorities will be fully responsible for it and will have to pay a high price," said the statement, carried by the North's official Korean Central News Agency.

A top U.S. diplomat said North Korea's test has brought China and the United States closer together and both countries want a unified response.

DOJ_NMG_0086683

"China has been in a very important relationship with us for many years and at no time did we feel any closer together with China than we felt in the wake of the North Korea provocation," Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill told reporters during a meeting of Pacific leaders in Fiji.

"I think the Chinese understand that the North Korean ... decision to proceed with a nuclear weapons program is really something quite beyond the pale and something we need to all speak with one voice about," said Hill, the chief U.S. envoy to six-nation talks on North Korea's nuclear program.

The U.N. resolution gave member countries 30 days from its Oct. 14 adoption to report on implementing the sanctions.

The South Korean panel, which met for the first time Tuesday, also is trying to decide how to handle the interdiction of North Korean cargo ships and what to do about the economic projects that have been criticized for providing hard currency to the North. The United States suspects the funds might have helped the North's arms programs.

One is a tourism program run by South Korea at North Korea's Diamond Mountain and the other is a South Korean-run industrial complex in the North Korean city of Kaesong. The North has received at least $900 million under the projects since the 1990s.

South Korea prizes the projects as symbols of reconciliation and has been unwilling to halt them. But it plans to make adjustments to meet Seoul's requirements under the U.N. sanctions.

Also at issue was whether South Korea would expand its participation in a U.S.-led drive to interdict North Korean ships and aircraft suspected of carrying weapons of mass destruction or related material.

South Korea has been reluctant to participate fully in the Proliferation Security Initiative because of concerns it could lead to clashes with North Korea and undermine efforts to persuade the communist state to give up its nuclear ambitions through diplomacy.

South Korea has only sent observers and attended briefings on the program.

South Korean Unification Minister Lee Jong-seok, a strong supporter of engagement with North Korea, offered to resign Wednesday because of the nuclear test. Critics have accused Lee of being too supportive of North Korea, but even if his resignation is accepted, it is not likely to lead to any immediate change in the South's engagement policy.

Russian President Vladimir Putin, meanwhile, also warned that pressuring the North could backfire.

"One should never lead the situation into an impasse, one should never put one of the negotiating sides in a position from which it virtually has no way out but one: an escalation of the situation," Putin said in televised comments broadcast in Moscow.

A U.S. Embassy In Pyongyang (WSJ)

By Henry S. Rowen

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

The United Nations sanctions on North Korea are useful, but unless China and South Korea change their policies, these sanctions will not have much effect on Pyongyang's weapons programs. On the contrary, be braced for more North Korean tests.

Beijing, with an assist from Seoul, has been keeping the North on life support. If it saw Pyongyang's programs as seriously damaging to its own interests, it has the means to stop them. While the Chinese say they told Kim Jong Il not to do it, they don't want chaos in North Korea with millions of refugees coming across the border; and they don't want American forces on their border, either. We and the South Koreans urgently need to discuss these matters with the Chinese -- along with the contingency known, colloquially, as "loose nukes."

A few years ago, some of us thought that Beijing would block the North's nuclear weapons because these programs would put pressure on the Japanese to get weapons of their own. Do the Chinese believe that Japan will get nuclear weapons anyway, or is that they do not care what Tokyo does? It's a puzzle.

There are some coincident, and some conflicting, interests between Washington and Beijing, but there is a larger anomaly: The country with the greatest influence in North Korea is China, while the one most at risk (so we think) is the U.S. A serious divergence of perceived interests here would not be good for either of us. As someone who regards the China-U.S. relationship as basically win-win, it is distressing to contemplate the possibility of members of Congress coming to see China's help to North Korea as supporting a major security threat to the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0086684

South Korea has been part of the problem. Residents of Seoul are ever conscious of their vulnerability to shelling from across the DMZ. Seoul also wants to avoid chaos in the North and is trying to open it up economically and politically. And it sees itself competing with China for influence there. All this has led to large subsidies to the North under its "sunshine policy," without much to show for it. The South supports a regime whose weapons can destroy it and threaten its protector, the U.S. Worse, South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun evidently sees the U.S as more dangerous than the North. There is the potential here for a disastrous breach between Washington and Seoul.

Matters are now in flux. Even before the test, Mr. Roh and his Uri party had become very unpopular. According to a post-test poll by the JoongAng Ilbo daily, 65% of respondents said they favor South Korea getting nuclear weapons and that the policy of engaging the North had failed. These views might not last, but if they persist maybe sunshine subsidies will be cut and support for a South Korean bomb will build.

This situation is now so serious that we and the South Koreans need to work hard to come together. What should we try to accomplish regarding the North's weapons? Having worked on them for over 30 years, getting nuclear weapons seems to be in the North's DNA, although it has been expressed in fits and starts over time. The Kim family's chosen isolation, with attendant poverty and growing military weakness, has made WMDs central to its survival.

These weapons pose two main dangers to us. One is a nuclear attack by the North -- which would result in its destruction. The other, much greater, threat is the sale of weapons materials to anyone who will pay. Therefore, President Bush has said that while the U.S. has no intention of attacking North Korea, "the transfer of nuclear weapons or material . . . to states or non-state entities would be considered a grave threat to the United States and we would hold North Korea fully accountable of the consequences of such action." Think, although not exclusively, of Iran and Hezbollah, with the U.S. and Israel as the prime targets.

Without a change in position by Beijing and Seoul, there is little chance of getting rid of the North's weapons. Another challenge, with better odds, is stopping the completion of the large reactor under construction, that will make much more plutonium available for sale. If it comes into production, we face the daunting task of deterring sales -- a task for which we would need help from many others, including the Chinese, as well as military options. * * *

What about diplomacy? It is elementary that we need both sticks and carrots in such a situation. In 1994, the credible threat of an American attack on its Yongbyon reactor, combined with a package of benefits, produced an agreement that slowed the North's program for nearly a decade. (Though it didn't keep Pyongyang from circumventing it by starting a uranium enrichment effort -- it's that DNA again.)

More immediately relevant sticks include not only the Security Council endorsed sanctions, but also our actions against banks that help the North's counterfeiting and other nefarious financial transactions, as well as our efforts to disrupt sales of drugs and arms. They are good in themselves, and add some muscle to diplomacy.

The Bush administration must find it irritating to be told by such lightweights as Kofi Annan that it should deal directly with Kim Jong Il (although more substantial figures such as James Baker are also saying this). Despite such endorsements, this position should be taken seriously. The administration's stance that the North's neighbors, who are in the six-party talks, should be at the table, is correct but incomplete.

There are two distinct propositions here. One is having diplomatic relations with Pyongyang. We should have them with every state, no matter how evil. We did it with Stalin's Soviet Union, but don't want to with Kim Jong Il's North Korea. An American delegation in Pyongyang might find itself isolated; but it might learn some things, and having a presence in what looks like an inherently unstable country could have a useful payoff if parts start to break loose.

As for one-on-one negotiations, there is a case for naming an experienced political heavyweight as our negotiator (enter the name of your favorite candidate here). Most of the items on the agenda have been around for some time, but it would be foolish to pretend that nothing major has occurred, and that there aren't new items such as the sanctions. This is an unsettled time with dangers and perhaps opportunities. Expectations need to be kept under control, but the game of getting something useful in exchange for giving something should not be scorned.

DOJ_NMG_0086685

Of course, there is the argument that to do such things now signals that any state that sets off a bomb or launches a long-range missile can win recognition from us. Avoiding such awkwardness is a good reason for dealing with everybody in the first place, and, in the present instance, for having skilled diplomats to manage our switch.

Mr. Rowen, senior fellow of the Hoover Institution and director emeritus of Stanford University's Shorenstein Asia Pacific Research Center, was assistant secretary of defense from 1989-91.

Bush Pushes For Trade Agreement (AP-Y)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, October 26, 2006

President Bush and the leader of the Dominican Republic agreed on Wednesday to jump-start a delayed free trade agreement to remove barriers to commerce between the two nations.

In an Oval Office meeting, Bush told Leonel Fernandez, the president of the Caribbean nation, that the United States will implement the Central American Free Trade Agreement as soon as possible.

"To that end, I had my trade minister, Ambassador Susan Schwab here, to make sure that we both heard the message of the president — that this was a very important piece of legislation," Bush said.

The Dominican Republic is one of six Latin American signatories to CAFTA, which is part of the administration's push to strike free trade deals with nations around the world as a way to boost U.S. exports. The free trade agreement has taken effect in Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua and El Salvador, but not in Costa Rica or the Dominican Republic.

The pact was supposed to take effect in the Dominican Republic on Jan. 1, but the country has not passed legislation needed to implement parts of the deal. Some of the delays stem from conflicts between U.S. and Dominican intellectual property law, including issues related to pharmaceutical manufacturing.

"We are now in the final phase," Fernandez said. "This is a bill now before our own congress in the Dominican Republic. We are dealing with some minor legal amendments, and our two teams have been working very hard to obtain a speedy implementation."

After the meeting, Fernandez talked with reporters about the open Latin American seat on the U.N. Security Council.

There is a deadlock between Guatemala and Venezuela, which are bidding for the spot, and the Dominican Republic is on a list of compromise candidates. Guatemala has led Venezuela in nearly three dozen rounds of voting, but it can't muster the necessary two-thirds majority in the 192-nation General Assembly to win the seat. Venezuela has refused to withdraw, saying that would mean ceding victory to the United States, which has campaigned against it.

"After 35 consecutive rounds with no result, obviously it's causing a degree of concern," Fernandez told reporters outside the West Wing. "Up to this end, the Dominican Republic was not formally asked to be a candidate. We will be watching how the events evolve in the future."

Putin Promises To Remain Influential (NYT)

By Andrew E. Kramer

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

MOSCOW, Oct. 25 — President Vladimir V. Putin, a former spy who is still popular in Russia after six years in office, said Wednesday that he would continue to “influence the life in our country” after his second term is up in 2008, but that he would not run for president again.

Mr. Putin said he would step down “even though I like my work.” Although a third consecutive term is forbidden under Russia’s 1993 Constitution, his supporters have called for a referendum to do away with that ban.

Though there is much speculation about his future, Mr. Putin did not elaborate during a televised question-and-answer session for Russian citizens.

The town-hall-style show has become an annual tradition in Russian politics under Mr. Putin, at a time when many forms of political expression are no longer possible. He said he used the call-in show to respond directly to voters.

Operators screened roughly a million calls, e-mail and cellphone text messages and passed a few dozen to Mr. Putin to answer during the nearly three-hour program.

DOJ_NMG_0086686

Most were bread-and-butter domestic issues, like teachers' and doctors' salaries. But he also weighed in on the sexual-assault charges facing Israel's president and chided North Korea for testing a nuclear device near Russia's border.

Early on in the program, Arkady Kokayev, a truck driver from the steppe town of Podgornaya-Pokrovka, asked Mr. Putin, "What will happen to us and this country after you leave?"

"Arkady, I think everything will be all right," Mr. Putin said, striking a folksy tone.

"As for myself, as I have said, the Constitution — even though I like my work — the Constitution does not give me the right to stand for a third consecutive term," Mr. Putin said.

He went on to say: "I shall be able to retain the most important thing that a man in politics should value: your confidence. And using it, you and I, we shall be able to influence the life in our country."

It was a strong hint that Mr. Putin, who has quashed most dissent here, would remain in politics in some fashion after 2008. Analysts say Mr. Putin has several options, including assuming the leadership of the party he founded, United Russia, becoming speaker of Parliament or the chairman of Gazprom.

Later in the program, Mr. Putin revisited some puzzling, coarse comments he made in a meeting with the Israeli prime minister, Ehud Olmert, last week. A microphone inadvertently left on captured Mr. Putin saying of President Moshe Katsav of Israel, who faces rape and assault charges: "He turned out to be quite a powerful man. He raped 10 women. I never expected it from him. He surprised all of us. We all envy him."

A Kremlin spokesman at the time characterized Mr. Putin's words as a joke that lost its humor in translation. Mr. Putin on Wednesday did not dispute the quotation but suggested that journalists reported a remark not intended to be public.

"In regard to representatives of the press, I can say, as we joked when I worked for an entirely different organization," Mr. Putin said in reference to his time at the K.G.B., "they were sent to peek but eavesdropped instead. It's not proper."

Mr. Putin condemned violence against women, but said that "The Israeli instance is special" and ventured that it was a form of political fallout after the war in Lebanon this summer.

"In my view, and many experts agree with me, a significant part of Israeli society was not satisfied with their leadership's action in the Lebanon conflict," Mr. Putin said. "Using instruments like defense of women's rights to solve unrelated political questions is unacceptable."

On other foreign policy matters, Mr. Putin criticized North Korea for testing a nuclear device about 100 miles from the Russian border, but he assured Russians that the prevailing winds in North Korea blew out to sea.

On Georgia, he said that Russia recognized its territorial integrity but noted that two separatist regions, South Ossetia and Abkhazia, were not historically part of Georgia when that country was annexed by the Russian empire. He said Georgia's attempts to regain control would lead to "bloodshed."

Mr. Putin demonstrated his trademark command of details and numbers. He said that Russia's economy was growing at a fast clip — 6.6 percent so far this year — but that it had failed to diversify away from dependence on oil and gas.

He also vowed to solve a string of recent contract murders, including the slaying of Anna Politkovskaya, an investigative journalist. He said, however, that murder for hire, the ultimate Russian system of settling disputes, had declined under his watch as the authorities became more successful at solving the crimes.

Putin Says He'll Retain Influence In Russia After Term Ends In '08 (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

MOSCOW, Oct. 25 -- With his trademark indefatigability and command of detail, President Vladimir Putin fielded questions from Russians for nearly three hours Wednesday in an annual televised session that has become a ritual of presidential stagecraft here.

Putin, who has sworn off amending the constitution to allow himself a third term, reiterated his determination to step down in 2008 but said he would continue to influence the country's direction.

DOJ_NMG_0086687

"Even having lost the powers and the levers of presidential power and not tailoring the basic law according to my personal interests, I will manage to retain the most important thing that a person involved in politics must cherish -- your trust," Putin said. "And using that, you and I will be able to exert influence on the life of our country and guarantee its development."

Each year, Russians are invited to send in questions by e-mail, phone and text message for Putin to answer, and this year more than 2 million questions poured in. Putin selects some questions, and others are chosen by the two national television stations that broadcast the event. People from across Russia also pose questions live.

The session reinforces the popular perception here of Putin as an open, capable and responsive leader. The latest opinion poll by the independent Levada Center gave the president a 77 percent approval rating.

Many questions dealt with local or bread-and-butter issues, and Putin, speaking directly into the camera without notes, cited one fact or statistic after another to highlight progress in areas from medical care to road-building. Answering a question about the poor quality of roads in Russia's Far East, for instance, he recalled that a black gravel layer was being laid on the Chita-Khabarovsk highway and that an asphalt layer would be finished by 2010.

On Georgia, Putin said Russia's policies toward its southern neighbor were primarily motivated by a desire to prevent bloodshed over the status of two breakaway regions of Georgia that are seeking independence. Georgia has accused Russia of fueling separatism in those zones.

Putin condemned the targeting of Georgians living here by Russian law enforcement agencies, which a Russian television anchor called a "hunt" after reports that police were demanding lists of schoolchildren with Georgian names.

"You know the Russian saying, 'Make a fool pray to God, and he will smash his head praying,' " Putin said. "I cannot approve of selective actions on ethnic grounds. On the contrary, I am calling on all law enforcement bodies and administrative bodies to refrain from such actions."

Human rights groups have charged that Putin inflamed passions here when he said that wholesale markets, where many members of ethnic minorities work, should be monitored "to protect the interests of Russian producers and population, the native Russian population."

Putin said contract killings, the bane of Russian life in the 1990s, had declined in recent years, despite the murders in the past two months of a central banker, a leading journalist and a mayoral candidate.

"The obligation of the state is to bring any such investigation to the end. This concerns the killings of mass media representatives and killings in the economic sphere," Putin said.

Putin also said jocular comments he made about allegations that Israeli President Moshe Katsav had raped 10 women were reported by journalists who "were already leaving the room and heard only dimly what was said about it and then they started speculating on the topic." He said he condemns violence against women.

During a meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert last week, Putin was reported by the Russian newspaper Kommersant to have said: "Greetings to your president. What a powerful man he turns out to be! He raped 10 women. I would never have expected this from him. He surprised us all. We all envy him."

On Wednesday, Putin said: "Ten women announced there that the president had raped them, and corruption allegations have recently been leveled at the prime minister. In my view, this can be explained by the fact that a significant number of Israelis are dissatisfied with their leadership's actions in the conflict with Lebanon."

As for the journalists who overheard him, Putin, a former KGB officer, said: "I could tell you a joke that we used when I worked in an absolutely different outfit: They were sent to keep an eye on us, and instead they are eavesdropping on us. It's a shame."

Putin Hints At His Political Future (FT)

By Neil Buckley In Moscow

Financial Times, October 26, 2006

Vladimir Putin, Russian president, said on Wednesday he would retain influence in the country even after he steps down as president in 2008, hinting at a possible continuing political role.

DOJ_NMG_0086688

Answering Russian viewers' questions during a three-hour TV phone-in, Mr Putin reiterated that he would not seek to change the constitution to enable him to stand for a third presidential term "even though I like the job".

"But even when I no longer have governing power and the levers of presidential rule, I think that, without adjusting the fundamental law to my personal interests, I will be able to keep your trust," he told a questioner from southern Russia. "And, using that, we will together be able to influence life in our country, guarantee its further development, and exert influence on what happens in Russia."

Mr Putin still enjoys 75 per cent approval ratings after six years as president and will be only 55 when he steps down. Analysts said his comments suggested he might aspire to the kind of guiding role Deng Ziaoping played in China from the late 1970s to the early 1990s.

Vyacheslav Nikonov, a political consultant close to the Kremlin, noted on Russia Today news channel the constitution would allow Mr Putin to stand for president in 2012 after a four-year break.

"He can be a politician for quite a while, like Winston Churchill, for example, who was the leading politician in Britain for half a century, coming back and forth ... or comrade Deng Xiaoping," Mr Nikonov said.

Mr Putin told reporters after the broadcast he would name a suggested successor in due course but "the Russian people must decide who is the strongest candidate".

Speculation centres on two deputy prime ministers – Dmitry Medvedev, who heads several multi-billion dollar social development programmes, and Sergei Ivanov, defence minister – as likely successors. But analysts believe a dark horse candidate could emerge, such as Vladimir Yakunin, head of Russian railways and a friend of the president.

Much of Mr Putin's annual phone-in was devoted to domestic policy, with the president highlighting Russia's continued strong economic growth, forecast at 6.6 per cent this year. But venturing into foreign policy, Mr Putin insisted Russia's suspension of transport links with neighbouring Georgia was not a punishment for the former Soviet republic's ambitions to join Nato.

He said Moscow's actions were aimed at ensuring Georgia did not try to use military force to regain control of two Russian-backed separatist regions, South Ossetia and Abkhazia.

Putin Vows Not To Seek 3rd Term (WT/AP)

By Henry Meyer

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

MOSCOW -- President Vladimir Putin reaffirmed yesterday that he would not try to run for another term but said he would retain influence over Russia even after leaving office in 2008.

The immensely popular Mr. Putin is constitutionally barred from seeking a third consecutive term, but supporters have called for a referendum to amend the country's laws to allow him to stay in power.

"Despite the fact that I like my job, the constitution doesn't allow me to run a third time in a row," Mr. Putin said during a nationally televised question-and-answer session.

With his popularity high, Mr. Putin sees the session -- his fifth since taking office in 2000 -- as an opportunity to show that he can respond directly to voters' concerns. He said the trust that Russians have in him will allow him to keep influencing the country after his presidency.

"Even having lost the powers and the levers of presidential power and not tailoring the basic law according to my personal interests, I will manage to retain the most important thing that a person involved in politics must cherish -- your trust," he said. "And using that, you and I will be able to exert influence on the life of our country and guarantee its development."

After the question-and-answer session, Russian news agencies quoted Mr. Putin as telling reporters that he was not prepared to name his successor but that when he was, he would make his choice known through the press.

Speculation on the successor is focused on Defense Minister Sergey Ivanov and Deputy Prime Minister Dmitry Medvedev.

The Russian leader also hailed the oil-rich country's robust economic growth rate of about 7 percent and vowed that the killers of a top Central Bank regulator and a well-known investigative journalist would be brought to justice.

DOJ_NMG_0086689

During the broadcast, Mr. Putin reeled off statistics, chided North Korea for its nuclear test, pledged to protect agricultural producers and vowed that his government would strictly monitor all companies, including foreign ones, for environmental violations.

Dressed in a dark blue suit and striped tie and seated at a rectangular table, the Russian president gestured and pointed as he fielded questions, as if giving a lecture.

The killings of Central Bank regulator Andrei Kozlov and investigative journalist Anna Politkovskaya have stoked fears that Russia is returning to the violence of the 1990s, when business disputes were commonly resolved through shootings and bombings.

Mr. Putin said that contract killings had declined in recent years and that authorities were becoming more successful in cracking down on financial crimes.

He answered questions posed by correspondents from the state-run television network speaking for small crowds in cities across the vast country, as well as questions sent via phone, e-mail and text messaging.

It was impossible to tell whether the questions were arranged in advance or questioners coached. During past question-and-answer sessions, critics said authorities and state television reporters screened questions and selected audiences to go live with Mr. Putin.

Putin Suggests He Will Remain A Force After Leaving Office (LAT)

By David Holley

The Los Angeles Times, October 26, 2006

Russian President Vladimir V. Putin on Wednesday reaffirmed his intention to leave office in 2008 at the end of his second term as required by the constitution, but suggested that he might continue to wield influence.

The Russian leader's comment was taken by some observers as an indication that he might seek to exercise power from another position, such as prime minister, or that he envisioned a role such as that played by Deng Xiaoping after the late Chinese leader retired from his official positions.

Putin's statement came during a live, nationally televised session of nearly three hours during which he took more than 50 citizens' questions, submitted via telephone, video feed, the Internet and text message. The annual event has become a key means for Putin to project an image as a leader responsive to his people.

"Although I like my job, the constitution denies me the right to run for a third term in succession," Putin said in response to a question about Russia's fate after he leaves office.

"But even when I no longer have governing power and the levers of presidential rule," he continued, "I think that without adjusting the fundamental law to my personal interests, I will be able to keep the most important thing that anyone engaged in politics should cherish: that is, your trust. And using that, together we will be able to influence life in our country so as to guarantee its progress and exert influence on what is happening in Russia."

Liliya Shevtsova, an analyst at the Carnegie Moscow Center, said she interpreted Putin's remarks as an indication that he was "seriously pondering" an attempt to move into a kind of unofficial paramount leader role modeled after Deng.

"The way I understood him, he doesn't want to become a party leader, a constitutional court chairman or parliamentary speaker," she said. "He knows that all these positions in today's Russia are miniature compared to the presidency. That is why he is really thinking about laying down a new tradition in the style of Deng Xiaoping."

In his wide-ranging comments, Putin also defended a rapid increase in Russian military spending, implicitly criticized U.S. handling of nuclear negotiations with North Korea and warned Georgia not to try to regain control of two pro-Russian separatist regions through use of force. He expressed satisfaction with the state of Russia's economy, which has averaged about 7% annual growth since he took office in 2000, and said the country must reduce the gap between rich and poor.

Although the annual event is designed to give some appearance of spontaneity, critics say it is stage-managed to present Putin in the best possible light.

Some questions posed via Internet and cellphone messages were presented by the studio hosts, and others chosen earlier and read by Putin himself. They were among more than 2 million questions that were submitted, organizers said.

DOJ_NMG_0086690

The questions via video feed came from small groups of people gathered in village or city squares around the country, together with correspondents. Some correspondents made comments implying that questioners had not been pre-selected, then walked straight to some individuals to give them the microphone. Questions dealt with everything from international relations and domestic policy to concerns about crime, gambling and education.

"Putin quite confidently played the role of 'the good czar,' " said Mikhail G. Delyagin, chairman of the Institute of Globalization Studies, a Moscow think tank. "In conditions where democracy in Russia is curbed in many aspects, Putin talks directly to the people, as if asking, 'What lack of democracy?' And people must accept this as proof of real democracy, and another proof that no one in the foreseeable future can run this country better than Putin."

One questioner asked why the country had boosted military spending. "Who are we going to fight against?" she asked. "Our relations with the United States are good, aren't they?"

Putin first replied that "it is hard to please everybody" because in previous events of this nature he was asked why Russia wasn't paying more attention to its army. He went on to say that the military budget is now 3.5 times what it was in 2000, but that American defense spending is 25 times that of Russia.

Putin said Russia was secure despite spending much less than the U.S. and China, mainly because of military technology retained from Soviet times.

Asked about North Korea's Oct. 9 test of a nuclear device, Putin cited Russia's support for a United Nations resolution condemning the test, and described the Pyongyang government's action as "impermissible." But he also took an apparent jab at Washington, suggesting it had taken too tough a stance in negotiations.

The international community should try to understand why the nuclear test occurred, Putin said.

"I think one of the reasons is that far from all the participants in the negotiating process were able to find the right tone during those talks," he continued, in apparent reference to the U.S. and some other participants in six-party talks that include Russia, China, Japan, South Korea and North Korea.

"One should never drive the situation into an impasse," he said. "No party should ever be put in such a situation where the only way out is the aggravation of tensions."

North Korea is now signaling its readiness to return to the negotiating table provided that its national security interests and ability to develop civilian nuclear power are ensured, Putin said.

Vote For Security Council Seat Stalled (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, October 26, 2006

The vote has been repeated — over and over, 41 times — and with each count, there is no winner in the diplomatic battle over Latin America's seat on the U.N. Security Council.

The two contenders — U.S.-backed Guatemala and Venezuela, led by its fiercely anti-American President Hugo Chavez — refuse to budge, though it has been clear since the early ballots that neither can gain the needed two-thirds support in the 192-nation U.N. General Assembly.

Frustrated diplomats from Latin America and the Caribbean met Wednesday, hoping to find a solution that would avoid another fruitless confrontation in the General Assembly.

But Ecuador's U.N. Ambassador Diego Cordovez, who chairs the 34-nation regional group, reported there was no imminent solution. Wednesday afternoon's voting, he said, would have to go ahead.

It did, for six rounds, and mirrored previous results: Guatemala led Venezuela but couldn't win a two-thirds majority. Voting resumes on Thursday.

Cordovez said, however, there is hope a solution may be found.

He held talks with the Guatemalan and Venezuelan ambassadors "in a very good atmosphere," and he said negotiations will continue Thursday with the foreign ministers of both countries.

"My expectation is that we are going to have — perhaps not tomorrow because these are very difficult things — but that we are going to have an agreement," Cordovez said.

DOJ_NMG_0086691

He said that agreement would indicate what both countries are going to do themselves and a decision on a compromise candidate.

Mexico's U.N. Ambassador Enrique Berruga said he was "hopeful more than optimistic" that the two foreign ministers will come up with a quick solution. That's because of "their entrenched positions," with each saying "no you quit first," he said.

"Our expectation is that they can come to an agreement — and that that agreement is the way forward," he said after Wednesday's voting in which Guatemala received between 100 and 109 votes while Venezuela got between 72 and 84 votes.

Berruga outlined three scenarios: that one of the two countries withdraws in favor of the other, that both quit and recommend a compromise candidate be adopted by consensus, or that both agree to quit but pass the ball on choosing a third candidate to the Latin American and Caribbean Group.

Venezuela's U.N. Ambassador Francisco Arias Cardenas said he expects that out of the foreign ministers' meeting "will come positive agreement that will facilitate a dignified and constructive solution."

Many U.N. members — not just the Latin Americans — hope that proves to be true.

The Guatemala-Venezuela voting is already the third longest in the U.N.'s 61-year history.

The second highest number of ballots was 52, set in 1960. After that, the General Assembly agreed to allow Poland and Turkey to serve on the council for one year each.

The record number is 155 rounds of voting, set in 1980. The General Assembly gave up on Cuba and Colombia after 154 rounds, and chose Mexico on the 155th, in early January of that year.

Brazil's U.N. Ambassador Ronaldo Mota Sardenberg said the message at the closed-door meeting was that the group needs to reach agreement on a candidate for the Security Council.

"We encouraged them to reach a solution quickly," he said, expressing hope that the Venezuelan and Guatemalan foreign ministers "will achieve some kind of a consensus."

"If they do, our group then can go for a consensus — can adopt a consensual solution," he said. "But first we need them — the two of them — to get together and present a name, present the name of a country."

Sardenberg said Brazil — which has been mentioned along with Bolivia, Costa Rica, Uruguay, Chile and others as a possible third option — "is not a candidate and we are ready to join any consensus."

Venezuela proposed Bolivia as an alternative in hopes of breaking the deadlock.

That nation said it would agree to be a candidate if it helped reach a consensus. But it remains to be seen if other nations in the region would agree on Bolivia, whose President Evo Morales is among Chavez's closest allies.

Venezuela's Arias Cardenas told Venezuelan radio network FFF that he understood Guatemala has suggested Costa Rica as an option.

But Guatemalan Foreign Minister Gert Rosenthal denied that, saying: "We've never proposed an alternative country."

Mexico's Berruga said Latin America needs to establish a system to avoid future diplomatic battles over seats on the U.N.'s most powerful body.

He said he also feels "a little bit ashamed because ... we're paralyzing the work of the General Assembly with this exercise" when there are pressing global issues to tackle.

Venezuela Would Back Bolivia For UN Security Seat (FT)

By Andy Webb-vidal In Caracas

Financial Times, October 26, 2006

Venezuela and Guatemala on Wednesday appeared ready to agree to find a consensus candidate to fill a temporary seat on the United Nations Security Council after a 40th round of voting failed to break a week-long diplomatic deadlock.

Neither of the two countries has been able to secure the two-thirds majority needed to win one of the two seats on the council allotted to a Latin American government since voting sessions began in the General Assembly last week.

However, Guatemala, which is strongly backed by the US, has led Venezuela in all but one of the voting rounds by a consistent margin of around 30 votes. Wednesday's final ballot left Guatemala with 105 votes and Venezuela with 78.

DOJ_NMG_0086692

President Hugo Chávez conceded on Wednesday that his government had virtually no chance of being able to win the seat, but he claimed to have captured the moral high ground in his ongoing sparring effort with Washington.

"It's going to be very difficult for us to win two-thirds of the vote," Mr Chávez said. "But we have achieved a great moral victory that no-one can take away from us."

The ongoing stalemate has markedly increased the chances that Latin American diplomats will now search for a consensus nation to resolve the impasse.

Uruguay and the Dominican Republic have been repeatedly rumoured as potential candidates.

Earlier yesterday, Nicolás Maduro, the Venezuelan foreign minister, said that while Caracas would not yet step down, it would back Bolivia as a consensus candidate if Guatemala first withdrew its bid.

"We are maintaining our candidature . . . [but] we are open to dialogue," Mr Maduro said. "The candidature of Bolivia is on the table, and to us it looks like an option."

In an unexpected turn on Tuesday, Bolivian president Evo Morales said that Mr Chávez had called him to say that Caracas would back La Paz.

"Chávez said he will leave the candidature to Bolivia," he said.

But what level of diplomatic backing Bolivia would garner as a Latin American consensus candidate for the council seat was not immediately clear on Wednesday.

Mr Morales is a close political ally of Mr Chávez, an alliance that would likely leave Bolivia open to accusations that its candidature would be politically influenced by Caracas.

Venezuela meanwhile has repeatedly accused Guatemala of being under the political tutelage of Washington.

John Bolton, the US ambassador to the UN, was last week actively lobbying to block the bid by Caracas, Venezuelan diplomats have said.

The Security Council seat will be vacated by Argentina at the end of year. Peru currently holds the other Latin American seat.

After 41 U.N. Ballots, Venezuela-Guatemala Logjam Persists (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 25 — Venezuela and Guatemala on Wednesday were unable to break the stalemate over which Latin American country should join the Security Council next year, and the General Assembly completed its 41st round of inconclusive balloting on the issue.

Diplomats expressed hope that a meeting in New York on Thursday between the foreign ministers of the countries, Gert Rosenthal of Guatemala and Nicolas Maduro of Venezuela, could lead to the choice of a compromise candidate.

"Any consensus of the Latin American-Caribbean group depends upon agreement between the two candidates, and that is why the meeting of the candidates' foreign ministers tomorrow is so important," said Heraldo Muñoz, the ambassador of Chile.

The decision to resume voting on the issue was made after the ambassadors of the two countries, Jorge Skinner-Klée of Guatemala and Francisco Arias Cárdenas of Venezuela, failed to reach any agreement in a meeting held in the mission of Ecuador, which is the current president of the 33-nation Latin American and Caribbean group.

The two countries are competing for the two-year term seat being vacated by Argentina.

United Nations rules allow for indefinite voting, and the General Assembly announced Wednesday evening that it had provisionally set aside time for additional ballots through the middle of November.

Venezuela has conducted a global campaign for the position, which the country's United States-baiting president, Hugo Chávez, has said he would devote to trying to shift the balance of power at the United Nations toward the poor countries of the developing world.

But Venezuela has failed to rally those countries, which are in a majority at the United Nations, and performed unexpectedly badly.

The United States has simultaneously lobbied vigorously against Venezuela.

DOJ_NMG_0086693

In the six rounds of balloting on Wednesday, Guatemala averaged 104 votes and Venezuela averaged 79, much the same outcome as after last week's 35 rounds of voting. A two-thirds majority of those voting and not abstaining, or roughly 124, is needed to win.

Both countries have said they will talk about the possibility of leaving the race in favor of a compromise candidate, but each has said it will not be the first to quit.

Guatemala argues that as the leader, it should not be obliged to step aside. Venezuela says giving up would hand a victory to the United States.

Venezuela has put forward Bolivia as a substitute, but Guatemala has made it clear the choice is unacceptable. Bolivia's president, Evo Morales, is a close ally of Mr. Chávez, whom he calls "comandante." In a speech in Caracas on Wednesday, Mr. Chávez referred to Mr. Morales as "comrade."

Other countries mentioned as possible third candidates are Costa Rica, Chile, Uruguay, Paraguay, the Dominican Republic and Panama.

Concerns Accompany U.S. Support For Uribe (WP)

By Juan Forero

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

BOGOTA, Colombia, Oct. 25 -- Beyond the hearty handshakes, a high-level U.S. delegation that visited here this week raised concerns with President Ã•lvaro Uribe's government about human rights abuses by the army and about the scandal-plagued effort to disarm paramilitary groups.

R. Nicholas Burns, undersecretary of state for political affairs, led 15 Bush administration officials from six agencies for meetings with virtually every top Colombian ministry. In reiterating support for Uribe, whose government receives more U.S. assistance than any country outside the Middle East, Burns told the Colombians that Washington would continue providing about $600 million a year through 2008 for programs from aerial fumigation of drug crops to training of the army.

But the delegation's two-day mission, which ended Wednesday, also confronted a string of reports that Colombia's army has been embroiled in drug-related scandals and murdered dozens of peasant farmers, only to pass them off as dead guerrillas.

"They're concerned that these issues haven't been resolved, that they continue to draw criticism from human rights groups, from the United Nations and presumably from some of their own diplomats," said Mark Schneider, senior vice president of the International Crisis Group, a policy analysis organization that regularly assesses the Colombian conflict.

"They're not blind to what's going on," said Schneider, who met with Burns on Monday in Washington before the diplomat left for Colombia.

In one particularly disturbing episode earlier this year, an army patrol with suspected ties to cocaine traffickers ambushed and killed 10 members of an elite anti-narcotics police unit trained by U.S. officials. Colombia's intelligence service is also trying to reform itself after allegations that rogue agents collaborated with paramilitary members to assassinate leftist union activists and provided secret information to drug traffickers.

The State Department has been concerned by reports that paramilitary commanders, despite having ostensibly laid down their arms, are killing hundreds of civilians while infiltrating government institutions. On Tuesday, two Colombian senators and a congressman were forced to give depositions at the Supreme Court after they were accused of working with paramilitary units.

In meetings with reporters on Tuesday, Burns stressed that U.S. support remains unwavering for Uribe and his "democratic security" policies, which are designed to take back a once-chaotic country from Marxist rebels, paramilitary groups and drug traffickers.

"But it is also true that there are big concerns raised about possible human rights violations," Burns said. "We are a friend of Colombia, and so, of course, we raise these issues."

The visit by the delegation, considered the highest-level visit by U.S. officials in years, occurred as Uribe's governing coalition has been hobbled by infighting and by concern that Marxist rebels remain a potent force. Last week, a powerful car bomb was set off inside one of the army's most important bases. That infuriated Uribe, who blamed leftist guerrillas and immediately cut off talks that could have led the rebels to release dozens of captives, including three Americans.

DOJ_NMG_0086694

Despite the setbacks, the White House considers Uribe, who was reelected to a second four-year term in May, a stabilizing force and a Latin American success story.

Colombia was on the brink of calamity four years ago, but violence is decreasing and the economy is growing stronger. Nearly 400 drug traffickers have been extradited to the United States under Uribe's government, and the country is now considered a linchpin in an unstable region marked by rising populism and deepening poverty.

Still, some U.S. legislators, even supporters of Uribe, are increasingly pushing for better results. After providing more than $4 billion in aid, most of it for military and anti-drug programs, U.S. policymakers are concerned that as much coca is being cultivated in Colombia now as when aerial spraying of the drug crop began six years ago.

The message was increasingly pressed upon Burns and other State Department officials before his visit, said human rights activists, congressional aides and others who met with him recently.

"We've given them $4 billion since 1999, and there were people from Congress who felt that it would lead to more dramatic results," said Myles Frechette, a former U.S. ambassador here who remains in close contact with American diplomats.

"Congress has given this money, and things are not working the way they're supposed to work," said Frechette, who despite the criticism counts himself as a backer of Uribe.

Burns stressed that in Washington he had met with Human Rights Watch and the International Crisis Group, both of which have been critical of Uribe's policies. He also said on Tuesday that he had meetings scheduled with Colombian human rights groups.

"He knows the situation is not what it should be, given the huge financial investment the U.S. has made," said Tim Rieser, foreign policy aide to Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), ranking member of the Appropriations subcommittee on foreign operations. "There's been a lot of criticism, and they recognize there are problems that need to be dealt with."

The International Crisis Group, which issued a report last week on Colombia, says it is crucial for the country to focus more of its resources on creating a functioning state in rural areas where armed groups often hold sway. After providing billions in aid, Schneider said, many in the U.S. Congress would like to see the Uribe government generate more of its own resources toward the effort.

"There are a lot of lawmakers at the Capitol who are concerned that Colombian taxpayers are not making the same sacrifice that American taxpayers have made to provide foreign assistance to Colombia," he said.

Nicaragua To Join Nations Banning All Abortions (LAT)

By Hector Tobar

The Los Angeles Times, October 26, 2006

MEXICO CITY — Nicaragua's legislature Thursday is expected to approve a law that outlaws all forms of abortion, including those procedures intended to save the life of a pregnant mother.

The measure has been supported by most major political parties, heading into the Nov. 5 presidential election, as they seek to win over voters in this overwhelmingly Catholic country. Leaders of the Roman Catholic Church helped draft the bill and have mobilized followers to support it.

Medical associations in Nicaragua and international human-rights groups have strongly criticized the proposal.

Since the late 1980s,Latin America's El Salvador and Chile have adopted similar measures. At least 34 countries, mostly in Africa and the Middle East, prohibit all abortions, without exception, according to the Center for Reproductive Rights, a non profit advocacy group based in New York.

The law would establish prison sentences of 6 to 30 years for women who abort their pregnancies and the doctors who perform the procedure.

Leaders of the leftist Sandinista National Liberation Front and the ruling right-wing Liberal Alliance have said their representatives would vote for the proposal. The two groups control all but one of the seats in the 92-member legislature.

"The current law allows a small door in which abortions can be performed, and we are trying to close that door," said Dr. Rafael Cabrera, an obstetrician and leader of the Yes to Life Movement. "We don't believe a child should be destroyed under the pretext that a woman might die."

DOJ_NMG_0086695

Cabrera and other backers of the law argue that medical science has advanced sufficiently to allow doctors to bring a fetus to the point of viability without endangering a woman's life.

But doctors with the Nicaraguan Society of Gynecology and Obstetrics told a Managua news conference Tuesday that the measure would endanger the lives of women and make doctors reluctant to perform life-saving procedures.

"When a woman arrives at a hospital with vaginal bleeding ... we're going to be afraid to do anything," society president Efrain Toruno said, according to the newspaper El Nuevo Diario. "If we treat her we could be prosecuted, and if we don't we could also be prosecuted."

Women's groups in Nicaragua charge the proposed law is a cynical pre-election ploy that panders to the influence of the Roman Catholic Church. The text of the law, they point out, is almost identical to a church proposal drafted earlier this year.

Outgoing President Bolanos fast-tracked the bill, using his authority to present emergency legislation to the National Assembly.

"The worst message of this proposed law is that the lives of women don't matter to this president, or to the government or the church," said Marta Maria Blandon, Central American Director of Ipas, a U.S.-based reproductive rights group.

Ipas estimates that 32,000 illegal abortions are performed in Nicaragua each year, many under unsafe conditions. Only 24 abortions authorized by law have been performed in Nicaragua in the past three years.

In 2004, a 9-year-old rape victim received an abortion under the current law's provisions.

Nearly all Latin American countries outlaw abortion, but most, including Nicaragua, allow the procedure in cases of rape and to preserve the life of the mother. Many countries, including Mexico, are working to make abortion more accessible to women who qualify for such exceptions.

Jose Maria Vivanco, Americas director of the U.S.-based Human Rights Watch, said the law could.

With Beheadings, Drug Gangs Terrorize Mexico (NYT)

By James C. Mckinley Jr.

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

URUAPAN, Mexico — Norteño music was blaring at the Sol y Sombra bar on Sept. 6 when several men in military garb broke up the late night party. Waving high-powered machine guns, they screamed at the crowd to stay put and then dumped the contents of a heavy plastic bag on the dance floor.

Five human heads rolled to a bloody stop.

“This is not something you see every day,” said a bartender, who asked not to be named for fear of losing his own head. “Very ugly.”

An underworld war between drug gangs is raging in Mexico, medieval in its barbarity, its foot soldiers operating with little fear of interference from the police, its scope and brutality unprecedented, even in a country accustomed to high levels of drug violence.

In recent months the violence has included a total of two dozen beheadings, a raid on a local police station by men with grenades and a bazooka, and daytime kidnappings of top law enforcement officials. At least 123 law enforcement officials, among them 2 judges and 3 prosecutors, have been gunned down or tortured to death. Five police officers were among those beheaded.

In all, the violence has claimed more than 1,700 civilian lives this year, and federal officials say the killings are on course to top the estimated 1,800 underworld killings last year. Those death tolls compare with 1,304 in 2004 and 1,080 in 2001, these officials say.

Mexico’s law enforcement officials maintain that the violence is a sign that they have made progress dismantling the major organized crime families in the country. The arrests of several drug cartel leaders and their top lieutenants have set off a violent struggle among second-rank mobsters for trade routes, federal prosecutors say. The old order has been fractured, and the remaining drug dealers are killing one another or making new alliances.

DOJ_NMG_0086696

"These alliances are happening because none of the organizations can control, on its own, the territory it used to control, and that speaks to the crisis that they are in," said José Luis Santiago Vasconcelos, the top federal prosecutor for organized crime.

Attorney General Daniel Cabeza de Vaca said a steadily rising tide of drug addiction within Mexico had spurred some of the murders, as dealers fought for local markets. At the same time, more and more honest police officers are trying to enforce the law rather than turn a blind eye to drug traffickers, often paying with their lives, prosecutors say.

But those assessments, other authorities say, are overly rosy and may explain only part of the picture. Some experts say the Mexican police forces, weakened by corruption and cowed by assassinations, are simply not up to the task of countering the underworld feuds unleashed by the arrests of cartel leaders over the last six years.

Many of the dead made their living in the drug trade and perished in a larger struggle for territory between a federation of cartels based in Sinaloa, on the Pacific Ocean, and the Gulf Cartel from the northeastern state of Tamaulipas, federal prosecutors say.

The five men beheaded in Uruapan, in Michoacán, were street-level methamphetamine dealers, addicted themselves to the synthetic drug. They were linked loosely to the Valencia family, which once controlled most of the drug trade in the state and is a part of the Sinaloa group, the police say. The killers came from a gang called The Family, believed to be allied with the Gulf Cartel.

A day before, the killers had kidnapped the five men from a mechanic's shop they had been using as a front for selling "ice," as crystal methamphetamine is called on the street. They sawed their victims' heads off with a bowie knife while they were still alive shortly before going to the bar, law enforcement officials said.

"You don't do something like that unless you want to send a big message," said one United States law enforcement official here, speaking on the condition of anonymity.

The beheadings, in fact, have become a signature form of intimidation aimed at both criminal rivals and federal and local authorities. In the tourist town of Acapulco, killers from one drug gang decapitated the commander of a special strike force, Mario Núñez Magaña, in April, along with one of his agents, Jesús Alberto Ibarra Velázquez.

They jammed the heads in a fence in front of the municipal police station. "So you will learn to respect," said a red note next to them.

"This year has been one to forget, a black year," said Jorge Valdez, a spokesman for the Acapulco police. "It's the most violent year in the last 50 years, and the acts are barbaric, bloody, with no trace of humanity."

The violence is by no means limited to Acapulco. In mid-July, about 15 gunmen attacked a small-town police station in Tabasco State at dawn with grenades, a bazooka and machine guns in an attempt to liberate two of their gang members, who were arrested after a bar fight the night before.

Two police officers died in the assault. The authorities said the attackers were dressed in the commando outfits of federal agents and belonged to the Zetas, former soldiers who work for the Gulf Cartel.

One reason for the wave of law enforcement killings is that the Mexican police do a poor job of protecting their own. Arrests have been made in only a handful of the assassinations of police officers this year. The overwhelming majority remain unsolved because witnesses fear testifying against drug traffickers. Even seasoned investigators are afraid to dig too deep into the murders.

"There is an atmosphere that affects us, of distrust, of terror inside the police force," said Jesús Alemán del Carmen, the head of the state police in Guerrero, where 22 law enforcement officials have been brutally assassinated this year.

One of the officers killed was Gonzalo Domínguez Díaz, the state police commander in Pátzcuaro, Michoacán. In February, he received a death threat from a local businessman who law enforcement officials say has links to the Valencia crime family.

The threat came just minutes after Commander Domínguez arrested two men on weapons possession charges. He arrived home that night pale and shaken, said his widow, Fanny Carranza Domínguez. His anxiety grew over time, after prosecutors released the men he had arrested, for a lack of evidence, his wife said.

In early May, he told his wife that he had heard on the street that gunmen were looking for him. "He said, 'I know that if I arrest them I am risking my life,' " she recalled. " 'I bring them to the capital, and they let them go.' "

DOJ_NMG_0086697

On May 8, a car cut off Commander Domínguez's police car as he was driving home alone about 6:30 p.m. Within minutes, he was shot point blank in the head with a 12-gauge shotgun and twice in the chest with an AK-47. He never unholstered his sidearm. So far, prosecutors have made no progress in solving his murder. He was 47, the father of three.

"I think the commanders that haven't been killed are in the game, and the ones that have been killed, it is because they attacked crime," Mrs. Carranza Domínguez said.

"The prosecutor seems asleep here," she added. "He doesn't do anything but collect his salary and go home."

Commander Domínguez was one of 16 state and federal police commanders assassinated this year across Mexico, along with 2 judges handling drug cases and 2 federal prosecutors. Local police chiefs have also been targets. Eight have been murdered, most of them in Michoacán.

Most were ambushed in their cars or outside their homes by men with machine guns. A few were kidnapped by men posing as federal agents. In these cases, the bodies were found later, shot full of holes, often showing signs of torture.

Commander Cándido Vargas, 40, the second in command of the state police in Uruapan, died that way in August. Prosecutors say he was walking to his car when he was surrounded by about 15 heavily armed men dressed in black commando outfits like those used by federal agents. It was 3:30 in the afternoon, and he was just 100 yards from the police headquarters.

The men hustled him into one of their vehicles and sped off. He was found the next day on a nearby ranch, shot 25 times. A sign next to his body read: "For playing with two bands."

No one from the police department visited his wife and three children, who live in another town, to tell them of his death. "We found out through the newspaper," said Paula Vargas, his wife of 23 years. "It was as if the whole world fell down on me."

The state prosecutor in Uruapan, Ramón Ponce, says he has found no evidence of Commander Vargas's being corrupt. Neither does he have any leads, he said. "The atmosphere is very tense," Mr. Ponce said. "It's very difficult."

While attacks on the police have risen, they have been far outpaced by grisly gangland killings. In Michoacán, The Family is believed to be responsible for the beheadings of a dozen people besides the ones they delivered to the Sol y Sombra bar. The heads have often been accompanied by cryptic messages declaring the killings divine justice, accusing the victims of crimes, or daring their rivals to send more henchmen.

Nearly every day, new victims are found in states along the major drug shipment routes, especially Quintana Roo, Michoacán, Guerrero, Tamaulipas and Baja California. Most are bound, gagged and shot to death, their bodies dumped on lonely roads.

In the towns hardest hit by the gangland warfare, the fear is palpable. For two years now, Nuevo Laredo has been the main battleground for a fight between gunmen loyal to Joaquín (Chapo) Guzmán of Sinaloa and the remnants of the Gulf Cartel, whose leader, Osiel Cárdenas, is in prison awaiting trial.

"I wouldn't be human if I said I wasn't afraid," acknowledged Elizabeth Hernández Arredone, a state prosecutor in Nuevo Laredo who has taped to her door a photograph of a female judge who recently disappeared.

The effects are everywhere. Many local journalists have stopped covering drug violence for fear they may become targets themselves. Tourists used to spill across the border from Laredo, Tex., to swig tequila, buy trinkets and run wild. Not anymore.

Church attendance is down, said the Rev. Alberto Monteras Monjarás of Santo Niño Church, because even a Sunday morning can be dangerous.

"People used to sleep outside on the porch if it got too hot," he said. "Not anymore. You stay inside, and you put three or four locks on the door."

Prominent S. African Denied Entry Into U.S. (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

JOHANNESBURG, Oct. 25 -- A prominent South African political analyst said Wednesday that U.S. border agents had denied him entry into the United States and questioned him about his views on terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0086698

Adam Habib, executive director of the Democracy and Governance Research Program for South Africa's Human Sciences Research Council, was taken to a holding room at John F. Kennedy International Airport on Saturday after his arrival for meetings in New York and Washington, he said in an interview.

Seven hours later, his visa had been canceled and he was escorted by an armed guard to a return flight to Johannesburg.

Habib said the border agents did not give him a reason. A U.S. Embassy spokesman, Mark M. Schlachter, confirmed the incident but said he did not know why Habib had been denied entry.

Habib, who is Muslim, said that most of the dozens of people in the holding room had dark skin and appeared to be Muslim, by virtue of their language or dress. He added that U.S. security measures, though in some cases justified by the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, threaten to create resentment among Muslims worldwide.

"If you do this in a way that alienates large portions of the world and creates enmity, then you are compromising your medium-term security in pursuing your short-term security," Habib said from his office in Pretoria.

Habib said that most of the questions seemed routine, though they included some about his views on terrorism. The rest of the South African delegation continued to a series of meetings with the World Bank, the National Institutes of Health, the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation and other groups.

The Human Sciences Research Council has asked the U.S. Embassy in Pretoria to investigate, and Habib said he had written the U.S. Customs and Border Protection office in Washington seeking an explanation.

In Burma, A Cry For U.N. Help (WP)

By U Pu Chin Sian Thang And U Thein Pe

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

Last month the U.N. Security Council formally discussed the situation in Burma for the first time. For Burmese people such as us, who live under the country's oppressive regime, this was a welcome development.

The Security Council discussion is incredibly important. Over the past 10 years we have watched with dismay as our country's military ruler has repeatedly hoodwinked a stream of U.N. envoys and ignored the world body's actions. Twenty-eight resolutions from the U.N.'s General Assembly and its former Commission on Human Rights, four consecutive human rights special rapporteurs and two successive special envoys representing U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan have failed to produce political change, dialogue or national reconciliation in Burma.

Meanwhile, much of the world has failed to understand the gravity of the crisis in our country. It is shocking that the Security Council has taken so long to get involved. No fewer than 3,000 villages have been destroyed or dislocated by the military regime in eastern Burma in the past decade. During the regime's systematic attacks on ethnic populations, women have been raped, children conscripted as child soldiers and rice supplies burned. Recently the regime instituted a practice of using soldiers' bayonets to pierce the bottoms of rice bowls, leaving villagers unable to cook their most basic foodstuff.

Fleeing the cruelty of this regime, leaving smoldering villages behind, our fellow citizens run for their lives, often to inhospitable territories where the junta awaits. The cycle of terror seems without end. Because of the regime's practices, mortality rates in eastern Burma have risen to the levels of the worst conflict zones in Africa. Children are chronically malnourished, infant mortality rates are soaring, and the most common ailments have become death sentences for thousands.

We know the Security Council has responded to other cases in which there are horrendous problems with refugees and internally displaced populations, in which rape is widespread and conscripting child soldiers is the norm. Burma, with 70,000 child soldiers, waits for a similar response and resolve from the Security Council. We simply cannot understand why the council has not taken the same sort of action in Burma as it has elsewhere. Now that it has taken up the issue of Burma, it must go further and pass a resolution.

Clearly, efforts outside the Security Council have not worked. After Ibrahim Gambari, a U.N. undersecretary of political affairs and envoy to Burma, visited the country in May, the military regime doubled the sentence imposed on Aung San Suu Kyi, the world's only imprisoned Nobel Peace Prize recipient, and increased its attacks on ethnic minorities. The heightened military offensive against these communities has resulted in thousands more refugees streaming across the borders into neighboring countries.

DOJ_NMG_0086699

The regime has not stopped its brutal campaign of terror, in part because the secretary general is unable to act without the mandate of a Security Council resolution. Only a council resolution will provide the United Nations with what it needs to confront this situation.

Just last month the Burmese military arrested five of the most prominent members of our movement, including Burma's second most-famous political leader, Min Ko Naing. By writing this opinion piece, we, too, are risking our lives. Our freedom is worth the risk.

We hope that attention at the Security Council will do more to shed light on the important cultural and political context of our struggle and the threat destabilizing the region. The U.N. diplomatic corps must understand that, unlike other countries, in which factors such as religion or historical rivalries weaken public support for democracy, Burma is a nation in which the people have clearly and repeatedly articulated what they want: a democratic society. That is why the National League for Democracy and allied parties won 82 percent of the seats in parliament in our last elections, and why tens of thousands of people risk their lives to participate in our movement.

Put simply, there is overwhelming evidence that the people of Burma want an end to the dictatorship that has been forced upon them. Without this understanding and without a Security Council resolution, the United Nations is likely to fail in Burma yet again.

The writers are members of Burma's parliament, which was chosen in the country's last democratic elections but has never been permitted to meet.

DOJ_NMG_0086700

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, OCTOBER 26, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Gonzales Criticizes Europeans For Refusing To Receive Guantanamo Detainees (AP) 4
Cheney Confirms That Detainees Were Subjected To Water-boarding (MCT) 4
U.S. Seeks To Limit Detainees' Contact (AP) 5
Sept. 11 Plotter Asks Court For Lawyer, Trial (WP) 6
Young Woman Fears Deportation, And Mutilation (NYT) 7

Homeland Response:

Intelligence, Homeland Security Agencies Sharpen Surveillance Methods (GOVEXEC) 8
New York Times Gets Two Extra Days To Disclose Confidential Sources (NYS) 9
Caution Flag For Evacuation Plans (WP) 9
Another Post-September 11 Reality (WT) 10
ID Plan Sent Back To Drawing Board (AP) 11

War News:

Bush Unsatisfied With Iraq War Progress (AP-Y) 12
Iraq Reality Check (LAT) 14
Bush's Gamble: Turning The Spotlight On The Iraq War As Republicans Try To Dim It (NYT) 14
Face The Nation: Demure Madonna And Anxious President (NYT) 15
Bush's Proposal Of 'Benchmarks' For Iraq Sounds Familiar (WP) 16
Conceding Missteps, Bush Urges Patience On Iraq (NYT) 17
Bush Is Reassuring On Iraq But Says He's 'Not Satisfied' (WP). 19
Bush Insists He'll Stand By His Iraq Goals (LAT) 20
Bush Says Iraq Strategy Is Flexible (WSJ) 22
Bush Tells US 'I'm Not Happy With Iraq' (FT) 23
Bush Backs Setting 'Benchmarks' In Iraq (WT) 24
Bush's Conviction On Iraq Exceeds His Plan's Credibility (USAT) 25
Wars Are Hard, But We'll Win (USAT) 25
War Now Works Against GOP (WP) 26
Frist To GOP Hopefuls: Don't Stress Iraq (AP-Y) 28
Defiant Iraqi PM Disavows Timetable (AP-Y) 29
Iraqi Premier Denies U.S. Assertion He Agreed To Timelines (WP) 30
Maliki Distances Himself From American Strategies In Iraq (MCT) 31
Iraq's Leader Jabs At U.S. On Timetables And Militias (NYT) 33
Maliki Resists US Pressure To Take Key Decisions (FT) 34
Iraqi Leader Bristles At Idea Of Timetable (USAT) 35
Al-Maliki Hits U.S. Calls For A Timetable (WT/AP) 36
Sadr City Raid Targets Death Squad Leader (LAT) 36
What Osama Wants (NYT) 37
In Syria, Iraq's Fate Silences Rights Activists (WP) 38
Money Down The Drain In Iraq (NYT) 39
For NBC Reporter, The Job That Won't Go Away (WP) 40
An Opportunity For Shared Sacrifice (USAT) 42
A GI Bill For The 21st Century (LAT) 43

DOJ:

Alito Swears In Acosta As Miami's Top Federal Prosecutor (AP) 44
Alito Protégé Sworn In As U.S. Attorney In Miami (MH) 44

Corporate Scandals:

UPDATE: SEC Says Two Defrauded Korean Community In Calif. (DOW) 45
Judge Issues Secret Ruling About Secrets In Nacchio Case (FINDLAW/AP) 45
SEC Probes Mutual-Fund Firms After Settlement In Kickback Case (WSJ) 46
NASD Fines James River CEO $2.25M For Alleged Improper Market Timing (LAW/AP) 47
Former AOL Execs Said Lied To Auditors (FINDLAW/AP) 48
Austria Charges Nine In Probe Of Refco-Bawag Ties (WSJ) 49

Criminal Law:

Pre-Vote Leaks Rankle GOP (RC) 50
Jurisdictional Issues Dog Member Probes (RC) 52
Rights Group Fires Publisher Of Foley E-Mail (NYT) 53
Hastert Aide Goes Before Ethics Panel (AP-Y) 54
Second Man Accuses Former Priest Who Abused Foley (WP/AP) 54
Washington Wire (WSJ) 55
FBI Eyes Contractor In Los Alamos Leak (WT) 58
Los Alamos Disks May Hold U.S. Secrets (WP) 59
Former Los Alamos Subcontract Worker Probed In Breach (Update1) (BLOOM) 59
Man Once Held In Wales' Death Seeks New Venue For Gun Charge (AP) 60
Family Faces New Charges In Military Secrets-to-China Case (MERCN) 61
5 In Family Charged With Military Data Conspiracy (LAT) 61

Enforcer Faces Charges In Trooper Threat (PHI) 62
Authorities Arrest Reputed Mobster On Federal Charges (NSDY/AP) 63
Gotti Says Detective Helped In Killing Of A Witness (NYS) 63
Private Eye Says He Rejected Plea Deals (MH) 64
Silicon Valley Bank Manager Sentenced For Embezzling $1.13M (SDUT/AP) 65
FORMER SJ BANK MANAGER SENTENCED FOR EMBEZZLEMENT (BCNW) 65
Man Gets 12 Years For Porn (LUFDN) 65
Killer Of 5 Florida Students Is Executed (NYT) 66
Plotting Crime, Street By Street (WP) 67
Justice Department Webcast Focuses On Hiring, Retaining New Police Officers (PADN) 68

Civil Law:

The Supreme Court's Crusade: Fairness For The Powerful (NYT) 69
Sticks And Stones May Break Bones, But Warsaw, Ind., Makes Replacements (WSJ) 70

Civil Rights:

List Errors Might Impede Voters (AP) 71
Black Groups Urge 3 To Resign From Ga. Election Board (AJC) 72
Manassas May Face 2nd Lawsuit (WP) 73
Right Hopes For Boost From N.J. Ruling (FWNS) 74
New Jersey Court Orders Equality For Gay Couples (WSJ) 75
Ruling On Gays May Echo At Polls (USAT) 75
N.J. Court Opens Door To Gay Marriage (AP-Y) 76
New Jersey's Justices Agree On All But The 'M' Word (NYT) 77
Gay Marriage Backers Plan Big Push To Sway Trenton Lawmakers (NYT) 78
New Jersey Court Backs Full Rights For Gay Couples (NYT) 79
New Jersey Says Gay Couples Have The Same Rights As Straight Couples (KCS) 81
NJ Court Grants Rights, Not Marriage, To Gays (LAT) 83
Jersey Court Orders OK Of Gay Unions (WT) 84
Party Lines Are No Guide To Opinions By Justices (NYT) 84
An 'I Do' From McGreevey? He Would. (NYT) 85
N.J. Supreme Court Punts Same-Sex Marriage To Legislature (LAW) 86
A Ruling For Equality In New Jersey (NYT) 87
New Jersey's Step Forward (WP) 87
Expanded DNA Collection Eroding Civil Liberties, Panel Says (AAS) 88
Abortion Ban Looms Large On S.D. Ballot (USAT) 88
New Voting Systems Face Midterm Exam (WSJ) 89
Voting Machines Had Defective Part (WP) 91
National Federation Of The Blind Files Target Lawsuit (USAT) 92
Inside The Beltway (WT) 94

Antitrust:

FCC Likely To Avoid 'net Neutrality' Debate In AT&T-BellSouth Merger Decision (SAEN) 94
FPL Group, Constellation Energy Call Off Their $12.5 Billion Deal (WSJ) 95
Plug Pulled On Md. Utility Deal (WP) 96
Yankee Candle Agrees To $1.4 Billion Buyout (WSJ) 97
Milberg, Weiss & Bush (WSJ) 98
Radio Chain Said To Weigh Selling Itself (NYT) 98
Big Law Firms From 2 Coasts Move Closer To A Merger (NYT) 99
Growing Funds Fuel Buyout Boom (WSJ) 100
NYSE To Buy Rest Of Amex Tech Stake (WSJ) 101
German Regulators Say No To Coherent Buy (AP-YBIZ) 101
German Regulator OKs Metro-Wal-Mart Deal (AP) 102

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Military Tells Panel Stryker Unit Is Vital (HSB) 102
Shell Could Face Criminal Charges In Russia (NYT) 103
Weakening The Fight For Mine Safety (NYT) 103
Tribal Police Chief, Officer Face Federal Charges (AP) 104

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

MCLU Says FBI Is Spying On Peace Activists (WCSH) 104
Peace Groups Say FBI Monitored Their E-mails (AP) 105
Cops Arrested For Allegedly Stealing $31,000 (CHIST) 105
2 Chicago Police Officers Charged In Narcotics Case (BVND) 106
Jail Guard Charged With Accepting Bribes From Inmate (AP) . 106
Ring Allegedly Hid Meth In Elmo Dolls (AP) 107
Colorado Meth Ring Smuggled Drugs Inside Elmo Dolls And Other Toys, DEA Says (AP) 107
Cops Take 45 Lbs. Of Meth In Greeley (DENP) 107
Meth Arrests Put Greeley Cartel On Ice (DENP) 108
Meth Ring Broken Up (RMN) 108
Ten Arrested In Big Weld Drug Bust (GT) 109
Local Agent Tipped Off Friends, DEA Says (CA) 110
DEA Agent Indicted On Charges He Tipped Off Suspect (BRAH) 110
MPD Cop Turned DEA Agent Gets Indicted (WPTY) 111
Federal Agents Bust One Of Their Own For Helping Dealers (WMC) 111
15 Arrested In Richmond Drug Raids (SFC) 111
15 SUSPECTED GANG MEMBERS ARRESTED IN NORTH RICHMOND (BCNW) 112
Pittsford Man Charged In Federal 'club Drug' Case (RDC) 112
White Plains Pharmacist Facing Federal Drug Charge (JN) 113
Trial Date Set In Drug Case (TRE) 113
Bloomberg, Daley Lead Mayors In Coalition Against Gun Violence (AP) 114
Gladewater Gun Dealer Faces 5 Years In Prison, $250,000 Fine (LONGNJ) 114
STORE OWNER ADMITS TO ILLEGAL FIREARMS SALES (TMT) 114
Old West Leaves Dodge City; Guns Remain (AP-Y) 115
Fugitive Fatally Shot Was Holding Shoe, Not Gun (AP) 116
Suspect Killed After Confrontation With U.S. Marshal (AJC) 116

Immigration:

A Former Salvadoran Army Officer Convicted Of Killing Priests Is Arrested In L.A. As A Human Rights Violator (LAT) 116
Voters On Immigration: Action, Please (CSM) 118

DOJ_NMG_0086702

Tax:

Survey Finds Giving By Wealthy Largely Immune To Tax Changes (WSJ) ... 120
IRS Help Can Be Hard To Get, Audit Says (USAT) ... 120

Congress-Administration:

FT Interview: Rob Portman (FT) ... 121
Entering The Era Of Smart Card ID (WP) ... 122

Other News:

Fed Leaves Rates Alone For The Third Time (USAT) ... 123
Fed Again Leaves Rates Unchanged (WSJ) ... 123
Fed Holds Key Rate Steady At 5.25% (WP) ... 124
Home Prices Keep Sliding; Buyers Sit Tight (WSJ) ... 125
Sellers Sing The Blues As Price Drop Sets Record (USAT) ... 127
A Record Drop In Home Prices (WP) ... 129
Dow Hits High After Fed Keeps Rates Steady (USAT) ... 130
Stocks Rise On Fed News But Crude Curbs Gains (WSJ) ... 130
Amtrak Careless In Managing Outside Counsel, Report Says (WSJ) ... 131
Americans Expect Major Changes If Dems Win Nov. 7 (USAT) 131
Candidates Matter Some Places, But Not Everywhere (RC) ... 132
Democratic House Leader Under GOP Attack (FT) ... 133
Stakes Are High For Business Community In Nov. Elections (USAT) ... 134
Bush Calls Nov. 7 Referendum On Iraq, Taxes (WT) ... 136
Wall Street Handicaps Stocks, Sectors As Voting Nears (USAT) 137
Why Democrats Are Losing The Culture War (USAT) ... 138
Democrats Eyeing Upstate Races In Their Effort To Retake Congress (NYT) ... 139
Liberalism's Limits In Kentucky (WP) ... 141
A Hard Year To Be An Ohio Republican (WT) ... 142
In Old Textile District, The Free-Trade Issue Dominates (NYT) 144
Fed Up With Everybody (NYT) ... 145
Schumer Upbeat On Democrats' Senate Odds (WT) ... 146
In Tight Race, Ad On Black Candidate Stirs Furor (NYT) ... 147
Contentious Race Republicans' Hold On The South Gets Test In Tennessee (WSJ) ... 148
Ford Foundation (WSJ) ... 151
A Right Kind Of Democrat (LAT) ... 152
Celebrities Face Off On Stem Cell Issue In Mo. (USAT) ... 154
Political Pitches At The World Series (LAT) ... 154
Jesus' Words Used Vs. Stem-cell Initiative (WT) ... 155
Republicans Intensify Push In New Jersey (NYT) ... 156
Cardin, Steele Play Gotcha In Three-way Debate (BSUN) ... 157
Cardin, Steele Face Off In Contentious Debate (WP) ... 159
Senate Hopefuls Squabble, Call Each Other 'Handpicked' (WT) 159
Iraq, Stem Cell Research Topics At Second Senate Debate (AP) 160
Black Democrats Pull Punches In Maryland Race (WT) ... 161
Allen, Webb Stake Out Positions On 'No Child' (WP) ... 161
Allen, Webb Tour Va.; Wilder Backs Webb (WP) ... 162
Virginia Mayor Endorses Senator's Opponent (NYT/AP) ... 164
Wilder Backs Webb In Race (WT) ... 164
An Ascent Shadowed By Questions On Race (WP) ... 165
GOP Sees Hope In Michigan Race (WT) ... 168
Races In Mich. Explore Economy's Electoral Impact (USAT) ... 169
Michigan's Messy DeVos (WSJ) ... 170
Connecticut Crucible For A War Debate (WP) ... 171
A New Campaign Tactic: Manipulating Google Data (NYT) ... 172
Arab Americans Trending Democratic In Swing States (WT) ... 173
Election May Turn On What Happened In Vegas (USAT) ... 174
Candidates Show Strain Of Tough Election Season (NYT) ... 174
Hillary Clinton Wins Minds But Not Yet Hearts (FT) ... 176
US Faces 'bigger Skills Gap' Than India (FT) ... 177
The Era Of What's Next (NYT) ... 177
Special Treatment For Air America (WT) ... 178
Kiss Of Death For 'President'? (USAT) ... 179
A Capital Connection (WP) ... 180
Not So Big Oil (WSJ) ... 180
Chad Says Sudan Is Arming Rebels (NYT) ... 181
U.S. Faults Europeans' Proposed Iran Sanctions (WSJ) ... 181
Draft Iran Resolution Would Restrict Students (NYT) ... 182
Iran Said To Be Stepping Up Nuclear Programme (FT) ... 183
Secretary Of State ElBaradei (WSJ) ... 184
Iranian Ex-Leader Sought In Argentina (WP/AP) ... 185
Argentina Seeks Arrest Of Former Iranian Leader (USAT/AP) ... 185
Argentine Prosecutor Ties Iran To Bombing Of Jewish Center (MCT) ... 186
Rice Presses South Korea On Sanctions (AP-Y) ... 187
S. Korea Official Quits Over North Policy (WT) ... 188
Rice Plays Down Veiled Putin Criticism Of US Handling Of NKorea Crisis (AFP-Y) ... 188
Tokyo Denies Report It Wants Nuke Meet (AP) ... 189
N. Korea Warns South Against Sanctions (AP-Y) ... 189
A U.S. Embassy In Pyongyang (WSJ) ... 190
Bush Pushes For Trade Agreement (AP-Y) ... 192
Putin Promises To Remain Influential (NYT) ... 192
Putin Says He'll Retain Influence In Russia After Term Ends In '08 (WP) ... 193
Putin Hints At His Political Future (FT) ... 194
Putin Vows Not To Seek 3rd Term (WT/AP) ... 195
Putin Suggests He Will Remain A Force After Leaving Office (LAT) ... 195
Vote For Security Council Seat Stalled (AP) ... 196
Venezuela Would Back Bolivia For UN Security Seat (FT) ... 197
After 41 U.N. Ballots, Venezuela-Guatemala Logjam Persists (NYT) ... 198
Concerns Accompany U.S. Support For Uribe (WP) ... 199
Nicaragua To Join Nations Banning All Abortions (LAT) ... 200
With Beheadings, Drug Gangs Terrorize Mexico (NYT) ... 201
Prominent S. African Denied Entry Into U.S. (WP) ... 203
In Burma, A Cry For U.N. Help (WP) ... 203

Online Version

Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

DOJ_NMG_0086703

TERRORISM NEWS:

Gonzales Criticizes Europeans For Refusing To Receive Guantanamo Detainees (AP)

AP, October 26, 2006

BERLIN (AP) — U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said European countries should do more to take back detainees released from the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, while defending Washington's treatment of prisoners.

Gonzales is touring European capitals to discuss a recently passed U.S. law covering the prosecution of terror suspects.

Speaking in Berlin at an event organized by the German Marshall Fund, he said the United States is "not interested in serving as the world's jailer," and urged Europeans to be more willing to repatriate released prisoners, as well as to increase pressure on third countries to do so.

"Despite demands from others that Guantanamo be closed, the United States has received little help from our European allies regarding the fate of these detainees," Gonzales said.

Chancellor Angela Merkel has been among the critics of the U.S. military prison, which opened nearly five years ago.

About 450 detainees are being held at Guantanamo on suspicion of links to al-Qaeda or Afghanistan's ousted Taliban regime.

In August, a German-born Turkish citizen was released from Guantanamo after lengthy negotiations between Berlin and Washington. Murat Kurnaz, 24, is again living in the northern German city of Bremen.

Gonzales also detailed the U.S. Military Commissions Act, a law that provides for trials of captured terrorists, saying it was proof that "just because the U.S. still believes a state of war exists, that does not mean that the rule of law has no place."

U.S. President George W. Bush signed the act into law last week. Civil libertarians and leading Democrats have decried the law as a violation of American values.

Gonzales was conciliatory toward expressions of frustration from German members of parliament who attended the discussion over what they view as insufficient respect by the United States for international law.

"We understand the anxiety and the tension this has created," Gonzales said. However, he urged German and other allies to be open for discussion, saying "we need you in the long haul as partners."

Cheney Confirms That Detainees Were Subjected To Water-boarding (MCT)

By Jonathan S. Landay

McClatchy Newspapers, October 26, 2006

WASHINGTON - Vice President Dick Cheney has confirmed that U.S. interrogators subjected captured senior al-Qaida suspects to a controversial interrogation technique called "water-boarding," which creates a sensation of drowning.

Cheney indicated that the Bush administration doesn't regard water-boarding as torture and allows the CIA to use it. "It's a no-brainer for me," Cheney said at one point in an interview.

Cheney's comments, in a White House interview on Tuesday with a conservative radio talk show host, appeared to reflect the Bush administration's view that the president has the constitutional power to do whatever he deems necessary to fight terrorism.

The U.S. Army, senior Republican lawmakers, human rights experts and many experts on the laws of war, however, consider water-boarding cruel, inhumane and degrading treatment that's banned by U.S. law and by international treaties that prohibit torture. Some intelligence professionals argue that it often provides false or misleading information because many subjects will tell their interrogators what they think they want to hear to make the water-boarding stop.

Republican Sens. John Warner of Virginia, John McCain of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina have said that a law Bush signed last month prohibits water-boarding. The three are the sponsors of the Military Commissions Act, which authorized the administration to continue its interrogations of enemy combatants.

The radio interview Tuesday was the first time that a senior Bush administration official has confirmed that U.S. interrogators used water-boarding against important al-Qaida suspects, including Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the alleged chief architect of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. Mohammad was captured in Pakistan on March 1, 2003, and turned over to the CIA.

Water-boarding means holding a person's head under water or pouring water on cloth or cellophane placed over the nose and mouth to simulate drowning until the subject agrees to talk or confess.

Lee Ann McBride, a spokeswoman for Cheney, denied that Cheney confirmed that U.S. interrogators used water-boarding or endorsed the technique.

"What the vice president was referring to was an interrogation program without torture," she said. "The vice president never goes into what may or may not be techniques or methods of questioning."

In the interview on Tuesday, Scott Hennen of WDAY Radio in Fargo, N.D., told Cheney that listeners had asked him to "let the vice president know that if it takes dunking a terrorist in water, we're all for it, if it saves American lives."

"Again, this debate seems a little silly given the threat we face, would you agree?" Hennen said.

"I do agree," Cheney replied, according to a transcript of the interview released Wednesday. "And I think the terrorist threat, for example, with respect to our ability to interrogate high-value detainees like Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, that's been a very important tool that we've had to be able to secure the nation."

Cheney added that Mohammed had provided "enormously valuable information about how many (al-Qaida members) there are, about how they plan, what their training processes are and so forth. We've learned a lot. We need to be able to continue that."

"Would you agree that a dunk in water is a no-brainer if it can save lives?" asked Hennen.

"It's a no-brainer for me, but for a while there, I was criticized as being the vice president `for torture.' We don't torture. That's not what we're involved in," Cheney replied. "We live up to our obligations in international treaties that we're party to and so forth. But the fact is, you can have a fairly robust interrogation program without torture, and we need to be able to do that."

The interview transcript was posted on the White House Web site. Interview of the Vice President by Scott Hennen, WDAY.

CIA spokeswoman Michelle Neff said, "While we do not discuss specific interrogation methods, the techniques we use have been reviewed by the Department of Justice and are in keeping with our laws and treaty obligations. We neither conduct nor condone torture."

U.S. Seeks To Limit Detainees' Contact (AP)

By Michael Melia

AP, October 26, 2006

The U.S. government has proposed limiting contact between defense lawyers and detainees at Guantanamo Bay, according to court documents.

The government argues that it must restrict the detainees' communications, as news of world events could incite the prisoners to violence.

The U.S. proposed the rules in a filing to a federal appeals court in Washington that was examined by The Associated Press. The case deals with an Afghani detainee but the government wants them to apply to other prisoners at Guantanamo Bay Naval Base in southeast Cuba. The prison camp holds some 430 detainees.

The rules, which would apply to detainees pursuing court challenges to their designations as "enemy combatants," would tighten censorship of mail from attorneys and give the military more control over what lawyers can discuss with their clients, according to the filing.

The number of face-to-face meetings between defense attorneys and detainees would be limited to four total. There are now no restrictions on the number of times they can meet, although lawyers' access to the base is already hampered because it is so remote.

The government says current rules have allowed detainees to receive books or articles about terrorist attacks in Iraq, London and Israel, as well as details of the prisoner abuse investigation at Iraq's Abu Ghraib prison.

In the court filing, which was first reported Wednesday by The Boston Globe, a military lawyer said security at Guantanamo Bay has been threatened by the introduction of a book on Abu Ghraib, a speech given at an Amnesty International conference about the war on terror, and other materials.

"Such materials could incite detainees to violence, leading to a destabilization of the camp," wrote Navy Cmdr. Patrick M. McCarthy.

The government petition was filed in August in the case of Haji Bismullah, an Afghanistan native who is among several Guantanamo detainees represented by the New York-based Center for Constitutional Rights.

Currently, mail from lawyers is examined only for physical contraband. The proposed rules call for all of a detainee's mail to be examined for forbidden information.

Wells Dixon, an attorney at the Center for Constitutional Rights, said he suspects the proposal is aimed at controlling the information coming out of Guantanamo. Accounts from defense lawyers who have visited Guantanamo have cast doubt on government assertions that most detainees are hardened terrorists, Dixon said.

"What's happening is the government wants to hide this indisputable fact," he said "They're not happy we've been able to bring a lot of these developments to light."

DOJ_NMG_0086705

In 2004, the Supreme Court said detainees can contest the legality of their detentions. A law signed by President Bush on Oct. 17 bars detainees from protesting their detentions in court, but they still have a right to challenge their designations as "enemy combatants." The new rules would restrict legal representation for those challenges.

Sept. 11 Plotter Asks Court For Lawyer, Trial (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig And Julie Tate

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

Ramzi Binalshibh, an admitted al-Qaeda planner of the Sept. 11 attacks, tried four times to join the terrorist hijackers who flew planes into the World Trade Center and the Pentagon in 2001 and has acknowledged his goal of killing as many Americans as possible.

Now the Yemeni man is seeking the help of the U.S. court system to address his complaint that he has been wrongfully imprisoned and treated unfairly by the U.S. government. He filed a legal challenge in federal court in Washington on Oct. 10, asserting his rights to contest his detention and requesting that a court-appointed lawyer represent him free of charge.

In so doing, Binalshibh brought to life the two arguments at the heart of the recent, furious debate over stripping such habeas corpus rights from so-called enemy combatants: the administration's position that alleged terrorists like him do not deserve access to U.S. courts, and his opponents' assertion that the American justice system is a model for the world precisely because it accords such basic rights to all.

One of the most bitterly fought provisions of the legislation President Bush signed Oct. 17 to establish a system of military trials, or "commissions," for accused enemy combatants eliminated those rights for the captives at the U.S. prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Suspending habeas rights is a step that has been taken only four times previously in U.S. history, and its legality this time will almost certainly be decided by the Supreme Court.

Because of Binalshibh's alleged admission that he was a key player in the Hamburg cell that carried out the attacks, his legal suit may provide the starkest test yet of America's justice system, legal experts said.

"It is how our system treats the worst of the worst, the most reviled of the reviled, that shows how true we are to our principles, " said David H. Remes, who has represented 17 detainees, mostly from Yemen, and coordinated defense arguments to the Supreme Court in the successful Hamdan case.

Binalshibh may never get the hearing he is seeking. His is one of hundreds of cases the government asked the courts to dismiss immediately after Bush signed the new law. For his part, Binalshibh did little more than assert his habeas rights and ask for a lawyer.

Binalshibh is part of a select group of detainees that even defense lawyers acknowledge may be guilty -- 14 suspected terrorists the government deemed "high-value detainees," some of whom have allegedly admitted high-level roles in the al-Qaeda attacks. President Bush cited the 14 men, selected from more than 100 terrorist suspects who had been held for years in secret CIA-run prisons, when he successfully lobbied for the military commission law.

Bush sought Congress's approval after the Supreme Court ruled in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld in June that the administration lacked the authority to establish the military trials on its own. He pressed for the legislation as the government transferred the 14 men to a unit of the military prison in Guantanamo Bay and singled out Binalshibh -- along with Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Sheik Mohammed.

Binalshibh's family's decision to seek help in a U.S. court also highlights a growing tension within the defense bar about the ethical and practical dilemmas of representing detainees who likely played a role in slaughtering thousands of Americans.

Binalshibh's brother filed a petition on his behalf and asked the federal court to appoint a public defender to represent him. The Center for Constitutional Rights, a civil liberties group that sued last year to represent the remaining detainees in Guantanamo Bay who lack representation, is not currently representing him. A group official said he could not comment on the reason because of potential attorney-client privilege.

Tina Foster, a civil liberties lawyer who previously helped coordinate the work of dozens of law firms representing hundreds of Guantanamo detainees, said it would be a "challenge" to find a pro bono lawyer for Binalshibh because he has been virtually convicted in media reports as a Sept. 11 plotter. Remes said there is an "understandable reluctance" among large commercial law firms to champion Binalshibh's cause.

"You wouldn't be rushing to file a habeas claim for Ramzi Binalshibh," Foster said. "Most of the folks down there are "no-value" detainees -- they shouldn't even be there -- and those are the ones you'd want to push in the court."

Binalshibh was captured by the United States in Pakistan in 2002 and taken to secret detention facilities. According to the Sept. 11 commission, he told interrogators that he was supposed to pilot another hijacked airliner on the day of the attacks but was repeatedly refused a visa to enter the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0086706

His transformation to a terrorist began in 1997 when he became friends with future hijackers Mohamed Atta, Marwan al-Shehhi and Ziad Jarrah while living in Germany on a student visa. He later pledged allegiance to Osama bin Laden while training with his friends in Afghanistan in 1999.

Instead of participating in the attack, Binalshibh relayed messages between the hijackers and Mohammed, met with Atta for briefings on attack planning and allegedly helped transfer money to the hijackers.

Young Woman Fears Deportation, And Mutilation (NYT)

By Nina Bernstein

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

Adama Bah's schoolmates were jubilant when she returned to 10th grade at Heritage High School in Manhattan in May 2005 after six weeks in a distant juvenile detention center. Her release put to rest the federal government's unexplained assertion that Adama, a popular 16-year-old who wore jeans under her Islamic garb, was a potential suicide bomber.

But a year and a half later, with many of her friends planning proms and applying to college, Ms. Bah, now 18, was still wearing an electronic ankle bracelet and tethered to a 10 p.m. government curfew, restrictions that were conditions of her release. And she was still facing deportation to Guinea, where she has not lived since she was 2.

Today, at a closed hearing in Manhattan's federal building, she will plead for political asylum from Guinea's entrenched practice of female genital mutilation, which has marked all the women in her extended family, including her mother. An immigration judge could decide her fate on the spot.

"I'm worried about being sent back," Ms. Bah said on Tuesday in her first extended interview about the lasting consequences of a case that briefly became a cause célèbre in the debate over government vigilance and the protection of individual liberties. "I'm worried about being separated from my family. This is all I have left now — what hasn't been taken."

Officially, she and a 16-year-old Bangladeshi girl arrested in Queens the same day were detained solely because their childhood visas were no longer valid. That remains the only reason Ms. Bah is in deportation proceedings, and the sole legal basis for an order last year that released the other girl, Tashnuba Hayder, on the condition that she leave the country immediately.

Even now, Ms. Bah says she has no idea whether her slight acquaintance with Ms. Hayder was what caused agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation to hold her for questioning. Though a document provided by a federal agent at the time said the F.B.I. considered the girls "an imminent threat" to national security, it provided no evidence, and officials refused to discuss the matter.

"Why me?" she asked, before her volunteer lawyers warned that a judicial order limits what she can say about the experience. "Nobody answers, why me?"

She has had little time to dwell on the question, however, because she has been struggling to replace her father as the family's primary breadwinner. Her father, a cabdriver who was arrested along with her and held on immigration violations, stayed in detention until his deportation last month. Her mother, illiterate and speaking little English, soon lost the family business, a trinket stand.

But under the strictures of the government's curfew, Ms. Bah found she could not continue her education and at the same time earn enough to feed her four younger siblings, all American citizens. Last year, she dropped out of Heritage High, where teachers had praised her intellectual curiosity and generous spirit, and took up office work at Bellevue Hospital Center for $6.75 an hour.

Her income fell far short of needs. And though a few community agencies tried to help with diapers for the youngest and trips to a food pantry, she said, the financial crisis deepened. In the end, it was an Islamic political activist in Maryland who came through, taking three of Ms. Bah's siblings into his home for the summer, and paying $500 a month toward household expenses so she could attend summer school and re-enroll in Heritage this fall.

"We were looking for other options, but nothing was working out," Ms. Bah said. She added that she knew little about the politics of the activist, Mauri Saalakhan, 53, whom she met for the first time last fall when she and her mother stopped to pray at a downtown mosque after a session with lawyers at Hughes, Hubbard & Reed, which is handling her asylum case without fee.

Her family's association with Mr. Saalakhan raised eyebrows this spring when he invited her to join spectators at the trial of a Pakistani immigrant accused — and eventually convicted — of plotting to blow up the Herald Square subway station in 2004. Ms. Bah, who was recognized by some reporters in the courtroom, said later that she went out of curiosity because people told her that the young man's case was like hers. It was not, she said, and when she realized that, she did not go back.

Mainstream Islamic groups have looked askance at her family's link to Mr. Saalakhan, an African-American who often accuses such groups of timidity, and whose criticism of government policies dates to a youthful stint with the Black Panthers. But, she said, “He’s somebody who stepped up and helped” when others seemed afraid or only offered services like counseling instead of money to pay the rent.

DOJ_NMG_0086707

For his part, Mr. Saalakhan says he is “a provocateur for truth and justice,” who loves America and has police officers in his family. He was happy to have Ms. Bah’s siblings Mohamed, 14, Mariama, 12, and Abdoul, 8, join him, his wife and teenage daughter for the summer near Washington, where he directs the Peace and Justice Foundation, “a grass-roots human rights organization.”

“What our government has put this family through is unconscionable,” he said.

But the volunteer lawyers who took over Ms. Bah’s asylum case last fall are leery of any effort to make her emblematic of larger issues, when government lawyers are raising no national security questions.

“Right now all we have is a straightforward asylum claim,” said Bryan Lonegan, a lawyer with the Legal Aid Society’s immigration unit who is advising Hughes, Hubbard lawyers on the case. “This is a life and death situation for her.”

The petition draws a grim picture of what she would face in Guinea as a young woman with intact genitalia who opposes the painful and dangerous practice of female genital mutilation.

In Guinea, “If a girl’s genitals are not mutilated, she is considered dirty, repulsive, unfit for marriage and motherhood, and devoid of morals and monetary value,” an expert, Hanny Lightfoot-Klein, wrote in an affidavit. Male relatives consider themselves dishonored, and will beat her until she submits, the affidavit added. “Elder women perform the procedure on dimly lit floors, with dull kitchen knives, glass shards, scissors or razor blades,” the affidavit said.

Ms. Bah’s mother, Aissatou Dalanda Bah, who has separately applied for asylum, had her clitoris excised by her grandmother with a kitchen knife when she was about 10, the court papers said. Later, she watched helplessly as one of Adama’s cousins bled to death from the procedure.

For Ms. Bah, who grew up absorbing American values and believing she was a legal immigrant, the prospect is terrifying and unreal. Genital mutilation “has nothing to do with my religion,” she said. “You can’t just circumcise a woman against her will, to take away her pleasure. That’s my right as a woman.” Her fear has become one more part of a day-to-day struggle to hold the family together, she said, as she repeatedly interrupted the interview to respond to her youngest brother, Saeed, 2.

“It’s hard to concentrate in school,” she said, explaining that she has missed many days this fall tending to the needs of her siblings, who now get public aid.

“In front of people,” she added, “you have to be this happy person, even though inside, it hurts.” At night, alone, she said, she allows herself to cry when she thinks about her family’s collapse, and about her judge: “Somebody who’s meeting me once, and making a decision for my lifetime.”

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Intelligence, Homeland Security Agencies Sharpen Surveillance Methods (GOVEXEC)

By Jonathan Marino

Government Executive, October 26, 2006

A senior Coast Guard official on Tuesday praised homeland security and intelligence agencies' efforts to develop new surveillance tools and bolster information sharing.

Guy Thomas, the Coast Guard's science and technology adviser, said improved surveillance techniques would help provide better protection against the possibility of attacks launched from boats offshore.

A 60- to 70-foot boat loaded with ordinary explosives and a biological or chemical weapon could deliver and spread a deadly substance - five pounds of anthrax, for example - to coastal areas with thousands of people, Thomas said. "I don't think I want to live in Los Angeles anymore," he told guests of the Border Management Summit, which was organized by the Institute for Defense and Government Advancement.

Protecting the coastal waters requires improved sensory techniques, an official with a company that provides security solutions said. He said his company has been working on multiple projects aimed at identifying incoming ships from farther away to detect suspicious ones. Recent advances mean that even the material from which a ship is built -- whether it is wood, plastic or metal -- can be determined from a distance, he said.

As part of more general efforts to improve surveillance, technology capable of recording biometric identifiers such as leg or facial muscle movement without alerting the subject is being refined. Gait recognition, for instance, is part of the "long-range surveillance" that the FBI may start using to help track suspects, said Duane Blackburn, the bureau's representative to the National Science and Technology Council. It remains in the research phase, and is being tested at universities, Blackburn said.

DOJ_NMG_0086708

Other techniques in development include keystroke analyses of typing rhythms, and the production of video and photographic images clear enough to display biometric patterns.

Like gait surveillance, these remain in the early research stages. "Video is a real challenge," said Christopher Miles, senior program manager of the Justice Department's National Institute of Justice.

When intelligence is gathered, more needs to be done to ensure it is shared among intelligence and homeland security officials, Thomas said. "Ninety-five percent of [information and intelligence] needs to stay [unclassified]," he said.

New York Times Gets Two Extra Days To Disclose Confidential Sources (NYS)

By Josh Gerstein, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, October 26, 2006

A federal judge gave the New York Times a brief reprieve from an order forcing it to identify confidential sources for columns about the 2001 anthrax attacks, but the paper could still face the possibility of being held in contempt of court as soon as tomorrow.

Judge Claude Hilton of Alexandria, Va., issued a two-day stay of a magistrate's order that would have required the Times to name the sources by yesterday. The order came in a libel suit filed by a former Army scientist, Steven Hatfill, who claims he was defamed by five columns written by Nicholas Kristof in 2002.

According to a lawyer involved in the dispute, Judge Hilton said yesterday that he was still reviewing whether the Times should be compelled to identify the sources. He told attorneys that he planned to rule on the issue by Friday.

But the Times suffered a setback yesterday when Judge Hilton upheld a magistrate's ruling denying its request to suspend action on the libel suit until the government completes its investigation into the anthrax mailings, which killed at least five people. While investigators searched a home and storage locker belonging to Mr. Hatfill, no criminal charges were brought.

The newspaper wanted to defend against the libel suit by gaining access to the records of the government probe, but the Justice Department has refused to cooperate. The magistrate assigned to the suit, Liam O'Grady, declined to force the disclosure of details of the investigation, which the FBI contends is ongoing.

Caution Flag For Evacuation Plans (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

Worried about evacuating your city in an emergency?

Move to Kansas City.

Making a familiar case for more roads and using the newer argument of homeland security, a trade association for highway builders and the automotive industry recently gave most of the nation's biggest metropolitan areas failing grades for how well they would evacuate their populations in a disaster.

Twenty of 37 urban areas received an F from the American Highways Users Alliance. The list included usual suspects such as New York City, Los Angeles, Chicago, Philadelphia and Washington.

Only Kansas City got an A.

The Bush administration and Congress have emphasized mass-evacuation planning since Hurricane Katrina and the destruction of much of New Orleans. The Department of Homeland Security this summer found such plans inadequate in about 90 percent of the nation's top 75 cities and "an area of profound concern." Pushed by Congress, DHS will award $1.3 billion in homeland security grants next year, partly on the basis of fixing them.

Washington area governments recently gave a million-dollar contract to a private firm to coordinate regional evacuation plans, joining many urban areas nationwide, and Congress has ordered Pennsylvania and West Virginia to take part in planning for an exodus of the capital region.

But many state and local officials warn that Washington is focusing too much on a replay of a Katrina-like disaster instead of drawing broader lessons about preparedness. Some recall a similar pattern after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, when attention shifted to terrorism at the expense of preparation for a natural disaster.

"I think it's a classic example of generals planning for the last war," said Richard A. Andrews, former head of California's emergency management office and a former member of the president's Homeland Security Advisory Council. "Because this happened with Katrina, now every city needs to have evacuation plans so they're not the city of New Orleans?"

The alliance's grades were based on three factors: each city's internal congestion, percentage of automobile ownership and percentage of vehicles that local highways could move in 12 hours. It recommended national standards, better planning and more roads and car ownership.

DOJ_NMG_0086709

The federal government is pushing coastal states to do some of that. The Transportation Department reviewed evacuation plans for five Gulf Coast states. DHS prepared to move 141,000 people by bus, train or plane from New Orleans if necessary, while arguing with Louisiana about sheltering 150,000 others, setting collection points and identifying vulnerable groups such as the sick and elderly.

Outside hurricane country and high-threat cities such as New York and Washington, however, experts are hard-pressed to envision scenarios in which officials would want to evacuate an entire metropolitan area in 12 hours.

The best response to a radiological "dirty" bomb or chemical release might be to take cover or at most to evacuate people from a specific plume area. In a doomsday scenario involving a nuclear bomb, planners say, it cannot be assumed that local authorities would have credible warning, time to act and confidence that they would not be sending people into harm's way before an event -- or that they would be able to respond effectively afterward.

Andrews recalled the Federal Emergency Management Agency's bad experience with an aborted $4.2 billion Crisis Relocation Planning program in the early 1980s, which called for plans to evacuate 400 U.S. cities before a nuclear attack.

"It became very clear it just wasn't in the cards. You just can't do it," Andrews said. "What was then the Civil Defense program lost a lot of credibility, because it just didn't make sense. There are an awful lot of things we could be better spending our time on than evacuation plans."

For instance, Milwaukee has an international port on Lake Michigan and is home to 12 Fortune 500 companies, so it takes a catastrophic threat seriously. But it faces bigger risks from tornadoes and ice storms, said the city's emergency coordinator, Daniel Alexander, and more urgent needs such as improving radio systems so first responders and nearby cities can talk in a disaster.

"There is an inordinate amount of attention paid to one threat or vulnerability that is not applicable to all areas of the country," Alexander said. "The money, time and energy that's being devoted to regional evacuation planning, while important in some parts of the country, there are other more pressing issues. One of them is interoperable communications."

David Riggleman, spokesman for Las Vegas, agreed. "We are not quite sure what the scenario would be," he said. "We're in the middle of the Mojave Desert. For us to evacuate 1.8 million people, where are we going to evacuate them to?"

Daniel Burns, southern Nevada emergency manager for the state Department of Public Safety, added: "I guess if there's a volcano, but you really have to stretch to get to cause a full evacuation in 12 hours." A bigger concern is receiving an exodus of Southern Californians in case of a large earthquake 300 miles away.

George W. Foresman, DHS undersecretary for preparedness, agreed that the "one-size-fits-all" approach does not work for different populations, transportation networks and risks in each city. But he said the highway users study is a bit of a straw man, because evacuation plans encompass preparations that would be useful in all kinds of emergencies, such as providing shelter and housing, improving communications, distributing medicine and health care, or setting up public alert and warning systems.

"We are not doing it at the expense of scenarios that have a higher probability of occurring," Foresman said. "We are not talking about the ability to evacuate every metro area to where it's a ghost town. . . . There is a different level of focus to what each area is putting into evacuation planning."

In any case, Foresman said, Congress has said it wants another survey of preparedness nationwide about this time next year.

Another Post-September 11 Reality (WT)

By Kevin M. Lynch

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

In the wake of the September 11 attacks, many people asked with great urgency: Why didn't someone connect the dots? Why didn't we see the attacks coming? And, how do we prevent other attacks?

The response was a classic example of protecting against the last threat and not "thinking outside the box" about that next threat. We have flung ourselves headlong into creating a safer air traffic system and so far it has been working. Another threat, which has reared its ugly and deadly head in Madrid, London, Chechnya and India, is the threat to the railroads.

We received threats against our railroads, and the major commuter railroads and subway systems were blanketed by police. Nothing happened, and that is a good thing. However, the bigger threat to our nation's railroads comes not from the potential to repeat those attacks on passenger rail around the world, but upon railroad infrastructure itself, which is primarily freight railroad in the United States.

Except along the Northeast Corridor from Boston to Washington, Amtrak runs on the tracks of the various freight railroads, as do most commuter railroads. A network of nearly 200,000 miles of railroad stretches across America with thousands upon thousands of switches, turnouts, crossovers, bridges, trestles, tunnels and hundreds of railroad yards and thousands upon thousands of railcars and locomotives.

DOJ_NMG_0086710

All are vulnerable to attack and sabotage and given al Qaeda's penchant for multiple, simultaneous attacks, any such attacks against the freight railroad infrastructure or the targeting of hazardous commodities in transit could spell disastrous consequences for local communities across the nation and could deliver a crippling blow to our economy. In addition, such attacks are easy and cheap to carry out.

Are we prepared to defend against such attacks? Sadly, the answer is a resounding "no." While the British Transport Police in Great Britain fields more than 3,500 officers to protect the rail system in that country, there are fewer than 1,400 railroad police officers in the United States, down from more than 4,000 20 years ago. Even since September 11, the freight railroads have continued to trim their police departments. Instead of fielding uniformed officers 24/7 across their systems, the freight railroads rely on "special agents" who are assigned 200 to 700 miles of railroad to protect. There are only a handful of marked railroad police cars across the United States.

Each year in the United States about 500 persons are killed while trespassing on railroad property and another 500 or so are injured. That is indicative of just how open and vulnerable our railroads are. Most of the 200,000 miles of railroad are not fenced either. For the most part, railroads operate on the honor system. That could be virtually stopped by vastly increasing the number of railroad police officers, making them much more visible and available to prevent trespassing and to protect railroad property. By eliminating casual trespassers, those intent upon doing harm will be stopped. Additionally, good, specially designed fences would go a great way in keeping trespassers off railroad property and prevent them from being killed or injured and protect railroad property from theft, vandalism and sabotage.

Major railroad accidents where hazardous materials have spilled have killed people in communities along the railroads and have led to a number of major evacuations of those who live near the railroads. What is the current railroad response to these threats? Simply this: Eventually compensate those dislocated and injured and the families of those killed. The assumption one can make is that paying claims must be cheaper than paying for cops, fences and other protective measures. That is unacceptable.

The only real answer is to stop giving lip service to protection and prevention and to fence strategic railroad property and drastically increase the number of sworn railroad police officers across the nation.

The railroads, through Operation Lifesaver, acknowledge that the three "E's," engineering, education and enforcement, are essential in protecting railroad property, the passengers and freight they carry and the communities through which they travel. But they have failed to acknowledge the fourth "E," enabling -- that is, actually putting their money where their mouths are and making protection of our nation's railroads a reality.

In this post-September 11 world we must connect the dots. Nothing less is acceptable. Our lives depend upon it.

Kevin M. Lynch of New York is a former captain of police for the Conrail Police Department and a consultant on railroad police practices. He also is an expert witness in railroad injury and death cases.

ID Plan Sent Back To Drawing Board (AP)

By Leslie Miller

The AP, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Two anti-terrorism ID programs have been sent back to the drawing board and a third is being farmed out to private companies after costing hundreds of millions of dollars.

Begun after the Sept. 11, 2001, hijackings, the programs were supposed to help prevent catastrophic terrorist attacks on the U.S. transportation system by checking airline passenger names against watch lists and providing special identification cards to every worker with access to airports, railroads, seaports or trucks.

So far, the Transportation Security Administration _ which has been overseeing development of the three programs_ has not gone beyond testing, has issued no IDs and has screened no passengers against terrorist lists.

TSA chief Kip Hawley defended the agency's efforts this week, saying the projects by their very nature use expensive and unreliable advanced technology.

All three are back on track, Hawley said. "Massive changes have happened here," he said. "We have a good acquisitions team and a good process."

According to documents obtained by The Associated Press, the agency has spent more than $200 million on the Transportation Worker Identity Credential, Secure Flight and Registered Traveler programs.

On all three, the TSA and contractors hired by the agency have spent more than anticipated, missed deadlines and raised questions about their ability to protect the public's privacy and the private sector's commercial interests.

Congressional investigators have warned repeatedly that the agency is mismanaging the programs.

"Five years after 9/11, the Bush Administration and TSA are stuck in neutral on critical security measures," said Massachusetts Rep. Ed Markey, a senior Democrat on the Homeland Security Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0086711

"The lack of oversight by this Republican Congress on this program and countless others is just another reason Americans are ready to head in a new direction in November," Markey said.

Hawley called Secure Flight the most important of the three projects. It is envisioned as a computer-based program to check all airline passengers' names against terrorist watch lists before they board an airplane.

Airlines already check names against the lists and alert TSA officials when a passenger's name appears similar to one on a watch list. The system has led to thousands of false identifications. More than 30,000 people who are not terrorists have asked TSA to remove their names from the lists since Sept. 11, 2001.

The TSA for four years tried to develop a technology system to take over the task of checking names against watch lists. The major contractors on the project were IBM, Lockheed Martin and Eagle Force Associates. Also involved in testing were Acxiom Corp., HNC Software, Infoglide Software, and Ascent Technology.

In February, the Government Accountability Office found security vulnerabilities with Secure Flight and it was suspended for retooling _ after $110 million had been spent.

Hawley said the project stalled because of debate about whether it should try to identify unknown terrorists _ which raises civil liberties concerns _ or simply match names against watch lists.

"That debate was played out," he said. "Congress said this is simply going to be watch-list matching."

The Transportation Workers Identity Credential, or TWIC, is an ID card to be issued to about 6 million longshoremen, mechanics, airport workers, locomotive engineers and truck drivers _ if they pass government background checks. The card will use a biometric identifier _ fingerprint or eye scan, for example.

Bearing Point, a Virginia consulting firm, did the bulk of TWIC development so far.

But years after the first cards were supposed to be issued, a contractor hasn't been chosen, a technical standard hasn't been issued for the card reader and regulations haven't been written to describe who will be required to get the card.

On Friday, the GAO reported that TSA must test the program to make sure the technology can work in harsh outdoor environments and that it won't delay the movement of goods.

"That is moving along and it is going to work," said Hawley, adding that TSA is pursuing a card that can be read without making physical contact with a machine. "This is cutting-edge technology," he said.

Registered Traveler is supposed to be a smart card program for frequent flyers in which they pay for a background check and a biometric ID card so they can wait in shorter security lines.

The government tested Registered Traveler in five airports and let a private company _ Verified Identity Pass Inc. _ test it in Orlando, Fla. Contractors for the pilot project were Unisys and EDS.

Frequent flyers who enrolled in the test said they liked Registered Traveler. The TSA found it didn't compromise security. The test, though, was staged in so few airports that its benefits were limited.

The TSA pulled the plug on the government tests in September 2005 because that year's funding ran out. Two months later TSA said Registered Traveler would be up and running in June 2006. It would be turned over to a consortium of private companies to develop and operate.

On Monday, Hawley said the TSA had decided Registered Traveler was a low priority but that it would be ready by the end of November.

Some security experts say Congress never should have ordered the TSA to undertake such complex information technology projects because they're far more expensive than anyone imagined, and probably will not work as envisioned.

"I blame Congress," said James Carafano, homeland security fellow at the Heritage Foundation, a Washington think tank.

Congress dictates deadlines for untested projects without ever analyzing if it is a good requirement or whether it can be accomplished, Carafano said.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Unsatisfied With Iraq War Progress (AP-Y)

By Terence Hunt

AP, October 26, 2006

Acknowledging painful losses in Iraq, President Bush said Wednesday he is not satisfied with the progress of the long and unpopular war, but he still insisted the United States was winning and should not think about withdrawing.

Thirteen days before elections in which Republicans fear Iraq could cost them control of the House or Senate, Bush expressed unwavering confidence in Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, the U.S. generals running the war and Iraq's prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, despite new strains between Baghdad and Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0086712

"The ultimate accountability rests with me," Bush said of Iraq. "If people are unhappy about it, look right to the president." He spoke in the East Room at an hour-long news conference dominated by Iraq questions.

Despite polls suggesting a Democratic takeover of at least the House, Bush said he was confident Republicans would prevail. Dismissing Democrats' hopes, Bush said, "We've got some people dancing in the end zone here in Washington, D.C. ... measuring their drapes."

Now in its fourth year, the war is the top campaign issue. A majority of Americans are opposed to Bush's handling of Iraq, and increasing numbers of Republican candidates have signaled impatience with the president's policies as U.S. deaths have climbed above 2,800. Bush indicated he shared the public's frustration even as he pushed back against calls for troop withdrawals.

"I know many Americans are not satisfied with the situation in Iraq," he said in a lengthy statement before taking questions. "I'm not satisfied either." October has been the deadliest month this year for American forces, and the war soon will have lasted longer than U.S. involvement in World War II.

"The events of the past month have been a serious concern to me and a serious concern to the American people," the president said.

Bush said the United States was changing tactics to deal with circumstances in Iraq but shouldn't change the overall direction of the war.

"Absolutely we're winning," the president asserted.

Bush voiced confidence in al-Maliki, calling him "the right man" for Iraq now.

In Baghdad, the Iraqi leader took a hard slap at the United States for a raid by U.S. and Iraqi forces on the stronghold of a Shiite militia led by a radical anti-American cleric on whom Al-Maliki relies for political support. Al-Maliki said the raid "will not be repeated."

Al-Maliki also criticized the top U.S. military and diplomatic representatives in Iraq for saying his government needed to set a timetable to curb violence in the country. "I affirm that this government represents the will of the people and no one has the right to impose a timetable on it," he said.

Bush said he had asked for a transcript of al-Maliki's remarks before coming into the East Room. Al-Maliki was correct in saying mandates could not be imposed on Iraq, Bush said. He suggested there had been a miscommunication between U.S. and Iraqi officials.

Despite criticism that al-Maliki has failed to stop sectarian violence, Bush said, "We'll push him, but we're not going to push him to the point where he can't achieve the objective." At the same time, Bush said Iraq's government "must respect the fact that we've got patience, but not unlimited patience."

Democrats said Bush's appearance was evidence that the war had shaken voters and the administration needed to salvage its reputation on national security. Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., called the news conference an election-season "performance" to "convince Americans he has a plan for Iraq. But the president can't sell what he doesn't have."

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., accused Bush of changing his tune. "One day, our senior military leaders indicate more troops may be needed, the next day the president discounts that option. One day, it's stay the course, the next day it's change the course."

Bush rejected Democratic calls for a timetable for troop withdrawals. Currently there are 144,000 U.S. forces in Iraq.

"We cannot allow our dissatisfaction to turn into disillusionment about our purpose in this war," the president said.

He said a fixed timetable for withdrawal "means defeat. You can't leave until the job is done." Bush said he would send more troops if Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Baghdad, said more were needed to win. A day earlier, Casey said he might need an increase in U.S. forces in Baghdad to stop the rising bloodshed.

"We're winning and we will win, unless we leave before the job is done," Bush said. He said Rumsfeld — whose resignation has been urged by some Democrats and Republicans — had done everything asked of him. "He is a smart, tough, capable administrator," the president said.

Bush said he looked forward to a report after the election from a blue-ribbon commission exploring U.S. options in Iraq. Bush said he would consider any option but cautioned, "The road to victory will not be easy. We should not expect a simple solution."

On other subjects, Bush said:

_He has not given up on trying to win immigration, Social Security and tax reform legislation. He said there was a better chance of getting them through a Republican Congress rather than a Democratic Congress — although it hasn't worked out that way yet.

DOJ_NMG_0086713

_North Korea was trying to test the will of five countries that are aligned in negotiations to pressure Pyongyang to abandon its nuclear weapons. Earlier, North Korea warned South Korea it would "pay a high price" if it joins the U.S.-led drive to punish North Korea for its nuclear test. "The leader of North Korea likes to threaten," Bush said.

Iraq Reality Check (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 26, 2006

IF THERE WAS GOOD NEWS from President Bush's news conference Wednesday, it's that the president is not adopting a bunker mentality and is addressing the deteriorating conditions in Iraq. The bad news is that the more he talks, the more apparent it becomes that there is no easy way to reverse them.

That is a painful admission for an administration two weeks before a midterm election, so any sense of despair was wrapped in more purposeful language. Washington is issuing benchmarks — don't call them timetables — to Baghdad. The administration routinely changes course in pursuit of its goals. Progress is being made. And so on.

The president at one point said Americans will "support the war as long as they see a path to victory." It is a curious formulation. If Bush believes the war in Iraq is central to the war on terror, why is support for it dependent on how winnable it is? Perhaps the formulation is unavoidable during election season. It would be unrealistic to expect Bush to say that because the U.S. has no choice but to "win," he is doubling the number of American troops in Iraq.

So the next round of Washington's ongoing battle of semantics may entail defining "victory" downward. If the war was initially supposed to bequeath the Middle East a proverbial shining city on a hill — an Arab middle-class democracy that would transform the region — the goal now seems to be to leave Iraq intact, if bloodied. Or to prevent the country from becoming a broken state that is a haven to terrorists. Victory, in the end, may simply be a matter of avoiding a worst-case scenario.

To be fair to Bush, U.S. woes are partly a function of the degree to which the administration has ceded sovereignty to the Iraqi people. There is an awkward tension now between Iraqi self-determination and U.S. responsibility for what transpires in the country. If Iraq's majority Shiite leaders want to use their democratically acquired power to settle scores with a long-dominant minority and engage in ethnic cleansing, what is the proper response of the United States? Reassert control of the country, or walk away?

Such blunt questions may be premature. But they underlie the tension between Washington and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, who held his own news conference Wednesday to criticize U.S. forces for conducting a raid in Sadr City, apparently without Iraqi government approval.

Bush is walking a tightrope, trying to browbeat Maliki, the head of a sovereign state, into cracking down on one of his political allies, the radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr. Sadr controls 30 seats in parliament and two ministries. He despises the West. Without appearing to dictate to his Iraqi counterpart, Bush has to make Maliki realize that he can't allow his supporters to run death squads that prey on Sunnis.

That won't be easy. Nothing in Iraq is, and it gets more difficult with each passing day. Here's hoping that it won't get much worse in the next two weeks, and that Bush will be more candid about his plans on Nov. 8.

Bush's Gamble: Turning The Spotlight On The Iraq War As Republicans Try To Dim It (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 25 — With a shift in tone and the suggestion of flexibility on tactics in Iraq, President Bush gambled Wednesday that he could rescue Republican candidates who are having a hard time defending the war and an even harder time running away from it.

With less than two weeks until Election Day, Mr. Bush's decision to address the war and its problems so prominently carries the risk that he will strengthen the Democrats' case that the midterm election is primarily a referendum on his own handling of the war.

Republican candidates around the country have been trying for months to de-emphasize the war as an issue, and to distance themselves from Mr. Bush more generally. In an interview with The Concord Monitor in New Hampshire on Tuesday, the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist, said his party's challenge "is to get Americans to focus on pocketbook issues, and not on the Iraq and terror issue."

If his party's candidates want to change the subject, Mr. Bush surely did not help them on Wednesday. While the deteriorating situation in Iraq and the tumult over the war has already thrust the issue to the center of the political stage, Mr. Bush spent more than an hour discussing Iraq with reporters at the White House, acknowledging the overriding importance of the issue and stating flatly that he should ultimately be held accountable.

DOJ_NMG_0086714

What came across was a president more candid than in the past about the military and political problems in Iraq and more willing to admit misjudgments about America's enemies and allies there. He said that in many cases Iraqi troops were not up to the job of defending their own country and that he was not satisfied with progress toward a resolution of the political and sectarian conflicts raging across the country.

But Mr. Bush, like other wartime presidents before him, remained grimly determined to press on in the face of mounting casualties and growing domestic discontent.

"The fact that the fighting is tough does not mean our efforts in Iraq are not worth it," the president said. "To the contrary; the consequences in Iraq will have a decisive impact on the security of our country, because defeating the terrorists in Iraq is essential to turning back the cause of extremism in the Middle East."

Some beleaguered Republican candidates welcomed the president's new realism and the flexibility he sought to project in how he would try to achieve victory.

"We are on the verge of chaos, and the current approach is clearly not working," said Jill Hazelbaker, spokeswoman for Thomas H. Kean Jr., the Republican candidate for the United States Senate in New Jersey. "We've seen an enormous amount of violence in Iraq, and Kean thinks it's a responsibility of the U.S. to determine: are there other strategies we can pursue? So, in that sense, yes, we welcome tactical changes."

But other Republicans were skeptical. Tony Fabrizio, a pollster working for several Republican candidates, said the president did his party more harm than good by highlighting a troublesome issue and seeming to change course so close to Election Day.

"It makes it look like they have a confused policy," he said. "Now the question will be, every day, what are the parameters of flexibility?"

Senior Democrats in Congress said the president presented little more than an old policy in new garb.

Senator Carl Levin, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, said Mr. Bush gave little ground on Wednesday and was unlikely to reap any political benefit.

"I don't see any reason to believe the president is any more realistic," Mr. Levin said. "What he said was an effort to get himself past the election by telling the American people that he's changing course while telling the Iraqis he's not changing course."

It is too early to say whether this is a major turning point in the president's thinking about the conduct of the war. But he said he was willing to consider altering his policy when he received the recommendations of a bipartisan panel led by James A. Baker III, the Republican former secretary of state, and Lee H. Hamilton, a former Democratic representative from Indiana, later this year.

The moment is reminiscent of early 1968, when President Lyndon B. Johnson convened a panel of wise men to advise him on the Vietnam War, which by then was killing hundreds of Americans a month with little military progress to show for it. Mr. Johnson insisted that American credibility was at stake and believed that a leader in wartime had to show resolve in the face of an implacable enemy and loud domestic criticism.

That spring, he capitulated, announcing plans to begin to de-escalate the war and declaring that he would not seek re-election. It took seven more years for Presidents Nixon and Ford to extricate the United States fully from Vietnam.

Mr. Bush may be facing a similar moment of truth, when the steadiness applauded by the American public after Sept. 11, 2001, begins to look like stubbornness and a refusal to recognize reality, according to Bruce W. Jentleson, professor of public policy at Duke University.

"This rush to make all these changes on the eve of the election isn't going to help that much," said Mr. Jentleson, who has advised Democratic candidates but is not affiliated with any campaign this fall. "The question is, what does he do after he gets this electoral outcome? Is he willing to change course and find a solution that avoids total disaster in Iraq?"

George C. Edwards III, a presidential scholar at Texas A&M University, said the president's appearance on Wednesday was both an act of political desperation and a possible turning point in the war. He cautioned, however, that little in Mr. Bush's record indicated he was capable of a radical change of direction.

"Many factors have come together to force him to re-evaluate," Professor Edwards said. "But we also have a long history of him being obdurate, while we don't have a long history of his being a particularly insightful decision maker about these things. We still should have some skepticism."

Face The Nation: Demure Madonna And Anxious President (NYT)

By Alessandra Stanley

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0086715

Both are famous people famously under fire for a ruckus overseas. Both are famous for never bending to public opprobrium and for pushing their agendas with single-minded assurance.

The president and the pop star went on television yesterday looking more like victims of circumstances beyond their control than visionaries.

Madonna went on "The Oprah Winfrey Show" to assure a skeptical public that she didn't snatch an African baby on a fashionably philanthropic whim. President Bush held a news conference to assure a skeptical public that he is inflexible in his willingness to be flexible in managing the Iraq war.

"Our goals are unchanging," Mr. Bush said. "We are flexible in our methods to achieving those goals."

Both showed viewers an unfamiliar side of themselves. The president, whose political identity is founded on an image of unwavering cowboy resolve, looked uncertain and chastened behind the lectern, at one moment staring downward and gnawing his lip in a rare tableau of weary anxiety.

The singer known for saucy aplomb was as prim and cautious as a politician, even if her clipped duty-free British diction undercut some of the poignancy of her appeal.

"I'm disappointed because it discourages other people from doing the same thing," Madonna told Ms. Winfrey via satellite from London. "I feel the media is doing a great disservice to all the orphans of Africa, period, not just the orphans of Malawi."

She said she learned that she was at the center of a global scandal only when she returned home. "I don't read newspapers or watch television, but all of my friends have let me know what everybody's talking about and what's going on in the news," Madonna said. "So it really didn't hit me until I got back to England. It's pretty shocking."

Madonna's fracas began earlier this month, when she started adoption procedures for a 13-month-old boy, David, from an orphanage in Malawi, in southeast Africa, and reporters learned that the child's father is still alive but said he was too poor to feed and rear his child. After the news broke, tabloid newspapers quoted the father, Yohane Banda, as saying he felt duped by the superstar. Madonna came off as a Lady Bountiful-come-lately, trying to compete with Bono in the world of philanthropy in Africa and with Angelina Jolie in the arena of celebrity mothers without borders.

Her explanation to Ms. Winfrey was plausible: she said she was told by officials in Malawi that the baby had been in the orphanage since he was 2 weeks old, and survived TB and malaria without any visits or show of concern from family members.

"From my perspective," she said, wearing a blue print outfit, "there was no one looking after David's welfare."

She had a point. Her description of a stampeding herd of tabloid hyenas hounding and confusing the boy's father, an unsophisticated African subsistence farmer — leading to front-page headlines like "She Stole My Baby" in The New York Post — certainly rang true.

But it was interesting to see the entertainer who made her name by courting and provoking the press now blaming reporters for her publicity woes.

The president, on the other hand, has often taken reporters to task for focusing on bad news in Iraq. But yesterday he avoided placing blame on the news media while skirting a direct admission that his overall strategy in Iraq needs a course correction. "This is a tough war in Iraq," Mr. Bush told White House reporters. "I mean, it's a hard fight, no question about it. All you've got to do is turn on your TV. But I believe that the military strategy we have is going to work."

He added: "We've made changes throughout the war, we'll continue to make changes throughout the war. But the important thing is whether or not we have the right strategy and the tactics necessary to achieve that goal. And I believe we do."

Mr. Bush, who prides himself on independence from his father's foreign policy, yesterday promised Americans that he would henceforth be guided on Iraq by his father's consigliere, James A. Baker III. "My administration will carefully consider any proposal that will help us achieve victory," the president said. The man who campaigned on a "humble" foreign policy tried to convey a new humility about his statesmanship. Madonna, who built a career on hubris, humbly thanked Ms. Winfrey for giving her a chance to tell her side of the story. The woman famous for never respecting boundaries wanted to work her way back into the confines of respectability.

Bush's Proposal Of 'Benchmarks' For Iraq Sounds Familiar (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

The text of President Bush's news conference yesterday ran to nearly 10,000 words, but what may have been more significant were the things he did not say.

The president talked repeatedly about "benchmarks" for progress in Iraq, using that word 13 times. But he did not discuss the consequences of the Iraqi government missing those targets. Such a question, he said, was "hypothetical."

That response left unclear how the benchmarks would be different from previous times when the United States has set out intentions, only to back down. For example, the original war plan envisioned the U.S. troop presence in Iraq being cut to 30,000 by the fall of 2003. Last year, some top U.S. commanders thought they would be able to significantly cut the U.S. troop level in Iraq this year -- a hope now officially abandoned. More recently, the U.S. military all but withdrew from Baghdad, only to have to have to reenter the capital as security evaporated from its streets and Iraqi forces proved unable to restore calm by themselves.

DOJ_NMG_0086716

President Bush also spoke several times yesterday about his flexibility, apparently as a way of countering critics calling for a major change in his approach to Iraq. But he made it clear that he was talking about tactical adjustments, rather than the kind of sweeping strategic revision being mulled by the Iraq Study Group led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee H. Hamilton, and also being urged by a host of members of Congress and political pundits.

More briefly, he touched upon establishing Iraqi security forces. But he did not use his old favorite phrase about U.S. troops "standing down as they stand up." He mentioned the goal of training about 325,000 Iraqi soldiers and police officers, but he did not address the paradox that as that goal is neared, violence has intensified and the insurgency appears as robust as ever. Nor did he note that after U.S. forces stood down in Baghdad, they had to stand back up again. Instead, without offering much explanation, he said that "we are refining our training strategy for the Iraqi security forces."

At the same time, the president's tone has changed markedly. Gone was the talk of past Bush administration news conferences about "steady progress" in Iraq and all the good news that the media was said to be ignoring there. Instead he began yesterday's session with a straightforward and even grim account of the events of the past month in Iraq. He noted the deaths of 93 U.S. soldiers over the past 25 days. "I know many Americans are not satisfied with the situation in Iraq," he said. "I'm not satisfied either." So, he said, the American effort in Iraq is "constantly adjusting our tactics."

Yet under his sober mien and a newfound insistence on adaptability, he appeared to be quietly digging in his heels. "Our goals are unchanging," he emphasized in his opening remarks. "We are flexible in our methods to achieving those goals."

His bottom line was that "we'll work as fast as we can get the job done." That open-ended commitment to an unchanging goal doesn't seem different from the answer being given by Bush administration officials three years and 2,802 U.S. military deaths ago -- that the U.S. effort in Iraq would last "as long as it takes."

Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), the ranking minority member on the Armed Services Committee and a member of the intelligence committee, said Bush "has dropped the rhetoric, but the policies are the same."

Kurt Campbell, a Clinton-era Pentagon official and co-author of a new book on defense politics, interpreted the president's comments as an effort to patch up differences within the Republican Party over Iraq and to aid candidates facing close elections in two weeks. "It was meant to appeal to both the 'stay the course' crowd and the 'we need a responsible change' crowd," he said. But Campbell said he expected a major strategic revision on Iraq soon after that vote, predicting that "the political dynamics are going to change radically after the election."

Vin Weber, a lobbyist and former Republican member of Congress with ties to the White House, said he thought the president more broadly was trying to appeal to the American public as it loses faith in his Iraq policy. "Basically, the bottom has fallen out," he said. "The public is on the verge of throwing up its hands over Iraq." He agreed with Campbell that the domestic politics of the Iraq situation are going to alter in a few weeks, perhaps in unpredictable ways that will be shaped by the outcome of the midterm elections.

But former New York governor Mario M. Cuomo (D) said he thought that the president actually was laying the groundwork for disengaging from Iraq. "I think the war is virtually over," he said. By emphasizing benchmarks, Cuomo said, "what he is saying is, 'We are going to leave it to the Iraqis.' "

Under a barrage of sharp questions from reporters, pointing again and again to contradictions and problems in his stance on Iraq, President Bush clung to his most basic line of defense -- his own faith and confidence in his approach. He used the word "believe" 21 times in the course of the hour-long news conference.

"I believe that the military strategy we have is going to work, that's what I believe," he said to one reporter.

Conceding Missteps, Bush Urges Patience On Iraq (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 25 — Facing public dismay over the war in Iraq, President Bush on Wednesday somberly acknowledged the broad scope of American setbacks and missteps there. But he urged Americans to look beyond the violence on their TV screens and avoid disillusionment over a war he said was being won.

Mr. Bush's comments, in a news conference at the White House, were a stark indication of concern within the West Wing over eroding support for the war. The violence in Iraq has reached near-record peaks just as voters are considering their final choices for Congress in midterm elections less than two weeks from now, a contest that Mr. Bush has cast in part as a national referendum on the conflict.

DOJ_NMG_0086717

While most Republican candidates have sought to turn voters' attention away from the war, Mr. Bush chose to address it head-on, adopting a subdued tone, a new emphasis on tactical flexibility, and directly acknowledging the public's reservations. [News analysis, Page A10.]

"I know many Americans are not satisfied with the situation in Iraq; I'm not satisfied, either," Mr. Bush said. "That is why we're taking new steps to help secure Baghdad, and constantly adjusting our tactics across the country to meet the changing threat."

Mr. Bush expressed general support for Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq, even as Mr. Maliki used his own news conference to distance himself from the United States. Speaking in Baghdad, Mr. Maliki said he had not endorsed an American notion of a time line for stabilizing Iraq, and he criticized a raid carried out by American forces. [Page A11.]

With Mr. Bush and Mr. Maliki clearly focused on their domestic political audiences, the political tumult in both countries carries the potential to drive them further apart.

Mr. Bush's comments were the latest iteration in a recent rhetorical evolution that has seen him move from vowing to "stay the course" in Iraq to promising flexibility. But Mr. Bush also said, "We cannot allow our dissatisfaction to turn into disillusionment about our purpose in this war." He said eight separate times, in various formulations, that he was committed to getting the job done.

When asked whether the United States was winning in Iraq, Mr. Bush said, "Absolutely, we're winning" — a declaration that prompted a volley of statements from Democratic leaders, who accused Mr. Bush of being "in denial" about Iraqi violence.

Mr. Bush indicated no major changes in his overall strategy in Iraq, saying he continued to support Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and the generals overseeing the war. But he also spoke in terms of a conflict that would be long, hard and bloody. Asked whether the United States would seek permanent military bases in Iraq, Mr. Bush said that would be up to the Iraqi government, adding, "Frankly, it's not in much of a position to be thinking about what the world is going to look like 5 or 10 years from now."

It was the second time this month that Mr. Bush had held a news conference at which he took pains to explain his war plan, which has come under increasing criticism even from fellow Republicans. Many of them fear that the administration's failure to squelch the violence in Iraq is seriously harming the party's prospects for retaining control of Congress. Mr. Bush on Wednesday emphasized that he was well aware of the graphic images Americans were seeing nightly, as well as the many unfulfilled promises and predictions made by his administration over the course of the conflict.

"We overestimated the capability of the civil service in Iraq to continue to provide essential services to the Iraqi people," Mr. Bush said. "We did not expect the Iraqi Army, including the Republican Guard, to melt away in the way that it did in the face of advancing coalition forces."

Mr. Bush said that as of last spring, he had expected that he would be able to reduce the American troop commitment by early next year. There are currently more than 140,000 troops in Iraq. He portrayed the decision against reducing troops by early next year as an example of his willingness to alter his approach.

Before taking questions from reporters, Mr. Bush offered an opening statement that amounted to a kind of scorecard for Iraq, in which he acknowledged disappointments as well as successes. Among successes, he listed the capture of Saddam Hussein, free elections, and economic progress for farms and small businesses. Among the developments he called "not encouraging," he listed "the bombing of the U.N. headquarters in Baghdad, the fact that we did not find stockpiles of weapons of mass destruction, and the continued loss of some of America's finest sons and daughters."

Mr. Bush alluded to a theory embraced by White House aides that the public would support a conflict in which it could see a clear path to victory. "It's my responsibility to provide the American people with a candid assessment on the way forward. There is tough fighting ahead," Mr. Bush said, adding, "The fact that the fighting is tough does not mean our efforts in Iraq are not worth it."

Campaigning in Cincinnati on Wednesday, Vice President Dick Cheney echoed the president's remarks. "We'll be flexible," he said. "We'll do all we can to adapt to conditions on the ground. We'll make every change that is necessary to do the job, to finish the job, and to bring the troops home with the honor they've earned."

Aides to Mr. Bush have acknowledged that the rising violence in Iraq was depressing support for the war. And the bad news was being amplified in Democratic campaign ads declaring the war a failure. In all, Democrats have had 220 ads mentioning Iraq, running them 46,402 times at a cost of at least $41.6 million since January, according to an analysis by the Campaign Media Analysis Group. Republicans have run 48 ads on the Iraq campaign 11,677 times, costing at least $8.5 million.

Asked about debate among Republicans over whether the president was helping by calling attention to Iraq, the White House spokesman, Tony Snow, said that Mr. Bush was obliged to do so. "Everybody's talking about it, everybody's writing about it, all of his critics are on television talking about it," he said. "It's important for the president's voice to be heard in his own words."

DOJ_NMG_0086718

While Mr. Bush has said repeatedly that the two parties' approaches to Iraq should be a major issue in November, he acknowledged Wednesday that ultimately one person should be held responsible for progress in the war. "The ultimate accountability," Mr. Bush said, "rests with me."

Bush Is Reassuring On Iraq But Says He's 'Not Satisfied' (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

President Bush declared yesterday that the United States is winning the war in Iraq despite the deadliest month for U.S. troops in a year, but he added that he is not satisfied with the situation and vowed to press Iraqi leaders to do more to stabilize their country on their own.

Trying to walk a careful line between optimism and pessimism less than two weeks before midterm elections, Bush lamented the "unspeakable violence" raging in Iraq while trying to reassure American voters that he is adapting his approach to address it. He vowed to "carefully consider any proposal that will help us achieve victory" as long as it does not involve withdrawing troops prematurely.

"Absolutely, we're winning," Bush said when pressed at an East Room news conference. At the same time, he said, "I know many Americans are not satisfied with the situation in Iraq. I'm not satisfied either. And that is why we're taking new steps to help secure Baghdad and constantly adjusting our tactics across the country to meet the changing threat." He said that he is pushing Iraqi leaders "to take bold measures to save their country" and emphasized that his patience "is not unlimited."

Bush's appearance, made hours after a news conference by Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, exposed rising tensions between Washington and Baghdad as the fighting worsens. Maliki upbraided U.S. officials a day after they announced benchmarks for the Iraqi government to meet over the next 12 to 18 months, dismissing the plan as "the result of elections taking place right now that do not involve us."

The dueling messages come as U.S. casualties mount in Iraq and the Bush administration faces the prospect of Democrats taking over one or both houses of Congress in the Nov. 7 elections on the back of public disillusionment with the war. At least 93 U.S. troops have been killed in October, and commanders in Iraq have conceded that their latest effort to stem the violence in Baghdad has not succeeded.

Democrats quickly seized on Bush's comments and called them an act of political desperation. "This is a struggle on the part of the administration to look as though they're really trying to change course without saying they're changing course," Sen. Carl M. Levin (Mich.), the ranking Democrat on the Armed Services Committee, said in a conference call with reporters. The congressional elections, he added, "will be a referendum on Iraq policy to a significant degree in many of our states and districts."

Rep. Ike Skelton (Mo.), Levin's counterpart in the House, said Bush needs to define his benchmarks for progress. He said he proposed goals to Bush a year ago. "I recommended that for every three Iraqi brigades that were fully capable, that we'd redeploy one American brigade." In response, Skelton said, the president wrote back that his recommendation "was too rigid."

Bush made the unusual move of calling a second news conference in as many weeks to address the public concern, and then opened the event with a 16-minute speech, knowing television networks would carry it live. He said that he had hoped this spring to bring many U.S. troops home this year but that events made doing so impossible. Although he maintained that there has been "very important progress," he acknowledged that Iraq is "in the midst of an incredibly violent period."

The president tried to balance a variety of competing ideas. He insisted on keeping U.S. troops in Iraq "until the job is done" but also talked about changing course to meet an adapting enemy. He promoted benchmarks for Iraqi leaders to meet in terms of taking over security of their country while distinguishing that from Democratic-proposed timetables for withdrawal of U.S. troops. He said he is pushing Maliki to do more but expressed confidence in the Iraqi leader as "the right man to achieve the goal."

Most important, he tried to reassure the public that he knows what to do to win because, as he said, "if the people think we don't have a plan for victory, they're not going to support the effort." At the same time, he tried to identify with public frustration over the direction of the war by expressing his own "dissatisfaction."

Asked by a reporter whether the United States is winning the war, Bush offered a discussion of the nation's role in the broader struggle against Islamic extremists.

The reporter pressed for a direct answer. "Are we winning?"

"Absolutely, we're winning," Bush said. "Al-Qaeda is on the run. As a matter of fact, the mastermind, or the people who they think is the mastermind of the September the 11th attacks, is in our custody." He then circled back and seemed to make clear that he meant the United States is winning in Iraq specifically. "We're winning, and we will win unless we leave before the job is done. And the crucial battle right now is Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0086719

Asked afterward whether Bush meant that the United States is winning in Iraq specifically or in the fight against terrorism, White House press secretary Tony Snow said: "In Iraq."

Bush repeatedly said this summer that the United States was winning in Iraq. "You're winning this war," he told troops at Fort Bragg, N.C., on July 4. Three days later, at a fundraiser in Chicago, he said: "Americans are wondering whether or not we can win. And to those Americans, I say: Not only can we win, we are winning."

But in nearly four months since then, he has avoided repeating that assertion as violence has escalated to new heights, saying instead that the United States is winning the battle against terrorism or that he is confident that the nation will eventually win in Iraq. Asked at an Oct. 16 briefing whether the United States is winning in Iraq, Snow said: "I don't know. How do you define winning? . . . Let me put it this way: The president's made it obvious we're going to win."

Bush, who has adamantly resisted calls for timetables in Iraq, said that the benchmarks his team announced in Baghdad on Tuesday are not the same thing. "That is substantially different . . . from people saying, 'We want a time certain to get out of Iraq,' " he said. "As a matter of fact, the benchmarks will make it more likely we win. Withdrawing on an artificial timetable means we lose."

Bush declined to rule out seeking permanent bases in Iraq, an especially sensitive point among Iraqis and Arabs who accuse the United States of waging the war to establish a military foothold in the region. "Any decisions about permanency in Iraq will be made by the Iraqi government," he said.

Although Bush agreed that the war has not gone as he had hoped and that he was "not satisfied," he defended his decision not to fire Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld or any other member of his national security team.

"I've asked him to do some difficult tasks as the secretary of defense -- one, wage war in two different theaters of this war on terror, Afghanistan and Iraq, and at the same time, asked him to transform our military posture around the world and our military readiness here at home," Bush said. "I'm satisfied of how he's done all his jobs. He is a smart, tough, capable administrator."

As for whether anyone else should be held responsible for the missteps in Iraq, Bush said, "The ultimate accountability . . . rests with me. It's what the 2004 campaign was about. If people want to -- if people are unhappy about it, look right to the president."

He acknowledged that voters may do so in 12 days, agreeing that the congressional elections are shaping up as a referendum on his national security and economic policies. But he said Democrats were declaring victory prematurely.

"We've got some people dancing in the end zone here in Washington, D.C.," he said. "They've got them measuring their drapes. They're going over to the Capitol and saying, 'My new office looks beautiful, I think I'm going to have this size drape there, or this color.' But the American people are going to decide, and they're going to decide this race based upon who best to protect the American people and who best to keep the taxes low."

Staff writer Walter Pincus and research director Lucy Shackelford contributed to this report.

Bush Insists He'll Stand By His Iraq Goals (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 26, 2006

The president acknowledges setbacks in battle.

President Bush, seeking to shore up sagging preelection support for the Iraq war, acknowledged three years of setbacks Wednesday and expressed dissatisfaction over a frustrating and deadly month. But he insisted that he would stand by his goal of helping foster a government that can "sustain itself, govern itself and defend itself."

With the U.S. congressional election on Nov. 7 appearing increasingly to be a referendum on the war he started in March 2003, the president sought to clarify his Iraq policy at a time when violence has been escalating, U.S. casualties increasing, and political breakthroughs in Baghdad proving elusive.

"The events of the past month have been a serious concern to me, and a serious concern to the American people," Bush said at a White House news conference 13 days before the midterm U.S. balloting. "We've got patience, but not unlimited patience."

Bush, who in recent days has altered his disciplined "stay-the-course" message, endorsed a schedule of benchmarks for political progress and greater Iraqi control, while condemning those who called for timetables for troop withdrawals.

Meanwhile, in Baghdad, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki said he would not accept any timelines imposed by the Americans. He also criticized a new U.S. military effort to disrupt Shiite Muslim militant groups in the Baghdad slum of Sadr City, a stronghold of one of his allies, anti-American cleric Muqtada Sadr.

Speaking at a news conference before Bush spoke in Washington, Maliki declared that "the Americans have the right to review their policies, but we do not believe in a timetable, and no one will impose one on us."

DOJ_NMG_0086720

Bush is under pressure to begin pulling troops out of Iraq in the face of unrelenting sectarian violence between Sunni Arab and Shiite Muslims and continuing attacks on U.S. forces. Americans, he said, "have no intention of taking sides in a sectarian struggle or standing in the crossfire between rival factions."

At the same time, he defended U.S. attempts to calm Baghdad, where one-third of the more than 90 U.S. deaths this month took place.

October has been the deadliest month for American troops this year.

Despite his unusually sober assessment, Bush also said that U.S. goals for a stable, democratic and prosperous Iraq were "unchanging," and he declared, "Absolutely, we're winning."

A deadline for withdrawing troops, Bush said, "means defeat."

Calling for patience, he declared in the White House East Room: "We cannot allow our dissatisfaction to turn into disillusionment about our purpose in this war. We must not look at every success of the enemy as a mistake on our part, cause for an investigation, or a reason to call for our troops to come home."

For one hour — one-fourth of it taken up by his opening statement — Bush spelled out what he sees as the stakes in Iraq and the stakes in the election, in which Democrats are widely believed to have their best chance for gaining a majority since Republicans took control of the House in 1994.

He sought to convince a doubting public that he is pursuing a necessary course, and is ready to adjust tactics to meet new challenges. But he also emphasized that he would not give up his overarching goal after more than three years of war, the deaths of nearly 3,000 U.S. troops and many thousands of Iraqis.

Even as he avoided saying that he would "stay the course," he presented a plan that did not yield to demands that he set a specific timetable for withdrawal, or even that he set the United States on a specific course to a reduced presence in Iraq.

"I know we're not going to succeed, however, if we set artificial timetables for withdrawal, or we get out of there, or we say to the enemy: 'Just keep fighting. We'll leave soon,' " he said.

"I know many Americans are not satisfied with the situation in Iraq," he said. "I'm not satisfied, either."

With Democrats hammering Republican incumbents for their support of the war in congressional districts throughout much of the country, Bush sought to throw a cloak of presidential protection over his allies.

"The ultimate accountability," he said, rests not with the generals or Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld — whom Bush again endorsed, calling him "a smart, tough, capable administrator."

Rather, the president said, accountability "rests right here."

"If people are unhappy about it, look right to the president," he said.

Bush's austere assessment of the war came as polls have found that Americans are growing gloomier about the outlook in Iraq.

A USA Today/Gallup Poll released Wednesday found that Americans are as pessimistic about the war as they were in April 2004, during an insurgent uprising in Fallouja that saw the bodies of civilian U.S. workers dragged through the streets.

Fifty-eight percent said the war was "a mistake," more than six in 10 Americans said things were going badly in Iraq, and a majority said the situation was "out of control."

For the first time, as many Americans said the insurgents were winning the war as said the United States and its allies were winning.

Assessing problems and obstacles in Iraq, Bush cited multiple mistakes and setbacks, some of which he has acknowledged before: the failure to find unconventional weapons, the 2003 insurgent bombing of the U.N. headquarters in Baghdad, the inability of some Iraqi units to perform as expected and the continued loss of American lives.

Bush repeated several times that the United States was shifting its tactics in Iraq, noting the dispatch of additional troops to Baghdad to counter sectarian violence.

"My point to the American people is … that we're constantly adjusting our tactics to achieve victory," Bush said.

He said that regardless of the devastation and obstacles, Americans must recognize that their security "depends on ensuring that Iraq is an ally in the war on terror and does not become a terrorist haven, like Afghanistan under the Taliban."

The extent to which Iraq has come to dominate the public face of the Bush presidency and the election was demonstrated by the amount of time devoted to it at the news conference. All but two of the questions dealt to one degree or another with Iraq, much as the war took up nearly all of his news conference two weeks ago.

On the issue of North Korea, the president said that despite signs of reluctance by China and South Korea to enforce U.N. Security Council sanctions against the government in Pyongyang in response to its announcement of a nuclear test, "the coalition remains firm."

DOJ_NMG_0086721

At the heart of the latest shift in U.S. policy in Iraq is the plan to use "benchmarks" to demonstrate progress toward the president's broader goal of a stable and democratic Iraq. The plan was announced Tuesday in a news conference by Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr. and the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad. No Iraqi officials were present.

Maliki's objections Wednesday complicated the notion.

Bush, at his news conference, insisted that there was a difference between benchmarks and a timetable for withdrawal.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said later that the new turn reflected a policy "in complete disarray."

"One day the administration calls for a timetable," and the Iraqi prime minister objects, Reid said in a written statement. "One day, our senior military leaders indicate more troops may be needed, the next day the president discounts that option. One day it's stay the course, the next day it's change the course."

"It is increasingly clear that the president does not know what to do to stop the escalating violence in Iraq and that his so-called 'National Strategy for Victory in Iraq' has failed," Reid said.

*

james.gerstenzang@latimes.com

Times staff writers Paul Richter and Julian E. Barnes contributed to this report.

Bush Says Iraq Strategy Is Flexible (WSJ)

By Henry J. Pulizzi

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush acknowledged Wednesday the heavy bloodshed in Iraq this month, but sought to give assurances that the U.S. is continually refining its tactics to help the country's nascent government bolster its security forces and stop the violence.

"The events of the past month have been a serious concern to me and a serious concern to the American people," Mr. Bush said at a press conference in the East Room of the White House. (Text of the speech1)

The president departed starkly from a practice of not talking about specific deaths in Iraq, acknowledging that this month has been the bloodiest in Iraq since October 2005. "There has been heavy fighting, many enemy fighters have been killed or captured and we've suffered casualties of our own," he said. "This month we've lost 93 American service members in Iraq. During roughly the same period, more than 300 Iraqi security personnel have given their lives in battle. Iraqi civilians have suffered unspeakable violence at the hands of the terrorists, insurgents, illegal militias, armed groups and criminals."

With the debate over the strategy in Iraq heating up two weeks ahead of the mid-term Congressional elections, Wednesday's press conference was billed as a chance for Mr. Bush to give the public an update on the war. In recent days, the administration has emphasized that its methods on the ground are changing to address continuing violence. Under pressure to shift strategy, the White House has stopped using the term "stay the course" to describe its stance.

"Our goals are unchanging," Mr. Bush said Wednesday. "We are flexible in our methods to achieving those goals." He said U.S. commanders are refining their training strategy for Iraqi security forces and increasing the number of coalition advisers in the Iraqi ministries of Defense and Interior, among other things.

Mr. Bush said that as those killing Americans and Iraqi troops change tactics, so, too, will the U.S. military. "Americans have no intention of taking sides in a sectarian struggle or standing in the crossfire between rival factions," Mr. Bush said.

The top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., said Tuesday that he may ask for more forces to be sent to Baghdad, potentially by boosting the overall presence in Iraq rather than shifting troops into the capital from other parts of the country. Gen. Casey, who briefed reporters in Baghdad with U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, said Iraqi forces won't be ready to assume security responsibility until late next year or early 2008.

Mr. Bush said the U.S. is pushing Iraq's leaders to make bold moves. "We're making it clear that America's patience is not unlimited," he said. "Yet we also understand the difficult challenges Iraq's leader's face and we will not put more pressure on the Iraqi government than it can bear. The way to succeed in Iraq is to help Iraq's government grow in strength and assume more control over its country as quickly as possible."

Mr. Bush mentioned neither troop additions nor withdrawals at Wednesday's briefing, but conceded he'd boost troop levels if Gen. Casey made such a request. "That's the way I've been running this war," Mr. Bush said.

The White House said this week that it's working with the Iraqi government on a long-running to-do list of security, economic and political benchmarks, but denied it has imposed any ultimatums on Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. Mr. Bush said there's a "significant difference" between deadlines and benchmarks.

Mr. Bush's focus on Iraq comes as polls suggest the war will damage Republican candidates in the Nov. 7 election, possibly swinging control of Congress away from the GOP. The Democrats need to win 15 seats in the House and six in the Senate to win control.

DOJ_NMG_0086722

With Iraq on voters' minds, Mr. Bush has sought to assure the public that the administration has adopted a flexible strategy, but remains resolute. Democrats complain Bush's changes on Iraq have been mainly rhetorical and are demanding a more dramatic shift. Sen. John Kerry, (D., Mass.), has called for a one-year deadline for Iraq to meet certain goals before U.S. forces are withdrawn.

Polls suggest Mr. Bush is having little luck convincing voters the war effort is on the right track. According to the latest Wall Street Journal-NBC News poll, one-third of voters approve of Mr. Bush's handling of the war, while 63% disapprove. An even worse omen for the GOP is that 39% say Democrats could better deal with Iraq, compared with 31% who side with Republicans.

Mr. Bush noted that an independent panel led by former Secretary of State James Baker and former Congressman Lee Hamilton will make recommendations on Iraq in an upcoming report. "I welcome these efforts," the president said. "My administration will carefully consider any proposal that will help us achieve victory."

Mr. Bush, who said he owed "an explanation to the American people" of his war strategy, expressed confidence about Iraq and the broader war on terror, but admitted that the fight will be long and difficult. "I'm confident we'll succeed in Iraq. And the reason I'm confident we'll succeed in Iraq is because the Iraqis want to succeed in Iraq," Mr. Bush said.

Asked specifically if the U.S. is winning, Mr. Bush said: "Absolutely we're winning." Nonetheless, Mr. Bush said he's "not satisfied" with the situation in Iraq.

He gave Mr. Maliki an endorsement, saying he's the right man for a difficult job. "He's got a hard job," Mr. Bush said. "Look, he's got to deal with sectarian violence, he's got to deal with criminals, he's got to deal with al Qaeda; all of whom are lethal. These are people that will kill. And he wants to achieve the same objective I want to achieve. And he's making tough decisions."

Donald Rumsfeld won a similar endorsement. Mr. Bush praised his defense secretary for waging two wars and transforming the military. "And I'm satisfied of how he's done all his jobs. He is a smart, tough, capable administrator," Mr. Bush said, rejecting calls for Mr. Rumsfeld to be fired.

For all his fervor about the importance of the military mission in Iraq, Mr. Bush sidestepped when asked whether the elections should be viewed as a referendum on the war. "The election is a referendum on which party has a plan to make the economy grow, and which party has a plan to make the American people safe," he said. "If we succeed in Iraq, the country (the United States) is more secure. If we don't succeed in Iraq, the country is less secure."

On the looming elections, Mr. Bush again said he thinks Republicans will retain control of Congress, and indicated he hasn't given up on three of his top domestic priorities -- Social Security reform, an overhaul of the tax code and comprehensive immigration reform.

"I firmly believe it is more likely to achieve those three objectives with a Republican-controlled Congress and a Republican-controlled Senate," Mr. Bush said. "And I believe I will be working with a Republican-controlled Congress and a Republican-controlled Senate."

He accused some in Washington of dancing in the end zone before they've scored a touchdown.

The economy, which Mr. Bush says along with national security will be a top issue in the election, is another area where the White House has gotten little traction. Despite buoyant stock markets, falling gasoline prices and steady economic growth, most Americans aren't happy with Mr. Bush's stewardship of the economy, according to polls. "The two issues I see in the campaign can be boiled down to who best to protect this country and who best to keep taxes low," Mr. Bush said.

Bush Tells US 'I'm Not Happy With Iraq' (FT)

By Caroline Daniel In Washington

Financial Times, October 26, 2006

President George W. Bush on Wednesday sought to align himself with US public opinion when he said he was "not satisfied either" with rising violence in Iraq. But he warned that US troops were needed to "prevent a full-scale civil war".

Although Mr Bush said he had no intention of "standing in the crossfire between rival factions in Iraq", officials and analysts in the Middle East – and some Republican loyalists – are saying US troops already face that direct challenge.

In a sombre press conference on Wednesday, the president spent nearly 15 minutes in an opening statement trying to knit together often-contradictory arguments.

He moved from expressing "serious concern" about Iraq, while emphasising progress was being made, to being resolute about the ultimate outcome in the country but flexible about military tactics to attain that end.

He stressed his role as commander-in-chief – "the ultimate accountability rests with me" – even as he deferred to the commanders on the ground to dictate troop levels.

The Bush administration has consistently rejected timetables for withdrawal, accusing proponents of being defeatists. However, on Tuesday US officials said the Iraqis should take full control of security within 18 months. The Iraqis had "committed themselves to a timetable for making some of those decisions", said -Zalmay Khalizad, US ambassador to Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0086723

Although Mr Bush for the first time embraced the idea of “benchmarks”, saying they would make victory more likely, he continued to assert he did not support a fixed timetable. There were “significant differences between benchmarks for a government to achieve and a timetable for withdrawal”, he said.

The press conference marked Mr Bush’s latest attempt to control the debate about Iraq, amid mounting criticism even from Republican loyalists. The administration has struggled to redefine both the terms and goals of its engagement in Iraq. On Monday, officials said they would stop using the phrase “stay the course”.

The concept of victory in Iraq has been scaled back, to an Iraq that can “defend, govern and sustain itself”. Mr Bush acknowledged the US’s most immediate goal was “to prevent a full-scale civil war from happening in the first place”.

That is some way from the definitions set out in November in the Victory in Iraq document. It said the short-term view of victory was an “Iraq that is making steady progress in fighting terrorists, meeting political milestones, building democratic institutions, and standing up security forces”. The medium-term goal was to have a “fully constitutional government in place”.

Mr Bush said he would consider any “proposal that will help us achieve victory” but declined to say whether he would directly engage with Iran and Syria to resolve tensions.

“Iran and Syria understand full well that the world expects them to help Iraq,” he said.

Mr Bush offered his -support to two embattled figures. He said Nouri al-Maliki, prime minister, was “the right man to achieve the goal in Iraq”, and called Donald Rumsfeld, secretary of defence, “a smart, tough, capable administrator”.

Bush Backs Setting 'Benchmarks' In Iraq (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

President Bush yesterday firmly supported setting "benchmarks" in Iraq to move toward stability and security in the war-torn country, and warned Iraqi leaders that the United States has "got patience, but not unlimited patience."

Making frank admissions of overestimations, underperformance and flat-out errors, the president used a hastily called press conference to try to assuage angry voters, who by most election strategists' accounts plan to vote Republicans out of control of Congress in just two weeks.

"We overestimated the capability of the civil service in Iraq to continue to provide essential services to the Iraqi people. We did not expect the Iraqi army, including the Republican Guard, to melt away in the way that it did in the face of advancing coalition forces," Mr. Bush said.

Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, said Tuesday that Iraqi forces should be able to take control of security in 12 to 18 months with "some level" of U.S. support. Top U.S. military commanders laid out a series of "benchmarks" for the fledgling Iraqi government.

But Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki took umbrage yesterday at the new talk of "benchmarks" for his government to reach.

"I affirm that this government represents the will of the people and no one has the right to impose a timetable on it," Mr. al-Maliki said at a Baghdad press conference, where he dismissed U.S. talk of timelines as driven by the upcoming midterm elections.

"I am positive that this is not the official policy of the American government but rather a result of the ongoing election campaign. And that does not concern us much," he said.

Asked yesterday for the first time since the "benchmarks" were laid out, the president -- who has steadfastly opposed setting a "timetable" for the withdrawal of U.S. troops -- endorsed the 12- to 18-month concept, with a few caveats such as objecting to a reporter's question that used "benchmarks" and "timetable" interchangeably.

"There is a significant difference between benchmarks for a government to achieve and a timetable for withdrawal. ... We're working with the Iraqi government to have certain benchmarks to meet as a way to determine whether or not they're making the hard decisions necessary to achieve peace. I believe that's what you're referring to. And we're working with the Iraqi government to come up with benchmarks."

But the president, who was combative and defensive at times in the hourlong press conference in the White House East Room, said "Americans have no intention of taking sides in a sectarian struggle or standing in the crossfire between rival factions."

In supporting the idea of "benchmarks" for the new Iraqi government to reach as it takes over security operations, Mr. Bush warned Mr. al-Maliki that the United States must see action on a number of fronts.

"We'll respect the fact that the Iraq government is sovereign, and they must respect the fact that we've got patience, but not unlimited patience," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0086724

Democrats on Capitol Hill immediately took aim at Mr. Bush. "President Bush's Iraq policy has been a dismal failure. The president has abandoned his 'stay the course' slogan; it is long past time he abandon his 'stay the course' policy," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said.

Added Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid: "The Bush administration's Iraq policy, like Iraq itself, is in complete disarray. One day, the administration calls for a timetable, the next day, Iraqi Prime Minister Maliki objects to it. ... One day, it's stay the course, the next day, it's change the course."

But Mr. Bush said benchmarks will help show the American people that Iraqis are moving forward.

"It's a condition, a base estimate. And that's important for the American people to know. This notion about, you know, fixed timetable of withdrawal, in my judgment, is a -- means defeat. You can't leave until the job is done. Our mission is to get the job done as quickly as possible," he said.

In his 15-minute opening statement, Mr. Bush said the time has come for the Iraqi government to begin moving quickly toward responsibility for its own fate.

"We're pressing Iraq's leaders to take bold measures to save their country. We're making it clear that America's patience is not unlimited. Yet we also understand the difficult challenges Iraq's leaders face, and we will not put more pressure on the Iraqi government than it can bear," he said.

Bush's Conviction On Iraq Exceeds His Plan's Credibility (USAT)

USA Today, October 26, 2006

There is little doubting the sincerity of President Bush's commitment to the mission in Iraq. On Wednesday, amid sinking public approval less than two weeks before congressional elections, Bush set out yet another course for a victory he optimistically predicted was achievable.

The president's conviction is obvious. But whether it's supported by facts — and whether there's a real path to victory as he defines it — is dubious.

There continues to be a yawning gap between his rhetoric and reality:

·"Absolutely we're winning," Bush said. But only 19% of Americans in last weekend's USA TODAY/Gallup Poll agree. And just 14% of Iraqis surveyed recently say the U.S. impact on their country is mostly positive.

·The United States has "no intention of … standing in the crossfire between rival factions," the president said. But that's exactly where American troops in Baghdad now find themselves.

·Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki is "the right man," he said, though shortly before Bush's news conference the Iraqi leader denounced a U.S. raid on one of the many militias drawing Iraq deeper into civil war.

For all of Bush's claims to consistency in his policy, the definition of "victory" has also shifted. At first, he thought invasion alone would light the fires of democracy. Then it became a longer-term fight to suppress terrorists and spread freedom in the Arab Middle East. Now, political rhetoric aside, it is simply to get out while leaving a functioning, U.S.-allied government behind.

The battle to secure Baghdad, billed as make-or-break, has been going poorly. October has been the deadliest month for U.S. forces in two years. Bush has abandoned a well-worn "stay the course" mantra for talk of U.S. tactical flexibility.

The United States will now ask the Iraqi government to meet benchmarks, such as getting a grip on the militias. What will happen if they're not achieved is left unsaid, but few would argue that they'll be easily attained. It's possible that the administration is laying a path for a U.S. withdrawal that would blame the Iraqis for failing to meet the benchmarks. Bush pointedly said Wednesday that U.S. patience is "not unlimited."

Policymakers grasping at straws have focused on an Iraq report, due after the November elections, from a bipartisan group co-chaired by Bush family friend and former secretary of State James Baker. There's an irrational sense that it can deliver some kind of magic salvation. Bush played to those hopes by saying he's ready to listen.

No doubt the group will back sensible ideas that should have been tried years ago — such as engaging neighbors Iran and Syria (Bush refuses to talk directly to either) and some kind of muscular international involvement. Those, however, are long shots.

Whatever happens next, the Iraq mess won't be resolved by new slogans, speeches, news conferences or Power Point presentations. After 3½ years, nearly the same length as U.S. involvement in World War II, the only meaningful progress in Iraq is clear and convincing success on the ground.

Wars Are Hard, But We'll Win (USAT)

By Tony Snow

USA Today, October 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0086725

It seems odd to be defending the commanding general and the U.S. ambassador to Iraq from charges that they don't understand the situation in the country in which they work, especially when the complaining sages live thousands of miles from the battlefront.

The business of war requires constant vigilance, enterprise and determination. Our goal and a key to our security at home: to help Iraq sustain, govern and defend itself, and emerge as a key ally in the war on terror.

We have pursued that aim according to the challenges on the ground and have adjusted to shifting realities — from the early resistance by Saddam Hussein's armies, to early battles in such places as Fallujah totoday's Iraq, where 14 of 18 provinces live in relative peace. Gen. George Casey noted earlier this week that 90% of the violence in Iraq now occurs within a 30-mile radius of Baghdad. Coalition forces have been assisting Iraqi army and police in taking on the perpetrators of that violence, and they have adopted the tactic of trying to clear, hold and rebuild neighborhoods wracked by terror.

The combined Iraqi-U.S. forces will win that fight, as they have every other engagement of the war. But peace in Iraq will require more than superiority of arms. Iraqis need some other basics for good and free lives — a political system that will guarantee rights and representation for all, and an economy that can provide jobs.

President Bush and Prime Minister al-Maliki have been working on those objectives since the prime minister's accession to power. In the past month, al-Maliki has pursued national reconciliation. The Iraqi parliament is streamlining the legislative process, refining the constitution, considering key issues of federalism, and passing a “hydrocarbons law” that would provide for the general distribution of oil and natural gas revenues.

The Iraqi economy continues to grow, electricity production continues to rise, businesses are springing to life, and the nation's standard of living has grown.

But the reality is that wars are hard. Our enemies are determined and utterly contemptuous of innocent human life. And just because the enemy appears to make some progress, that doesn't mean we should leave — quite the opposite.

When they adjust tactics, we must adjust ours, taking the fight to them. That is what we have done and what we will continue to do. And we will win.

War Now Works Against GOP (WP)

By Peter Slevin And Michael Powell

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

DOYLESTOWN, Pa. -- A visitor to Rep. Michael G. Fitzpatrick's campaign Web site will immediately hear a 20-second audio clip of a contentious television interview about Iraq with his Democratic challenger, Patrick Murphy. The clip ends: "Tough times demand honest answers, not Pat Murphy."

Fitzpatrick, a freshman Republican, hoped to throttle Murphy on an issue critical to the 2004 victories of President Bush and the Republican Congress. But Murphy, a 33-year-old West Point graduate and a veteran of the war, has battled his way into contention by directly attacking Fitzpatrick and Bush on their party's handling of Iraq itself.

"When we went there in 2003, we had a mission to get rid of Saddam Hussein and weapons of mass destruction. We're still in Iraq 3 1/2 years later and the mission isn't clear," Murphy told an audience here last week. "Together we can change it. We can change what we're doing in Iraq."

Just three months ago, Republican strategists believed that doubts about Iraq could be contained -- or even turned into an electoral advantage -- if the battle was framed as a vital front in the war against terrorism. Voters would be invited to choose: Stand firm or capitulate.

But the issue is not playing out that way. In both parties, a consensus now exists -- buttressed by polls -- that disaffection with a war grown costly and difficult to manage is the gravest threat to continued Republican rule.

Iraq is not only a potent issue in its own right, but is also a resonant metaphor for doubts about the competence and accountability of the Republican Party.

In the most competitive races, Iraq echoes in varying ways, but almost always for Republicans it is a problem to be navigated and for Democrats a stick to be brandished. In Ohio, it helped put incumbent Sen. Mike DeWine (R) on the defensive. In House races in Pennsylvania and Illinois, it gave three Democratic war veterans and novice politicians an opening.

"We are telling our candidates not to be afraid to talk about it," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. "Who would have thought two years ago the Democrats would be affirmatively putting ads on television about Iraq and Republicans would be avoiding it?"

Showing how the tables have turned, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) told interviewers in New Hampshire this week that Republican candidates should steer away from the war.

"The challenge," Frist said, "is to get Americans to focus on pocketbook issues, and not on the Iraq and terror issue."

DOJ_NMG_0086726

In Connecticut and Ohio, in Pennsylvania and New Mexico, critical swaths of voters tell pollsters they are using the war as a lens to assess -- and in many cases punish -- the party in control of the White House and both houses of Congress. This appears particularly true of independents, who are considered most likely to determine whether the House and Senate change hands.

A Pew Research Center poll this month found that 50 percent of independents listed Iraq among their top two national concerns, compared with 36 percent of Republicans and 68 percent of Democrats. Overall, 58 percent of respondents said the war is not going well and only 38 percent said the battle for Iraq is helping the war on terrorism.

Voter dissatisfaction with Iraq has taken years to build, not least because few Americans fear a draft, unlike the Vietnam era. But the war is intruding on the public conversation.

"Iraq is at the top of the agenda, and it's largely among those people who say they are largely voting Democratic," said Andrew Kohut, the Pew Research Center's president. "It's not the only issue, but it's the one that has most given people a sense of unease about the state of the nation."

Independents, said Kohut, "are going to decide this election."

Recent Washington Post-ABC News polls, including one released this week, found that growing skepticism about the administration's performance since Sept. 11, 2001, has put the two parties at parity on combating terrorism -- formerly a winning Republican issue by a large margin.

Less than two weeks before Election Day, the figures represent a severe challenge to the GOP strategy of painting Democrats as weak on national security. They also help explain the boldness of Democratic candidates in challenging Republicans on the war.

"I'm getting less and less happy with way Bush is handling things," fifth-grade teacher Denise Hall said in Doylestown on a crystalline autumn morning. Iraq is "definitely a factor" as she considers backing Democrats this year after twice voting for Bush. "Things seem to keep getting worse."

Hall said she is troubled not only by the war deaths -- 93 Americans killed this month, the highest total in a year -- but also by what the Bush administration's approach to Iraq tells her about its ability to manage other crises. "My real concern is North Korea," she said. "That scares the heck out of me. Would we go in somewhere else and think we could straighten it out?"

In Connecticut's 5th District, Republican Rep. Nancy L. Johnson volunteers information on pretty much everything except the war. Her campaign Web site lists her positions on 12 "key issues," none of which includes Iraq. She talks of her "social moderation" and discusses her stances on the environment, health care and jobs.

Johnson believes the war echoes especially strongly in her race because of the battle for the Senate seat held by Joseph I. Lieberman, who was defeated by antiwar candidate Ned Lamont in the Democratic primary and is running as an independent. She contends that most candidates, Republican or Democrat, are not far apart in believing the Iraq war is off track.

Nearby, Democrat Diane Farrell is hammering repeatedly at Rep. Christopher Shays (R) for his support of the war. Recent polls show her with a narrow lead over Shays, who has visited Iraq 13 times and contends that victory remains possible.

"Christopher is such an ardent defender of the war and he holds himself out as an expert," Farrell said. "It makes it easier to hit on this issue."

It became clear in late summer that Iraq was working against Republican candidates, despite the well-telegraphed strategy of Bush and presidential adviser Karl Rove to link criticism of the war to weakness on national security. On Aug. 28, Vice President Cheney warned darkly of "self-defeating pessimism," but he found that some critics were solid Republicans.

GOP candidates are often keeping a distance from Bush, trying to define themselves as "independent." Ed Patru, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, said this is not a year to enforce party discipline.

"We encourage and expect every candidate to do the things they need to do to connect with the electorate," Patru said. One common GOP approach is to acknowledge that the war is not going well and to challenge voters to distinguish among the candidates' solutions.

"At least it becomes a wash," Patru said.

The NRCC has spent $8.5 million defending three Republican members of Congress near Philadelphia and $3.3 million on three competitive Connecticut races. Other candidates for the House and Senate are buying their own time on the issue.

In South Florida, a newspaper advertisement for Democrat Ron Klein challenges Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr. (R) for not doing more on Iraq.

"Clay Shaw refuses to hold the Bush administration accountable when it comes to the war on Iraq," the ad proclaims. "Whether it's a plan to win the peace, bring our troops home or account for a dime of the $300 billion we have spent, Shaw will not stand up to Bush or ask tough questions on Iraq. That's not leadership."

In Tennessee, Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. (D) is running an ad in his Senate campaign against Republican Bob Corker that declares: "I support our troops and I voted for the war, but we shouldn't stay the course, as Mr. Corker wants."

DOJ_NMG_0086727

Connecticut is home to what may be the most intently watched war debate, in the race between Lamont and Lieberman. Lamont, a millionaire from Greenwich, won the primary and national attention by pounding almost exclusively on Lieberman's backing of the Bush administration on the war. Yet recent polls show Lamont's candidacy tumbling.

Farrell, stopping in western Connecticut, said in a voice grown raspy by campaigning that the war alone will not carry a candidacy. She believes her quest to defeat Shays has been fueled by a "double shot" of public desire to send a message on Iraq and dethrone the Republican leadership in Congress.

"They are both Democrats -- voters don't have to reject Joe to get a Democratic Senate," she said. "The difference in my district is that it's about the war and control of the majority of the House of Representatives. You need both -- the war and control of Congress -- to work together for voters."

Mark Matthews, a political independent and school custodian, has a newspaper under his arm as he walks into a Fast Stop Food Shop in Norwalk. For him, at least, frustration with the war is enough to steer him to Lamont and Farrell.

"All these young kids, our boys, are dying over there," Matthews said. "For what? It's ridiculous. We've lost focus and I've had enough."

Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) has donated $1 million to the campaigns of 18 military veterans. That includes $220,000 to Tammy Duckworth, seeking the suburban Chicago seat vacated by Rep. Henry J. Hyde (R), and $130,000 each to Murphy and to Joseph A. Sestak Jr., who is challenging Rep. Curt Weldon (R) in suburban Philadelphia.

After campaigning for Michigan Gov. Jennifer Granholm and Sen. Debbie Stabenow in Flint last week, Kerry maintained that the Iraq war has become a national proxy for other worries about GOP leadership.

"I believe there is a continuum of incompetence and outright misleading that characterizes this administration on everything," Kerry said. "There is no disagreement that it's been mishandled and mismanaged and that we need a change. It runs very, very deep."

To emphasize the war, Kerry will attend with Murphy a Thursday rally among veterans. Murphy has made his military training and the war the centerpiece of his campaign against Fitzpatrick, 43, the GOP incumbent, who spent 10 years on the Bucks County Commission.

"It's forward-thinking: You anticipate what your enemy might do next. It's leadership," Murphy, a lawyer who served with the Army's 82nd Airborne Division, said in an unsubtle slap at Republicans. Yet in an MSNBC television interview as he launched his candidacy, he repeatedly refused to say how he would have voted on the 2002 Iraq war resolution -- an awkward moment he calls "a lesson learned."

Murphy now calls for all U.S. troops to be withdrawn within 12 months, with a strike force of 30,000 left in remote Iraq or Kuwait. He said 8,000 to 10,000 troops should be redeployed to Afghanistan. Fitzpatrick opposes setting a timetable.

At a recent debate, each candidate was permitted to ask the other a final question.

Fitzpatrick asked: "Pat, how many school districts are there in Bucks County and what are their names?"

Murphy asked: "Congressman Fitzpatrick, when are you going to give the American public the straight story on where you are with the war in Iraq?"

Powell reported from Connecticut. Staff writers Kari Lydersen in Chicago and Robin Shulman in New York and political researcher Zachary A. Goldfarb in Washington contributed to this report.

Frist To GOP Hopefuls: Don't Stress Iraq (AP-Y)

AP, October 26, 2006

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist says if Republican candidates want to succeed on Election Day, they should turn their focus away from the Iraq war.

"The challenge is to get Americans to focus on pocketbook issues, and not on the Iraq and terror issue," Frist said in an interview with the Concord Monitor on Tuesday.

Frist suggested that Republicans remind voters of subjects like tax cuts and lower gas prices, the result, he said, of the energy bill passed by Congress last year.

"These are all things the media has not covered," Frist said. "People don't say, 'This Congress passed tax cuts.' But that means something to every American."

Frist, a possible candidate for the presidency in 2008, visited New Hampshire on Tuesday to help local Republicans running for office and to accompany his wife, Karyn, on a promotional tour for her new book.

Frist, who is retiring from the Senate when his term expires at the end of this year, said he has been campaigning for candidates in his native Tennessee, Missouri, Iowa and New Hampshire. He said those trips have shown him a "worried, discontented and confused" electorate, with voters fed up with the politics of Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0086728

Frist suggested two issues that Republicans should use to highlight their differences with Democrats: homeland security and taxes. He criticized Democratic opposition to renewing the Patriot Act as "not equipping the government and military with the best tools to defeat terrorists." He also said proposals by Democrats to repeal tax cuts for the wealthiest Americans would be a drain on all taxpayers.

Defiant Iraqi PM Disavows Timetable (AP-Y)

By Christopher Bodeen, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 26, 2006

An angry Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki disavowed a joint U.S.-Iraqi raid in the capital's Sadr City slum Wednesday, and criticized the top U.S. military and diplomatic representatives in Iraq for saying his government needs to set a timetable to curb violence in the country.

Al-Maliki spoke at a news conference a day after U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said Iraqi leaders had agreed to set deadlines by year's end for achieving specific political and security goals laid out by the United States, including reining in militia groups.

"I affirm that this government represents the will of the people and no one has the right to impose a timetable on it," the prime minister said.

The prime minister dismissed U.S. talk of timelines as driven by the coming midterm elections in the United States. "I am positive that this is not the official policy of the American government but rather a result of the ongoing election campaign. And that does not concern us much," he said.

Al-Maliki complained that he was not consulted beforehand about the Sadr City offensive. The raid was conducted by Iraqi special forces backed by U.S. advisers and was aimed at capturing a top militia commander wanted for running a Shiite death squad.

"We will ask for clarification to what has happened," al-Maliki said. "We will review this issue with the Multinational Forces so that it will not be repeated."

Mouwafak al-Rubaie, his national security adviser, later told The Associated Press that al-Maliki's anger grew out of a misunderstanding that had since been cleared up with Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq.

While the U.S. military said the raid had been cleared in advance with al-Maliki's government, President Bush acknowledged that al-Maliki himself may not have been consulted.

"We need coordinate with him. That makes sense to me. And there's a lot of operations taking place which means sometimes communications are not as good as they should be. And we'll continue to work very closely with the government to make sure communications are solid," Bush said at his own news conference.

Military action in Sadr City is especially sensitive for the prime minister.

Until Wednesday, U.S. and Iraqi forces had largely avoided the densely populated slum, a grid of rutted streets and tumble-down housing that is home to 2.5 million Shiites and under the control of anti-American cleric Muqtada's al-Sadr's Mahdi Army.

Reining in the Mahdi Army and the other major militia, the Badr Brigades, remains one of the thorniest problems facing al-Maliki. His fragile Shiite-dominated government derives much of its power from the al-Sadr's faction and from the Supreme Council for the Revolution in Iraq, or SCIRI, which operates the Badr Brigades.

The U.S. military said Mahdi Army militiamen fought back in the Sadr City raid and that the Americans called in an air strike and cordoned the sprawling east Baghdad region.

Late Wednesday the military said it had killed 10 suspected militia fighters and wounded two in the battle. It did not identify the wanted militia leader or say whether he was still at large. Earlier, police and hospital officials said four people were killed and at least 18 wounded.

The military also said it had raided a mosque in Sadr City looking for a missing U.S. soldier and his kidnappers. The soldier was not found but three suspects were detained.

Residents living near Sadr City said gunfire and air strikes began about 11 p.m. Tuesday and continued for hours. The neighborhood was sealed to outsiders before dawn.

Groups of young men in black fatigues favored by the Mahdi Army were seen driving toward the area to join the fight. Explosions and automatic weapons fire were heard above the noise of U.S. helicopters circling overhead firing flares.

Crowds of Shiite men, some carrying pistols and others hoisting giant posters of al-Sadr, swarmed onto the district's streets Wednesday morning, chanting, "America has insulted us."

Throughout the day and into the night, U.S. F-16 jet fighters growled across the Baghdad sky, and at one point the report of tank cannon fire echoed across the city five times in quick succession.

Streets were empty and shops closed, although the district still had electricity from the national power grid.

DOJ_NMG_0086729

Well after nightfall, residents said all roads into the slum remained blocked by U.S. and Iraqi forces. U.S. soldiers were searching all cars.

A frustrated motorist waiting at one checkpoint jumped out of his car and called for al-Maliki to resign.

"Where is al-Maliki? It would be more honorable for him to resign. Why is he letting the Americans do this to us," the driver could be heard to scream.

Falah Hassan Shanshal, a lawmaker from al-Sadr's political bloc, said women and children had been killed, although videotape pictures of the bodies from the neighborhood taken at the local morgue showed only male victims.

"If there was an arrest operation, it should have been carried out by the Iraqi authorities, and not like this where air cover is used as if we were in a war zone," Shanshal said in an interview with the government's al-Iraqiya television station.

Iraqi Premier Denies U.S. Assertion He Agreed To Timelines (WP)

By John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 25 -- Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki lashed out at the United States on Wednesday, saying his popularly elected government would not bend to U.S.-imposed benchmarks and timelines and criticizing a U.S.-Iraqi military operation in a Shiite slum in Baghdad that left at least five people dead and 20 wounded.

Maliki's comments came a day after U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said the prime minister had agreed to timelines for accomplishing several critical goals, including developing plans to deal with militias, amend the constitution and equitably distribute Iraq's oil revenue.

"I affirm that this government represents the will of the people, and no one has the right to impose a timetable on it," Maliki said at a nationally televised news conference Wednesday. "The Americans have the right to review their policies, but we do not believe in a timetable."

With less than two weeks to go before critical midterm elections in the United States, Maliki accused U.S. officials of election-year grandstanding, saying that deadlines were not logical and were "the result of elections taking place right now that do not involve us."

In a conference call with reporters, two senior Democratic members of the Senate Armed Services Committee focused on Maliki's statements on the Bush administration benchmarks.

Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), ranking member of the panel, said, "I think the page we are on differs and is rewritten day to day to try to get past the elections here."

Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.), a West Point graduate who just returned from Iraq, said Maliki's comment "deliberately repudiates what the president's saying." He called it "disheartening" but said it "might be a function of politics of Iraq as much as a function of politics of the United States. But it does not appear they're even at the level of how to talk about the problem."

Maliki's comments followed a deadly early-morning military raid in Sadr City, a teeming Shiite slum in eastern Baghdad with more than 2 million residents loyal to the charismatic anti-U.S. cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. The aim of the operation was to capture the leader of a Shiite death squad, according to a U.S. military statement. It was unclear whether the target was among the casualties.

Sadr heads a large Shiite political party that is a key member of Maliki's government. He also heads a powerful militia, the Mahdi Army, that has fought several prolonged battles against American troops. U.S. officials, Sunni Arabs and independent observers say that the Mahdi Army is a driving force behind death squads that have slaughtered thousands of Sunnis and that Maliki's government has done little to halt the attacks or disarm the group.

Although a U.S. military statement on the operation did not mention the Mahdi Army or Sadr by name, the implication that the target was a member of the militia was unmistakable.

Iraqi army special forces, supported by U.S. advisers, "conducted a raid authorized by the Government of Iraq . . . to capture a top illegal armed group commander directing widespread death-squad activity throughout eastern Baghdad," the statement said. It also said Iraqi forces came under fire during the raid and "requested support from Coalition aircraft, which used precision gunfire only to eliminate the enemy threat."

At his news conference, Maliki distanced himself from the raid, saying his government would "ask for clarification about what has happened in Sadr City" and "review the issue with the multinational forces so that it will not be repeated."

Sahib al-Amiry, a top aide to Sadr, denied that any of the casualties were members of a death squad, saying they were simple people trying to scratch out a living. Speaking in Najaf, where Sadr has his headquarters, Amiry accused the United States of trying to provoke a bigger clash with Sadr's forces, but he said the cleric had ordered his followers not to rise to the bait.

DOJ_NMG_0086730

Sadr "gave an order to calm down and be patient, because the occupation forces want to drag the Mahdi Army into an internal fight, especially in Baghdad," Amiry said. He said Sadr "is calling for calm, but the occupation forces are insisting on escalating the situation."

Meanwhile, the office of Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top U.S. military official in Iraq, issued a statement Wednesday clarifying that he has not asked for more U.S. troops to be sent to Iraq. The statement said reports of Casey's comments at the joint news conference with Khalilzad on Tuesday "inferred" that Casey said more troops might be needed to quell violence in Iraq. "Quite frankly, that is the wrong impression," the statement said.

"There is no intent to bring more U.S. troops into Iraq at this time," the statement said. "The General was merely saying, as he has said consistently since taking command of the Multi-National Force Iraq, that all options are on the table. He will ask for what is needed. He has made no such request to date."

In his remarks Tuesday, Casey said he did not want to go into specifics about how better security and services would be brought to Baghdad, adding: "Now, do we need more troops to do that? Maybe. And as I've said all along, if we do, I will ask for the troops I need, both coalition and Iraqis."

Casey elaborated later, saying that if he needed more troops, he could draw them from Iraqi forces, U.S. forces already in Iraq or U.S. forces outside the theater.

Despite Maliki's tough reaction to suggestions that his government would bow to benchmarks and timelines to rein in militias, the prime minister reiterated at his news conference Wednesday, for the second time in as many days, the government's intention to crack down on illegal armed groups.

"The state is the only one that has the right to carry weapons," he said. "We will deal with anybody who is outside the law. Everyone now realizes that the existence of armed groups and militias harms the stability and unity of the state."

He also appealed to Iraq's neighbors to stop meddling in his country's affairs, and he blamed foreign fighters and supporters of ousted president Saddam Hussein for fomenting the current violence.

"I would like to state here that the root of the battle we are fighting in Iraq and the root of the bloody cycle that we are undergoing is the presence of terror organizations that have arrived in the country," Maliki said.

Maliki Distances Himself From American Strategies In Iraq (MCT)

By Nancy A. Youssef

McClatchy Newspapers, October 26, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - U.S. officials and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki are increasingly at odds over strategy and goals, a division that American officials in Iraq say is making it harder to pursue their objectives in Iraq.

On Wednesday, Maliki denounced an American bombing mission in the Baghdad neighborhood of Sadr City that the U.S. said had killed a notorious Shiite Muslim death-squad member. He also rejected a call Tuesday by the two top American officials in Iraq for a timetable for his government to tackle the nation's most intractable problems.

"This government is one of popular will and national unity, and it is nobody's right to put timetables before it," Maliki said.

It was at least the third time in recent weeks that Maliki had publicly contradicted American positions, and it underscored that he draws much of his support from the very militia groups that the U.S. is pressing him to dismantle.

The differences with the Bush administration were also evident during President Bush's news conference in Washington on Wednesday.

"I know many Americans are not satisfied with the situation in Iraq," Bush said in an opening statement. "I'm not satisfied, either."

He said the U.S. was pressing Maliki to move more quickly and warned that "America's patience is not unlimited."

But Bush also said the administration wouldn't press too hard. "Look, we'll push him," he said, "but we're not going to push him to the point where he can't achieve the objective."

With less than two weeks before congressional elections, a clamor has been growing among Democrats and some Republicans for a timetable that would require the Iraqi government to resolve certain issues or face a possible withdrawal of U.S. troops. Polls indicate that Republicans could lose control of the House of Representatives and possibly the Senate, largely over dissatisfaction with developments in Iraq.

Bush acknowledged that the war has become a top-tier issue with voters, and noted that 93 American soldiers have been killed so far this month, a rare mention by the president of the war's death toll.

But he said it was Maliki's responsibility to find a solution to the violence and that the United States wouldn't be drawn into supporting one side over the other in a civil war.

DOJ_NMG_0086731

"Americans have no intention of taking sides in a sectarian struggle or standing in the crossfire between rival factions," he said. "Our mission is to help the elected government in Iraq defeat common enemies, bring peace and stability to Iraq and to make our nation more secure."

Identifying the common enemies has proved to be one of the most difficult tasks for American officials, however.

U.S. military officers and civilian officials have warned for months that Shiite militias are responsible for most of the civilian deaths in Iraq, and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad in May called them the biggest threat to Iraq's security.

But the militias, notably the Mahdi Army, led by fiery cleric Muqtada al Sadr, are also key to Maliki's support, and the prime minister has objected on several occasions to U.S. efforts to rein them in.

On Wednesday, Maliki said American officials didn't get his approval before they conducted the bombing raid in Sadr City, where his core supporters and many members of Sadr's Mahdi Army live.

"In fact, we will ask for a clarification of what happened, and this is an issue we will review with the multinational forces so it won't happen again," Maliki said.

U.S. military officials here disputed Maliki's claim, saying they never enter Sadr City without coordinating with his government.

According to a U.S. statement, Iraqi soldiers were conducting the raid in Sadr City when they came under fire and requested support from American aircraft. The aircraft "used precision gunfire only to eliminate the enemy threat," the statement said.

Still, U.S. officials said they weren't surprised by Maliki's comments.

"We were expecting it," said one top American military aide who asked to go nameless because of the sensitivity of the subject.

Last week, Maliki ordered the United States to release a Mahdi Army member it had seized in a raid for death-squad involvement. In August, Maliki publicly berated the Americans for a raid on Sadr City.

The tension between Maliki and U.S. officials also was evident Tuesday during a news conference in Baghdad by Ambassador Khalilzad and Gen. William Casey, the top American military commander in Iraq.

Khalilzad and Casey said they'd won approval from the Iraqi government for a timetable to consider some of Iraq's pressing issues, including disarming the militias, revamping the constitution and setting a date for parliamentary elections.

In elaborating on that agreement, Khalilzad said the commitment came from President Jalal Talabani. He didn't mention Maliki except to say that he took the prime minister at his word when he promised to negotiate with Sadr.

Talabani, an ethnic Kurd, is a strong U.S. ally, but it's unclear whether he has the authority to agree to a timetable on behalf of the government. Iraq's Constitution is vague about the responsibilities of the president and prime minister, although it appears that the prime minister - not the president - must approve agreements with other nations.

For many Iraqis, there's no surprise that American officials and Maliki don't see eye to eye. Before his appointment as prime minister, Maliki had a reputation as a staunch advocate for his fellow Shiites.

In the weeks-long battle earlier this year over who'd be prime minister, Maliki drew key backing from Sadr supporters, who hold more seats than any other group in parliament. He's since appointed Sadr supporters to government ministries such as health and education.

Some experts think that Maliki would be forced from power if he adhered to U.S. insistence that he move against Sadr.

"I'm not sure Maliki can do anything to improve Bush's position," said Judith Yaphe, a Persian Gulf expert at Washington's National Defense University.

The prime minister, she noted, sits atop a central government that was designed to be weak because Shiites and Kurds wanted it that way.

Maliki is in "an extraordinarily weak position," Yaphe said. "He doesn't give the impression of being the person who's in charge."

The latest divisions between Maliki and the U.S. left the Bush administration open to Democratic attack.

Citing the differences over a timetable, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., issued a statement Wednesday that said, "The Bush administration's Iraq policy, like Iraq itself, is in complete disarray."

"It is increasingly clear that the president does not know what to do to stop the escalating violence in Iraq and that his so-called `National Strategy for Victory' in Iraq has failed," the statement said.

"It's disheartening," said Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I., a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee. "This might be a function of the politics of Iraq as much as the politics of the United States, but it does not appear - even at the level of how to talk about this thing - that there's a meeting of the minds."

McClatchy correspondents William Douglas and Margaret Talev contributed to this report from Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0086732

Iraq's Leader Jabs At U.S. On Timetables And Militias (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 25 — Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki put himself at odds on Wednesday with the American government that backs him, distancing himself from the American notion of a timetable for stabilizing Iraq and criticizing an American-backed raid on a Shiite militia enclave.

Speaking in Baghdad just hours before President Bush held a news conference in Washington, Mr. Maliki tailored his remarks to a domestic audience, reassuring the millions of Shiites who form his power base that he would not bend to pressure by the American government over how to conduct internal Iraqi affairs.

His comments stood in stark contrast to the message given Tuesday by the top two United States officials in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr. and Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, who said the timetable for political measures had been accepted by the Iraqi government.

"I want to stress that this is a government of the people's will, and no one has the right to set a timetable for it," Mr. Maliki said at a news conference broadcast on national television.

"This is an elected government, and only the people who elected the government have the right to make time limitations or amendments," he said, stabbing the air with his hand.

The remarks pointed to a widening schism between the Shiite-led Iraqi government and the Americans who support it.

As the violence here increases and midterm elections in the United States approach, Mr. Maliki has come under pressure from the Bush administration to step up efforts to control the violence. But the very forces that elevated him to power and whose support he must retain — religious Shiite parties with their own militias — are complicit in the violence.

That tension was on display in his remarks on Wednesday. While acknowledging the problems presented by militias and death squads — groups of men with guns that American military officials say are some of the primary culprits in the new phase of bloodletting here — Mr. Maliki said pointedly that the main factor driving the violence was insurgents and militant fighters, largely Sunni, who have been killing Shiites for more than three years.

"Saddamists and terrorist groups are responsible for what is going on this country and the reactions," he said, in a reference to retaliatory killing by Shiite militias that began after the February bombing of a shrine sacred to Shiites. "We should contain the reactions."

Mr. Maliki's stance differs sharply from views presented by American officials, who speak of Shiite death squads as an evil equal to that of the Sunni insurgents. But it fits snugly inside the circle of hardening Shiite sentiment that the American military, in keeping full control of security, has not given the Iraqi government full power to intervene when Sunni militias or insurgents carry out sectarian cleansing.

"Most of the officials feel like their hands are tied," said one Shiite politician, who insisted on anonymity. "They can't take critical decisions at critical times."

The politician cited the example of Saab al Bour, a largely Shiite town with Sunni outskirts northwest of Baghdad, from which hundreds of Shiite families have fled in the past month after attacks by Sunni insurgents. Shiites were "crying for help," he said, but the government could not come to their aid because of confusion over which country's troops were responsible for the area.

Americans have held onto control over security partly because they do not believe that the Iraqi forces are up to the job. They also fear selective enforcement by the government in favor of Shiites, who form a large part of Iraq's security forces, particularly the police, whose ranks are infiltrated by militias.

Mr. Maliki is stuck in the middle, forced to navigate between the rising tide of frustration among Shiites who form his base and the American government that wields the power.

Evidence of that increasing discomfort showed in Mr. Maliki's reaction to an American raid on a suspected Shiite death squad leader early Wednesday morning.

The raid took place at dawn in Sadr City, a vast district of cinderblock houses that is the stronghold of the Mahdi Army, a large Shiite militia that fought two battles against the American military under the command of a radical Shiite cleric, Moktada al-Sadr.

Iraqi forces and American advisers entered the far northern tip of the district, the domain of a Shiite guerilla leader known by his Iraqi nickname, Abu Dera, and immediately came under fire. The military called in air support, and aircraft fired high-caliber guns at militiamen on the ground, a military official said.

DOJ_NMG_0086733

The American military reported that 10 militiamen were killed and two were wounded in the fight, which residents said lasted several hours. The Iraqi authorities put the total wounded at 20. Soldiers continued to a nearby mosque, where the military suspected that the kidnappers of a missing American soldier were located, and detained three suspects.

"We will ask for a clarification on that from the multinational forces," Mr. Maliki said. "This is an issue we will review together so that it will not happen again. The Iraqi government should know about and have a role in these military operations."

It was not clear whether Mr. Maliki was posturing publicly to play to his Shiite base, or whether he had genuinely been taken by surprise. The raid was carried out by Iraqi forces and backed by Americans. But in nearly all cases, Americans initiate secret raids.

"The Iraqi government is a prisoner in the Green Zone, it's helpless," said Jaleel al-Nuri, an aide to Mr. Sadr. "They are like puppets moved by the coalition forces."

The American military, for its part, said the Iraqi government had approved the raid, which was directed at "a top illegal armed group commander directing widespread death squad activities." It said 10 suspects were detained but did not say whether the target was among them.

Residents said Abu Dera, whose real name is Ismail al-Zerjawi, was not among those captured, though his son was wounded and his cousin killed. Once loyal to Mr. Sadr, he broke away in 2004 and now runs his own influential crime ring. He is popular among hard-line Shiites, who put his image on cellphones and call him the Zarqawi of the Shiites, a reference to Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the former Qaeda leader who urged Sunnis to kill Shiites.

Mr. Maliki has acted before to assert Shiite influence over American military decision-making. In a similar raid last week, an aide to Mr. Sadr was arrested, and released a day later at the request of Mr. Maliki, who was about to visit Mr. Sadr.

General Casey said Tuesday that he personally allowed the release. Perhaps the most vivid illustration of just how uncomfortable Shiites have become with full American control is a new push to amend the terms of the United Nations agreement that extends the mandate of the multinational forces in Iraq, essentially providing the legal basis for the United States and other countries to have their militaries here.

Mowaffak al-Rubaie, Iraq's national security adviser, said the government would like to speed up the process of handing over Iraqi troops to Iraqi control. Two provinces are controlled by Iraqis, and Iraqis are in full charge of 2 of 10 Iraqi Army divisions.

Mr. Maliki said Wednesday that the government would draw up a new agreement to allow the government to move Iraqi Army units and run security operations in "Sadr City or any other tense area."

"We don't want to give the coalition forces the absolute authority to take the security responsibility all over the country," Mr. Rubaie said. "We think we can do things better and it's the time now."

"We need to be given the opportunity to make mistakes."

The push by the Iraqi authorities for more control over their own security comes as American military officials have scaled back estimates of the readiness of Iraqi troops. General Casey said Tuesday that it would be another 12 to 18 months before Iraqi troops would take control, longer than originally predicted.

Maliki Resists US Pressure To Take Key Decisions (FT)

By Steve Negus, Iraq Correspondent

Financial Times, October 26, 2006

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki on Wednesday dismissed Washington's claim that Iraqi politicians had agreed a timetable to reach key compromises and lashed out at a US-supervised raid on a militia target in the Shia slum of Sadr City.

His statements were a challenge to US officials who say that progress depends on Iraqi politicians swiftly taking decisions on issues that have divided Sunni and Shia and fed sectarian tensions.

The comments suggest that Mr Maliki either believes that Washington has no option but to continue backing his government, or feels that he cannot afford to alienate other members of his Shia-led coalition by authorising operations against Shia militias as the Americans would like.

Mr Maliki spoke at a press conference following a US-Iraqi raid on the massive Shia slum of Sadr City, the support base of the radical Shia Mahdi Army militia, in which residents said at least four people were killed by airstrikes and gunfire.

According to a US military statement, Iraqi special forces backed by US advisers conducted a raid "authorised by the government of Iraq... to capture a top illegal armed group commander directing widespread death-squad activity".

The prime minister however, who in an interview last week said he would block large-scale US operations in the crowded district, denied that he had been informed of the raid. "We will ask for clarification about what has happened in Sadr City. We will review this issue with the multinational forces so that it will not be repeated," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0086734

Mr Maliki also disavowed a statement on Tuesday by US ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad that Iraqi politicians had set a timetable to reach agreement on divisive issues. "I affirm that this government represents the will of the people and no one has the right to impose a timetable on it," Mr Maliki said.

He said that talk of timelines was probably driven by the November 7 US elections, and that "we are not much concerned by it".

Mr Khalilzad had said that Iraqi leaders would take decisions on how to share Iraq's oil revenues, on amending the constitution, on changing the committee charged with purging former members of the ruling Ba'ath party into an "accountability and reconciliation programme", on implementing a plan to address militias and death squads, and on other issues.

Most of these are of particular importance to Sunni leaders, who want to change the constitution to prevent their oil-poor heartland in central Iraq from being denied oil revenue. Mr Maliki has come under US pressure to reach out to the Sunni community.

He reiterated his government's pledge to crack down on militias deemed responsible for sectarian killings. There is no place for militias alongside the state. The existence of militias harms the state and I've given instructions to our armed forces that they be firm with them," he said.

Iraqi Leader Bristles At Idea Of Timetable (USAT)

By David Jackson And Rick Jervis

USA Today, October 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — Bush administration efforts to pressure Iraq's government by establishing a timeline to disarm militias and stand on its own have run into resistance from Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

In a news conference Wednesday, Bush vowed to push Iraqi leaders to accept more responsibility to govern their divided nation. In Iraq, al-Maliki rejected U.S. calls made 24 hours earlier for Iraq to set a timetable to quell sectarian violence.

Al-Maliki dismissed comments by Gen. George Casey, the chief U.S. commander in Iraq, and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad as driven by Bush administration concerns about the elections Nov. 7.

"I affirm that this government represents the will of the people, and no one has the right to impose a timetable on it," al-Maliki said in Baghdad. "I am sure this is not the official policy of the U.S. government, but it is a result of the election campaign."

Al-Maliki also denied prior knowledge of a raid by U.S. and Iraqi forces Wednesday in Sadr City, the stronghold of a Shiite militia led by militant cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. Al-Maliki said he had not been consulted and such an action "will not be repeated."

Al-Maliki's tough talk against U.S. initiatives is a public effort to appeal to the power base in his tenuous coalition government — mainly al-Sadr's movement and the rival Shiite faction, the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or SCIRI, said Chris Toensing, director of the Washington-based Middle East Research and Information Project. "By disavowing any role in the raid, he's talking to the Sadrists, and by dismissing timetables, he's talking to SCIRI and (al-Maliki's own party) Dawa," Toensing said. "It's a pretty narrow tightrope to walk."

In a statement, the U.S. military said Iraqi special forces with coalition advisers conducted two raids in Sadr City. The raids were aimed at capturing a death squad leader and suspects in the kidnapping of a U.S. soldier.

Bush, speaking to reporters at the White House, agreed with al-Maliki that conditions could not be forced upon Iraq's sovereign government. He made clear, however, that U.S. patience with al-Maliki is not infinite. "I speak to him quite frequently, and I remind him we're with him so long as he continues to make tough decisions. That's what we expect," Bush said. "We'll push him, but we're not going to push him to the point where he can't achieve the objective" of a stable Iraq.

The United States wants al-Maliki to reach an agreement with militias to lay down their arms. Al-Maliki has repeatedly pledged to deal with the militias but has resisted issuing firm ultimatums.

Bush acknowledged Wednesday that U.S. forces are taking heavy casualties in Iraq and that many Americans "are not satisfied with the situation."

"I'm not satisfied either," he said.

He continued to dismiss Democratic calls to set a fixed timetable to begin withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq. He repeated his contention that victory in Iraq is essential to the larger battle against terrorism. "We're winning and we will win, unless we leave before the job is done," he said.

Bush said last spring he had thought he might be able to "reduce our troop presence" early next year but conditions in Iraq now would not permit it. A premature withdrawal, Bush said, risks turning Iraq into a terrorist state, an echo of Afghanistan under the Taliban — only with oil revenue to spend.

Bush cited successes in Iraq such as the capture of Saddam Hussein in December 2003 and successful elections. He also listed failures, including loss of American lives and not finding weapons of mass destruction. "The ultimate accountability," Bush said, "rests with me."

DOJ_NMG_0086735

Leading Democrats, who believe voter concern about the war could fuel Republican losses in the congressional elections, said the apparent disconnect between Bush and al-Maliki reflected White House confusion about Iraq.

"The Bush administration's Iraq policy, like Iraq itself, is in complete disarray," Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said in a statement. "One day, the administration calls for a timetable, the next day Iraqi Prime Minister Maliki objects to it."

The most recent USA TODAY/Gallup Poll, taken Friday-Sunday, found voters are more focused on national issues than in any previous congressional election and are pessimistic about the war in Iraq. Nineteen percent of those surveyed said the United States is winning in Iraq, an all-time low.

At his news conference Wednesday, Al-Maliki appealed to neighboring states to cease meddling in Iraq's domestic affairs. The United States has accused Iran and Syria of aiding Sunni and Shiite armed groups. Al-Maliki blamed foreign fighters in groups such as al-Qaeda in Iraq and loyalists of Saddam's Baath Party for driving the violence.

Al-Maliki Hits U.S. Calls For A Timetable (WT/AP)

By Sameer N. Yacoub

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

BAGHDAD -- A defiant Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki yesterday slammed the top U.S. military and diplomatic representatives in Iraq for saying his government needed to set a timetable to curb violence ravaging the country.

"I affirm that this government represents the will of the people, and no one has the right to impose a timetable on it," Mr. al-Maliki said at a press conference.

On Tuesday, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said Mr. al-Maliki had agreed to a timeline.

Mr. al-Maliki also disavowed a joint raid by U.S. and Iraqi forces at the Baghdad stronghold of a Shi'ite militia led by radical anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr in search of a death-squad leader.

Mr. al-Maliki, who relies on political support from the cleric, said the strike against a figure in Sheik al-Sadr's Mahdi's Army militia in Sadr City "will not be repeated."

The prime minister dismissed U.S. talk of timelines as driven by the upcoming midterm elections in the United States.

"I am positive that this is not the official policy of the American government, but rather a result of the ongoing election campaign. And that does not concern us much," he said.

Mr. al-Maliki's comments followed remarks Tuesday by Gen. George Casey, the top American commander in Iraq, and Mr. Khalilzad, who said Iraqi leaders had agreed to a timeline for achieving key political and security goals, including reining in such groups.

Mr. Khalilzad revealed neither specific deadlines for achieving those goals nor penalties for their failure to do so, and Mr. al-Maliki said no deadlines had been put to his government.

"I would like to assert that everyone knows my government is a government that came to power through the will of the people. And it is no one's business to give it timelines," he said.

Mr. Khalilzad said Mr. al-Maliki had agreed to the timeline concept, which calls for specific deadlines to be set by year's end. Gen Casey said the Iraqi forces could be in a position to take over operations in all the country's provinces within 18 months "with some level of support" from coalition forces.

In Washington, President Bush sought to delineate a middle ground in terms of pressing the Iraqis to accept more of the responsibility for their own fate.

"We are making it clear that America's patience is not unlimited," he said at a press conference yesterday. "We will not put more pressure on the Iraqi government than it can bear."

Tank cannons boomed out over the city five times in rapid succession yesterday afternoon, and U.S. F-16 jet fighters screamed low overhead as the conflict in Sadr City continued into the day.

Four persons were killed and 18 wounded in overnight fighting in the overwhelmingly Shi'ite eastern district, according to police and hospital officials.

The U.S. military said Iraqi army special forces, backed up by U.S. advisers, carried out a raid to capture a "top illegal armed group commander directing widespread death-squad activity throughout eastern Baghdad," the military said.

Mr. al-Maliki, who is commander in chief of Iraq's army, firmly denied that he knew anything about the raid.

"We will ask for clarification about what has happened in Sadr City. We will review this issue with the multinational forces so that it will not be repeated," he said. "The Iraqi government should be aware and part of any military operation. Coordination is needed between Iraqi government and multinational forces."

Sadr City Raid Targets Death Squad Leader (LAT)

By Louise Roug

DOJ_NMG_0086736

The Los Angeles Times, October 26, 2006

BAGHDAD — American-led forces battled gunmen in Sadr City today during a rare foray into the capital's vast Shiite Muslim slum. Troops searching for an alleged death squad leader called in airstrikes when they came under attack, killing four people, according to Iraqi authorities.

While the U.S. military said in a statement that the raid had been authorized by the Iraqi government, Prime Minister Nouri Maliki quickly renounced the operation. He told reporters at a news conference that the raid was an example of the continued lack of coordination between Iraqi and American officials.

"We are going to request some explanations from the multinational forces to prevent a similar incident and to ensure coordination with the Iraqi security forces," the Iraqi leader said.

Maliki distanced himself further from the U.S. by refuting American talk of a timetable by which the Iraqi government needs to solve some of the country's most intractable issues, including disarming the militias.

"This government is one of popular will and national unity and it is nobody's right to put timetables before it," Maliki said, suggesting that statements by U.S. officials here had less to do with Iraq and more to do with U.S. electoral politics.

On Tuesday, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad told reporters that the Iraqi government had agreed to a series of "benchmarks" by which to resolve major domestic problems. The remarks came during a rare joint news conference with the top U.S. military commander in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr.

Maliki also went out of his way to praise the anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr for seemingly rejecting violence against other Muslims. Sadr has not renounced killing U.S. troops. American commanders believe that his militia, the Al Mahdi army, is behind most of the attacks against their troops.

October has been the bloodiest month of the year for U.S. forces, with at least 91 American troops killed this month.

While Maliki has been under pressure from the U.S. to rein in Shiite militias, notably the Mahdi army, the prime minister relies on the young cleric for political support. In addition to controlling the largest Shiite militia in Iraq, Sadr controls 30 seats in parliament.

In today's raid on Sadr City, troops set out to capture a "top illegal armed group commander directing widespread death squad activity throughout eastern Baghdad," the U.S. military said in a statement. It was unclear whether they caught the cell leader.

What Osama Wants (NYT)

By Peter Bergen

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

Washington

THE French saying, often attributed to Talleyrand, that “this is worse than a crime, it’s a blunder,” could easily describe America’s invasion of Iraq. But for the United States to pull entirely out of that country right now, as is being demanded by a growing chorus of critics, would be to snatch an unqualified disaster from the jaws of an enormous blunder.

To understand why, look to history. Vietnam often looms large in the debate over Iraq, but the better analogy is what happened in Afghanistan since the Soviet invasion. During the 1980’s, Washington poured billions of dollars into the Afghan resistance. Around the time of Moscow’s withdrawal in 1989, however, the United States shut its embassy in Kabul and largely ignored the ensuing civil war and the rise of the Taliban and its Qaeda allies. We can’t make the same mistake again in Iraq.

A total withdrawal from Iraq would play into the hands of the jihadist terrorists. As Osama bin Laden’s deputy, Ayman al-Zawahri, made clear shortly after 9/11 in his book “Knights Under the Prophet’s Banner,” Al Qaeda’s most important short-term strategic goal is to seize control of a state, or part of a state, somewhere in the Muslim world. “Confronting the enemies of Islam and launching jihad against them require a Muslim authority, established on a Muslim land,” he wrote. “Without achieving this goal our actions will mean nothing.” Such a jihadist state would be the ideal launching pad for future attacks on the West.

And there is no riper spot than the Sunni-majority areas of central and western Iraq. Abu Musab al-Zarqawi — the most feared insurgent commander in Iraq — was issuing an invitation to Mr. bin Laden when he named his group Al Qaeda in Iraq. When Mr. Zarqawi was killed this year, his successor, Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, also swore allegiance to Al Qaeda’s chief.

Another problem with a total American withdrawal is that it would fit all too neatly into Osama bin Laden’s master narrative about American foreign policy. His theme is that America is a paper tiger that cannot tolerate body bags coming home; to back it up, he cites President Ronald Reagan’s 1984 withdrawal of United States troops from Lebanon and President Bill Clinton’s decision nearly a decade later to pull troops from Somalia. A unilateral pullout from Iraq would only confirm this analysis of American weakness among his jihadist allies.

Indeed, in 2005 Mr. Zawahri sent Mr. Zarqawi a letter, which was intercepted by the United States military, exhorting him to start preparing for the impending American withdrawal similar to that of Vietnam 30 years ago. “The aftermath of the collapse of American power in Vietnam — and how they ran and left their agents — is noteworthy," Mr. Zawahri said. "Because of that, we must be ready starting now, before events overtake us, and before we are surprised by the conspiracies of the Americans and the United Nations and their plans to fill the void behind them."

DOJ_NMG_0086737

Yes, there is little doubt that the botched American occupation of Iraq was the critical factor that fueled the Iraqi insurgency. But for the United States to wash its hands of the country now would give Al Qaeda's leaders what they want.

This does not mean simply holding course. America should abandon its pretensions that it can make Iraq a functioning democracy and halt the civil war. Instead, we should focus on a minimalist definition of our interests in Iraq, which is to prevent a militant Sunni jihadist mini-state from emerging and allowing Al Qaeda to regroup.

While withdrawing a substantial number of American troops from Iraq would probably tamp down the insurgency and should be done as soon as is possible, a significant force must remain in Iraq for many years to destroy Al Qaeda in Iraq.

That can be accomplished by making the American presence less visible; withdrawing American troops to bases in central and western Iraq; and relying on contingents of Special Forces to hunt militants. To do otherwise would be to ignore the lessons of history, lessons that Al Qaeda's leaders certainly haven't forgotten.

In Syria, Iraq's Fate Silences Rights Activists (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

DAMASCUS, Syria -- Horror at the bloodshed accompanying the U.S. effort to bring democracy to Iraq has accomplished what human rights activists, analysts and others say Syrian President Bashar al-Assad had been unable to do by himself: silence public demands for democratic reforms here.

The idea of the government as a bulwark of stability and security has long been the watchword of Syrian bureaucrats and village elders. But since Iraq's descent into sectarian and ethnic war -- and after Israel's war with Hezbollah in Lebanon, on the other side of Syria -- even Syrian activists concede that the country's feeble rights movement is moribund.

Advocates of democracy are equated now with supporters of America, even "traitors," said Maan Abdul Salam, 36, a Damascus publisher who has coordinated conferences on women's rights and similar topics.

"Now, talking about democracy and freedom has become very difficult and sensitive," Salam said. "The people are not believing these thoughts anymore. When the U.S. came to Iraq, it came in the name of democracy and freedom. But all we see are bodies, bodies, bodies."

Ordinary people in Syria are hunkering down, and probably rightly so, said Omar Amiralay, a well-known Syrian filmmaker whose documentaries are quietly critical of Assad's one-family rule.

"If democracy brings such chaos in the region, and especially the destruction of society, as it did in Iraq and in Lebanon, it's absolutely normal, and I think it's absolutely a wise position from the people to be afraid to imagine how it would be in Syria," Amiralay said. "I think that people at the end said, 'Well, it is better to keep this government. We know them, and we don't want to go to this civil war, and to live this apocalyptic image of change, with civil war and sectarianism and blood.' "

In 2003, a few people in Damascus were bold enough to raise their glasses in cafes to toast the American tanks then rolling into Baghdad to overthrow Saddam Hussein. They were dreaming of the changes that might happen next here, in the only remaining government led by the Baath Party, a prominent writer in the capital said, speaking on condition of anonymity for fear of being jailed a second time.

"The Americans came to Iraq to make it an example to the other countries to ask for change," the writer said. "But what happened was the opposite. Now everyone is saying we do not want to be like Iraq."

Yet while Assad's government has fulfilled its pledge of stability, it has put off acting on any of its promises on democratic reform. In fact, as the U.S. effort in Iraq goes increasingly awry, Syria has cracked down even harder, activists said.

In May, the government jailed at least 12 people for signing a petition calling for better relations with Lebanon, according to Human Rights Watch. In July, Syrian courts sentenced three bloggers to up to four years in prison for writing too freely. The jail terms led Reporters Without Borders to declare Syria "the Middle East's biggest jail for cyber-dissidents."

Also in July, security and intelligence services imposed a foreign travel ban on scores of Syrian artists, rights workers and others. Activists learned of the ban one by one, when they showed up at the border or the airport with passport and suitcase, only to be refused permission to leave the country. Some democracy groups and forums have been shut down since last year.

Amiralay, 62, was stopped at the Syrian border in September as he headed to Jordan for a workshop on filmmaking. Middle East satellite television networks had recently broadcast his latest work, an understated documentary showing Baath Party rule across the generations in a Syrian village.

DOJ_NMG_0086738

Syrian officials clapped the noted filmmaker in handcuffs and brought him back to Damascus. Security officers screened his latest work frame by frame, demanding his explanation of any shot that suggested untoward symbolism, he said. Reports of his detention on Arabic-language television helped win his quick release.

Amiralay's prominence has helped him cope. Another critic, the once-outspoken writer, said he has opted to watch his words more carefully. And Salam, the publisher and conference organizer, voted with his feet, moving to Canada just after his interview in Damascus.

Before he left, Salam spoke darkly of the prospects for the Middle East. Iraq was in ruins, he said. Lebanon was in peril of civil war. In Syria, Assad would either stay in power or destroy the country first if he was forced out.

In Egypt, Yemen and Libya, strongmen were preparing their sons to succeed them, while the United States and other avowed promoters of democracy in the Middle East looked the other way. "I don't see the situation getting better," Salam said. "Young people are trying to leave Syria -- to Canada, to Europe, to any place."

Internationally, as well, the erosion of U.S. stature over Iraq and Lebanon has put Syria in position to try to improve its regional and world standing without giving in to the reform demands of the United States, diplomats and analysts said.

The United States and the European Union have officially isolated Syria since the February 2005 bombing that killed former Lebanese prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri in Beirut. The United States and others suspected Syrian involvement.

But Spain, Italy and Germany have renewed contacts since the war in Lebanon this summer, calling Syria's help vital to averting further conflict there. Britain, a staunch U.S. ally, continues to observe diplomatic silence with regard to Syria, but even its ambassador, Peter Ford, said in an interview here that the bid to shut out Syria had not accomplished its aims and may no longer be the best move. Former U.S. secretary of state James A. Baker III, co-chairman of a bipartisan panel seeking alternative strategies for Iraq, has suggested he may recommend U.S. talks with both Syria and Iran.

In Damascus, Baath Party legislator Georges Jabbour laughed when asked about the success of the U.S. policy toward Syria. Interviewed by telephone, he pointed to the two-day state visit to Damascus then being undertaken by Spanish Foreign Minister Miguel Ã ngel Moratinos. A year ago, Spain was still bowing to U.S. pressure to isolate Syria, and the Spanish foreign minister limited a Damascus visit to an unnecessary refueling stop for furtive meetings with Syrian officials, Jabbour said.

Meanwhile, Syria's people remain spectators of their government's maneuvering, free to watch it but not to speak.

They enjoy the small freedoms that their neighbors in dangerous Iraq no longer do -- such as the ability to go out after dark. This month, after breaking the daily Ramadan fast, families chugged in their cars up the steep roads of Mount Cassion to stroll, sip colas and fruit drinks and take in the view of Damascus spread out below.

Seated on a plastic chair on the road with a friend, real estate salesman Mohammed Yousif gestured toward the city. Green lights of mosques glowed among the white lights of a capital fully powered and at peace. Speaking to a foreign journalist, the 42-year-old salesman measured his words carefully, answering questions with the blandness often seen in Iraq before Hussein was toppled.

"We are talking and enjoying ourselves," Yousif said, waving the nozzle of the traditional water pipe he and his friend were using to smoke flavored tobacco. "This is our democracy. This is our freedom."

Money Down The Drain In Iraq (NYT)

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

When the full encyclopedia of Bush administration misfeasance in Iraq is compiled, it will have to include a lengthy section on the contracting fiascos that wasted billions of taxpayer dollars in the name of rebuilding the country. It isn't only money that was lost. Washington's disgraceful failure to deliver on its promises to restore electricity, water and oil distribution, and to rebuild education and health facilities, turned millions of once sympathetic Iraqis against the American presence.

Their discovery that the world's richest, most technologically advanced country could not restore basic services to minimal prewar levels left an impression of American weakness and, worse, of indifference to the well-being of ordinary Iraqis. That further poisoned a situation already soured by White House intelligence breakdowns, military misjudgments and political blunders.

The latest contracting revelations came in a report issued Tuesday by the office of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction. The office reviewed records covering $1.3 billion out of the $18.4 billion that Congress voted for Iraq reconstruction two years ago. Reported overhead costs ran from a low of 11 percent for several contracts awarded to Lucent to a high of 55 percent for, you guessed it, the Halliburton subsidiary, KBR Inc.

On similar projects in the United States, overhead is typically just a few percent. Given the difficult security environment in Iraq, overhead was expected to run closer to 10 percent. But in many of the contracts examined, it ran much, much higher, in some cases consuming over half the allocated funds. And the report may have actually underestimated total overhead because the government agencies that were supposed to be supervising these reconstruction projects sometimes failed to systematically track overhead expenses.

DOJ_NMG_0086739

The main explanation for these excessive overhead rates turned out to be not special security costs but simply the costly down time that resulted from sending workers and equipment to Iraq months before there was any actual work for them to do. That is yet another example of the shoddy contract writing, lax oversight and absent supervision that has consistently characterized Washington's approach to Iraq reconstruction from the start.

Bush administration incompetence, not corporate greed, is the chief culprit. Still, these charges are one more example of how the favored American companies lucky enough to be awarded reconstruction contracts made large sums of money while the Iraqis failed to get most of the promised benefits.

As Americans now look for explanations of how things went so horribly wrong in Iraq, they should not overlook the shameful breakdowns in reconstruction contracting. They need to insist that Congress impose tough new rules on the Pentagon to ensure more competitive bidding, tighter contract writing and more rigorous supervision. That is the best way to ensure that such a costly and damaging failure never happens again.

For NBC Reporter, The Job That Won't Go Away (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

NEW YORK -- After struggling for years to make it as a Middle East journalist, Richard Engel was living in Cairo, married to his college girlfriend and itching for a new adventure.

As the Bush administration geared up to invade Iraq, Engel decided he had to be there and bought an illegal visa. Once in Iraq, he became so absorbed in the conflict that his marriage became a casualty of war.

"There is no personal life," he says. "This is what I do all the time. It's not a solitary existence like I'm riding a camel in the desert, but you just don't have any personal space."

At 33, the baby-faced Engel has logged more time in Iraq than any other television correspondent, chronicling 3 1/2 years of carnage for NBC and shrugging off several close calls. As nearly all television correspondents rotate in and out of Iraq, Engel has stayed .

"In an era of instant media criticism, he calls balls and strikes in the middle of a war zone," says NBC anchor Brian Williams. "He is completely unbothered by any Web site that may have problems with his reporting while he's over in Iraq dodging bullets. . . . He is the most agenda-less person I've met in our business, I think, in the past 20 years."

On a rare visit home, Engel looks slighter than he does in flak-jacketed appearances from Baghdad, as if he doesn't quite fill out his suit. He speaks with an air of resignation about the worst that human beings can do to each other.

Earlier this month he interviewed a woman whose 13-year-old son was kidnapped. After she paid the $12,000 ransom, the boy was tortured and killed anyway.

"It's horrible," Engel says. "I've seen hundreds of dead bodies -- rotting bodies, bodies buried in shallow graves. One time I watched a dog carry a severed human head in its mouth. You're smelling bodies, you're seeing people who are so angry and insanely distraught. The people who are being killed are too old, too stupid, too poor, too young or too weak, socially or otherwise, to leave."

Engel frequently hits the punching bag as a form of therapy. "There are images that I would rather not have in my head," he says. "You can't let your guard down. . . . You have to go out every day assuming you're being hunted, that people want to take you for ransom."

Among the small circle of journalists who risk their lives in the region, Engel commands considerable respect.

"I admire Richard because he's passionate about the story, and he cares," Lara Logan, CBS's chief foreign correspondent, says from Iraq. "When he was a freelancer with no real support, he wasn't afraid to stay on his own in Baghdad for 'shock and awe.' He's also a really decent guy."

Why does he stay? When NBC made Engel its Middle East bureau chief over the summer, he agreed to a new contract and moved to the relative calm of Beirut. Days later he found himself covering a fierce war between Israel and Hezbollah -- and was suddenly reenergized. This, for better or worse, is what he does.

Not that Engel necessarily approves of military conflict.

"I think war should be illegal," he says. "I'm basically a pacifist."

* * *

Engel was taping a standup last week on Haifa Street, in one of Baghdad's most dangerous neighborhoods, where he was traveling with the 172nd Stryker Brigade.

DOJ_NMG_0086740

Suddenly shots rang out. The unit was under sniper fire. "Let's go, go, go, go, go, go!" one soldier shouted. Engel scrambled for cover, but completed his report a few minutes later.

He has little patience for the notion that the media are suffering from Iraq fatigue because the story -- day after day of death and destruction -- has gotten so repetitive.

"Whether you agree with the war or not, I have a very soft spot for the guys who are out there. These guys have saved my life on more than one occasion, and they are dying at the rate of two a day, and they deserve to be talked about."

Danger lurks everywhere for Western correspondents in Iraq. Engel has survived two kidnapping attempts, one of which occurred when a pair of cars surrounded his vehicle, forcing his driver to make an evasive maneuver at 90 miles per hour with a third car in hot pursuit. And journalists' hotels are a periodic target. Engel's hotel room has been blown up three times in insurgent attacks, once collapsing the ceiling and another time blowing off the door as shrapnel filled the room.

"There's a fine line between fearless and crazy," Williams says. "Richard is not crazy. He has distilled risk to a science."

Few would have predicted that Engel would become an intrepid war correspondent when he was growing up on Manhattan's East 86th Street. He suffered from dyslexia and struggled in school.

"He was down in the mouth and low on self-confidence," says his mother, Nina Engel. "He lived in the shadow of his older brother, Mr. Perfect," who is now a cardiologist. In fact, she had only "a very faint hope" that he would be able to go to college.

When he was 13, Engel asked his parents to send him to a wilderness survival program in Wyoming. Frustrated by his learning disabilities, he was eager to escape the comforts of Upper East Side life and try a tougher environment.

He says he was "scared to death," especially when given a gun to hunt small game. Nina Engel remembers getting a letter from her son: "I just returned from my survival hike. I clubbed a bird to death and ate it." When the teenager returned, he told his mother: "I learned a lot about myself."

Engel says the experience began a transformation that largely enabled him to overcome his dyslexia and school problems. Despite his learning difficulties, he showed early promise in other ways.

"He was a great writer," says Ross Peet, who was a classmate at Riverdale Country School in the Bronx. "But he struggled with anything that had a number on it."

At 16, Engel spent a year as an exchange student in Sicily. After graduating from Stanford in 1996 with a degree in international relations, Engel says, he decided that "the Middle East would be the story of my generation." He announced to his parents that he was moving to Cairo, where the family had once taken a trip.

"Are you insane?" Nina Engel recalls asking him. "Do you remember what a hellhole it was?" When her son said he was also considering Damascus, she allowed as how Cairo was not really that bad.

The aspiring reporter took his $2,000 in savings, moved to Cairo, enrolled in Arabic classes and found an apartment in a neighborhood where donkeys and dogs roamed the dirt roads.

Engel did some local freelancing and caught an early break when he was asked to take over the English-language Middle East Times after the staff walked out in the wake of the editor's firing. He wrote all the articles -- making plenty of mistakes in the process -- and took the proofs each week to a printing press in Athens, as a way to avoid Egyptian censorship laws.

Engel ran into trouble anyway as he began reporting on the group that would become al-Qaeda. He says Egyptian authorities started following him and bugging his phone. Once, after a weekend trip, an official called to ask how he had liked staying in Room 17 of a hotel in Alexandria. Engel reported the surveillance to the U.S. embassy, to no avail.

"The embassy was useless," he says. "It was my first lesson that you cannot rely on anyone else. No one is coming to help you."

In 1999, Agence France-Presse hired Engel to go to Jerusalem and cover the Palestinians. As the intifada protests against Israel turned violent, he says, "I spent the next three years on my stomach, getting tear-gassed and shot at with rubber bullets."

Most people might consider that a miserable existence. But Engel brightens at the thought: "I was lucky enough to be on the fault line as history shifts and moves."

Friends were not surprised at his constant need for an adrenaline fix. "He has no interest in a 9-to-5 job," Peet says. "He's very much into living on the edge. I don't think he has much interest in having a normal life."

By late 2002, as war with Iraq loomed, ABC News and the BBC had hired Engel as a freelancer. But even though he spoke Arabic, Engel wasn't on anyone's list to get an Iraqi visa. The networks were concentrating their efforts on their bigger stars.

Undeterred, Engel took $20,000, went to Jordan and bought a human shield visa, meaning that he was pledging to chain himself to an Iraqi facility as a deterrent against U.S. bombing. Engel got the visa from an Iraqi official who knew full well he was a journalist but was swayed by a few hundred dollars and some baby clothing that Engel had bought for extra persuasion.

Once in Iraq, Engel bought a generator and some crowbars, souped up two Volkswagens so he could move fast without being conspicuous, and hired an off-duty police officer. On the eve of the Western invasion, most of the networks pulled out their correspondents for safety reasons, a decision that Engel could not fathom.

DOJ_NMG_0086741

"You knew it was going to be horrible -- that's why you're there," he says.

As other journalists either withdrew, were expelled or clamored to get in, Engel was for a brief time the only American television reporter in Iraq. He found himself much in demand by ABC, which still identified him as a freelancer. He did the videotaping himself with a small camcorder. Once Saddam Hussein was toppled, ABC and NBC both offered to hire Engel. He retained a top New York agent and decided he would prefer a fresh start with NBC, "coming in the front door as opposed to climbing up the fire escape and breaking in the back door."

In the invasion's aftermath, Engel would drive each week to such cities as Najaf and Fallujah, poking around to find stories. But that gradually changed as the security situation deteriorated. Now, unless he is embedded with a military unit, Engel usually finds himself confined to the safer precincts of Baghdad, an experience he describes as "a noose tightening around us." He increasingly relies on Iraqi staffers who are from certain neighborhoods or members of the same ethnic group as a given area's residents. But even that can be problematic. "I've gotten rid of the ones who I think cannot be trusted," Engel says.

Not everything he covers involves bombs and bullets. Engel did a piece earlier this year on the plight of children at a Baghdad orphanage, which drew so much public reaction that "NBC Nightly News" aired it a second time.

"I don't look for good-news stories or bad-news stories. I don't have an abacus," he says.

But bad news has a way of finding journalists in Iraq. On Memorial Day, Engel heard a nearby explosion. He soon learned that CBS correspondent Kimberly Dozier had been badly wounded and her two crew members, Paul Douglas and James Brolan, killed by the blast.

His mother sent him an e-mail: "YOU ARE UNDER HOUSE ARREST UNTIL YOU CAN BOOK A FLIGHT OUT OF THERE . . . Mom's orders."

She writes him every day, but he has not followed her evacuation instructions. Still, there are psychological effects. Riding in an Army Humvee, Engel looked down at his legs and thought how fragile they looked. What if he lost them?

"You worry about how many lives you have and how many I've already used up," Engel says. "I don't think I'm invincible."

An Opportunity For Shared Sacrifice (USAT)

By Hodding Carter And Ronald Goldfarb

USA Today, October 26, 2006

As with so many Americans of our generation, we went into military service because that was what you were expected to do. We may have groused at the time, but we are proud of having served our country. It carved a few years out of our lives in the 1950s and '60s, but strengthened our understanding of the country we served and the people with whom we served.

Of course, while public service now seems self-evident to us, it does not to most of our children's generation. It is not that they turn away from duty to the civil society. Millions have chosen the military, of course. Many serve in the government and voluntary service organizations, working among the urban poor and rural landless. A large number tell pollsters they believe in volunteerism. But the idea of public service as a universal duty is another story.

On the campaign trail these days, there are few fresh ideas, and in the wake of the fifth 9/11 anniversary, there are still not enough calls for public sacrifice beyond that made by our troops. National service isn't a new idea. It arises from one of the oldest themes of U.S. history. What does the citizen owe the state? Answer: mandated public service without exemptions.

Mandatory national service could appeal to Americans' natural inclination toward patriotism and provide an antidote to the cynical public attitude that characterizes recent politics. It would bring out the best in young Americans and rekindle a sense of shared national purpose. And it isn't right or left, Democratic or Republican.

The death of the military draft was hailed in the Vietnam War era by liberals and conservatives alike, not necessarily for shared reasons but with shared acclaim. With today's professionalized military, the many are protected; the relative few fight and die in the name of the whole.

The best approach to mandatory national service would be to require every 18-year-old man and woman, and every young immigrant seeking citizenship, to spend 18 months to two years in public service. Their service could be in the military or in the Homeland Security Department, or be in programs similar to President Franklin Roosevelt's Civilian Conservation Corps, Sargent Shriver's Peace Corps or President Clinton's AmeriCorps — any work experience that is in the public interest.

According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, there are about 4 million 18-year-olds who might fill our proposed first class. Some 2.7 million youths graduated from high school from 2004 through 2005. Just under 60,000 are in the military. Others hold jobs, are in school or are in jail. About 17% are unemployed.

There are great costs attributable to this class, economic and others. The cost of public service would be a wise investment. After completing national service, these young people would enter their next phase in life more mature and more knowledgeable about the rich variety of America's peoples and the breadth of the nation's unfinished business.

DOJ_NMG_0086742

National service is not a partisan concept. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., has praised Clinton's AmeriCorps program. It also need not be the exclusive province of government. Private-public interest organizations, including churches and other faith-based groups, could qualify as sponsors and providers of public service. Diversity, rather than bureaucratic uniformity, would be encouraged.

But the bottom line would be the reinstitution of a notion as old as the nation. Just as all share in the benefits of freedom, all should share in shoring it up.

Hodding Carter is a professor and former journalist; he served in the Marines and State Department. Ronald Goldfarb is an attorney and author; he served in the Air Force and Justice Department.

A GI Bill For The 21st Century (LAT)

By Edward Humes

The Los Angeles Times, October 26, 2006

IMAGINE TELLING the members of an entire generation they could receive a free college education at any school that accepted them — Cal State, Harvard, the Sorbonne — courtesy of Uncle Sam. Throw in a monthly stipend and textbooks. After graduation, there are government-backed home loans, no money down — buy a house cheaper than renting. Throw in subsidized business loans, farm loans, job training, medical care and up to a year's worth of unemployment checks.

What insane politician would ever propose such a costly boondoggle, such outright social engineering? It would be the most enormous, far-reaching, life-changing government program in the history of the world.

And so it was. We know it today as the original GI Bill.

Today's unthinkable was yesterday's matter of course. FDR and Congress adopted the humbly named Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944 with bipartisan fervor. The stated goal was simple: to help 16 million veterans and their families resume their lives after the scourge of World War II.

But this investment in the nation's future powered far more than a return to the status quo. It transformed the nation and the very nature of the American dream, opening up the colleges, raising suburbs out of bean fields, creating a new middle class and providing the medical, engineering and scientific prowess that conquered long-feared diseases, ushered in the Information Age and helped win the Cold War.

There was never anything like the GI Bill. There's nothing like it on the horizon. And that's a problem.

Today's veterans are getting shortchanged. Instead of a full ride to any college, the modern GI Bill's education support tops out at $36,000 for a four-year degree — barely enough to cover the average state university and well short of UCLA's $19,500 annual tuition, room and board. Forget about the private colleges once covered by the GI Bill — $36,000 would pay for only a year at many of them.

Reservists and National Guard troops in Iraq receive even less — only 27% of the education benefits that regular troops receive. President Bush has opposed closing this gap, considering it a budget buster. Indeed, in a quest to minimize projected war costs, the administration used prewar statistics to craft its budget for another pillar of the GI Bill — healthcare. Now veterans hospitals caring for the wounded of Iraq and Afghanistan are $3 billion short.

But this is not simply a story of slighted veterans, scandalous as that may be. This is a story of a United States no longer investing it its future. The GI Bill was an engine of opportunity for all of us. It powered U.S. prosperity after World War II, turning a nation of renters into a nation of homeowners, transforming college from an elite bastion into almost an entitlement and making a tiny middle class into America's leading demographic.

The "greatest generation" endured depression and war, but its members also ended up our most privileged generation, gifted with more government largesse than any group in history. More than 7 million veterans took advantage of the education benefits alone for college or trade schools. This proved a costly but sound investment: For every dollar paid out under the original GI Bill, there was a $7 return to the economy in terms of increased earnings, consumer spending and tax revenue, according to a 1988 congressional study.

Three presidents — George H.W. Bush, Gerald Ford and Jimmy Carter — dozens of congressmen, 14 Nobel Prize winners, giants of literature, Broadway and Hollywood and hundreds of thousands of teachers, doctors, nurses and businessmen got their starts with the help of the GI Bill. "Biggest piece of legislation the country ever passed," says former Sen. Bob Dole, a war hero and GI Bill beneficiary. "Maybe we need something like it again."

Which begs the question: What happened to the Washington that created something so magnificent? Why do we no longer expect — or demand — greatness from Americans' joint enterprise, our government? In the 1960s, before Watergate and Vietnam, most Americans believed that their government usually did the right thing. Now we've accepted Ronald Reagan's old formulation about the nine most dangerous words in the English language: "I'm from the government and I'm here to help." How ironic that a member of the GI Bill generation would sell his countrymen on that idea. But it's not a truism; it's self-fulfilling prophecy. We expect our government to fail, and it meets our expectations.

DOJ_NMG_0086743

The original GI Bill was powerful because it touched a whole generation, and the ripple effects washed over the entire nation, not just veterans. Today's GI Bill reaches less than 1% of the population. It is no longer an engine for greatness, and Americans desperately need such an engine. We have always been the nation where the children can expect a better life than the parents; we no longer believe this is likely.

Before he died, FDR offered a solution that did not require a world war and a military draft. He proposed a program of national service, in which young people earned education, medical, housing and pension benefits. Not just veterans but all young people. It was, in essence, a peacetime civilian GI Bill — an investment in the future and in civic service. Polls suggested a receptive public, but the idea died with Roosevelt. President Clinton tried a modest resurrection with his AmeriCorps project. Much more is needed.

Would such a program be expensive? Absolutely — about what we've spent so far on the war in Iraq. But spending hundreds of billions at home to generate opportunities for future doctors, scientists, teachers, leaders and productive, healthy citizens would be a far sounder investment, with a proven rate of return. Where would you rather spend your tax dollars?

In an era in which college is a skyrocketing financial burden for many families, when homeownership is less affordable than ever, when the nation is losing its competitive edge in advanced degrees and when the American dream so generously nurtured after World War II is under siege, it is time to expect greatness from our government once again. Our children deserve it.

DOJ:

Alito Swears In Acosta As Miami's Top Federal Prosecutor (AP)

By Curt Anderson, The Associated Press

AP, October 26, 2006

MIAMI - R. Alexander Acosta was formally sworn in Wednesday as South Florida's top federal prosecutor by Supreme Court Justice Samuel Alito Jr., for whom Acosta clerked shortly after graduating from Harvard Law School.

Alito recalled that during his clerkship in 1994 at the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, Acosta appeared to exercise good judgment and common sense at a young age and that "and it has developed since then." Alito, who is a big baseball fan, compared Acosta to players adept at all phases of the game.

"He reminds me of one of those baseball players who can do everything," Alito said.

Acosta, 37, a Miami native of Cuban ancestry, was confirmed by the U.S. Senate for the Southern District of Florida post on June 9. Before returning to Florida, he was assistant attorney general for civil rights at the U.S. Justice Department in Washington and prior to that was a member of the National Labor Relations Board.

The Miami job is one of the most prominent and busiest in the country, covering a district that is home to some 6 million people in nine counties. Its major recent cases range from alleged al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff to the Colombian brothers who ran the Cali cocaine cartel.

Acosta was joined at the ceremony by the district's federal judges, prosecutors and dozens of defense lawyers as well as his wife, Jan, mother and other well-wishers. In brief remarks, he said cases that have "quality and impact" would be the focus of his office.

"Our job is, and must be, to bring high-impact cases," he said. "I appreciate and am deeply honored by the opportunity to serve the citizens of South Florida."

Alito Protégé Sworn In As U.S. Attorney In Miami (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, October 26, 2006

Samuel A. Alito, the U.S. Supreme Court's newest justice, praised one of his protégés, R. Alexander Acosta, on Wednesday as he swore him in as the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of Florida.

But Alito said that for all his formidable legal talent, Acosta betrayed one "weakness" when he served as a law clerk in 1994 for the then-federal appellate judge.

"Alex's knowledge of sports was a little bit lacking," Alito deadpanned before a standing-room-only gathering of judges, prosecutors and defense lawyers in the historic central courtroom of the Miami federal courthouse.

Alito, a self-professed baseball fan, joked that Acosta probably didn't know the difference between the Florida Marlins and the Miami Dolphins.

DOJ_NMG_0086744

All joking aside, Acosta's star has risen quickly in Republican circles. He served on the National Labor Relations Board and then became the first Hispanic to lead the Justice Department's civil rights office.

He temporarily replaced outgoing U.S. Attorney Marcos Jimenez in June 2005 and was nominated for the job by President Bush earlier this year at age 37. The Senate confirmed Acosta in August, making him one of the nation's youngest top prosecutors.

Acosta -- now officially in charge of a 220-lawyer office that extends from Fort Pierce to Key West -- singled out the extraordinary role of South Florida's law enforcement community in some of the nation's biggest prosecutions.

He cited the recent convictions of Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff in the SunCruz Casinos fraud case and of Cali Cartel founders Gilberto and Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela. He also said his office is prosecuting a major terror suspect, Jose Padilla.

Acosta, flanked by his wife, Jan, thanked his Cuban exile parents for sacrificing to put him through Gulliver Preparatory School and Harvard University, where he earned his undergraduate and law degrees.

Acosta seemed in awe of the legal elite gathered in the courtroom, saying his own story was not that unusual: ``The fact that there are so many stories in this room is a testament to the nation's freedom and opportunities."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

UPDATE: SEC Says Two Defrauded Korean Community In Calif. (DOW)

By Siobhan Hughes, Of DOW JONES NEWSWIRES

Dow Jones, October 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- The Securities and Exchange Commission has filed civil-fraud charges against two men who allegedly took at least $3 million from Korean speakers in Southern California from 2003 through August 2005 through two firms that they portrayed as legitimate securities firms.

The SEC on Wednesday announced the charges against Kangsan Kim, the owner of money-manager Unus Capital Management Inc., and Hyun Soo Jang, the owner of PeopleN Investment Corp., the brokerage firm that was supposed to execute trades for Unus. The two men face civil penalties and orders to return the money to investors.

"This case provides an unfortunate example of the dangers presented by those seeking to exploit the trust of members of their own community," said Randall Lee, director of the SEC's office in Los Angeles. "Such schemes are reprehensible, and the SEC is committed to vigorously prosecuting those who betray that trust for their own profit."

Kim was arrested in July on federal mail-fraud and wire-fraud charges, according to a Justice Department press release. He doesn't have a lawyer, according to the SEC, and he couldn't be located. The SEC said it believes Jang is in South Korea.

Unus attracted investors from the Korean community by sponsoring daily morning stock reports on Korean-language radio broadcasts in Los Angeles, the SEC said. The firm asked clients to enter agreements under which Unus managed their accounts and executed trades through PeopleN, the SEC said.

Instead of investing the $4.5 million raised from investors, Jang misappropriated more than $3 million, the SEC said, and gave $500,000 of that amount to Kim and Unus. The SEC said that Unus withdrew its investment advisor registration in 2004, and that PeopleN wasn't registered to do business as a brokerage firm, even though both firms told investors that they were regulated businesses.

Judge Issues Secret Ruling About Secrets In Nacchio Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Sandy Shore, Ap Business Writer

AP, October 26, 2006

(AP) - DENVER-A federal judge has issued a secret ruling about the relevance of classified government documents that former Qwest Chief Executive Officer Joe Nacchio wants to use in his defense against insider trading charges.

In his memorandum and order, which were filed with the court late Tuesday, U.S. District Judge Edward Nottingham said he explained his decision regarding the documents but the bulk of it, 25 pages, was sealed under the Classified Information Procedures Act.

Nottingham's ruling came about two weeks after he met behind closed doors with prosecutors and Nacchio's attorneys to discuss the classified information.

A spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office declined comment Wednesday. Nacchio's attorneys have said they will not comment on the case outside the courtroom.

Nacchio is charged with 42 counts of insider trading, accused of selling stock in 2001 based on inside knowledge that Qwest Communications International Inc. would be unable to meet revenue targets.

DOJ_NMG_0086745

Each count against Nacchio carries a penalty of up to 10 years in prison and a $1 million (â,¬800,000) fine. The trial is set for March 19 and is expected to last about 30 days.

At issue is whether the classified information will help explain what Nacchio might have known at the time the trades occurred.

The defense has said Nacchio was aware of classified government contracts awarded to Qwest and of plans for future government business dealings with the Denver-based company.

Qwest, the primary phone service provider in 14 mostly Western states, reported total revenue of $19.6 billion in 2001, the year of the trades in question. Of that, $322 million was attributed to federal contracts, and less than half of that came from classified contracts, according to court filings.

Nacchio also is one of several former Qwest executives accused by the Securities and Exchange Commission in a civil case alleging they orchestrated a financial fraud that forced the company to restate billions of dollars in revenue.

The Classified Information Procedures Act was enacted several decades ago to counter a strategy used by defendants charged with spying who would threaten to expose national secrets unless the charges were dropped.

It allows the attorneys and judges to review such information behind closed doors to determine if it is significant enough to be included at trial.

SEC Probes Mutual-Fund Firms After Settlement In Kickback Case (WSJ)

By Tom Lauricella

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission has launched an investigation of 27 mutual-fund companies that the agency says have accepted kickbacks totaling hundreds of millions of dollars in recent years.

The investigation centers on alleged arrangements in which independent contractors agreed to pay rebates to mutual-fund companies in order to win lucrative contracts for jobs like producing shareholder reports and prospectuses. The probe stems from a $21.4 million settlement the SEC reached last month with Bisys Fund Services Inc., an administrative-services provider owned by Bisys Group Inc.

Regulators say Bisys, which is based in Roseland, N.J., paid a total of $230 million in kickbacks between July 1999 and June 2004 as part of an effort to win work from mutual funds. Bisys settled the civil charges without admitting or denying wrongdoing.

While the alleged kickbacks would have taken only a tiny toll on individual investors, perhaps shaving a few hundredths of a percent a year off their fund accounts and returns, the latest investigation comes as the fund industry is struggling to rebuild its reputation after a series of trading scandals that triggered regulatory crackdowns and fines totaling more than $1 billion.

Critics have long complained about fund companies using shareholder money for their own benefit. For example, funds are allowed to use trading commissions, which are deducted from shareholder funds, to pay for research that may not benefit individual fund investors. They can also levy fees on their investors for marketing, although attracting more investors benefits the fund company and not necessarily its existing shareholders. Both these practices are highly regulated to prevent abuses. Nonetheless, regulators and other observers say the latest scandal is part of a distressing pattern of fund companies misusing shareholder money.

"This is far worse conduct" than previous fund-trading scandals, said Mercer Bullard, a law professor at the University of Mississippi who specializes in mutual-fund matters. "Receiving a kickback that comes indirectly out of the pockets of shareholders is the functional equivalent of embezzlement."

In part based on information from Bisys, the SEC has sent letters to some of the 27 fund companies asking them to provide details about their ties to Bisys, according to people familiar with the probe. They didn't identify any of the companies. However, the investigation is unlikely to include many of the very largest fund companies, which tend to have in-house units that handle administrative functions.

Most of Bisys's clients were bank-run funds, many of which tended to be smaller firms with several billion of dollars under management. A handful of banks, however, do rank among the larger fund managers.

The SEC says the alleged kickbacks involving Bisys and other service providers worked with the help of secret side agreements. The service providers charged shareholder accounts for administrative services but, unbeknownst to the funds' investors or independent board members, the providers agreed to rebate part of that money to fund advisers, who would then use it to cover their marketing expenses. In exchange for the kickbacks, the advisers would recommend to their funds' boards that the service providers' contracts be renewed.

At issue in the probe is whether fund companies misused their investors' money and misled their boards about why they were hiring certain service providers, according to people familiar with the probe. "These matters raise questions about whether there was a breach of duty to shareholders," said Philip Khinda, an attorney who represents a number of fund boards that have been investigating their funds' arrangements with Bisys.

In its complaint against Bisys, the SEC described the actions of one fund company, which it referred to as "Adviser A," that allegedly demanded millions of dollars in kickbacks in return for recommending that Bisys's contract be renewed. Another 26 fund families had similar deals -- some written, and some only oral -- with the firm, the SEC said.

The agency didn't identify any of the fund companies in the complaint but, according to people familiar with the investigation, "Adviser A" is AmSouth Funds, which was then a unit of AmSouth Bancorp of Birmingham, Ala.

AmSouth Bancorp declined to comment on whether or not it is the company referred to as "Adviser A," but it said it is cooperating with the SEC.

In 2005, after the alleged arrangement with Bisys had ended, the AmSouth Funds, which then totaled $5.5 billion in assets, were sold to Pioneer Investments. A spokesman for Pioneer declined to comment.

The SEC's Bisys complaint says a senior executive at "Adviser A" told Bisys in 1999 that if it didn't agree to a kickback arrangement, one of its competitors would. Indeed, the SEC alleged in its complaint that "other administrators" besides Bisys cut such deals.

Bisys's main competitor is SEI Investments Co. A spokesman for SEI, which is based in Oaks, Pa., said that as a matter of policy the company wouldn't comment on whether it had received inquiries from the SEC nor on whether it had similar rebate agreements with fund companies.

Bisys accepted the deal with "Adviser A," and over the next five years, funds totaling $17.3 million were deducted from shareholder accounts at the fund company, according to the SEC. The money was used by "Adviser A" mainly to cover marketing costs that would normally come out of its own pocket. The adviser also used some of the money to pay the initiation fee and monthly dues at a country club, the SEC's complaint says.

In the arrangement with "Adviser A," Bisys would be paid 0.20% of fund's assets, the SEC said. However, Bisys kept only roughly one-quarter of that amount. About one-third was paid to "Adviser A" in an above-board contract, the SEC says, while the remainder was kicked back to the adviser through a "marketing budget."

In its settlement with the SEC, Bisys agreed to terminate such agreements and change its policies. It disciplined or fired a number of employees.

Last summer, AmSouth gave its own version of its dealings with Bisys. At the time, it disclosed that the SEC had informed the bank it intended to bring civil charges against it related to the service provider. It said that the probe related to "past arrangements under which Bisys used a portion of the fees paid to it by the fund family to pay for marketing and other expenses."

The mutual-fund industry has been dogged by scandals in recent years. In 2003, it came under fire after revelations that a number of big companies let favored clients conduct short-term trading, earning profits at the expense of ordinary shareholders. The following year, regulators cracked down on fund companies that used stock-trading commissions, which are deducted from shareholder accounts, to pay for marketing activities the companies would otherwise have had to cover themselves.

Write to Tom Lauricella at tom.lauricella@wsj.com1

NASD Fines James River CEO $2.25M For Alleged Improper Market Timing (LAW/AP)

By Marcy Gordon, The Associated Press

AP, October 26, 2006

Securities regulators have imposed a record $2.25 million fine on the chairman and CEO of hedge fund James River Capital Corp. for allegedly using deceptive practices in trading in the long-term investments known as variable annuities.

The National Association of Securities Dealers, the brokerage industry's self-policing organization, on Wednesday announced the civil penalty against Paul Saunders, a broker who is the chairman, CEO and majority owner of Richmond, Va.-based James River. Saunders neither admitted nor denied the NASD's allegations in agreeing to the settlement, under which he also will be suspended for 60 days from working as a broker.

The NASD said the $2.25 million penalty was the largest fine it has ever imposed on an individual for alleged improper market timing -- frequent "in-and-out" trading. It includes restitution of some $750,000 in illicit profits that Saunders allegedly personally made.

In June 2004, the organization fined the brokerage Davenport & Co. $450,000 and ordered it to pay some $288,000 in restitution for allegedly allowing James River and another hedge fund, TFS Capital, to engage in improper market timing in variable annuities. That was the first case against a brokerage for allowing clients to improperly engage in market timing of variable annuities, often described as mutual funds wrapped in an insurance policy. Federal and state securities regulators have brought a number of cases for improper market timing of mutual funds in recent years.

Market timing is not illegal but is widely restricted because it tends to skim profits from other shareholders.

James River is general partner and trading manager of the Jazzman Fund, a hedge fund set up specifically to engage in market timing, according to the NASD. After personally investing in Jazzman, Saunders through James River created 19 partnerships under Jazzman to better enable the hedge fund to engage in market timing of variable annuities, the NASD said.

While each Jazzman partnership appeared to be a separate entity, they all had common owners -- a fact that Saunders failed to disclose to the insurance companies that sold the variable annuities, the NASD said. The insurance companies place investors' money in special accounts that invest in mutual funds.

The NASD said that from October 2001 through September 2003, Saunders used the Jazzman partnerships to evade the insurers' attempts to block or restrict his market timing in those accounts. Saunders' deceptive techniques were said to have included opening 20 different accounts for the Jazzman partnerships at one brokerage firm and market timing in variable annuities accounts, sometimes simultaneously buying contracts and trading in the same annuity through several partnerships.

In recent years, the NASD has taken scores of disciplinary actions against brokers and investment firms for alleged abuses in sales of variable annuities, which are tax-deferred and a popular way to save for retirement. They are contracts between an investor and the company selling it in which the company agrees to make periodic payments to the investor, beginning immediately or at some future date. The payments to the annuity holder vary and are determined by the performance of the underlying investments.

Former AOL Execs Said Lied To Auditors (FINDLAW/AP)

By Brian Westley, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 26, 2006

(AP) - ALEXANDRIA, Va.-Two former America Online executives and top officials at a defunct Las Vegas software maker lied to auditors as part of a scheme to boost both companies' revenue as the dot-com boom fizzled in 2001, government lawyers argued Tuesday.

Kent Wakeford, former executive director at AOL's business affairs unit, and John Tuli, a former vice president in AOL's NetBusiness unit, are among the four defendants on trial at U.S. District Court in Alexandria.

The men, along with two former executives at PurchasePro, are charged with securities fraud, making false statements to auditors and wire fraud. The defendants deny wrongdoing.

In opening statements Tuesday, prosecutors alleged that PurchasePro gave AOL a stake in its company in 2000. In exchange, AOL helped sell PurchasePro's core product, a "marketplace license," which is software designed to facilitate business-to-business transactions.

But the licenses were a tough sell for AOL. The Dulles-based company was only able to convince companies to make a purchase by cutting secret side deals, including free online advertisements, Assistant U.S. Attorney Charles Connolly told jurors.

The executives engaged in various forms of deception to make it appear the licenses had been sold in the first quarter of 2001 so PurchasePro could meet its quarterly revenue goals and create the illusion of success to its shareholders, Connolly said.

"In short, it is a case about lies and cover-ups," Connolly said. "Much of the revenue was bogus because the products were given away for free."

In one instance, prosecutors claim a fax machine was tampered with so that deals made in April would appear with an earlier date.

"They were trying to stop the clock from ticking and the pages of the calendar from turning," Connolly said.

At the time the fraud is alleged to have occurred, PurchasePro's stock was in free fall, dropping from a high of about $160 a share in March 2000 to about $10 by April 2001, prosecutors said.

AOL, which was to earn a 50 percent commission for each license it sold, also felt pressure to sell more licenses to meet revenue goals.

The PurchasePro executives charged are Charles "Junior" Johnson, the company's former CEO; and Christopher Benyo, a former senior vice president of marketing.

The trial is expected to involve hundreds of intricate financial transactions and could last up to two months. Six other former PurchasePro executives, including the co-founder, have previously pleaded guilty and could testify during the trial.

One by one Tuesday, defense attorneys for the former executives delivered their opening statements, refuting the government's charges.

"There is so much to disagree with, I don't even know where to begin," said Tuli's lawyer, Mark Hulkower. He said that the deals in question are complicated and cannot always be easily judged by outsiders.

DOJ_NMG_0086748

Johnson's attorney, Preston Burton, said his client was being made a scapegoat by others within PurchasePro, who resented Johnson because he would not permit them to sell their stock after the company went public in 1999, resulting in the loss of millions of dollars.

"He rode the Internet bubble all the way up ... and he rode it all the way down," Burton said of Johnson, a high-profile businessman who counts casino mogul Steve Wynn among his friends.

Wakeford's lawyer, Henry Asbill, said prosecutors also were making his client a fall guy for decisions that were made by high-level executives.

Asbill said that more than 80 people with a title of manager or higher at AOL worked on the PurchasePro deal, and that Wakeford spent less than 5 percent of his working time on it.

"He was a junior executive," Asbill said of Wakeford. "Ask yourself why the real AOL insiders are not here."

Jurors also heard testimony Tuesday from the government's first witness, Bigstep.com founder Andrew Beebe, who said AOL persuaded him to buy a PurchasePro license for $1.1 million in early 2001 - even though AOL had already given Bigstep a license for free.

Beebe said he agreed to buy the license only because AOL and PurchasePro agreed to provide $2.8 million in reciprocal deals.

"We had no interest at all in a second license," Beebe said. "we were still waiting for someone to tell us what to do with the first one."

Associated Press Writer Matthew Barakat contributed to this story.

Austria Charges Nine In Probe Of Refco-Bawag Ties (WSJ)

By David Crawford And Carrick Mollenkamp

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

Prosecutors in Vienna have charged nine men, including the former chief executive officer of Bawag PSK, on charges ranging from embezzlement to fraud amid an Austrian probe into ties between U.S. commodity brokerage Refco Inc. and the Vienna bank.

Among those charged was the former CEO of Bawag, Helmut Elsner, and Wolfgang Flöttl, who traded on behalf of Bawag from New York and is the son of another former Bawag CEO, Walter Flöttl. Robert Reiter, a former auditor at KPMG Alpen-Treuhand GmbH, which oversaw Bawag's books, also was charged. In the indictment, which was made public yesterday in Vienna, prosecutors allege the nine men "intentionally abused their positions of trust at Bawag" and engaged in transactions that cost the bank €1.44 billion ($1.81 billion).

The charges come a year after Refco, a large New York broker of commodities and other securities that catered to corporations, government agencies and hedge funds, disclosed that then-CEO Phillip R. Bennett had used a scheme to hide bad debt from Refco investors. Refco investors and U.S. prosecutors allege the scheme included Bawag, which sought to hide its own bad debt that largely was a result of Wolfgang Flöttl's trading losses.

Mr. Bennett has been charged1 with conspiracy, securities fraud, wire fraud and making false filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission. He pleaded not guilty to the charges yesterday in a U.S. district court in Manhattan. His lawyer, David Frankel, declined comment on the charges in Austria and said Mr. Bennett continues to deny any wrongdoing.

After the October 2005 disclosure, Refco fell into bankruptcy proceedings and investigators in the U.S. and Austria launched investigations. Refco's former chief financial officer, Robert Trosten, yesterday pleaded not guilty in New York for his role in the alleged scheme. Mr. Trosten was charged with conspiracy, securities fraud and two counts of wire fraud.

In Vienna, prosecutors allege that Mr. Elsner hired Wolfgang Flöttl to trade in currency markets. Initially, the trading was successful but ultimately led to massive losses. Wolfgang Flöttl handled much of the trading in the New York area, while at the same time establishing himself as a benefactor of New York arts and charities.

Austrian prosecutors allege that Mr. Elsner then used a complex coverup with the assistance of Wolfgang Flöttl, senior Bawag officials, the chairman of the Bawag supervisory board and a former senior KPMG auditor, Mr. Reiter. Mr. Elsner is charged with embezzlement and fraud, according to the indictment. Wolfgang Flöttl, Mr. Reiter and the other Bawag officials are charged with embezzlement, according to the indictment.

Vienna prosecution spokesman Gerhard Jarosch said the charges have been filed with an investigatory magistrate, who may approve the indictment for presentation to the accused, under Austrian legal procedure. Lawyers for the defendants will then have 14 days to accept the charges leading to a trial, to ask for an amendment of the charges, or to contest the charges in their entirety. An appeal of the charges could postpone a trial for an additional four weeks to six weeks, the prosecution spokesman said.

DOJ_NMG_0086749

If convicted, the accused could be sentenced to between one year and 10 years in prison.

Wolfgang Schubert, a lawyer for Mr. Elsner, said his client is innocent. Mr. Elsner, who has been in France for the past several months, earlier had been told by Austrian authorities to return to Austria to face questions in the probe. His lawyer is fighting that request.

A lawyer for Wolfgang Flöttl declined to comment and a person in Mr. Flöttl's office said he wasn't available for comment.

A Bawag spokesman said the bank is cooperating with investigators.

A spokeswoman for KPMG Austria GmbH, the parent of the unit where Mr. Reiter worked, said Mr. Reiter, the former auditor, has left the firm and KPMG is cooperating with investigators. Mr. Reiter said he hadn't yet seen the indictment and declined to comment.

Martin Wagner, a senior partner at KPMG Austria GmbH, said KPMG believes Mr. Reiter is innocent.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Pre-Vote Leaks Rankle GOP (RC)

By John Bresnahan, Roll Call Staff

Roll Call, October 26, 2006

For House Republicans, it seems that every week brings a new report about a GOP lawmaker under investigation by the Justice Department for alleged corruption. And with the elections just 12 days away, Republicans are crying foul, complaining bitterly that the negative press spurred by the public disclosure of those criminal probes could help cost them their House majority.

Within just the past two weeks, Reps. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.) and Rick Renzi (R-Ariz.) have faced unwanted headlines blaring the fact that they are under scrutiny by federal prosecutors and the FBI. Both lawmakers have publicly denied any wrongdoing, but Weldon, who was already mired in a tough re-election campaign, has had to deal with the added problem of FBI raids on his daughter's home, as well as the office of a longtime political ally. Federal agents also searched the Florida offices of a Russian energy company that did business with Karen Weldon's lobbying firm.

Renzi is being probed by the U.S. attorney's office in Phoenix for involvement in an Oct. 2005 land sale that helped net his former business partner more than $4 million, according to The Associated Press. The New York Times also reported that DOJ officials are looking into a 2003 bill Renzi introduced that indirectly benefited the company where his father worked.

While a Justice Department run by Republican appointees who were nominated by a conservative Republican president would normally get the benefit of the doubt from GOP lawmakers and staffers, some party insiders are privately wondering whether "rogue elements" within the department — and more specifically the Public Integrity Unit, where corruption cases are handled — are trying to tip the election to Democrats by leaking news of these investigations so late in the cycle.

"It would seem that the Public Integrity Unit of the Justice Department is running wild," maintained a top Republican political operative, who would only speak on the condition of anonymity. "They're trying to have some effect" on the midterm elections.

A House GOP leadership aide suggested that "rogue elements" within DOJ's bureaucracy are "working for a Democratic victory" on Nov. 7.

"Of course, we all want to root out corruption at all levels of government," said the aide, who said he was "afraid to speak publicly" since it may spur more leaks about Republican lawmakers. "At the same time, when word of Congressional investigations are continually thrown out in the media late in the cycle, then it smacks of a campaign against Republicans."

Another senior GOP staffer speculated that it was "residual anger" from Speaker Dennis Hastert's (R-Ill.) public criticism of the June 20 FBI raid on Rep. William Jefferson's (D-La.) office that is feeding the "campaign" against House Republicans.

"I think there are people within the Justice Department who are angry with Hastert and the [GOP] leadership" over the Congressional response to the Jefferson raid. "This is all payback, that's all."

This source also pointed to the fact that "someone in the Justice Department or FBI" leaked a story to ABC News shortly after Hastert criticized the Jefferson search suggesting that Hastert himself was under investigation by the Justice Department. DOJ officials quickly released a statement calling the ABC story wrong.

Democrats have not escaped unscathed from the recent Justice Department revelations, although the political fallout for the minority party has been much less severe, at least so far.

In addition to Jefferson's situation, Time magazine reported this week that Rep. Jane Harman (D-Calif.), ranking member of the House Intelligence Committee, urged officials from the American Israel Public Affairs Committee to lobby House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) last year to allow Harman to retain the top Democratic spot on the panel. The FBI began an investigation into whether Harman promised AIPAC she would help the group deal with its own Justice Department investigation. Both Harman and AIPAC deny the allegation and the investigation appears to have stalled out months ago.

But with the revelations seeming to hit a new Republican target almost weekly, senior Justice Department officials suddenly have found themselves barraged with questions about the leaks, although they strongly deny any suggestion that the department is meddling in political contests.

"What I can say with great confidence is that the men and women in the Department of Justice and all of its investigative agencies do not take political considerations into play when it comes to discharging their duty," said Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty at a news conference last week.

"And that's the way we run this department and the way we always will run the department. But beyond that, I'm not going to talk about the timing of anything happening."

Bryan Sierra, a spokesman for the Justice Department, declined to comment about any of the specific cases related to recent developments with Weldon, Harman or Renzi, but noted that traditionally the department and investigative agents are supposed to halt overt, public actions when an election is approaching.

"Particularly close to an election, of course there's a concern about leaks," Sierra said.

When a competitive campaign involves a potential target close to Election Day, Sierra said, "It is unlikely that you will see a flurry of public activity related to a criminal investigation."

"We specifically do not want to give the appearance of getting involved in the political process," Sierra added.

Sierra also cautioned that sometimes leaks or revelations about probes aren't accurate, and that many times they don't mean any new path or direction has taken hold among DOJ officials, but merely that some ongoing, previously unknown investigation has broken into the public domain.

"The fact that they're happening close to an election doesn't necessarily alter the criminal investigation," Sierra said.

But even Republicans who have served in the Justice Department under President Bush admit that the spate of recent news stories regarding federal corruption probes of sitting GOP lawmakers disturbs them, particularly this close to an election.

"It's a huge problem for the department because it casts an unsavory light on all the investigations," said Mark Corallo, who served as public affairs director at Justice from 2002 to 2005. "I have heard lots of complaints from Republicans about what is going on. It's natural for people to be suspicious."

Combating the allegations of widespread corruption within the party also is costing the GOP gobs of money needed elsewhere to defend its majority.

As of this week, the National Republican Congressional Committee had spent more than $16 million to defend nine seats either now held, or recently held, by GOP incumbents faced with legal or ethical problems, according to a Roll Call survey of the committee's independent expenditures. These include Weldon's race, as well as the special election won by now-Rep. Brian Bilbray (R-Calif.) for the seat held by former Rep. Duke Cunningham (R), who went to jail earlier this year after pleading guilty to bribery, fraud and tax evasion charges.

The corruption charges are appearing at a particularly bad juncture for Hastert and other GOP leaders, as they have been battered by allegations that they covered up or deliberately ignored warnings that former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) was acting inappropriately in his dealings with male Congressional pages. Foley resigned from Congress on Sept. 29, and Hastert, Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), and National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.) all testified before the House ethics committee on the scandal this week, bringing more negative news coverage.

Weldon, for his part, initially blamed a "liberal conspiracy," pointing in particular to the watchdog group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, with somehow being behind the Justice Department investigation. CREW dismissed Weldon's allegation as ridiculous.

The Pennsylvania Republican is now trumpeting a column written by conservative activist Paul Weyrich. Weyrich argued that Weldon has angered "the Establishment" by publicly pushing the theory that the Pentagon could have stopped the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, but failed to do so, a claim that has been vehemently denied by Defense Department officials. Weldon's campaign posted Weyrich's article on its Web site on Wednesday.

"I think certain forces do not want to see Weldon as Chairman or Ranking Minority Member of the [House Armed Services] Committee," Weyrich wrote. Weyrich acknowledged in the article that he did not know whether Weldon had broken any laws in his dealings with his daughter's firm but added "I do not believe in most conspiracy theories.

However, perhaps we have a conspiracy here."

Renzi and his attorney, former Arizona Attorney General Grant Woods, have denied any knowledge of a federal investigation of the lawmaker while also asserting that he did nothing improper or unethical.

Paul Kane and Lauren W. Whittington contributed to this report.

DOJ_NMG_0086751

Jurisdictional Issues Dog Member Probes (RC)

By Paul Kane And John Bresnahan, Roll Call Staff

Roll Call, October 26, 2006

The Justice Department has employed a sprawling lineup of investigators and prosecutors to conduct its ever-expanding roster of Congressional investigations, and in the process created a patchwork of probes across the nation.

With at least 17 Members of the 109th Congress coming under federal investigation, Justice has used a pair of offices in its Washington, D.C., headquarters to conduct probes while at the same time coordinating with the offices of at least seven U.S. attorneys and roughly as many FBI offices to serve as ground troops for the inquiries.

Aides at Justice, along with other experts and former prosecutors, said the process of sorting out which offices lead investigations and prosecutions can be a sometimes messy division of labor that focuses on questions of jurisdiction and resources.

"There's no cookie-cutter approach to it," said Bryan Sierra, spokesman for the Justice Department.

"There is not any one protocol on who does what — it was designed to be handled on a case-by-case basis," said Dick Thornburgh, who served as attorney general from 1988 to 1991.

That case-by-case process has led to at least a quartet of Members being investigated the past two years by Justice's Public Integrity Unit, while another half-dozen Members have come under the prosecutorial glare of U.S. attorneys, almost always their local federal prosecutor.

While the Congressional corruption cases are some of the most sensitive for any prosecutor, they also bring with them the kind of big headlines that can make a prosecutor's career. And some U.S. attorneys have been known to employ sharp elbows when competing with other federal prosecutors to lead a probe, initially flooding a case with their agents to demonstrate they've done the most work and stake claim to a case.

Sierra said jurisdiction is the most important aspect in determining which office will initially handle a case, leading to U.S. attorneys taking the lead when it involves circumstances such as a Member and a local contributor or contractor seeking favors. That was the case with ex-Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.), now serving a 100-month prison term for orchestrating the largest bribery scheme ever perpetrated by a single Member of Congress.

The Cunningham case was led by the U.S. attorney's office for Southern California, based in San Diego, a natural base of operations since the main portion of his more than $2.4 million in bribes involved the sale of one home and the purchase of another in the San Diego area, orchestrated by a defense contractor and his co-conspirators.

An offshoot of the Cunningham investigation has been the probe into House Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.) and his ties to defense contractors and municipalities in and around his district to the north of Cunningham's former seat, which is now being led the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles. While the probe is examining Lewis' ties to lobbyist and former Rep. Bill Lowery and earmarks from Defense spending bills, the money has predominantly flowed into the suburban Los Angeles area near Lewis' district.

These are cases of U.S. attorneys taking the lead because the prosecutors and local FBI agents are closest to "where the crime took place," Sierra said.

But sometimes officials in Washington will have to step in because of conflicts of interest regarding a U.S. attorney's office and the Member of Congress under the microscope.

Recently, for example, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) has come under investigation for appropriations earmarks he steered to municipalities and entities which were clients of a lobbyist whose spouse, Vicki Siegel, was a top appropriations staffer for Specter. Some of those clients of Siegel's husband are in Philadelphia, but the investigation has so far not involved U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan, the top federal prosecutor in the city of Brotherly Love.

Meehan was a longtime counsel on Specter's Senate staff and won his spot as a U.S. attorney in 2001 largely because of Specter's patronage.

Instead, the review of Specter's appropriations work has been handled by the FBI's Washington Field Office, agents who actually work in a Falls Church, Va., office.

Public Integrity — a unit based in Justice's Washington headquarters with less than 30 attorneys — is running an investigation in Alaska into Veco, an energy services company that paid more than $250,000 to state Sen. Ben Stevens (R) for consulting services in recent years. The son of powerful Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), Ben Stevens had his legislative offices raided Aug. 31 as part of the Veco probe.

Nelson Cohen, the new U.S. attorney for Alaska, has been recused from that case along with many other prosecutors in that office. Instead, Sierra said, a few prosecutors there are working with local FBI agents and Public Integrity prosecutors handling the case. Sierra declined to explain why Cohen was recused.

Unlike other U.S. attorneys, who often rely on home-state Senators for their appointments, Cohen was appointed top federal prosecutor in Alaska in late August over the objections of Ted Stevens, who had been publicly pleading for an Alaska native to get the post. Cohen came to the job from being assistant U.S. attorney in Western Pennsylvania.

Recusals, for whatever reason, aren't always limited to political corruption cases. In the Enron investigation, the entire U.S. attorney's office in Houston was walled off from the case because so many prosecutors had ties to the energy giant, whether through their past employment at firms that represented Enron or through family members working for the company.

Joe Whitley, who oversaw the Criminal Division at Justice during the late 1980s, said sometimes the level of experience and resources in U.S. attorneys' offices can lead to cases being centralized in Washington.

"You are looking at the experience level of the offices involved," Whitely said, especially whether prosecutors in a particular U.S. attorney's office have ever successfully tried a corruption case involving a high-profile politician.

Public Integrity also has run the most prominent Congressional corruption investigation in recent years, the ongoing probe of felon-lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Sierra acknowledged that Public Integrity is in charge of that case because a large portion of the alleged crimes — including the giving of bribes in the form of meals and drinks at Abramoff's restaurants, tickets in his suites to sporting events, private jets to exotic vacations and legislative provisions in return — occurred in Washington.

Some investigations are based out of Washington, D.C., simply because that's where the cases originate, according to officials. Recently, Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.) was confirmed to be under federal investigation for his daughter's role in lobbying and consulting for Eastern European companies, which was immediately followed by a public raid on her suburban Philadelphia home and office.

All indications are that the Weldon probe was hatched by Justice and is being run by Public Integrity, not Meehan's prosecutors in Philadelphia.

Other corruption cases are run by federal prosecutors whose roles simply aren't clear. Such is the case with Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.), whose home and Congressional offices have been raided at various points by FBI officials conducting a long-running investigation into his ties with companies looking to do business in Africa.

The Jefferson probe has been overseen by the U.S. attorney's office in Eastern Virginia, based in Alexandria, not by Public Integrity or by local federal prosecutors in Jefferson's hometown of New Orleans. Some of the alleged crimes in the Jefferson probe have occurred in Virginia, such as the FBI raid on his Virginia home uncovering $90,000 in alleged bribe money in his freezer.

Sierra declined to say why prosecutors in Alexandria — long considered a more hospitable climate for jury trials involving federal officials than the District — are running this probe, saying to explain that rationale might reveal some of the investigation's details.

"The Congressman has not been charged yet," Sierra said. "Not all of the facts of that investigation are publicly known."

Rights Group Fires Publisher Of Foley E-Mail (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 25 — A liberal gay rights group said Wednesday that one of its employees, acting anonymously, had created the Web site that first published copies of unusually solicitous e-mail messages to teenagers from former Representative Mark Foley, which led to his resignation.

A spokesman for the group, the Human Rights Campaign, said it first learned of its employee's role this week and immediately fired him for misusing the group's resources. The scandal surrounding Mr. Foley, a Florida Republican, has been a burdensome distraction for members of his party in the month before the midterm elections, and some Republicans have speculated that the e-mail messages were planted by a Democrat.

The rights campaign's spokesman, David Smith, said the employee, whose name he declined to disclose, was a junior staff member hired last month to help mobilize the organization's members in Michigan. "The minute we learned about it we took decisive action," Mr. Smith said.

The Miami Herald and other news organizations have acknowledged obtaining copies of the same e-mail messages months ago but declining to publish them because of their potentially ambiguous contents.

After the messages appeared on the Web, at stopsexpredators.blogspot.com, the Web site of ABC News followed with its own independent report. The ABC News report resulted in the disclosure of more sexually explicit electronic messages that Mr. Foley sent to other former Congressional pages.

In the aftermath of the scandal, the creator of the sex predators Web site declined requests sent by e-mail to identify himself. Instead, he posted a message urging the news media to ask questions about "when the Republican leadership knew about it, what they did, how they were connected, what favors took place, etc."

DOJ_NMG_0086753

The posting continued: “The true hero here is the page who reported the e-mails in the first place.”

Hastert Aide Goes Before Ethics Panel (AP-Y)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, October 26, 2006

An aide to House Speaker Dennis Hastert on Wednesday went before ethics investigators in private to explain how the office handled complaints about former Rep. Mark Foley's behavior toward former pages.

Ted Van Der Meid, who oversaw the page program for Hastert, R-Ill., appears to be one of the last witnesses. The House ethics panel is investigating whether lawmakers and staff aides acted properly when learning of Foley's too-friendly messages to ex-pages and other possible inappropriate behavior.

The panel is in its third week of hearing testimony and seems unlikely to complete its probe before the Nov. 7 elections.

Van Der Meid was a central figure in the handling of a complaint last fall from a former page from Louisiana. Hastert's office was alerted to the "over friendly" e-mails and dispatched then-Clerk of the House Jeff Trandahl and Rep. John Shimkus, R-Ill., to confront Foley, R-Fla.

Former top Foley aide Kirk Fordham has told the committee that Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, knew of earlier incidents involving Foley.

Foley abruptly resigned Sept. 29 after being confronted with sexually explicit e-mails sent in 2003 to a former page from Oklahoma.

No lawmaker has acknowledged knowing of sexually graphic e-mails. They surfaced only after news broke that Foley last fall had sent a too-friendly message to the former Louisiana page. But a small group of lawmakers and top GOP staff aides have known for years of inappropriate messages and rumors of bad behavior by Foley toward pages.

Rather than investigating Foley, the four-member investigative panel is trying to determine who knew about his behavior toward pages and whether more should have been done to stop it.

Trandahl was appointed to the clerk's post — with responsibility over the page program a prominent responsibility — and was in frequent contact with Hastert's office.

A key question for investigators is who else knew about Foley. Fordham's account has been disputed by Palmer, but Trandahl reportedly has backed up Fordham's story.

The panel may want to know what Van Der Meid knew about earlier incidents regarding Foley.

For example, the panel has been asked to look into rumors that several years ago Foley tried to enter the page dorm while drunk, an incident that Fordham has testified about.

Trandahl and Rep. Jim Kolbe, R-Ariz., learned in 2001 or 2002 of an episode in which Foley sent an ex-page inappropriate e-mails.

In those instances, Foley's inappropriate behavior with former pages have been handled by a few staff aides and lawmakers, rather than being investigated more fully. Foley's misbehavior did not cease.

The panel heard Tuesday from Hastert, who urged it to wrap up its investigation quickly. He said he answered questions to the best of his ability, but his recollection differs from other GOP leaders.

Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, and House GOP campaign chairman Tom Reynolds of New York have said they discussed with Hastert the "over friendly" e-mails from Foley to the Louisiana teen; the speaker says he does not recall the conversations.

Separately, Foley's attorney's revealed Wednesday that he is being treated for alcoholism at a facility in Tucson, Ariz. Foley has been in a 30-day treatment program at the Sierra Tucson treatment center since Oct. 1.

Second Man Accuses Former Priest Who Abused Foley (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

MIAMI, Oct. 25 -- Another former altar boy says he was sexually abused in the 1970s by the same retired Catholic priest who acknowledged fondling former congressman Mark Foley when Foley was a teenager, the man's attorney said Wednesday.

The new allegations against Anthony Mercieca were made by a man who lived in North Miami and was an altar boy at St. James Catholic Church, where Mercieca worked, attorney Jeffrey Herman said.

Herman said he plans to file a lawsuit against the Archdiocese of Miami. His client, now 40 and identified in the lawsuit only as John Doe No. 26, says Mercieca abused him when he was about 12 years old.

"He had been thinking about it before Foley came forward, and then when Foley came out and the church encouraged other victims to come forward, he decided to come forward," Herman said.

DOJ_NMG_0086754

The man said "all of my nightmares came back" when Mercieca's picture appeared on the news last week amid Foley's allegations that the priest had molested him.

Foley (R-Fla.) resigned amid accusations that he sent sexually explicit electronic messages to teenage boys who had worked as pages on Capitol Hill.

Mercieca, 69, now lives on the Maltese island of Gozo in the Mediterranean. No one answered the phone at his home.

Archdiocese spokeswoman Mary Ross Agosta said: "Any of this type of behavior by Father Mercieca was unknown to the archdiocese and we had absolutely no information to indicate that the father did or would engage in any type of inappropriate or abusive behavior."

Washington Wire (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

Taxpayer-subsidized Amtrak — which faces calls to sharply reduce its long-distance train service — has been careless in managing law firms that have billed it millions in legal fees, according to a report released Wednesday by federal investigators.

The report, issued jointly by Amtrak's Office of Inspector General and the U.S. Department of Transportation Inspector General, said that the law department of the passenger railroad, for example, failed consistently to request and manage budgets for legal work. Also, law firms engaged in "block billing," in which firms lump tasks under one entry of an invoice rather than showing the costs of each task. The practice is prohibited by Amtrak's billing guidelines, the report says. "About 30% of the billings were block billed, which is actually not allowed," says U.S. Rep. John Mica (R., Fla.), a member of the House Committee on Transportation and Infrastructure who requested the probe.

From 2002 to 2005, according to the report, Amtrak paid more than $100 million in legal fees — $40 million of which went to 10 firms, which are listed in the report. In response, the chairman of Amtrak's board, David Laney, said Amtrak reduced annual legal fees by 26%, or $8 million, since 2003, and in the past five years, working with outside law firms, recovered $79 million in cash from legal settlements. Read the full article, download the report or see the full list of lawyers at Law Blog. – Nathan Koppel and Ashby Jones

Read more: Global, Domestic Policy

Permalink | Comments | Trackbacks

October 25, 2006, 6:58 pm Police Chiefs Push for Federal Money

Facing a rise in murders, drug shootings and armed robberies, more than a dozen police chiefs met senior White House officials on Wednesday to argue that there's a national epidemic of violent crime and they need federal money to fight it.

The 15 police chiefs said that during the 90-minute meeting with Rob Portman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, and several members of President Bush's domestic policy team, they stressed that they needed flexibility in funding to fight both terrorists and criminals, and that each community faced different risks.

"We didn't want them to think so much about homeland security that they forget about hometown security," said Atlanta Chief Richard J. Pennington. "I think they got the message."

The meeting comes two weeks ahead of the midterm elections, and the police chiefs said the rise in crime was becoming a political issue in some communities.

White House officials say they are well aware of a spike in violent crime statistics over the last year and are already been considering programs to fight the trade in methamphetamine, which is fueling the crime rise in some cities like Las Vegas. But the violence varies from city to city: Chicago and Miami haven't had increases; in Boston, homicides have hit a 10-year high and in Cincinnati a 20-year high, according to local crime statistics analyzed by the Police Executive Research Forum, or PERF, a think tank and police lobby group.

"We discussed crime rates, the counter-intuitive fact that as federal funding has declined so have crime rates, and the current situation of historically low crime rates combined with spikes of violent crimes in selected cities. It's the kind of discussion that is valuable to have with those whose job is to put policy into action," said OMB spokesman Scott Milburn.

The White House said it would continue the discussions and would work with PERF to look for ways to address police concerns.

"We left the meeting hopeful that number they recognize the problems and number two they want to do something about it," said Chuck Wexler, the executive director of the group. – Robert Block

Read more: Global, Budget, Spending and Taxes, Domestic Policy

Permalink | Comments | Trackbacks

October 25, 2006, 6:53 pm VoteVets Makes Ad Buys

DOJ_NMG_0086755

Democratic-leaning special interest group VoteVets, which was behind a dramatic body armor ad used to some effect in several Senate races, has now made ad buys in four House districts to complain that the Republican incumbents haven't done enough for Iraq war veterans.

The new ad features Tomas Young, an Iraq war veteran and anti-war activist who was paralyzed from the waist down in Baghdad. Young has been an outspoken activist, particularly for veterans rights, and in this ad, he takes lawmakers, including Minnesota Republican Rep. Gil Gutknecht, to task for voting a pay raise for themselves but not increasing health-care benefits for veterans.

According to Daily Kos, a similar version of the ad will also run until Election Day in the districts of Republican congressmen John Doolittle in California, Jon Porter of Nevada and John Sweeney in New York. The ad hasn't shown up yet on the group's Web site yet. –Amy Schatz

Read more: Global, Campaign 2006, Congress, Foreign Policy

Permalink | Comments | Trackbacks

October 25, 2006, 4:56 pm Oh, That Editorial

The Early Bird, the Pentagon's clipping service of all news military, carried an odd item today: A letter to the New York Times (which the newspaper hasn't published) about a Times editorial Tuesday that called for Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's firing.

Unlike the unpublished letter, the Early Bird chose not to carry the published editorial in its clippings. The letter, signed by Dorrance Smith, assistant secretary of defense for public affairs, gives the drift: "Today's editorial claims: 'There have never been enough troops, the result of Mr. Rumsfeld's negligent decision to use Iraq as a proving ground for his pet military theories, rather than listen to his generals.' Whether or not the Times believes there were enough troops in Iraq, the claim that any troop level in Iraq is the result of Secretary Rumsfeld 'not listening to his generals' is demonstrably untrue." It goes on to list what a number of generals have had to say on the matter.

That got us pondering the Early Bird's mission statement: "… daily compilations of published articles and commentary concerning significant defense and defense-related national security issues. The publications aim to represent how the public, Congress and the press see military and defense programs and issues. They are internal management tools intended to serve the informational needs of senior DoD officials in the continuing assessment of defense policies, programs and actions…" –Greg Jaffe

Read more: Foreign Policy, Iraq, White House

Permalink | Comments | Trackbacks

October 25, 2006, 4:39 pm Adjusting, Flexible, Changing, Dynamic Iraq Tactics

Eager to show that he's not simply staying the course on Iraq, President Bush used some variant of "flexible" five times, "adjust" six times, and "change" no fewer than 18 times in his hour-long news conference in the ceremonial East Room this morning. "This war, and other wars, they're not static. They're dynamic events," Bush said. "And we must adjust to meet those events, and we are." He also insisted that the U.S. and its allies are winning on a number of scores.

Bush

Democrats quickly rebutted his claims. "The White House may be changing its rhetoric about staying the course…but the policies are the same," said Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, in a conference call with reporters. Although the White House has been trying to avoid the phrase "stay the course" for months, Democrats in recent days have sought to pin the label on the administration, as a way of reinforcing voter impressions of a quagmire in Iraq. The advocacy group Americans United announced it will run a TV ad campaign entitled "Change the Course," aimed at three Republican incumbents.

Bush's news conference was aimed at easing voter dissatisfaction with the war less than two weeks before the Nov. 7 election. It came a day after U.S. officials in Iraq laid out timetables for political progress and predicted that Iraqi troops would be able to take over most of the war effort in a year to 18 months. Wednesday's event also gave Bush a chance to repeat in blunt terms what he views as the rising stakes in the Middle East if the U.S. abandons oil-rich Iraq to its enemies. "It's a serious business," he said.

At other times, he playfully chided pundits who've awarded the election to Democrats, and suggested that Democrats themselves are "dancing in the end zone" and "measuring their drapes" in Capitol offices prematurely.

"See you on the campaign trail," he said as he finished up. –John D. McKinnon

Video: Bush press conference | Transcript

Read more: Global, Foreign Policy, White House

Permalink | Comments (1) | Trackbacks

October 25, 2006, 4:26 pm How Should We Put This?

DOJ_NMG_0086756

The Federal Reserve's meeting this week was a two-day affair, lengthened from the originally planned one day so that the 18 members of the Federal Open Market Committee (one seat is vacant) could discuss how to improve their communications with the outside world. Carl Tannenbaum, chief economist at LaSalle Bank, cracked that if the policy statement released after the meeting – which was almost identical to September's - is any indication, the early signs are not encouraging. "After a half day to talk about communications, we got a statement that inserted one clause and removed another. This evolution in communications is definitely a slow process."

In truth, the Fed is unlikely to announce a shift in communications strategy in its policy statement. Minutes to the meeting, to be released Nov. 15, should shed more light on what was discussed this week. But it appears Fed officials are months away from announcing any substantive change to current practices. –Greg Ip

Parsing the Fed: How the October, September Fed statements differed

Fed Keeps Interest Rates Unchanged

Read more: Economy

Permalink | Comments (1) | Trackbacks

October 25, 2006, 2:07 pm Eligibility at Issue in Md. Attorney General Race

The candidates for attorney general in Maryland are practicing their legal moves.

A lawsuit filed last week by a state resident, who is represented by none other than Republican candidate Scott Rolle's campaign manager, challenges Democrat Doug Gansler's qualifications to appear on the ballot. The lawsuit argues that Gansler, the Montgomery County state's attorney, hasn't practiced law in Maryland for the required 10 years. In Anne Arundel County Circuit Court today, a morning hearing on the case was still in progress in the middle of the afternoon.

In an article in the Baltimore Sun about a Gansler-Rolle debate on Maryland Public Television last night, Gansler was quoted calling the lawsuit a "frivolous, silly, desperate" complaint lodged because Rolle "is 30 points behind in the polls." The Sun reported that after the debate, Rolle was asked whether he supports the lawsuit. "I am not condoning it," he said, then quickly added, "It is a legitimate issue."

The same issue doomed the attorney general aspirations of Democrat Thomas Perez in the September primary. –Mary Lu Carnevale

Read more: Campaign 2006

Permalink | Comments | Trackbacks

October 25, 2006, 12:08 pm A Ways to Go

Just how long might the U.S. be in Iraq?

President Bush, at today's news conference, wouldn't answer directly. "You can't leave until the job is done," he said. "Our mission is to get the job done as quickly as possible."

But his response to a question about whether the U.S. wants to maintain permanent bases in Iraq indicated it could be years.

"Any decisions about permanency in Iraq will be made by the Iraqi government," Bush began. "And, frankly, it's not in much of a position to be thinking about what the world's going to look like five or 10 years from now. They are working to make sure that we succeed in the short term. And they need our help. And that's where our focus is.

"But remember, when you're talking about bases and troops, we're dealing with a sovereign government. Now, we entered into an agreement with the Karzai government [in Afghanistan]. They weren't called permanent bases, but they were called arrangements that will help this government understand that there will be a U.S. presence so long as they want them there. And at the appropriate time, I'm confident we'll be willing to sit down and discuss, you know, the long-term security of Iraq. But right now we're discussing how to bring security to Baghdad and what do we do in al-Anbar Province, where al Qaeda still uses violent methods to achieve political objectives." –Mary Lu Carnevale

Video: Bush press conference | Transcript

Read more: Global, White House

Permalink | Comments (34) | Trackbacks

October 25, 2006, 11:08 am Get Ready, Catholic Church Tells Immigrants

The Catholic Church is advising illegal immigrants to get ready for the day they're allowed to file for legal residency. "It may take a long time" for any legalization proposal to pass into law, notes the Catholic Legal Immigration Network Inc., a project of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops. But illegal immigrants should nevertheless start assembling the documentation they'll need to support their petition for legal status, it adds.

Among other things, the church's online posting at www.cliniclegal.org, advises illegal immigrants to get involved in their children's schools and in community and volunteer organizations, to enlist with their draft board and to pay income taxes. Those moves "can prove good moral character," a possible requirement of a legalization process, it says.

It also advises illegal immigrants to assemble documents that prove when and how they arrived in the U.S.—important evidence if Congress decides to legalize only those immigrants who arrived before a certain date. The church suggests collecting pay stubs, apartment leases, medical records, auto registrations, utility bills and postmarked letters addressed to them since their arrival.

It advises against being too bold about seeking official government identification, though. An illegal immigrant faces the risk of deportation "if s/he comes to the attention of the U.S. government," it says.

The House and Senate passed starkly different immigration bills this year, but neither bill one has any likelihood of passing into law this year. That means that both houses will have to introduce new bills when a new Congress is seated in January.

The House and Senate passed starkly different immigration bills this year, but neither bill one has any likelihood of passing into law this year. That means that both houses will have to introduce new bills when a new Congress is seated in January. Although President Bush has promoted pro-immigrant legislation, a bill would face better chances of passage if electoral gains next month give Democrats control of the House, where Republicans now lead a vocal anti-immigrant caucus. –June Kronholz

Read more: Global

Permalink | Comments | Trackbacks

October 25, 2006, 8:31 am Politicians Grow Wary of Survey

Project Vote Smart is being undermined by the same negative forces it's trying to combat. Working out of a former dude ranch in Montana, Vote Smart runs a Web site and a toll-free number that tracks more than 10,000 candidates running for federal and state offices. Along with gathering voluminous data on voting records, speeches and endorsements, the nonprofit conducts an exhaustive survey of the candidates' positions on issues ranging from abortion to welfare.

For years, the survey was catching on with incumbents and challengers alike. But lately, the number of candidates taking the survey has dropped dramatically. The reason: Many are afraid their opponents will use the information against them in attack ads. "We tell our candidates not to do it," says Rep. Anne Gannon, the Democratic leader pro tempore of the Florida House of Representatives. "It sets them up for a hit piece." Read the full article. – Peter Grant

Read more: Global, Campaign 2006

Permalink | Comments (1) | Trackbacks (1)

October 25, 2006, 8:30 am Danger Signals From Voters Amid Prosperity

There's something unnerving about watching an anti-incumbent tidal wave roll in at a time when the economy, by most macro measures, is cruising. The big economic bugaboos of earlier this year — rising interest rates and soaring oil prices — have both eased off. Even the Dow Jones Industrial Average is hitting historic highs. Yet a majority of voters who responded to last week's Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll say they disapprove of President Bush's handling of the economy.

Still, the economic backdrop for election 2006 should raise a warning flag about the future. Large numbers of Americans seem to have lost their belief in John F. Kennedy's famous aphorism that a rising tide lifts all boats. "They know the economy is white hot," says political analyst Charlie Cook, "but they also know they aren't in it….There's a feeling that some people are getting theirs, but we aren't getting ours." Read the full column. – Alan Murray

Video: Alan Murray says that it's extraordinary for polls to reflect strong disatisfaction with the goverment's economic leadership, given that economy is actually doing quite well.

FBI Eyes Contractor In Los Alamos Leak (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

The FBI is focusing on a subcontractor at the Los Alamos National Laboratory as the possible source of classified information from the nuclear-weapons facility discovered during the arrest of a New Mexico man on drug charges.

Federal authorities said yesterday that the subcontractor, Jessica Quintana, was questioned after Los Alamos police discovered the classified data during a search for evidence of a drug business after the arrest of Justin Stone, 20, Friday.

Miss Quintana, who authorities said shared the mobile home with Mr. Stone, has not been charged in the case.

"This appears to be a new low: Even drug dealers can get classified information out of Los Alamos," said Danielle Brian, executive director of the Project On Government Oversight, a watchdog that has exposed seven incidents involving the mishandling or loss of classified information at nuclear-weapons facilities since 2002.

Authorities said the Los Alamos information was located on a computer flash drive, a portable flash memory card that plugs into a computer's Universal Serial Bus, or USB, port and functions as a hard drive. Flash drives have been banned from the Los Alamos laboratory for the past two years.

DOJ_NMG_0086758

Linton F. Brooks, chief of the National Nuclear Security Administration, said yesterday that "extraordinary efforts" have been made in the past three years to put strong security procedures in place at Los Alamos and other national laboratories to ensure that sensitive information is not compromised.

"Our job now is to assess what happened at Los Alamos, to determine whether procedures have been diligently observed, and to decide whether additional steps need to be taken," he said, adding that the agency's chief of defense nuclear security will "personally investigate the facts at Los Alamos."

Los Alamos Police Department Sgt. Chuck Ney said the classified information was located Friday at a trailer park in the city after officers responded to a domestic disturbance call. Police also found hazardous methamphetamine lab components.

Police then notified the FBI, and federal authorities began a separate investigation.

FBI Special Agent Bill Elwell in Albuquerque said a now-sealed search warrant was served in the case by agents, but he declined to discuss details of the ongoing investigation. He said the U.S. attorney's office in Albuquerque is "evaluating the information."

Los Alamos has a long history of security breaches. In December 1999, Wen Ho Lee, a Taiwanese-American scientist who worked at the laboratory, was accused of stealing secrets on the U.S. nuclear arsenal for China. After investigators dropped a 59-count complaint, Mr. Lee pleaded guilty to improper handling of restricted data.

In June, the government and five news organizations -- The Washington Post, Los Angeles Times, New York Times, ABC News and the Associated Press -- announced a $1.6 million settlement with Mr. Lee over accusations that government leaks violated his privacy.

In 2004, Los Alamos was shut down after an inventory found that two computer disks with nuclear secrets were missing. A year later, the lab concluded the disks never existed.

Los Alamos Disks May Hold U.S. Secrets (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

The contract employee at the center of a possible security breach at Los Alamos National Laboratory had a high-level clearance that may have given her special access to intelligence intercepts and other closely held national secrets, sources familiar with the case said yesterday.

The FBI is examining at least three computer disks that police in Los Alamos, N.M., discovered last week during a search of a suspected drug dealer's trailer home, according to the FBI and other agencies. A woman who was living at the home and worked for a Los Alamos subcontractor has been linked to the disks by investigators, officials said.

Authorities said the disks appear to contain classified material. An FBI search warrant filed in connection with the case has been sealed.

The investigation -- which was revealed publicly on Tuesday -- is the latest potential embarrassment for the Los Alamos lab, which is under new management and undergoing changes designed to improve security. The lab is one of the nation's three nuclear-weapons-research facilities.

Los Alamos Director Michael Anastasio confirmed the potential breach of security in a statement yesterday. He said that the lab is cooperating with the FBI and is implementing extra security measures.

"This is a serious matter, and we are taking immediate steps to address it," Anastasio said, adding that "we intend to do everything possible to guard against any criminal activity, particularly where a breach of security may be involved."

The National Nuclear Security Administration, which oversees Los Alamos, said it has begun its own investigation and has sent a "cyber security team" to New Mexico to review procedures.

The case began after the Los Alamos Police Department responded to an Oct. 17 domestic dispute complaint at the home. Officers found drug paraphernalia and other evidence of methamphetamine trafficking, officials said. A search through records in the home revealed the computer disks, and the FBI was notified.

FBI spokesman Bill Elwell in Albuquerque said no charges have been filed.

"We are at the stage of going through the evidence and assessing its importance," he said.

Former Los Alamos Subcontract Worker Probed In Breach (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt

Bloomberg, October 26, 2006

Oct. 25 (Bloomberg) -- The FBI is investigating a possible security breach at Los Alamos National Laboratory in New Mexico after people familiar with the matter said local police found what may be classified information while searching a residence for drugs.

DOJ_NMG_0086759

The potential security breach involves a former employee of a subcontractor at the nuclear-weapons laboratory, lab director Michael Anastasio said in a statement. He didn't identify the ex- employee or give further details. U.S. Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman told reporters in Washington the former employee was a woman and had worked as an archivist.

``We take this matter very seriously," Bodman said. ``It is on my priority list." He said the former employee had worked on ``archiving data from past history and making that available in electronic form so that it could be stored and accessed."

Special Agent Bill Elwell of the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Albuquerque office said local police called the bureau after finding ``evidence they thought would be of interest to us" while searching for methamphetamines at a private residence. The officers went to the home Oct. 17 in response to a call about a domestic dispute, and the FBI conducted a search Oct. 20, Elwell said.

Two law-enforcement officials who asked not to be identified said the evidence appeared to be classified information, stored in a computer file, from the Los Alamos lab.

Storage Devices

According to Los Alamos Police Department records, officers searching the home in a trailer park confiscated drug paraphernalia as well as three portable computer storage devices that allow users to transfer and carry data. Justin Stone, 20, was arrested on a warrant for a probation violation, police records said.

Anastasio's statement said the lab is ``fully cooperating with the FBI on this matter and we intend to do everything possible to guard against any criminal activity, particularly where a breach of security may be involved."

The Los Alamos facility has had security issues in the past. In 2004, work at the lab was halted when two computer disks with classified information were reported missing. It was later learned the disks never existed.

The laboratory also fired scientist Wen Ho Lee in 1999 after he was accused of passing nuclear secrets to China. Lee, who spent nine months in solitary confinement, was never charged with espionage and later pleaded guilty to one count of mishandling classified information. A federal judge apologized to Lee for the government's conduct in the case.

Man Once Held In Wales' Death Seeks New Venue For Gun Charge (AP)

AP, October 26, 2006

SEATTLE - A gun collector once jailed as a material witness in the assassination of a federal prosecutor is seeking a change of venue for an unrelated weapons charge.

Albert K. Kwan, of suburban Bellevue, says he cannot get a fair trial on the charge - possession of an unregistered machine gun - because in the public's mind, his case "is inseparably intertwined with that of the murder investigation of Assistant United States Attorney Thomas C. Wales," his lawyers wrote in a court filing this week.

Wales, an 18-year veteran of the U.S. attorney's office in Seattle and the president of the gun-control group Washington CeaseFire, was shot as he worked in the basement of his home in Seattle's Queen Anne Hill neighborhood on Oct. 11, 2001. The murder weapon was a Makarov pistol outfitted with a replacement barrel.

A nationwide search for the gun led the FBI to Kwan, who, agents say, purchased two of the barrels from a Minnesota company but has only turned over one of them. Kwan says he doesn't recall ever purchasing a second barrel.

In searching Kwan's home in January 2005, agents found what they say was an illegal, unregistered M-14. Kwan was charged with the gun count last month, although his attorneys say the weapon didn't meet the definition of a machine gun because parts had been welded to prevent it from firing automatically. They also insist the government brought the charge to "squeeze" him and ensure his cooperation with the grand jury investigating the Wales crime.

Last week, Kwan's lawyers filed court papers saying he would fully cooperate with the grand jury and take a lie-detector test.

Kwan's lead attorney, Joe Conte, said Wednesday he did not expect U.S. District Judge Thomas Zilly to move Kwan's trial on the weapons charge out of the Western District of Washington.

"It's very hard to win a venue change," he said.

Kwan was held for three weeks in January 2005 as a material witness in the Wales case. Conte said in the court filing that because of the news coverage, potential jurors are likely to "equate defendant's prosecution with the first killing of a federal prosecutor in our nation's history."

Conte has said his client was not involved in Wales' death.

The U.S. attorney's office did not have any immediate response to the request, said spokeswoman Emily Langlie.

An attachment to a separate filing by Kwan's lawyers sheds light on the FBI's search for Makarov replacement barrels.

The attachment, a letter from special prosecutor Steven Clymer to Assistant U.S. Attorney Bill Redkey in Seattle, says that the two barrels Kwan is alleged to have purchased were among 69 shipped by the Minnesota company, Federal Arms Corp., to addresses within a 50-mile radius of Wales' home. As of January 2005, when Kwan's house was searched, the FBI had yet to locate 30 of them.

DOJ_NMG_0086760

The FBI said this month it has located and test-fired about half of the 3,600 Makarov barrels that Federal Arms sold nationwide prior to the killing.

Family Faces New Charges In Military Secrets-to-China Case (MERCN)

By Gillian Flaccus

The San Jose Mercury News, October 26, 2006

SANTA ANA, Calif. - Five members of a family accused of scheming to send sensitive information about Navy warships to China were indicted Wednesday on new conspiracy charges, prosecutors said.

The indictment, handed down by a federal grand jury, added counts of conspiracy to export U.S. defense articles to China; possession of property in aid of a foreign government and making false statements to federal investigators.

Named in the supplemental indictment were Chi Mak, a U.S. citizen who worked for Anaheim defense contractor Power Paragon; his wife, Rebecca Laiwah Chiu; his brother, Tai Mak; Tai Mak's wife, Fuk Heung Li; and their son, Billy Yui Mak.

Li, 49, and her 26-year-old son already faced charges of making false statements and acting as agents of a foreign government, namely China, without prior notification to the U.S. attorney general.

Chi Mak, 66, Tai Wang Mak, 57, and Rebecca Laiwah Chiu, 62, were previously charged with one count of failing to register as a foreign agent.

The government claims that Chi Mak passed information about U.S. naval technology from his employer to his brother and that his nephew, Billy Mak, then helped encrypt the files onto CD-ROM computer disk. That disk was found hidden the luggage of Tai Mak and his wife after they were arrested in October 2005 at Los Angeles International Airport as they prepared to travel to Hong Kong and Guangzhou, China, authorities said.

Attorneys for the Maks said they were not aware of the new indictment until contacted by The Associated Press.

Ronald Kaye, an attorney for Chi Mak, said his client worked with sensitive information as part of his daily job, but never misused it or stole intelligence.

"My client is involved in an area of technology that is not classified - is not even prohibited from distribution," Kaye said. "It's a strong sign that they are desperately trying to find whatever counts can stick. They've overcharged this case consistently."

Stanley Greenberg, an attorney for Rebecca Chiu, also said his client was innocent.

"It really doesn't matter how they keep changing the format of the charges. The evidence will eventually show she's not guilty, because it all grows out of the same facts," Greenberg said.

John Early, an attorney for Tai Mak, said he had not seen the indictment and couldn't comment. Attorneys for Fuk Li and Billy Mak and the Mak family attorney didn't immediately return calls left after business hours Wednesday.

According to the FBI, Chi Mak told investigators his brother was giving the information to a researcher at the a Chinese university center that conducts operations research for and receives funding from the People's Liberation Army.

Prosecutors have said previously that authorities recovered from the disk restricted documents on the DDX Destroyer, an advanced technology warship. They also allege that they found two tasking lists in Chinese asking Mak to get documents about submarine torpedo technology, electromagnetic artillery systems, weapon standardization, early warning technology used to detect incoming missiles, and defenses used against nuclear attack.

The FBI originally arrested Chi Mak and his wife for investigation of conspiracy to steal U.S. government documents. That allegation was never charged, and no one has been charged with espionage in the case.

The new indictment includes three counts of actual and attempted unlawful export of defense articles for Chi Mak; one count of possession of property in aid of a foreign government for Tai Mak; one count each against Chi Mak, Tai Mak and Rebecca Chiu for making false statements; and one count against all five family members for conpsiracy to export defense articles.

Chi Mak is in custody pending a March 20 trial. The other four are scheduled for trial on May 15. Tai Mak and Billy Mak are in custody; Fuk Li and Rebecca Chiu are free on bail.

A hearing on several defense motions is scheduled for Nov. 17.

5 In Family Charged With Military Data Conspiracy (LAT)

By H.g. Reza, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 26, 2006

One was an engineer on a submarine propulsion project. Defense lawyers say the government is straining to make a case.

DOJ_NMG_0086761

Five family members already facing charges for allegedly failing to register as agents of the Chinese government faced new charges Wednesday after a federal grand jury indicted them on charges of conspiring to export sensitive military information.

The 15-count indictment unsealed in Santa Ana includes allegations raised last year against lead defendant Chi Mak and three of his relatives but never pursued by the government until now. Instead, Mak, his wife, Rebecca Laiwah Chiu, and his brother, Tai Wang Mak, were charged Nov. 15, 2005, with failing to register as agents of a foreign government.

The new indictment accuses them of conspiring to export technical data regarding sensitive submarine and warship technology to China, and possessing military-related articles aimed at aiding that country. They are also accused of lying to federal investigators.

Also named in the indictment are Tai Mak's wife, Fuk Heung Li, and their son, Yui Mak. The five family members live in Downey and Alhambra.

Prosecutors did not return telephone calls Wednesday but previously had said Chi Mak received requests for specific military information from unnamed Chinese officials. In the conspiracy alleged by the government, Chi Mak and his wife copied the material onto CD-ROM disks and gave them to Tai Mak. Yui Mak encrypted the data and his parents allegedly tried to take them to China in October 2005.

Chi Mak, 66 and a naturalized U.S. citizen, was the lead project engineer on a contract to develop a quiet electric-drive propulsion system for U.S. Navy submarines at Paragon Power in Anaheim.

Authorities said he had security clearance that gave him access to sensitive technical information.

His wife, Chiu, 63, is also a naturalized citizen. Both are originally from China, as are the other defendants.

Federal prosecutors acknowledged last year that the information Chi Mak and the others gathered was not classified. In fact, much of it can be found on the Internet.

Wednesday's indictment, however, says the president has the authority "to control the import and export of defense articles" by placing them on the United States Munitions List, apparently even if they are readily accessible to the public. Articles placed on the list can be exported only by agents of a foreign government registered with the Defense Department, according to the indictment.

The court document does not say whether the articles the defendants allegedly conspired to export to China were on the government's munitions list, or when they might have been placed there.

Attorney Ron Kaye, who represents Chi Mak, said none of the information in his client's possession was restricted.

"The government has a history of overstating this case," he said. "They said he stole government property and retracted the charge. They said he was engaged in espionage and they retracted the charge. They're throwing everything at him, hoping something will stick."

Early in the case, prosecutors also alleged that Chi Mak had obtained plans for a nuclear power plant in New York. Later, however, they said it was merely directions from the airport to the plant that he had downloaded. According to Kaye, Chi Mak's company had a contract with the facility.

John Early, who represents Tai Mak, said the government was "having a hard time picking a charge."

"If it took them a year to figure out that the information was on a restricted list, I'll be interested to see the government's evidence to support the charges," Early said.

Chi Mak, Tai Mak, 57, and Yui Mak, 26, are being held without bail.

hgreza@latimes.com

Enforcer Faces Charges In Trooper Threat (PHI)

By George Anastasia

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 26, 2006

Bodybuilder and mob enforcer Vincent "Big Vincent" Filipelli was ordered held without bail yesterday for allegedly threatening an undercover New Jersey State Police trooper involved in an organized-crime gambling investigation.

Authorities said Filipelli, 53, made the threat at a South Philadelphia "gentleman's club" where a meeting had been set up to discuss a gambling debt he was attempting to collect.

The onetime competitive weight-lifter was unaware that the two men he was meeting with were both undercover state troopers and that one of them was wearing a body wire.

The meeting occurred in May at the Crazy Horse Too, an upscale go-go bar and restaurant on South Columbus Boulevard, according to a document made public during a federal court hearing in Camden yesterday.

Filipelli allegedly told the undercover investigator who owed the money that he would be hurt if he did not pay up.

DOJ_NMG_0086762

"Filipelli [said] that he would track him down and put him in the hospital for a year," according to an affidavit filed by FBI agent James A. Titcombe, who worked the case with the state police.

Later, as he was driving back to Cherry Hill with one of the undercover officials, Filipelli boasted that he was a "made" member of the Philadelphia mob, according to the document.

"He was rather brazen," said state police detective Salvatore DeGirolamo.

DeGirolamo, assigned to the casino unit of the State Police Organized Crime Control Bureau South, declined to comment further about the investigation, which began in August 2005 and targeted a mob-run gambling ring. The FBI joined the probe in February, according to court documents.

Filipelli was taking bets and making collections for a South Philadelphia-based mob bookmaker, according to one source familiar with the probe. He and the bookmaker unwittingly began taking bets from the undercover trooper as part of a sting operation.

No one else has been charged in the case, which is built around secretly recorded conversations and extensive surveillance. Authorities emphasized yesterday that the investigation was continuing. More arrests are expected.

Filipelli, who spent Tuesday night in the Camden County Jail, appeared yesterday before U.S. Magistrate Judge Anne Marie Donio. The judge set a bail hearing for Monday and ruled that Filipelli would remain in federal custody until then.

Filipelli was charged with gambling, extortion and traveling interstate - from Cherry Hill to Philadelphia for the meeting at the Crazy Horse Too - to commit a crime of violence.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Jacqueline Carle, in seeking to have Filipelli held without bail, argued that he was a danger to the community. The tape in which he threatened the undercover trooper may be played at Monday's hearing to support that argument.

Donald Manno, Filipelli's attorney, argued that his client was not a threat. He pointed out that the alleged incident had occurred in May and that authorities had left Filipelli on the streets until his arrest Tuesday.

Filipelli also faces additional gambling, loan-sharking and money-laundering charges lodged by the state police. Authorities are expected to expand those charges to include weapons and drug offenses.

Detectives found a stun gun and what appeared to be vials containing steroids during a search of Filipelli's home in the 500 block of New York Avenue in Cherry Hill on Tuesday, according to the state police.

Manno said he suspected the federal charges were "part of something bigger." He said his client had rejected an offer to cooperate.

"He's not cooperating and he's not likely to cooperate," Manno said. "It just isn't in him."

Filipelli served more than four years in prison after pleading guilty to federal and state extortion charges in 1995.

At a sentencing hearing in 1996, a federal prosecutor described him as an "international-class athlete [who] basically became a thug" for the mob.

Authorities Arrest Reputed Mobster On Federal Charges (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, October 26, 2006

CAMDEN, N.J. (AP) _ Authorities have arrested a reputed organized crime family member on charges stemming from an investigation into illegal sports gambling, state police said Wednesday.

State police, working with the FBI's Philadelphia office, arrested Vincent Filipelli, 53, at his Cherry Hill home on Tuesday. They seized anabolic steroids and drug paraphernalia valued at $10,000, two stun guns, gambling records and cash, according to state police.

Filipelli faces state and federal charges related to a sports betting operation and the distribution of illegal drugs, specifically anabolic steroids, said state police Sgt. Stephen Jones.

He was being held without bail Wednesday at the Camden County jail, pending a federal hearing.

According to state police, Filipelli was a former bodyguard for John Stanfa, boss of the Philadelphia La Cosa Nostra organized crime family.

During an undercover investigation that included two state police detectives, Filipelli threatened one of the undercover detectives, whom he believed owed him a debt, telling him he would put him in the hospital for a year, according to state police.

Gotti Says Detective Helped In Killing Of A Witness (NYS)

By Jerry Capeci

New York Sun, October 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0086763

At a secret session with the feds last year, John "Junior" Gotti fingered a former NYPD detective as a money-hungry rogue who gave up confidential information about a 1983 barroom murder — information that Gambino wiseguys used to kill a witness whose death has been officially ruled a suicide for more than two decades, Gang Land has learned.

Law enforcement sources said Gotti attributed his stunning account about the death by hanging of Vinny Cennamo to what he was told several years after the fact by mobster Angelo Ruggiero, a close ally of Gotti's late father who died of cancer in 1989.

Police reports state that Cennamo, a friend of the murder victim, fingered Mark Caputo, a burly 6-foot-2-inch, 300-pound "bodyguard" whom the elder John Gotti had assigned to watch over his son, as the killer and said he left the bar with Junior.

According to what Junior told the feds, Ruggiero said that he and two other cronies of the elder Gotti used crucial background information supplied by the detective to whack Cennamo and make it appear to be a suicide, the sources said.

